TO THE HIGH AND MIGHTIE Prince IAMES, by the grace of God King of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, Defendor of the Faith, &c.

IT may of ſome, and not without juſt cauſe (moſt gracious and dread Soueraigne) be imputed vnto me for no ſmall preſumption, to preſent vnto your royall Majeſtie (a prince of ſo great learning and judgement) theſe homely fruits of mine endeuours and paines taken in the Generall Hiſtorie of the Turkes, and ſtrange ſucceſſe of their great and mightie Othoman Empire. Whereunto for all that I was the rather induced, not only by the rare and wonderfull clemencie joyned vnto many other the great and moſt reſplendent vertues of your heroicall mind; the leaſt whereof is ſufficient to haue cheared vp my weake and feeble ſpirits; but alſo by the encouragement of the right Worſhipful my moſt eſpecial good friend Sir Peter Manwood knight of the Bath, the firſt mouer of me to take this great worke in hand, and my continuall and only comfort, ſtay, and helper therein. Which to doe, I was alſo the more deſirous, ſeeing diuers little volumes, and ſmall parts of the Hiſtorie preſented vnto the greateſt Princes: as the little Treatiſe of Paulus Iou. de Rebus Turcicis, dedicated vnto the great and mightie Emperour Charles the fifth, and the ſmall Hiſtorie of Cœlius Secundus, de Bello Melitenſi, vnto her late ſacred Maieſtie, of moſt happie and bleſſed memorie, the rare Phœnix of her ſex, who now reſteth in glorie: with diuers others of like ſort by the learned Authors thereof ſtill commended ſome to one great Prince of their times, ſome to others: all filling me with good hope, that this whole and continuat Hiſtorie of that Northren and warlike Nation (which in ſhort time by God his appointment hath brought ſuch fatall mutations vpon a great part of the world, as former times haue ſeldome or neuer ſeene) drawne euen from the firſt beginning thereof (not together to my knowledge by any one before written) ſhould with your moſt noble Maieſtie find no leſſe grace and fauour, than hath almoſt euery part thereof with other the aforeſaid and ſuch like moſt mightie and famous Princes: and the rather, for that your Maieſtie hath not diſdained in your Lepanto or Heroicall Song, with your learned Muſe to adorne and ſet forth the greateſt and moſt glorious victory that euer was by any the Chriſtian confederate Princes obtained againſt theſe the Othoman Kings or Emperors. Beſides that the matter and argument of this Hiſtory and ſuch like (ſo much concerning the ſtate and good of the Chriſtian commonweale in generall, neuer by any ſo much impugned or endangered, as by theſe the naturall & capitall enemies therof) of right vnto non ſo properly belõgeth, as vnto your moſt excellent Maieſty, with the reſt of the chriſtian princes, ſitting at the helme of your eſtates, who only by your vnited forces (the barbarous enemies greateſt terrour) are able to giue remedy therunto: in the chiefeſt ranke of whom, your ſacred Maieſty for glory, honour, ſtrength, and power (God long preſerue the ſame) is now ſecond vnto none. Thus perſuaded and encouraged, I in all humble and dutifull manner do preſent vnto your Maieſty theſe my weake endeauours, according to my abilitie and means continued for ſome few yeres more: which how vnworthy ſoeuer they be of ſo great and princely fauour, as well for the meanneſſe of mee the Author, as for the plainneſſe of the ſtile; yet if for the worthineſſe of the matter, or of your owne great & infinit clemency you vouchſafe them your Maieſties fauourable regard, they ſhall no doubt liue no leſſe fortunat, than if they had bin more happily born or brought to light: ſeruing (if to no other vſe) yet as fair warnings vnto ſuch great ones as God hath heere vpon earth exalted aboue the reſt vnto the higheſt degrees of power and of ſtate, for the good gouernment and defence of his Church and people. Accept them, I beſeech you, moſt mightie monarch, into your gracious protection, ſo ſhal I (if God ſpare life) be comforted and incouraged vnder ſo mightie a fauour to proceed to amend what ſhal be found amiſſe, and adde what future times and better helpe ſhal diſcouer and miniſter vnto me for the perfection of this Hiſtory: and according to my bounden duty inceſſantly in all humilitie pray vnto the great God of all might and power (by whom all kings and princes raigne) to his glory long to preſerue your moſt royall Maieſtie in bleſſed health and peace to rule and raigne ouer vs and theſe your great kingdomes, ſo happily by you vnited: and ſo likewiſe (his will ſo being) your moſt noble poſteritie after you, euen to the worlds end.

Your Maieſties moſt

humble and obedient ſubiect,

Richard Knolles.

The Authors induction to the Christian Reader vnto the Historie following.

THe long and still declining state of the Christian Commonweale, with the vtter ruine and subuersion of the Empire of the East, and many other most glorious kingdomes and prouinces of the Christians, neuer to be sufficiently lamented, might with the due consideration thereof worthily moue euen a right stony heart to ruth: but therwith also to call to remembrance the dishonour done vnto the blessed name of our Sauiour Christ Iesus, the desolation of his Church heere militant vpon earth, the dreadfull danger daily threatned vnto the poore remainder thereof, the millions of soules cast headlong into eternall destruction, the infinite number of wofull Christians (whose grieuous groanings vnder the heauie yoke of infidelitie no tongue is able to expresse) with the carelesnesse of the great for the redresse thereof, might giue iust cause vnto any good Christian to sit downe, and with the heauie Prophet to say as hee did of Hierusalem: O how hath the Lord darkened the daughter of Sion in his wrath? and cast downe from heauen vnto the earth the beautie of Israel, and remembred not his footstoole in the day of his wrath? Lament. Hieremię, cap. 2. All which miseries (with many others so great, as greater there cannone bee) the prince of darknesse and authour of all mischiefe hath by the persecuting princes of all ages, and auncient heretikes his ministers, laboured from time to time to bring vpon the Church of God, to the obscuring of his blessed name, and vtter subuersion of his most sacred word; but yet by none, no not by them all together so much preuailed, as by the false prophet Mahomet, borne in an vnhappie houre, to the great destruction of mankind: whose most grosse and blasphemous doctrine first phantasied by himselfe in Arabia, and so by him obtruded vnto the world; and afterwards by the Sarasin Caliphes (his seduced successors) with greater forces maintained, was by them together with their Empire, dispersed ouer a great part of the face of the earth, to the vnspeakeable ruine and destruction of the Christian Religion and State: especially in Asia and Africke, with some good part of Europe also. But the vnitie of this great Mahometane Monarchie being once dissolued, and it diuided into many kingdomes, and so after the manner of worldly things drawing vnto the fatall period of it selfe, in processe of time became of farre lesse force than before, and so lesse dreadfull vnto the Christian princes of the West, by whom these Sarasins were againe expulsed out of all the parts of Europe, excepting one corner of Spaine, which they yet helde within the remembrance of our fathers, vntill that by their victorious forces they were thence at length happily remooued also, after that they had possessed the same aboue the space of seuen hundred yeares. In this declination of the Sarasins, the first champions of the Mahometane superstition, who though they had lost much, yet held they many kingdomes both in Asia and Africke, taken for the most part from the Christians) arise the Turks, an obscure and base people, before scarce known vnto the world, yet fierce and courragious, who by their valour first aspired vnto the kingdome of Persia, with diuers other large prouinces: from whence they were about 170 yeares after againe expulsed by the Tartars, and enforced to retire themselues into the lesser Asia: where taking the benefit of the discord of the Christian princes of the East, and the carelesnesse of the Christians in generall, they in some good measure repaired their former losses againe, and maintained the state of a kingdome at Iconium in Cilicia (now of them called Caramania) holding in their subiection the greatst part of that fruitfull countrey, still seeking to gaine from the Christians what they had before lost vnto the Tartars. But this kingdome of the Turkes declining also, by the dismembring of the same, there stept vp among the Turkes in Bythinia, one Osman or Othoman, of the Oguzian tribe or familie, a man of great spirit and valour, who by little and little growing vp amongst the rest of his countreymen, and other the effeminate Christians on that side of Asia, at last like another Romulus, tooke vpon him the name of a Sultan or King, and is right worthily accounted

ted the first founder of the mightie Empire of the Turkes: which continued by many discents directly in the line of himselfe, euen vnto Achmat, who now raigneth, is from a small beginning become the greatest terrour of the world, and holding in subiection many great and mightie kingdomes in Asia, Europe, and Africke, is growne to that height of pride, as that it threatneth destruction vnto the rest of the kingdomes of the earth; labouring with nothing more than with the weight of it selfe. In the greatnesse whereof is swallowed vp both the name and Empire of the Sarasins, the glorious Empire of the Greeks, the renowned kingdomes of Macedonia, Peloponesus, Epirus, Bulgaria, Seruia, Bosna, Armenia, Cyprus, Syria, Ægypt, Iudea, Tunes, Algiers, Media, Mesopotamia, with a great part of Hungarie, as also of the Persian kingdom, and all those churches and places so much spoken of in holy Scripture (the Romanes onely excepted;) and in briefe, so much of Christendome as farre exceedeth that which is thereof at this day left. So that at this present if you consider the beginning, progresse, and perpetuall felicitie of this the Othoman Empire, there is in this world nothing more admirable or strange; if the greatnesse and lustre therof, nothing more magnificent or glorious; if the power and strength thereof, nothing more dreadfull or dangerous: which wondering at nothing but at the beautie of it selfe, and drunke with the pleasant wine of perpetuall felicitie, holdeth all the rest of the world in scorne, thundering out nothing but still bloud and warre, with a full perswasion in time to rule ouer all, prefixing vnto it selfe no other limits than the vttermost bounds of the earth, from the rising of the Sun vnto the going down of the same. The causes whereof are many and right lamentable, but for the most part so shut vp in the counsels of the Great, as that for mee to seeke after them, were great follie: yet amongst the rest, some others there be, so pregnant and manifest, as that the blind world taketh thereof as it were a generall knowledge, and may therefore without offence of the wiser sort (as I hope) euen in these our nice dayes be lightly touched. Whereof the first and greatest, is the iust and secret iudgement of the Almightie, who in iustice deliuereth into the hands of these mercilesse miscreants, nation after nation, and kingdome vpon kingdome, as vnto the most terrible executioners of his dreadfull wrath, to be punished for their sinnes: others in the meane while, no lesse sinfull than they, in his mercie enioying the benefit of a longer time, calling them vnto repentance. Then, the vncertaintie of worldly things, which subiect to perpetuall change, cannot long stay in one state, but as the sea is with the wind, so are they in like sort tossed vp and down with the continual surges and waues of alteration and change; so that being once growne to their height, they there stay not long, but fall againe as fast as euer they rise, and so in time come to nothing: As wee see the greatest Monarchies that euer yet were vpon earth haue done, their course being run; ouer whom Time now triumpheth, as no doubt at length it shall ouer this so great a Monarchie also, when it shall but then liue by fame, as the others now do. Next to these causes from aboue (without offence be it said) is the small care the Christian princes, especially those that dwelt further off, haue had of the common state of the Christian Commonweale, whereof euen the verie greatest are to account themselues but as the principall members of one and the same bodie, and haue, or ought to haue, as sharp a feeling one of anothers harmes, as hath the head of the wrongs done vnto the feet, or rather, as if it were done vnto themselues: in stead of which Christian compassion and vnitie, they haue euer, and euen yet at this time are so diuided among themselues with endlesse quarels, partly for questions of religion (neuer by the sword to be determined,) partly for matters touching their own proper state and soueraigntie, and that with such distrust and implacable hatred, that they neuer could as yet (although it haue been long wished) ioyne their common forces against the common enemie: but turning their weapons one vpon another (the more to be lamented) haue from time to time weakened themselues, and opened a way for him to deuour them one after another: Whereas with their combined forces (the greedie enemies greatest terrour) they might long since not onely haue represſed his furie, and abated his pride, but with small daunger and much glorie (God fauouring their so honourable attempts) haue againe recouered from him most of those famous Christian kingdomes, which he by force against all right holdeth at this day in most miserable subiection and thraldome; many millions of the poore oppressed Christians in the meane time out of the furnace of tribulatian, in the anguish of their soules crying in vaine vnto their Christian brethren for reliefe. By ciuile discord the noble countrey of Græcia perished, when as the father rising against the sonne, and the sonne against the father, and brother against brother, they to the mutuall destruction of themselues, called in the Turke, who like a greedie lyon lurking in his den, lay in wait for them all. So perished the kingdomes of Bulgaria, Seruia, Bosna, and Epirus, with the famous islands of the Rhodes and Cyprus, betrayed as it were by the Christian princes their neighbours, by whom they might haue easily beene releeued. So the most flourishing and strong kingdome of Hungarie (in the reliques whereof the fortune of the Turkish Empire hath longer stucke, than in the conquest of any other kingdome, by it attempted, whatsoeuer) diuided in it selfe by the ambition of princes, and ciuile discord, the weaker still calling vnto his aid the mightie power of the Turke, is long since for the most part become vnto him a prey, the poore remainders thereof being at this day hardly defended by the forces of the Christian Emperour and of

The causes of the greatnesse and encreast of the Turks Empire.

the Princes his confederats, ſeldome times meeting together with ſuch cheerefulneſſe or expedition as the neceſſitie of ſo great a matter requireth. Vnto which ſo great a cauſe of the common decay, may be added the euill choice of our ſouldiours employed in thoſe warres, who taken vp hand ouer head out of the promiſcuous vulgar people, are for moſt part vntrained men, ſeruing rather for ſhew, and the filling vp of number, than for vſe, and in no reſpect to be compared with the Turkes Ianizaries, and other his moſt expert ſouldiours, continually euen from their youth exerciſed in feats of armes. Not to ſpeake in the meane time of the want of the auntient martiall diſcipline, the wholeſome preſeruatiue of moſt puiſſant armies, which breedeth in the proud enemie a contempt of the Chriſtian forces, with a full perſwaſion of himſelfe, that he is not by ſuch diſordered and weake meanes to be withſtood. But to come neerer vnto the cauſes of the Turkes greatneſſe, and more proper vnto themſelues, as not depending of the improuident careleſneſſe, weakneſſe, diſcord, or imperfections of others: firſt in them is to be noted an ardent and infinit deſire of ſoueraigntie, wherewith they haue long ſince promiſed vnto themſelues the monarchie of the whole world, a quick motiue vnto their ſo hautie deſignes: Then, ſuch a rare vnitie and agreement amongſt them, as well in the manner of their religion (if it be ſo to be called) as in matters concerning their ſtate (eſpecially in all their enterpriſes to be taken in hand for the augmenting of their Empire) as that thereof they call themſelues Iſlami, that is to ſay, men of one mind, or at peace among themſelues; ſo as it is not to be maruelled, if thereby they grow ſtrong themſelues, and dreadfull to others: ioyne vnto this their courage, conceiued by the wonderfull ſucceſſe of their perpetuall fortune, their notable vigilancie in taking the aduantage of euerie occaſion for the enlarging of their Monarchie, their frugalitie and temperatneſſe in their diet, and other manner of liuing, their ſtrait obſeruing of their auntient militarie diſcipline, their cheerfull and almoſt incredible obedience vnto their Princes and Sultans; ſuch, as in that point no nation in the world was to be worthily compared vnto them: all great cauſes why their Empire hath ſo mightily encreaſed and ſo long continued. Whereunto may be added the two ſtrongeſt ſinews of euery well gouerned commonweale, Reward propounded to the good, and Puniſhment threatned vnto the offendor; where the prize is for vertue and valour ſet vp, and the way laid open for euery common perſon, be he neuer ſo meanely borne, to aſpire vnto the greateſt honours and preferments both of the Court and of the field, yea euen vnto the neereſt affinitie of the great Sultan himſelfe, if his valour or other worth ſhall ſo deſerue: when as on the contrarie part the diſloyall or cowardly is to expect from the ſame ſoueraigne power nothing but diſgrace, death, and torture. And yet theſe great ones not contented by ſuch commendable and lawfull meane, ſtill to extend or eſtabliſh their farre ſpreading Empire, if that point once come in queſtion, they ſticke not in their diuelliſh policy to breake and infringe the lawes both of Nations and Nature. Their leagues grounded vpon the law of Nations, be they with neuer ſo ſtrong capitulations concluded, or ſolemnitie of oath confirmed, haue with them no longer force than ſtandeth with their owne profit, ſeruing indeed but as ſnares to entangle other princes in, vntill they haue ſingled out him whom they purpoſe to deuoure; the reſt faſt bound by their leagues, ſtill looking on, as if their owne turne ſhould neuer come, yet with no more aſſurance of their ſafetie by their leagues, than had the other whom they ſee periſh before their faces. As for the kind law of Nature, what can be thereunto more contrary, than for the father moſt vnnaturally to embrue his hands in the bloud of his owne children? and the brother to become the bloudie executioner of his owne brother? a common matter among the Othoman Emperours. All which moſt execrable and inhumane murthers, they couer with the pretended ſafetie of their ſtate, as thereby freed from the feare of all aſpiring competitors (the greateſt torment of the mightie) and by the preſeruation of the integritie of their Empire, which they thereby keepe whole and entire vnto themſelues, and ſo deliuer it as it were by hand from one to another, in no part diſmembred or impaired. By theſe and ſuch like meanes is this barbarous Empire (of almoſt nothing) growne to that height of maieſtie and power, as that it hath in contempt all the reſt, being it ſelfe not inferiour in greatneſſe and ſtrength vnto the greateſt Monarchies that euer yet were vpon the face of the earth, the Romane Empire onely excepted. Which how farre it ſhall yet further ſpread, none knoweth, but he that holdeth in his hand all the kingdomes of the earth, and with his word boundeth in the raging of the ſea, ſo that it cannot further paſſe. Moued with the greatneſſe and glorie of this ſo mightie and dreadfull an Empire, growne for the moſt part out of the ruine of the Chriſtian commonweale, with the vtter ſubuerſion of many great and flouriſhing kingdomes, and wofull fall of many moe right puiſſant and mightie princes, not without griefe to be remembred: I long ſince (as many others haue) entred into the heauie conſideration thereof, purpoſing ſo to haue contented my ſelfe with a light view of that which might well be for euer of all good Chriſtians lamented, but hardly or neuer remedied; vntill that afterwards led with a more earneſt deſire to know the ſtrange and fatall mutations, by this barbarous nation in former time brought vpon a great part of the world, as alſo ſo much as I might to ſee ſo great a terrour of the preſent time, and in what tearmes it ſtandeth with the reſt, I had with long ſearch and much labor, mixt with ſome pleaſure & mine own reaſonable contentment, paſſed through the whole melancholly course of their tragicall History: yet without purpose euer to haue commended the same or any part thereof vnto the remembrance of posteritie, as deeming it an argument of too high a reach, and fitter for some more happie wit, better furnished with such helpes both of nature and art as are of necessitie requisite for the vndertaking of so great a charge, than was my selfe, of many thousands the meanest. Not vnmindfull also of that which the Poet (keeping decorum) saith in like case, though farre lesse matter, of himselfe:

Virg. Ecloga sexta.

Cum canerem reges & prælia, Cynthius aurem Velit, & admonuit: Pastorem Tittere pingues Pascere oportet oues, deductum ducere carmen.

When I did sing of mightie Kings, or else of bloudie warre, Apollo pluckt me by the eare, and said I went too farre:
Beseemes a shepheard Titterus his fatlings for to feed,
And for to fit his rurall song vnto his slender reed.

Besides that, so manie difficulties euen at the first presented themselues vnto my view, as to ouercome the same, if I should take the labour in hand, seemed to me almost impossible: for beside the sea and world of matter I was to passe through (requiring both great labour and time) full of the most rare example both of the better and worse fortune in men of all sort and condition, yeelding more pleasure vnto the Reader than facilitie to the Writer, I saw not any (among so many as had taken this argument in hand) whom I might as a sure guide or loadstarre long follow in the course of this so great an Historie: many right worthie and learned men (whose memorie my soule honoureth) contenting themselues to haue with their learned pennes enrolled in the Recordes of neuer-dying Fame, some one great expedition or action, some, another, as in their times they fell out: yea, the Turkish Histories and Chronicles themselues (from whom the greatest light for the continuation of the Historie was in reason to haue beene expected) being in the declaration of their owne affaires (according to their barbarous manner) so sparing and short, as that they may of right bee accounted rather short rude notes, than iust Histories, rather poynting things out, than declaring the same; and that with such obscuritie, by changing the ancient and vsuall names as well of whole kindomes, countreyes, and prouinces, as of cities, townes, riuers, mountaines, and other places, yea, and oftentimes of men themselues, into other strange and barbarous names of their owne deuising, in such sort, as might well stay an intentiue Reader, and depriue him of the pleasure together with the profit hee might otherwise expect by the reading thereof; whereunto to giue order, perspicuitie, and light, would require no small trauell and paine: Not to speake in the meane time of the diuersitie of reports in the course of the whole Historie, such as is oftentimes most hard, if not altogether impossible, to reconcile. Notwithstanding all which difficulties, with many others more proper vnto my selfe, hauing with long labour and diligent search passed through the course of the whole Historie, and so in some reasonable sort satisfied my selfe therein, I thought it not amisse, as well for the worthinesse of the matter, as for the zeale I beare vnto the Christian Commonweale, and for the satisfying also of some others my good friends much desirous of the same, to make proofe if out of the dispersed workes of many right worthie men, I could set downe one orderly and continuate Historie of this so mightie an Empire, with the great and fatall mutation or rather subuersion of manie right strong and flourishing kingdomes and states (the proper worke of all mightie rising Empires, still encreasing by the fall of others) wherewith this proud Monarchie hath alreadie daunted a great part of the world, being so many and so strange, as that moe or more wonderfull were not euer to bee seene in any of the greatest Monarchies of auncient time or memorie, and so together, and as it were vnder one view, and at one shew, to lay open vnto the Christian Reader, what I was glad to seeke for out of the diffused labours of many: a worke so long and laborious, as might well haue deterred a right resolute and constant mind from the vndertaking thereof, being as yet to my knowledge not vndergone or performed by any: wherein among such varieties, or more truely to say, contrarieties of Writers, I contented not my selfe, as a blinde man led by his guide, happily of no better sight than himselfe, to tread the steppes of this or that one man, going for a while before mee, and by and by leauing mee againe stumbling in the darke: but out of the learned and faithfull workes of manie, according to my simple iudgement to make choyce of that was most probable, still supplying with the perfections of the better, what I found wanting or defectiue in the weaker, propounding vnto my selfe no other marke to ayme at, than the verie truth of the Historie; as that which is it selfe of power to giue life vnto the dead letter, and to couer the faults escaped in the homely penning or compiling thereof. Which the better to performe, I collected so much of the Historie as possibly I could, out of the writings of such as were themselues themſelues preſent, and as it were eie-witneſſes of the greateſt part of that they writ, and ſo, as of all others beſt able, moſt like alſo to haue left vnto vs the very truth. Such is the greateſt part of ſo much of the hiſtory of the Greeke empire as I haue (for the better vnderſtanding of the riſing of the Turkes) in this hiſtorie ſet downe, gathered out of the doings of Nicetas Choniates, Nicephorus, Gregoras, and Laonicus Chalcocondiles, all writing ſuch things as they themſelues ſaw, or were for moſt part in their time, and neere vnto them, done. Such are the wonderfull and almoſt incredible wars betwixt old Amurath the ſecond, and his ſonne, the fortunate prince of Epirus, of the Turks commonly called Scanderbeg, & by that wayward tyrant at his death together with his kingdome deliuered, as it were by inheritance, vnto his ſonne, the great and cruell Sultan Mahomet; all written by Marinus Barletius, himſelfe an Epirot, & in all thoſe troubleſome times then liuing in Scodra, a citie of the Venetians ioyning vpon Epirus. Such is the wofull captiuitie of the imperiall citie of Conſtantinople, with the miſerable death of the Greeke Emperour Conſtantinus Palæologus, and the fatall ruine of the Greeke empire, written by Leonardus Chienſis, Archbiſhop of Mitylene, being himſelfe then preſent, & there taken priſoner. Such is the lamentable hiſtory of the Rhodes, taken for moſt part out of Ia. Fontanus his three bookes de bello Rhodio, a learned man then preſent and in great credit with Villerius the great Maſter, at ſuch time as that famous iſland, after it had by him & the other worthie knights of the Order bin moſt wonderfully long defended, was to the great ruth of Chriſtendom taken by the great Sultan Solyman. Such is the moſt tragicall hiſtory of Baiazet, Solyman his yongeſt ſonne, collected out of the notable Epiſtles of Augerius Buſbequius Legationis Turcicæ, he himſelfe then lying embaſſador for the emperor Ferdinand at Conſtantinoble, & preſent in Solymans camp, at ſuch time as he himſelf in perſon went ouer with his army into Aſia, to countenance his eldeſt ſon Selymus, who ſucceeded him in the empire, againſt his valiant yonger brother Baiazet; and beſide well acquainted with the great Baſſaes, Achmet, Ruſtan, Haly, & others, oftentimes mentioned in the hiſtorie following. Such is alſo the hiſtory of the taking of the ancient citie of Tripolis in Barbarie from the knights of Malta by Sinan the proud Baſſa, written by Nicholas Nicholay lord of Arfeuile, preſent at the ſame time with the lord of Aramont, then embaſſador for the French king vnto Solyman. So might I ſay alſo of the miſerable ſpoile of the fruitfull and pleaſant iſlands of the Mediterranean, made by Lutzis Baſſa, Solyman his brother in law & great Admirall, with the ſubmitting of the iſland of Naxos to the Turkes obeiſance, written by Iohn Criſpe, at that time duke of the ſame iſland. And ſo likewiſe of diuers other parts of the hiſtorie, too long to rehearſe. But for as much as euery great and famous action had not the fortune to haue in it a Cæſar, ſuch as both could and would commend vnto poſteritie by writing that whereof they might truly ſay, They were themſelues a great part; many right excellent Generals contenting themſelues with the honour of the field, and their glorie there woon, leauing the honourable fame therof to be by others reported: for lacke of ſuch moſt certaine Authors, or rather (as I before ſaid) eye-witneſſes, I gathered ſo much as I could of that remained, out of the workes of ſuch, as being themſelues men of great place, and well acquainted with the great and worthy perſonages of their time, might from their mouths as from certaine Oracles report the vndoubted truth of many moſt famous exploits done both by themſelues and others: as might Pau: Iouius from the mouth of Muleaſſes king of Tunes, from Vaſtius the great generall, from Auria the prince of Melphis, Charles the Emperor his Admirall, and ſuch others: or elſe out of the writings of ſuch as were themſelues great trauellers into the Turkes dominions, and withall, diligent obſeruers of their affaires and ſtate, as were the Phyſitians Pantaleon, Minadoie, and Leunclauius (of all others a moſt curious ſearcher of their antiquities and hiſtories) vnto which great Clerkes, and ſome others of that learned profeſſion, we may worthily attribute the greateſt light & certaintie of that is reported of a great part of the Turkiſh affaires. But theſe in the courſe of ſo long an hiſtorie failing alſo (as by conferring that which is hereafter written, together with their hiſtories, is eaſily to bee perceiued) to perfect that I had taken in hand, I tooke my refuge vnto the writings of ſuch other learned and credible authors, as of whoſe integritie and faithfulneſſe the world hath not to my knowledge at any time yet doubted: yea, for theſe few late yeares I was glad out of the Germane and Italian writers in their owne language in part to borrow the knowledge of theſe late affaires; as alſo from the credible and certain report of ſome ſuch honorable minded gentlemen of our owne country, as haue either for their honours ſake ſerued in theſe late warres in Hungarie, or vpon ſome other occaſions ſpent ſome good time in trauelling into the Turks dominions, but eſpecially vnto the imperiall citie of Conſtantinople, the chiefe ſeat of the Turkiſh empire, and place of the great Turkes abode: amongſt whom, I cannot but deſeruedly remember my kind friend and couſin M. Rog. Howe, vnto whoſe diſcreet & curious obſeruations during the time of his late abode at Conſtantinople, I iuſtly account my ſelfe for many things beholden. In which courſe of my proceeding, if the Reader find not himſelfe ſo fully ſatisfied as he could deſire, I would be glad by him my ſelfe to be better informed, as being no leſſe deſirous to learne the truth of that I know not, than willing to impart to others that little which I know.

Thus

To the Reader.

Thus much I thought good to set downe, to perswade the Christian Reader of the truth of the history following, wherin he shal find matter ynough to wonder at, and nalesse strange than that whatsoeuer it is that is written of the greatest Monarchies of auncient time, vnto whom for power and maiestie it yeeldeth little: But so much the more worthie our consideration than they, for that their periods alreadie ronn, and so their furie ouerpast, this in our time so flourisheth, and at this present so mightily swelleth, as if it would ouerflow all, were it not for the mercy of God first, and then by the force of some few of the Christian princes neerest vnto so great a danger, with their so great charge, to their immortall glory, & benefit of the Christian commonweale, mightily checked and kept within some bounds and compasse. This Historie for the most part thus as is aforesaid passed through, and brought to some good perfection, was yet by me againe laied aside, and like ynough euen as an abortiue fruit to haue perished in the birth before it was growen to perfection, had I not, many times fainting in the long and painefull trauell therewith, by my especiall good and honourable friend, Sir Peter Manwood of S. Stephens in the countie of Kent, knight of the honourable order of the Bath, a great louer and fauourer of learning (and in whose keeping it so for the most part manie yeares in safetie rested) beene still comforted, and as it were againe reuiued, and finally encouraged to take it in hand, and as at first to perfect it: so now againe to continue it: vnto whom (being the onely furtherer, stay, and helpe of these my labours) thou art for such pleasure as thou findest therin in courtesie beholden, and I for euer bounden. Now, what I for my part haue in this my long trauell performed, I leaue it to thy good discretion to consider, contenting my selfe in so great matter to haue beene willing to haue done something; wishing no longer to liue, than in some measure to bee profitable to the Christian Common weale; which long since in my nursing mother house Lincoln Colledge in Oxford, where I was sometime Fellow, I did purpose to performe, as it should please God in time to giue me meanes and occasion: in which mind I hope by the goodnesse and mercie of Christ my Sauiour so long as I liue to continue. Onely this fauour (to conclude with) I request of thee, That if in this so long and perplexed an Historie (by piece meale of so many diuersly handled) written by me in a world of troubles and cares, in a place that affoorded no meanes of comfort to proceed in so great a worke, thou chaunce to light vpon some things otherwise reported than thou hast elsewhere read them (as I doubt not but thou maiest) not therefore forthwith to condemne what thou here findest, being haply taken from a more certaine reporter than was that whereunto thou giuest more credit; or at least wise not written by mee, as meaning in any thing to preiudice thy better iudgement, but to leaue it to thy good choice in such diuersities of reports to follow that which may seeme vnto thee most true. By which courtesie thou hast already encouraged me to ioyne vnto my former Historie a continuation for some few yeares in this edition, and yet maye it (God giuing mee life and health) hereafter encourage mee to performe some other worke to thy no lesse contentment. So wishing thee all happinesse, I bid thee farewell. From Sandwich the last of March, 1610.

Thine in all dutifull kindnesse,

THE GENERAL HISTORIE OF THE TVRKES, BEFORE THE RISING OF THE OTHOMAN FAMILIE, WITH ALL THE NOTABLE EXPEDITIONS OF THE CHRISTIAN PRINCES AGAINST THEM.

THE glorious Empire of the Turkes, the preſent terrour of the world, hath amongſt other things nothing in it more wonderfull or ſtrange, than the poore beginning of it ſelfe; ſo ſmall and obſcure, as that it is not well knowne vnto themſelues, or agreed vpon euen among the beſt writers of their hiſtories, from whence this barbarous nation that now ſo triumpheth ouer the beſt part of the world, firſt crept out or tooke their beginning. Some (after the manner of moſt nations) deriue them from the Troians, led thereunto by the affinitie of the words Turci and Teucri, ſuppoſing (but with what probabilitie I know not) the word Turci or Turks to haue beene made of the corruption of the word Teucri, the common name of the Troians: as alſo for that the Turks haue of long moſt inhabited the leſſer ASIA, wherein the ancient & moſt famous citie of TROY ſometime ſtood. No great reaſon in my deeming: yet giue the authors thereof leaue therewith to pleaſe themſelues, as well as ſome others, which dwelling much farther off, borrow, or rather force their beginning from thence, without any probabilitie at all; and that with ſuch earneſtnes, as if they could not elſewhere haue found any ſo honourable anceſtors. Otherſome report them to haue firſt come out of PERSIA, and of I wot not what citie there, to haue taken their name: neither want there ſome which affirme them to haue taken their beginning out of ARABIA, yea and ſome out of SYRIA, with many other farre fet deuices concerning the beginning and name of this people: all ſeruing to no better purpoſe, than to ſhew the vncertaintie thereof. Amongſt others, Philip of MORNAY, the noble and learned Frenchman, in his worthy worke concerning the truneſſe of the Chriſtian religion, ſeemeth (& that not without good reaſon) to deriue the Turks, together with the Tartars, from the Iewes, namely, from the ten Tribes, which were by Salmanazar king of ASIRIA, in the time of Oſeas king of ISRAEL, carried away into captiuitie, and by him confined into MEDIA, and the other vnpeopled countries of the North, whoſe going thither is not vnaptly deſcribed by Eſdras, where among the great Hords of the Tartars in the fartheſt part of the world Northward, euen at this day are found ſome, that ſtill retaine the names of Dan, Zabulon, and Nepthaly, a certaine argument of their deſcent: whereunto alſo the word Tartar, or Tatar, ſignifying in the Syrian tongue, remnants or leauings; and the word Turke, a word of diſgrace, ſignifying in Hebrew, baniſhed men, ſeemeth right well to agree. Beſides that, in the Northern countries of RVSSIA, SARMATIA, & LYTHVANIA, are found greater ſtore of the Iewiſh nation than elſewhere, and ſo neerer vnto the Tartarians ſtill the moe: whereunto Io. Leunclauius the moſt curious ſearcher out of the Turkes antiquities and monuments, addeth as a farther coniecture of the deſcent of thoſe barbarous northern people from the Iewes, That in his trauell through LIVONIA into LYTHVANIA in the countrie trie neere vnto the metropoliticall citie of RIGA, he found there the barbarous people of the Lettoes, quite differing in language from the other countrey people of the Curons and Eſtons, no leſſe barbarous than themſelues; who had alwaies in their mouthes as a perpetuall lamentation, which they with dolefull moanes daily repeated abroad in the fields, Ieru, Ieru, Maſco, Lan: wherby they were thought to lament ouer IERVSALEM and DAMASCO, as forgetfull of all other things in their ancient country, after ſo many worlds of yeeres, and in a deſolate place ſo farre diſtant thence. And Munſter in his deſcription of LIVONIA repeating the like words, reporteth, That this rude people being demanded what they meant by theſe words ſo often and ſo lamentably by them without cauſe vttered: anſwered, That they knew no more than that they had bin ſo of long taught by their anceſtors. But to leaue theſe opinions concerning their beginning, ſo diuers & vncertaine, and to follow greater probabilities as concerning the place from whence they came: it is vpon better ground thought by diuers others, and thoſe of the beſt hiſtoriographers, That this barbarous nation which hath of late brought ſuch fatall mutations vpon ſo great a part, not of Chriſtendome only, but euen of the whole world, tooke their firſt beginning out of the cold and bare country of SCYTHIA: induced thereunto, both by the authority of the greateſt Coſmographers, as by moſt apparant reaſons. Pomponius Mela, the deſcriber of the world, reckning vp the people neere vnto the great riuer TANAIS (the bounder of EVROPE from ASIA Eaſtward) amongſt others maketh mention of the Turkes, in theſe words: Geloni vrbem ligneam habitant. Iuxta Thyrſagetæ Turcæq́ vaſtas ſyluas occupant aluntur q́ venando. Tum continuis rupibus late aſpera & deſerta regio ad Arympheos vſque permittitur. The Geloni inhabit a citie of wood. And faſt by, the Thyrſagets and Turks poſſeſſe the vaſt forreſts, and liue by hunting. Then, a rough and deſart country with continuall rockes, is ſpaciouſly extended euen as farre as vnto the Arympheians. Plinie alſo in like manner reckning vp the nations about the fennes of MÆOTIS, agreeing with that Mela reporteth, ſaith: Deinde Euazæ, Cottæ, Cicimeni, Meſſeniani, Coſtobocci, Choatræ, Zigæ, Dandari, Thuſſagetæ, Turcæ, vſque ad ſolitudines ſaltuoſis conuallibus aſperas, vltra quos Arymphei qui ad Riphæos pertinent montes. Next vnto them, are the Euazæ, Cottæ, Cicimeni, Meſſeniani, Coſtobocci, Choatræ, Zigæ, Dandari, the Thuſſagets and Turkes, vnto the deſarts rough with wooddie vallies: beyond whom are the Arympheians, which border vnto the Riphean mountaines. And Ptolomie in the deſcription of SARMATIA ASIATICA, maketh mention of the Tuſci, whom many learned men ſuppoſe to haue beene the ſame nation with the Turkes. Vnto which ancient teſtimonies of reuerend antiquitie, adde the manners and conditions of the Turkes, their ancient attire, their geſture, their gate, their weapons, and manner of riding and fight, their language and dialect, ſo well agreeing with the Scythians; and a man ſhall finde matter enough ſufficient to perſwade him in reaſon, that the Turkes haue vndoubtedly taken their beginning from the Scythes; whom they in ſo many things reſemble, and with whom of all other nations they beſt agree.

The great agreement betwixt the Turks and Scythians.

Now it hath beene no leſſe doubted alſo among the writers of the Turkes hiſtories; at what time, and for what cauſes the Turkes (to the trouble of the world) left their naturall ſeats in the cold countrie of SCYTHIA, to ſeek themſelues others in more pleaſant and temperat countries more Southerly, than it had beene of their originall beginning. Blondus and Platina, report them, enforced with a generall want, to haue forſaken their natiue countrie and followed their better fortune, in the yeare of our Lord 755: with whom alſo Segonius agreeth in the cauſe of their departure, but not in the time or place when or whereby they departed. For they (as he ſaith) iſſued out of their dwelling places in the year of Grace 844, by the ſtraits of the mountaine CAVCASVS: whereas the other with greater probability ſuppoſe them to haue come foorth by the Caſpian ſtraits: which the Turks alſo (as ſaith Sabellicus) affirme of themſelues, their anceſtors (as they ſay) being by their neighbours driuen out of the Caſpian mountaines. Some others there be that report them to haue forſaken their natiue countrie, neither enforced thereunto by neceſſitie, or the power of others; but for their valour ſent for by the Sultan of PERSIA to aide him in his warres: vnaduiſedly ſuppoſing that to haue beene the cauſe of their firſt comming out, which indeed hapned long time after, as in the proceſſe of this hiſtorie ſhall appeare. But whatſoeuer the aforeſaid cauſes of want, or of the enemies power, might enforce them vnto, a greater power no doubt it was that ſtirred them vp, euen the hand of the Almightie, who being the author of all kingdoms vpon the earth, as wel thoſe which he hath appointed as ſcourges wherewith to puniſh the world, as others more bleſſed, will haue his worke and purpoſe

When and for what cauſes the Turks left their ancient and naturall ſeats in Scythia, to ſeeke others in the countries more Southerly.

A purpoſe full of diuine maieſtie, to appeare in the ſtirring of them vp from right ſmall beginnings, in the increaſing and eſtabliſhing of their greatneſſe and power, to the aſtoniſhment of the world, and in the ruine and deſtruction of them againe, the courſe of their appointed time once runne. As for the difference of the time of their comming forth, before remembred; it may reaſonably be referred to the diuers emotions of that people, who being not vnder the command of any one, but of their diuers gouernours, as the manner of that people was, are not to be thought to haue come forth all at once, either for one cauſe; but at diuers times, ſome ſooner, ſome later, and that for diuers cauſes. This people thus ſtirred vp, and by the Caſpian ports paſſing thorow the Georgian countrey, then called IBERIA, neere vnto the Caſpian
B ſea; firſt ſeized vpon a part of the greater ARMENIA, and that with ſo ſtrong hand, that it is by their poſteritie yet holden at this day, and of them called TVRCOMANIA; of all other, the moſt true progenie of the ancient Turkes. In which great countrey, they of long, vnder their diuers leaders, in the manner of their liuing moſt reſembling their anceſtors, roamed vp and downe with their families and heards of cattell, after the manner of the Scythian Nomades, their countrey men, without any certaine places of aboad; yet at great vnitie among themſelues, as not hauing much to looſe, or wherefore to ſtriue.

Armenia (now called Turcomania) the firſt ſeat of the Turks after their firſt comming out of Scythia.

The firſt kingdome of the Turks erected in PERSIA by Tangrolipix, Chieftaine of the Selzuccian familie: with the ſucceſſe thereof.

D THis wandring and vnregarded people, but now the terrour of the world, thus firſt ſeated in ARMENIA, long time there liued in that wide country, after their rude and wonted manner (from which the Turcoman nation their poſteritie in that place, euen at this day (as wee ſaid) much differeth not) and not only notably defended the countrey thus by them at the firſt poſſeſſed, but ſtill incroching farther & farther, and gaining by other mens harmes, became at length dreadfull vnto their neighbors, and of ſome fame alſo farther off: whereunto the effeminate cowardiſe of thoſe delicate people of ASIA, with whom they had to doe, gaue no leſſe furtherance than their owne valour; being neuertheleſſe an hardie rough people, though not much skilfull or trained vp in the feats of warre.

The fame of theſe Turkes, together with their fortune, thus daily increaſing, and the mightie
E Empire of the Saraſins as faſt declining, which vnder their Chaliphes the ſucceſſors of the falſe Prophet Mahomet, hauing in leſſe than the ſpace of two hundred yeeres, ouerſpread not onely the greateſt part of ASIA & AFRICKE, euen vnto GADES & the pillers of Hercules, but alſo paſſing ouer that ſtrait, had ouerwhelmed almoſt all SPAINE, & not there ſtaying, but paſſing the Pyrenei, had pierced euen into the heart of FRANCE, & diuers other parts of Chriſtendome, as namely, ITALY, SICILY, the famous Iland of the RHODES, with many others of the MEDITERRANEAN: now diuided in it ſelfe, and rent into many kingdomes, turned their victorious armes from the Chriſtians vpon one another, to the mutuall deſtruction of themſelues & their empire. Amongſt other the Saraſin Sultans, which forgetting their obedience vnto their great Chaliph, tooke vpon them the ſoueraigntie of gouernment (which admitteth no partner)
F was one Mahomet, Sultan of PERSIA, a right great Prince, who hardly beſet on the one ſide with the Indians, and on the other with the Chaliph of BABYLON his mortall enemie, praied aid of the Turks his neighbors, who were now come euen to the ſide of ARAXIS, the bounds of his empire: vnto which his requeſt the Turks eaſily granted, in hope therby to find a way for them afterwards to enter into PERSIA, & ſo ſent him three thouſand hardy men, vnder the leading of one Togra Mucalet, the ſonne of Mikeil, a valiant captaine, and chiefe of the Selzuccian tribe or familie; whom the Greekes commonly call Tangrolipix, and ſome others Selduck or Sadock, names (as I ſuppoſe) corrupted of the great familie whereof he was deſcended. By the aid of this Tangrolipix (for now wee will ſo call him, as by the name moſt vſed) Mahomet the Perſian Sultan, ouercame Piſaſiris the Chaliph of BABYLON, his Arabians being not able to endure the force of the Turkiſh archers. This warre thus happily ended, the Turks deſiring to returne home, requeſted of the Sultan leaue to depart, and with a ſafe conuoy to be conducted vnto the riuer ARAXIS, and there to haue the paſſage of that ſwift riuer opened vnto them, which was by the Perſians ſtrongly kept by two caſtels built vpon each end of the bridge wherby the riuer was to be paſſed: But Mahomet loth to forgoe ſuch neceſſarie men, by whom hee had obtained ſo great a victorie, and purpoſing to employ them further in his ſeruice againſt the Indians, would by no meanes hearken vnto their requeſt; but ſeeming therewith to be diſcontented, commanded them to ſpeake no more thereof, threatning them violence, if they ſhould more preſume to talke of their departure. The Turks therefore doubtfull of their eſtate, and fearing further danger, ſecretly withdrew themſelues into the deſart of CARAVONITIS, and for that they were in number but few, and not able to come into the open field againſt ſo many millions of the Saraſins, liued as they might, by continuall incurſions and roades which they made out of the deſart forreſt into the countries adioyning: wherewith Mahomet greatly incenſed, ſent out an armie of twentie thouſand men, vnder the conduct of ten of his beſt captaines againſt them: who for want of water and other neceſſaries, doubting to enter the deſart, encamped themſelues in the ſide of the forreſt, there to conſult what courſe to take. But Tangrolipix, who with his Turks lay a great way off in the couert of the woods and mountaines, vnderſtanding of the comming of his enemies, and of the manner of their lying; thought it beſt vpon the ſodaine by night to ſet vpon the Saraſins and Perſians, if ſo happily hee might ouerthrow them by policie, whom he was not able to encounter in plaine battell. Vpon which reſolution hauing trauelled two daies long march in the deſart, the third day at night he ſodainely ſet vpon his enemies, lying negligently in their trenches, and by his vnexpected comming, brought ſuch a feare vpon them, that they without longer ſtay betooke themſelues to flight, euery man ſhifting for himſelfe, without regard of others. This victorie ſo happily gained, and Tangrolipix now (beyond his hope) throughly furniſhed, with armour, horſes, and abundance of all things needfull for the wars, kept the woods & forreſts no longer as a theefe or out-law, but ſhewed himſelfe in the open field, where daily repaired vnto him numbers of rogues and vagabonds, ſeeking after ſpoile; with many other deſperate villaines, who for feare of puniſhment were glad of ſuch a refuge: So that in a ſhort ſpace his armie was growne to be fiftie thouſand ſtrong, and ſo much the ſtronger, for that they had nothing to truſt vnto, more than the valour of themſelues. Whileſt Tangrolipix thus increaſeth, Mahomet inraged with the ouerthrow of his armie, in his furie cauſed all thoſe ten captains that had the leading thereof, to haue their eies pluckt out, threatning alſo to attire all the ſouldiers that fled out of the battell in womens apparell, and ſo diſgraced, to carry them about as cowards: and withall raiſed a great armie for the ſuppreſſing of the Turks. All things being now in readines, he ſet forward: when by the way the ſouldiers whom he had before ſo threatned to diſgrace, ſuddenly fled to the enemy: with whoſe comming, Tangrolipix greatly encouraged and ſtrengthned, reſolued to giue the Sultan battell. And ſo boldly comming on, met with him at ISPAHAN, a citie of PERSIA, where was fought betwixt them a moſt terrible battell, with wonderfull ſlaughter on both ſides. In the heat of which battell, Mahomet vnaduiſedly riding to and fro to encourage his ſouldiers, falling with his horſe, brake his necke: vpon which miſchance both the armies comming to agreement, by common conſent proclaimed Tangrolipix Sultan in his ſtead, & ſo made him king of PERSIA, and of all the other large dominions vnto that kingdome belonging.

Mahomet the Perſian Sultan goeth himſelfe with an armie againſt Tangrolipix.

Tangrolipix by conſent of the ſouldiers, made Sultan of Perſia.

This was the firſt kingdome of the Turks, begun by the good fortune of Tangrolipix, about 214 yeares after their comming out of SCYTHIA, in the yeare alſo of our Lord 1030; Conſtantinus Monomachus then raigning, or a little before (according to the Turks account) in the raigne of Romanus Argirus, Conſtantine his predeceſſour. Tangrolipix by rare fortune, thus of a meane captaine become king of PERSIA, forthwith commanded the garriſon that kept the bridge ouer the riuer ARAXIS, to be remooued, and ſo free paſſage to be giuen vnto the Turkes his countreymen, at their pleaſure to come ouer: who in great multitudes repaired into PERSIA, where they were by the new Sultan well prouided for, and by little & little promoted vnto the greateſt greateſt dignities of that kingdome; the Perſians and Saraſins the ancient inhabitants thereof, being by theſe new come gueſts, now kept vnder, and as it were troden vnder foot. Together with this kingdome, the Turks receiued the Mahometane ſuperſtition, from which they before not much abhorred, as men vſing circumciſion: So that hard it is to ſay, whether nation loſt more; the Perſians and Saraſins, by the loſſe of ſo great a kingdome; or the Turks, by embracing ſo great a vanitie. when the Turks firſt receiued the Mahometane ſuperſtition.

Tangrolipix with his Turkes thus poſſeſſed of the kingdome of PERSIA, held not himſelfe therewith long content, but made war vpon his neighbor princes, eſpecially againſt Piſaſiris the Chaliph of BABYLON, whom hee in diuers battels ouerthrew; and hauing at length ſlaine him, ioyned his kingdome vnto his owne. After that he ſent Cutlu-Muſes his couſin, with an armie againſt the Arabians, by whom hee was ouerthrowne and put to flight. But returning by MEDIA, he requeſted of Stephan the Greeke Emperors lieutenant, leaue to paſſe with his armie by the confines of his countrey: which his requeſt, Stephan not only reiected, but alſo by ſtrong hand ſought to ſtop his paſſage; but ioyning battell with him, was by the Turkes eaſily ouerthrowne and himſelfe taken. So Cutlu-Muſes returning to Tangrolipix, and recounting vnto him the ſucceſſe of his wars, perſwaded him to turn his forces into MEDIA, as a moſt fruitfull country, and eaſie to be ſubdued. But he highly offended with the ouerthrow giuen by the Arabians, would not hearken vnto him, but raiſing a new armie in hope of better fortune, went againſt the Arabians in perſon himſelfe. Cutlu-Muſes in the meane time fearing the Sultans diſpleaſure, fled with his followers and fauorites: and taking for his refuge PASAR, a ſtrong citie of the Choraſmians, reuolted from him: which the Sultan ſeeming not to regard, held on his intended iourney againſt the Arabians, by whom he was alſo put to the worſt, and enforced with diſhonour to returne. After that, he with part of his armie beſieged Cutlu-Muſes, who by the ſtrength of the place and valour of the people, for a great while notably defended himſelfe. In the meane time Tangrolipix not vnmindfull what Cutlu-Muſes had before ſaid vnto him, concerning the eaſineſſe of the conqueſt of MEDIA (a countrey, as he ſaid, defended but by women) ſent Aſan his brothers ſonne, ſurnamed the Deafe, with a conuenient armie to inuade the ſame: who entring into the frontiers of that prouince, was there by the Emperors lieutenant ouerthrown, and himſelfe with the greateſt part of his armie ſlaine: with which loſſe the Sultan rather enraged than diſcouraged, ſent Habramie Alim his brother, againe with an armie of an hundred thouſand fighting men; with which ſo great a power the Emperors lieutenant thought it not good to encounter, vntill he had procured farther aid from the Emperor, eſpecially out of IBERIA, and therefore kept himſelfe with ſuch power as he had within his ſtrong & fenced places: which Alim perceiuing, and out of hope to draw him vnto battell, roaming vp and downe the countrey, at laſt beſieged ARZEN an open towne, but full of rich merchants, by whom it was contrary to his expectation, notably defended for the ſpace of ſix daies; vntill that at length the Turks ſeeing no other way to win it, ſet fire vpon it in diuers places: by force whereof the inhabitants were enforced for ſauegard of their liues to flie, and to leaue the towne with an infinite wealth to the ſpoile of the enemie. By this time was Liparites gouernour of IBERIA come with a great power to the aid of the Emperors lieutenant in MEDIA: whereof Alim hauing intelligence, without delay haſted with his armie towards his enemies: and meeting with them a little before night, had with them a cruell fight, wherein the victory fell vnto the Chriſtians, who had the Turkes in chace a great part of the night. Neuertheleſſe Liparites valiantly fighting in another wing of the battell, was there taken and ſo carried away priſoner: for whoſe ranſome the Emperor ſent a great ſum of mony, with certaine preſents to the Sultan; all which he ſent backe againe, and frankly ſet Liparites at libertie, wiſhing him neuer to beare armes more againſt the Turks. And with him ſent the Seriph, a man of great place among the Mahumetans, his embaſſadour vnto the Emperour: who comming to CONSTANTINOPLE, amongſt other things, proudly demanded of the Emperor to become tributary vnto the Sultan, and ſo to be at peace with him for euer. Which his vnreaſonable demand, was by the Emperor with no leſſe diſdaine ſcornfully reiected, and the Seriph ſo diſmiſſed: which contempt of his embaſſadour the Sultan taking in euill part, as alſo not a little mooued with the death of his nephew and loſſe of his armie, with all his power inuaded the Roman prouinces. But being come as far as COIME without any notable harme doing, for that the country people hearing before of his comming, had in time conueighed themſelues with their ſubſtance into their ſtrong holds, whereof there was

was great ſtore in thoſe countries; and hearing alſo that the Greeke Emperour was raiſing a great power to come againſt him at CESAREA; not daring to proceed any further, leauing ſo many enemies behinde him, he fretting in himſelfe, returned into MEDIA, where finding the people all fled into their ſtrong townes, he laid ſiege vnto MANTZICHIERT, a citie ſtanding in a plaine champian countrey, but ſtrongly fortified with a triple wall and deepe ditches. This citie he furiouſly aſſaulted by the ſpace of thirty daies without intermiſſion, but all in vaine, the ſame being ſtill notably defended by Baſilius gouernour thereof, and the other Chriſtians therein. The Sultan wearie of this ſiege, and about to haue riſen, was by Alcan one of his great captains, perſwaded yet to ſtay one day, for him to make proofe in, what he were able to do for the gaining thereof: whereunto the Sultan yeelding, committed the whole charge of the aſſault vnto him. Alcan the next day diuiding the armie into two parts, and placing the one part vpon the higher ground, of purpoſe, with the multitude of their ſhot to haue ouerwhelmed the defendants; with the other part of the armie, furniſhed with all things needfull for the aſſault, approched the wals: the Sultan in the mean time with certain of the chiefe Turks, from an high place beholding all that was done. But this ſo forward a captaine in the middeſt of his endeuour loſt himſelfe, being ſlaine with a great number of his followers in approching the wall. His dead bodie knowne by the beautie of his armour, was by two valiant young men that ſallied out of the gate, drawne by the haire of his head into the citie; and his head being forthwith cut off, was caſt ouer the wall among the Turks: wherewith the Sultan diſcouraged, and out of hope of gaining the citie, roſe with his armie, pretending himſelfe with other his vrgent affaires to be called home, and threatning withall, the next ſpring to returne with greater power, and to do great matters. But not long after, great diſcord aroſe betwixt the Sultan and his brother Habramie Alim, in ſo much that the Sultan ſought by diuers meanes to haue taken him out of the way: which Habramie perceiuing, fled to his nephew Cutlu-Muſes, and ioyning his forces with his, denounced warre vnto the Sultan his brother; who meeting with them not farre from CAESAR, ouercame them in plaine battell, wherin Habramie was taken, and preſently by the commandement of his brother put to death. But Cutlu-Muſes with his couſin Melech, & ſix thouſand Turks fled into ARMENIA; and by meſſengers ſent of purpoſe, requeſted of the Emperor Conſtantinus Monomachus to be receiued into his protection. But the Sultan with his armie following them at the heeles, they for their more ſafetie were glad to flie into ARABIA. The Sultan afterwards turning into IBERIA, did there great harme, ſpoiling the countrey before him: againſt whom the Emperour ſent Michael Acoluthus, a valiant captaine; of whoſe approach the Sultan hearing, and that he would vndoubtedly ere long giue him battell (deeming it no great honour vnto him to ouercome the Emperours ſeruant, but an eternall diſhonour to be of him ouerthrowne) retired with his armie backe againe to TAVRIS, leauing behinde him one Samuch with three thouſand Turks to infeſt the frontiers of the Emperors territories; which both he & other the Turks captaines afterward more eaſily did, for that Monomachus the Emperour hauing prodigally ſpent the treaſures of the empire, to increaſe his reuenue, had impoſed a tribute vpon the frontier countries of his empire, wont before to be free from all exactions: in lieu whereof, they were bound to defend the paſſages from all incurſions of the enemies; but now preſſed with new impoſitions, had diſſolued their wonted garriſons, and left an eaſie entrance for the barbarous enemies into the prouinces confining vpon them: Beſides that the Emperors immediatly following, and eſpecially Conſtantinus Ducas, abhorring from wars, and giuen altogether to the hoording vp of treaſure, gaue little countenance and leſſe maintenance vnto men of ſeruice, which in ſhort time turned vnto the great weakning, and in fine to the vtter ruine of the Conſtantinopolitane empire. At the ſame time alſo the gouernment of the Conſtantinopolitane empire by the death of Conſtantinus Ducas the late Emperor, came to his wife Eudocia with her three ſonnes, Michael, Andronicus, and Conſtantinus, all very young; whoſe ſex and tender yeres the barbarous nations hauing in contempt, at their pleaſure grieuouſly ſpoiled the prouinces of the empire, namely, MESOPOTAMIA, CILICIA, CAPADOCIA, yea and ſometime as farre as CŒLESIRIA. The report whereof much troubled the Empreſſe, and gaue occaſion for many that loued her not, to ſay, that ſo troubled an eſtate required the gouernment of ſome worthy man. Wherefore ſhe fearing leſt that the Senate, making choiſe of ſome other, ſhe and her children ſhould be remoued from the gouernment, thought it beſt for the preſeruation of her ſtate & her childrens, to make choiſe of ſome notable and valiant man for her huſband, that

A for her & hers ſhould take vpon him the managing of ſo weighty affaires. But to checke this her purpoſe (the onely remedy of her troubled thoughts) ſhe had at the death of the late Emperor Conſtantine her husband, at ſuch time as the ſoueraigntie was by the Senate confirmed vnto her and her ſonnes, ſolemnly ſworne neuer more to marrie; which her oath was for the more aſſurance conceiued into writing, and ſo deliuered vnto the Patriarch to keepe. This troubled her more, than to find out the man whom ſhe could thinke worthy of her ſelfe, with ſo great honor. She held then in priſon one Diogenes Romanus, a man of great renown & honorably deſcended; whoſe father hauing married the neece of the Emperour Romanus Argirus, and aſpiring to the empire, being cõuicted therof, ſlew himſelfe for feare to be enforced by torments to bewray his B confederats. This Diogenes was by the late Emperour Conſtantine, for his good ſeruice againſt the Scythes (who then much troubled the empire) highly promoted, with moſt honorable teſtimonie in the charters of his promotions, That ſuch honors were beſtowed vpon him, not of the Emperours meere bountie, but as the due rewards of his worthy deſerts. Notwithſtanding after the death of the Emperour, he ſicke of his fathers diſeaſe, and ſwelling with the pride of ambition, ſought by ſecret meanes to haue aſpired vnto the empire: whereof the Empreſſe hauing intelligence, cauſed him to be apprehended and brought in bonds to CONSTANTINOPLE, where being found guiltie of the foule treaſon, and ſo committed to ſafe keeping, was ſhortly after brought forth to the iudgement ſeat againe, to receiue the heauie ſentence of death. In which wofull plight, ſtanding as a man out of hope and now vtterly forlorne, he moo-
C ued all the beholders with a ſorrowfull compaſſion: for beſide that he was a man of exceeding ſtrength, ſo was he of incomparable feature and beautie, adorned with many other rare qualities and vertues anſwerable thereunto: wherewith the Empreſſe mooued with the reſt, or pierced with a ſecret good liking, is hard to ſay, reuoked the ſentence of condemnation ready to haue beene pronounced vpon him, and gaue him pardon. And ſhortly after hauing ſet him at libertie, ſent for him as he was going into CAPADOCIA his natiue country, and made him generall of all her forces, with a full reſolution in her ſelfe to marry him, & to make him Emperor, if ſhee might by any meanes get the writing out of the Patriarchs hand, wherein her oath for neuer marrying againe was compriſed. For the compaſſing whereof, ſhee entred into a deepe deuice ful of feminine policie with one of her Eunuches, whom ſhe purpoſed to vſe as her pan-
D der for the circumuenting of the Patriarch. This craftie Eunuch inſtructed by his miſtreſſe, comming to the Patriarch Ioannes Xiliphilinus, a man both for his place and integritie of life much honoured, told him in great ſecret, that the Empreſſe had ſo far ſet her good liking vpon a yong gentleman, a nephew of his called Barda (then a gallant of the court) as that ſhe could be content to take him to her husband and to make him Emperor, if ſhe might by his holineſſe be perſwaded, that ſhe might with ſafe conſcience doe it, & by him be diſcharged of the raſh oath ſhe had vnaduiſedly taken, neuer to marry againe, whereof he had the keeping. The Patriarch, otherwiſe a contemner of worldly honours, yet mooued with ſo great a preferment of his nephew, promiſed the Eunuch to doe therein whatſoeuer the Empreſſe had deſired, which he accordingly performed. And ſo ſending for the Senators one by one, in whoſe good liking the E matter chiefly reſted, he with much grauitie propounded vnto them the dangerous eſtate of the common-weale, with the troubles daily increaſing, & the continuall feare of forreine enemies, not to be repreſſed by the weake hand of a woman, or the authoritie of young children, but requiring (as hee ſaid) the valiant courage of ſome worthy man. After that, hee began to finde great fault with the raſh oath which the Empreſſe had taken a little before the death of her huſband, neuer to marry; and vtterly condemning the ſame, as contrary to the word of God, & vniuſtly exacted of her, rather to ſatisfie the iealous humor of the Emperor her late husband, than for any good of the common-weale: he in fine perſwaded them, that the vnlawfull oath might be reuoked, and the Empreſſe ſet at libertie at her pleaſure, by their good liking to make choice of ſuch a man for her huſband, as might better vndertake ſo weightie affaires of the empire, F more fit for a man, than for ſo tender a Lady and three young children. The greater part of the Senate thus perſwaded by the Patriarch, and the reſt with gifts and promiſes ouercome by the Empreſſe, the Patriarch deliuered vnto her the writing ſhe ſo much deſired, and diſcharged her of her oath: whereupon ſhe forthwith calling vnto her certaine of her ſecret friends, married Diogenes, whom ſhe cauſed to be proclaimed Emperour. Now thought Eudocia, after the manner of women, to haue had her huſband (whom ſhee euen frõ the bottome of deſpaire had exalthe firſt forced himſelfe, but afterwards (being a man of a proud nature, and haughtie ſpirit) became wearie of ſuch obſeruance, and began by little and little to take euery day more and more vpon him. And for that the imperiall prouinces in the Eaſt, were in ſome part loſt, and the reſt in no ſmall danger; he, as well for the redreſſe thereof, as for his owne honour, and to ſhew him-ſelfe an Emperor indeed, and not the ſeruant of the Empreſſe, left the court & paſſed ouer into ASIA, although it were with a ſmall armie and euill appointed: for why, it was no eaſie matter for him to furniſh out the armie with all things neceſſary, which by the ſloth and ſparing of the late Emperors, had, to the great danger and diſhonor of the empire, been vtterly neglected.

Neuertheles the Turkiſh Sultan, who at the ſame time with a great power inuaded the prouin- H ces of the empire, hearing of his comming, and that he was a man of great valour, and doubting what power he might bring with him, retired himſelfe; and diuiding his armie, ſent the one part thereof into the South part of ASIA, and the other into the North, which ſpoiled all the countrey before them as they went, and ſuddenly ſurpriſing the citie of NEO-CESARIA, ſacked it, and ſo laded with the ſpoile thereof departed. But the Emperor vnderſtanding thereof, and not a little grieued therewith, drawing out certaine bands and companies of the beſt and moſt readieſt ſouldiers in his armie, and with them coaſting the countrey to get betwixt the Turks and home, vſed therein ſuch expedition, that he was vpon them before they were aware, and ſo ſuddenly charging them, brought ſuch a feare vpon them, that they betooke themſelues to their heeles, leauing behind them for haſte, their baggage & carriages, with all the priſoners and boo- I tie they had before taken at NEO-CESARIA, and in their late expedition: yet was there no great number of them ſlaine, for that the Chriſtians forewearied with long trauel, were not able farre to follow the chace. From thence taking his way into SYRIA, he ſent part of his armie to MELITENA, and carried himſelfe from ALEPPO, a great bootie both of men and cattell. At which time alſo the citie of HIERAPOLIS was yeelded vnto him, where he ſhortly after built a ſtrong caſtell. But whileſt he there ſtaied, newes was brought vnto him, that the other part of his armie which he had ſent away, was ouerthrowne by the Turks; for the reliefe of whom, he roſe with all haſte and marched towards them: but being in number farre inferiour vnto his enemies, hee was by them as hee lay encamped, encloſed round in ſuch ſort, as that it was thought almoſt impoſſible for him to haue eſcaped. At which time alſo the gouernour of A- K LEPPO traiterouſly reuolted from him, and ioyned his forces with the enemie, making now no other reckoning, but aſſuredly to haue taken him. But whiles the Turks thus dreame of nothing but of a moſt glorious victorie, and were in minde diuiding the ſpoile, the Emperor without ſo much as the ſounding of a trumpet, ſuddenly iſſuing out of his trenches, when they leaſt thoght he durſt ſo haue done, & reſolutely charging them home, put them to flight, & had of them had a notable victorie, had he throughly proſecuted the ſame. After that, hauing taken diuers towns he came to ALEXANDRIA in CILICIA, and there all about in the countrey billited his armie, becauſe of the approach of winter, and ſo returned himſelfe to CONSTANTINOPLE.
The next ſpring the Turks, according to their vſuall manner inuading the frontiers of the empire, did much harme about NEO-CESARIA: whereof the Emperor aduertiſed, went thither L with his armie, and quickly repreſſing their furie, tooke his iourney to the riuer EVPHRATES, where leauing part of his armie with Philaretus for the keeping of thoſe frontiers, hee himſelfe retired Northward into CAPADOCIA. But after his departure, the Turkes ſetting vpon Phila- retus, put him to flight with his garriſons: and taking the ſpoile of the frontiers, entred into CA-PADOCIA, waſting all as they went: & afterwards turning into CILICIA, ſacked ICONIVM a rich and populous citie. Whereof the Emperor vnderſtanding at SEBASTIA, made towards them: but hearing by the way that they had ranſackt the citie, and were for feare of his com-ming already retired, he ſent Chatagurio gouernour of ANTIOCH, with part of his armie to MOPSIPHESTIA to ſtop the Turks of their paſſage. But they in the plains of THARSVS were before diſtreſſed by the Armenians, and ſtript of all their rich prey: and hearing farther of the M approach of the Emperors power, fled by night, and ſo eſcaped: which the Emperor vnderſtanding, and hauing now well quieted thoſe prouinces, and the yeere farre ſpent, returned again to CONSTANTINOPLE. But after his departure, the Turks again inuading the frontier prouin-ces, hee ſent Manuel Comnenus, a valiant young man, generall againſt them; who ſo preuailed, that the Emperor enuying at his honour, tooke from him a great part of his armie, and ſent him

A with a ſmall power into SYRIA. But as he was vpon his way, he was by the Turks entrapped neere vnto SEBASTIA, and there taken, moſt part of his armie being at the ſame time ouerthrowne and ſlaine: with which loſſe, the Emperour troubled, made great preparation to goe himſelfe in perſon againſt his enemies; who encouraged with the former victorie, ceaſed not to infeſt his territories. In the meane time, by great fortune came Manuel Comnenus home, together with the Turke that tooke him; who being fallen into the diſpleaſure of the Sultan, fled vnto the Emperor with his priſoner, of whom he was honorably entertained. Al things now in a readineſſe for ſo great an expedition as the Emperor had in perſon purpoſed, he ſet forward: and after long trauell hauing paſſed CESAREA, he encamped at a place called CRYAPEGA: Diogenes goeth with a great armie againſt the Turks.

B where for ſeuere execution done vpon certaine mutinous ſouldiers, one of the legions of his armie roſe in mutinie againſt him: whom (for all that) he quickly pacified with the terrour of the reſt of his armie, which he threatned to turne vpon them if they proceeded to forget their dutie. After that, remouing to THEODOSOPOLIS, he diuided his armie, and ſent Ruſelius one of his beſt captaines, with one part thereof againſt Chliat, and another part hee ſent to beſiege MANTZICIERTS, retaining with himſelfe the reſt, being of no great ſtrength. The Turks in MANTZICIERTS finding themſelues not able long to hold out, fell to compoſition, and yeelded the citie. But ſhortly after, the ſouldiers left there in garriſon for the keeping thereof, going out to ſeeke for forrage, were by the Turks ſuddenly oppreſſed: which the Emperour vnderſtanding, ſent thither one Nicephorus Bryennius, with certaine companies to releeue the

C citie; who encountring with the Turks, and finding himſelfe too weake, ſent vnto the Emperour for aid: who not knowing the ſtrength of the enemies, blamed him of cowardiſe, yet ſent vnto him Nicephorus Baſilacius with part of his armie; who ioyning his forces with Bryennius, and giuing the Turks battell, put them to flight. But following too faſt vpon them vnto their trenches, and Bryennius making no great haſte after, he had his horſe ſlaine vnder him, and ſo on foot heauily laded with armour, and not able to ſhift for himſelfe, was there taken and brought to the Sultan: who honourably entreated him, and oftentimes queſtioning with him concerning the Emperour, and ſhewing him his owne power, examined him alſo of the Emperours.

Tangrolipix was now dead, and the Sultan now in field againſt the Emperour, was Axan his ſonne, a man of great wiſdome & diſcretion: who conſidering the doubtfull euent of battell, ſent Axan the Sultã ſendeth embaſſadours vnto Diogenes for peace.

D embaſſadors vnto the Emperour to entreat with him of peace. But he (perſwaded by ſome of his captains, that this motion made by the Sultan for peace, proceeded but of a meere feare and diſtruſt he had in his owne power, or elſe to gaine time vntill ſome greater ſtrength came) had ſmall regard of the embaſſadours or their meſſage, but proudly willed them to tell their maſter, That if he were deſirous of peace, he ſhould get him farther off, and leaue the place wherein he lay encamped, for him to lodge in. And ſo without other anſwere commanded them away. Now had the Emperor (as is before ſaid) ſent away part of his armie by Ruſelius againſt Chliat, whom he now ſent for in haſte againe: but he hearing of the approch of the Sultan, by the perſwaſion of Tarchomiates, one of his captaines, was retired for his more ſafetie backe into the Romane frontiers, leauing the Emperour deſtitute of his helpe. At which time alſo, a companie of

E the Scythians which ſerued in the Emperours campe, reuolted vnto the Turkes; not without ſome ſuſpition, that the reſt of their fellowes which remained, would ere long doe the like. Neuertheleſſe the Emperour preſuming of ſuch ſtrength as he had, or carried headlong with his owne fortune, reſolued to giue the Turks battell, and therefore putting his men in order, ſet vpon them. Who ſomewhat troubled with the Emperours ſo ſudden a reſolution, as being yet in ſome hope of peace: yet hauing put themſelues in order of battel, receiued the enemies charge; ſtill giuing a little ground, as men not greatly deſirous either to fight or to flie. This fight continuing long, and the day now declining, the Emperour doubting leſt the Sultan ſhould ſend part of his armie to aſſault his campe (from which he was now drawne ſomewhat farre, & had left the ſame but weakly manned) cauſed a retrait to be ſounded, and ſo began orderly to retire

F himſelfe with them that were about him: which others a farre off in the battell beholding, and ſuppoſing him to haue fled, began themſelues to flie amaine. Of which ſo ſhamefull flight and ſudden feare Andronicus (the ſonne of Iohn Ducas, the late Emperour Conſtantine his brother, and by him created Cæſar, who with his ſonnes ſecretly enuied at the honour of Diogenes) was the cauſe. For he commanding a great part of the armie, gaue it firſt out vnto ſuch as were about him, that the Emperor fled: and to increaſe the feare, turning his horſe about, fled towards the Iohn Ducas a notable Traitor cauſe of the flight of the emperours armie.

campe as fast as he could: after whom all the rest most disorderly followed: which the Emperor G beholding, and therewith not a little troubled, made a stand, labouring in vaine to haue staid the rest. For now the Turks encouraged with the sudden flight of the Christians, began hardly to pursue them, as men already ouerthrowne by the hand of God: whom for all that, the Emperor Diogenes the Emperour taken by the Turkes. with such as yet stood with him, for a space notably resisted. But being forsaken by the greater part of his armie, & oppressed with the multitude of his enemies, being wounded himselfe, and his horse slaine vnder him, he was there taken all imbrued with his own bloud, and the bloud of his enemies, of whom he had wounded and slaine many. The Sultan aduertised of his taking, at the first beleeued it not, supposing it rather to haue beene some other great man: vntill that he was both by them whom he had but a little before sent embassadour vnto him, & by Basilacius H one of his captains then prisoner with him, assured that it was vndoubtedly he, which Basilacius brought before him to see if he knew him, fel down prostrat at his feet, as before his dread Lord and Soueraigne. The Emperor brought before the Sultan, and humbling himselfe in such sort as best beseemed his heauie fortune, the Sultan eprsently tooke him vp, & thus cheerfully spoke vnto him: Grieue not noble Emperor (said he) at thy mishap, for such is the chance of warre, ouerwhelming sometimes one, and sometimes another: neither feare thou any harme, for I will vse thee not as my prisoner, but as an Emperor. Which he accordingly did, presently appointing him a princely pauilion, with all things answerable to his estate, setting him oftentimes at his owne boord, and for his sake enlarging such prisoners as he required. And after he had thus for certaine daies honorably vsed him, and discoursed with him of many things, he concluded a perpetuall peace I with him, vpon promise of a marriage to be made betwixt their children, and so with a safe conuoy sent him away with greater honour than was at an enemies hand to haue beene expected.
The Emperor in Turkish attire, which the Sultan had bestowed vpon him, comming to THEO-DOSOPOLIS, there staid the curing of his wounds, & afterwards accompanied with the Sultans embassadours, set forward toward CONSTANTINOPLE. But all was now there changed: for vpon the report of his captiuitie, Iohn the Cæsar, with Psellus one of the chiefe Senators, and others of the same faction, which alwaies enuied at the honour of Diogenes, presently tooke the had built neere vnto PROPONTIS, set vp Michael Ducas her eldest sonne, Emperour, in stead of Diogenes: whose simplicitie, Cæsar his vncle abusing with the rest, did now what they list. K And hearing that Diogenes was now (contrary to their expectation) set at libertie by the Sultan, and comming towards the emperiall citie, sent out letters euery way in the new Emperours name, vnto all the gouernours of the prouinces whereby he was to passe, not to receiue him as Emperour, or to doe him any honour: which Diogenes vnderstanding, staid at the castle of DOCIA, whither some of his friends with such power as they were able to make, resorted vnto him. Against whom, Cæsar with the contrary faction first sent his sonne Constantine, and after that Andronicus his eldest sonne, both Diogenes his mortall enemies, with a great armie: Diogenes the Emperor taken prisoner by Andronicus. by whom Diogenes, with his friends and followers, were ouerthrowne and discomfited. Dioge- purpose from Michael the Emperour, gaue their faith. So Diogenes all attired in blacke, yeelded himselfe to Andronicus: by whom he was brought to COTAI, then the metropoliticall citie of PHRIGIA, there to expect what further order should be taken for him from the court: during which time, he fell sicke, being (as many supposed) secretly poisoned. But whilst he there lay languishing, an heauier doome came from the young Emperour, That he should haue his eies The miserable death of Diogenes the Emperor put out: which was forthwith in most cruell manner done; the clergie men that had before for his safetie gaged their faith, crying out in vaine against so horrible a crueltie. Thus depriued of his sight, he was conueighed into the Iland of PROTA, where his eies for lacke of looking to, without the knowledge of the young Emperour his nephew.

Axan hearing of the miserable end of the late Emperour Diogenes, was therewith much grie-ued, & the more, for that the league which he had to his good content so lately made with him, was

A was thereby come to nought: wherefore in reuenge thereof, he with great power inuaded the imperiall prouinces; not for ſpoile and bootie only, as in former time, but now to conquer and to hold the ſame. Againſt whom Michael the Emperour ſent Iſaack Comnenus his lieutenant, with a great armie: who meeting with the Turks, & ioyning battell, was by them ouerthrowne with all his armie, and taken priſoner: and glad afterwards for a great ſumme of money, to redeeme himſelfe. After which ouerthrow, the Emperour ſent his vncle Caſar with another armie againſt them, who was by Ruſelius, that had before reuolted from the Emperour, ouerthrowne at the riuer SANGARIVS, and taken priſoner: whom he for all that, ſhortly after ſet at libertie againe, and ioyning with him againſt the Turkes, were both together by them diſcomfited and taken priſoners, but afterwards redeemed; Caſar by the Emperor, and Ruſelius by his
B wife. This Ruſelius was a notable traitour, who ioyning with the Turkes, did what he liſt in the prouinces of the empire in the leſſer ASIA: for the repreſſing of whom, the Emperour ſent Alexius Comnenus, a young man, but very politike and couragious; who ſecretly practiſing with the Turks that were great with Ruſelius, had him at laſt by them for a ſumme of money betraied into his power: who forthwith ſent him to CONSTANTINOPLE to the Emperor, by whom he was impriſoned, but afterward ſet at libertie and employed againſt Bryennius and his brother, then vp in rebellion againſt the Emperour.

But to come neerer vnto the Turkiſh affaires. Cutlu-Muſes, who with his couſin Melech and others were for feare of Tangrolipix their couſin fled into ARABIA, as is before declared, now
C in the beginning of the raigne of Axan, returned: and as the enuious competitours of his kingdome, hauing raiſed a great power of their friends and partakers, were now ready to haue tried the matter with him by plaine battell. Againſt whom alſo the Sultan on the other ſide had brought into the field his whole forces, and was now ready likewiſe to haue encountred them neere vnto the citie of ERES. But whileſt the Turks thus diuided, ſtood ready to deſtroy themſelues, the Caliph of BABYLON (from whom though the Turks had taken all temporal ſoueraigntie, yet in matters of religion ſtill held him in great reuerence and eſteeme, as their chiefe Biſhop, and the ſucceſſor of their great Prophet) conſidering that nothing could be more dangerous vnto his ſect and religion, than that ciuill diſſention, the late confuſion and vtter ruine of the Saraſin empire, and authoritie of the Caliphs; and fearing the like effect in theſe new Sara-
D ſins, now the chiefe ſtay of the Mahometane ſuperſtition: ſetting aſide all pontificall formalitie, whereby hee was bound not to goe out of his owne houſe, came with all ſpeed, euen as the armies were now ready to ioyne battell, and thruſting himſelfe into the middeſt betwixt them; what with the reuerence of his perſon, what with his effectuall perſwaſion, wrought ſo much, & preuailed ſo farre with both parties, that they were content to lay downe their weapons, and to ſtand to his order and iudgement: which was, That Axan the Sultan ſhould ſtill enioy his kingdome and territories, whole and entire vnto himſelfe as he did: and that Cutlu-Muſes and his ſons, aided by him, and ſo inuading the prouinces of the Conſtantinopolitane empire, ſhould thereof ſubdue ſo much as they could vnto themſelues, and to be thereof accounted the onely Lords and gouernours. Which order as it was vnto the Turkes, and for the maintenance of the E Mahometane ſuperſtition, very wholeſome & commodious; ſo was it vnto the Chriſtian common-weale and religion moſt dangerous and hurtfull, as in proceſſe of time by proofe it appeared. For by this meane, in ſhort time after, Cutlu-Muſes with his couſin and ſonnes ſubdued all MEDIA, with a great part of ARMENIA, CAPADOCIA, PONTVS, and BYTHINIA, and ſo a great part of the leſſer ASIA. By the aid of this Cutlu-Muſes, and the fauour of the ſouldiers, Nicephorus Botoniates aſpiring vnto the empire of CONSTANTINOPLE, diſplaced his maſter the Emperour, Michael Ducas, after he had raigned ſix yeeres and ſix moneths, and in the habit of a Monke thruſt him into an Abbey: which vſurper by the iuſt iudgement of God, was at length requited euen with the ſame meaſure, and in like maner ſerued by Alexius Comnenus; who thruſting him out, ſucceeded himſelfe in the empire. Much it was that this Cutlu-Muſes with his family, hath Aithonus, and others following his report, deriued their Dogrisla, Aspasalemus, Meleclas, and Belchiaroc, whom they suppose to haue orderly succeeded Zadoc, otherwise called Tangrolipix, in the Turkish empire, and to haue done great matters: whereas both by the report of the Turkes themselues, & the relation of the Greeks, it appears plainly, Axan (more truly called Ax-Han, that is to say, the White king) to haue beene the sonne of Tangrolipix, and to haue succeeded him in the empire: and that by him the emperour Diogenes was taken, and not by Aspasalemus as they vainely imagine. As for Aspasalemus, whom the Turkes by that name know not either any thing of his doings, it seemeth to haue beene a name corrupted of Aspam Sallarius, the brother of Tangrolipix and Habrami, and not his sonnes sonne as they would haue it. In like manner Meleclas also seemeth to haue beene forged of Melech the sonne of Habrami, Tangrolipix his brother, and not of Aspasalemus, as some without any good ground report. Whom they finding to haue beene all great Men in the Selzuccian familie, with some others also, haue both corrupted their names, and giuen vnto them an imaginarie soueraigntie and succession in the Turks first empire, such as beside that the Turks themselues acknowledge not, is easily to be refelled out of the histories of the Greekes, who had with them still much to doe. Wherefore leauing these supposed princes of the Turkes, with their imaginarie succession, and doings, vnto the authors thereof, following more certainties, to returne againe to the course of our historie. Axan the Sultan at the same time that hee had by the mediation of the Chaliph (or not long after) fallen to agreement with his cousin Cutlu-Muses: to encrease the honour of his nation and the bounds of his empire, gaue vnto Ducat and Melech, two of his nigh kinsmen, the gouernement of DAMASCO and ALEPPO, with that part of SIRIA which ioyneth vnto them, of purpose that way to encroch vpon the Ægyptian Chaliph, who then had vnder his iurisdiction, all, as far as LAODICEA in SIRIA; yet not with so large priuileges as had Cutlu-Muses, vnto whom and his posteritie hee had yeelded, the absolute honour of a Sultan or King, ouer such countries and prouinces as they should winne from the Christians: but vnto these others his kinsmen, hee gaue the gouernement of the aforesaid cities of DAMASCO and ALEPPO in the frontiers of his dominion in SIRIA, conditionally that they should still remaine his vassals, and hold of him as of their soueraigne, whatsoener they had; who neuertheless in short time mightily preuailed vpon the Egyptian, still increasing the Turkish territorie with the losse of the Sarasins, whose name together with their empire, was now by the Turkes almost quite driuen out of ASIA.
F ſonnes and kinſmen did for the enlarging of the Turkiſh empire, by the helpe of the great Perſian Sultan: whoſe forces, together with their own, in diuers countries conducted by theſe worthie leaders his nigh kinſmen, and doing great matters, gaue occaſion for themſelues to be accounted Sultans, though indeed they were none, neither their names ſuch as are by ſome ancient writers & ſome others of later time alſo reported; but vnto the Turks themſelues, by thoſe names, either for Sultans, vnknowne. Out of theſe great cõmanders, all borne of the Selzuccian familie,

The ground of the errour of diuers writers about the ſucceſſors of Tangrolipix, otherwiſe of them called Sadoth.

But these proud branches of the Turkish empire, thus ouerspreading the lesser ASIA, with the greatest part of of SIRIA, were in short time after by the mercy of God, and the valour of the most Christian and religious princes of the West, cut shorter, and brought againe into some better order. The full discourse whereof, worthie eternall memorie, by others inrolled in the ancient records of fame, I purpose not at large to follow, but in briefe to touch, for the orderly cotinuation of the present historie, hasting to the doings of this victorious nation of later times, wherein we are to make a longer stay, as more pertinent vnto the dangerous estate of the present time.

Peter a French Hermite goeth on pilgrimage to Ierusalem.

It fortuned that whilest Cutlu-Muses and his sonnes, supported by the Sultan Axan their kinsman, thus mightily preuailed against the Christians in the lesser ASIA on the one side, and Melech with his cousin against the Ægyptian Caliph in SIRIA on the other: that one Peter a French Hermite mooued with a denout zeale, according to the manner of that time, went to visit the sepulcher of our Sauiour, with the other holy places at IERVSALEM: who comming into SIRIA, then for the most part possessed by the Turkes and Sarasins, diligently noted by the way as he trauailed, the manners & fashions of these barbarous nations, their gouernment, their cities, their power and strength; but aboue all, the grieuous misiries of the poore oppressed Christians, that there liued in most miserable thraldom amongst them, without hope of release: all which, hee in the habite of a poore pilgrim, at liberty safely viewed, in the midst of these miscreants, being withall a little low hard fauoured fellow, and therefore in shew more to be contemned then feared. Yet vnder such simple & homly feature, lay vnregarded a most subtil sharp and pearching wit, fraught with discretion & sound iudgement, still applying to som good vse what he had in his long and painefull trauell most curiously obserued. He commeth to IERVSALEM, and performing his deuotions there, saw the grieuous misery of the poore deuout Christians, so greatly and heauy, as that greater or more intollerable could none be: wherewith not a little

The description of Peter the Hermite.

A little grieued, he entred into a deepe diſcourſe thereof with Simon the Patriarch and Abbot of the monaſterie of the Chriſtians (there before built by certaine deuout Italian merchants) and with the maſter of the Hoſpitalers, by whom he was fully informed thereof, as of whatſoeuer elſe he required. After much graue conference, it was at length agreed vpon amongſt them, that the Patriarch and the Grand-maſter, ſhould in their owne, and the names of the other oppreſſed Chriſtians, write their letters vnto the Pope and the other Chriſtian Princes, concerning their miſeries; and to craue their aid for the recouerie of thoſe holy places out of the hands of thoſe cruell Infidels: of which letters, the deuout hermit promiſed himſelfe to be the truſtie carrier, and of their petitions the moſt carefull ſoliciter. Whereupon the Patriarch and Grand-maſter
B in the name of the poore oppreſſed Chriſtians, wrote their letters vnto this effect.

The letters of Simon Patriarch of Ieruſalem, and of the Grand maſter of the Hoſpitalers vnto the Pope and other Chriſtian Princes, in the behalfe of the oppreſſed Chriſtians in Ieruſalem.

Wee the citizens of the Holy Citie, and countrymen of Chriſt Ieſus, daily ſuffer thoſe things which Chriſt our King ſuffered but once, in the laſt dayes of his mortalitie. Wee are daily buffeted, ſcourged, and pierced: euery day ſome of vs are brained, beheaded, or crucified. Wee would flie from citie to citie, vnto the remoteſt parts of the earth, and remooue out of the middle of that land, where Chriſt our Sauiour wrought our redemption, to leade a poore exiled and vagrant life; were it not impietie to leaue the land (ſacred with the birth, doctrine, death, reſurrection, and aſcenſion of our Sauiour) without inhabitants and Prieſts: and that there ſhould firſt lacke ſuch as would endure death and martyrdome, than ſuch as would inflict the ſame: and that there ſhould not be which would willingly die
C for Chriſt, as in battell, ſo long as there were any that would fight againſt them. Theſe things truly wee moſt miſerably ſuffer: yet was there a time when as our anceſtors feared no ſuch thing, either to themſelues or their poſteritie. And now perhaps the Chriſtian kingdomes of the Weſt, liue likewiſe without the leaſt ſuſpicion of feare: but let them be mooued by our example and teſtimonie. The ſtrength of the Turkes is daily increaſed, and ours diminiſhed: The continuall gaining of new kingdomes giueth them courage: They haue already deuoured the whole world, in hope. The forces of the Turkes are fiercer and ſtronger than the forces of the Saraſins, their policies deeper, their attempts more deſperate, their endeuours greater, and their ſucceſſe fortunater. Yet haue the Saraſins attempted both Romes; they haue beſieged Constantinople, and haue waſted not only the Sea coaſts of Italy, but euen the heart of the land alſo. Then why ſhould the kingdomes of the Weſt preſume

D themſelues to ſtand in ſafetie and out of all perill, when as the chiefe fortreſſes of the world haue beene ſo endangered? What may the reſt of Chriſtendome promiſe vnto it ſelfe, ſeeing that Ierusalem (the ſeat and ſpectacle of the Chriſtian religion) hath beene beſieged, taken, ſacked, raſed, and triumphed vpon? Seeing that of the Chriſtian profeſſion, remaine but the poore and weake reliques, in compariſon of the ancient whole entire body? This land, which is daily beſprinkled with our bloud, yea the bloud it ſelfe crieth out for reuenge. And wee your moſt humble ſuppliants, proſtrate at your feet, call vpon the helpe, aid, mercy, faith, and religion, of you moſt bleſſed Father, of the Kings, Princes, and Potentates; Chriſtians not in name and profeſſion only, but in heart, ſoule and ſpirit. Before the tempeſt thunder, before the lightning fall vpon you, auert from you and your children the ſtorme hanging ouer your heads: defend vs your poore ſuppliants: deliuer your religion from moſt wicked and accurſed ſlauerie.
E You ſhall in ſo doing, deſerue immortall fame, and God ſhall requite your ſo great valour in this world with terreſtriall kingdomes, and in the world to come with eternall bliſſe, whoſe ſacred inheritance you ſhall haue defended from the rage of hell.

With theſe letters, and plentie of other ſecret inſtructions, the deuout hermit returning into Italy, and comming to Rome, deliuered his letters vnto Vrban the ſecond of that name, then Pope, with a full diſcourſe of the miſeries of the Chriſtians vnder the Turkiſh thraldome, which he had ſeene at Ierusalem, and other places as he trauelled; requeſting his holy care for the redreſſe thereof: with whom he ſo preuailed, that ſhortly after, he calling a Councell at Claremont in France, among other things, propounded the miſerie of the poore op-

The Councell at Claremont in France.

F preſſed Chriſtians at Ierusalem, as an eſpeciall matter to be conſidered of. And hauing cauſed the aforeſaid letters, directed vnto him and the other Chriſtian Princes, to be openly read in the Councell, whereunto three hundred and ten Biſhops were then out of diuers parts of Chriſtendome aſſembled, with the embaſſadours of all countries, much mooued the whole aſſemblie to compaſſion: at which time alſo the hermit, whoſe flowing eloquence fully counteruailed what wanted in his feature, ſtanding vp in the midſt of the Councell, deliuered his message in the name of the afflicted Christians, with their heauie groanings and teares: which G as they could not be in letters expressed, so were they not hardly by the religious hermit (as by him who hauing but lately seene, both the miserie of the men, and desolation of the places, and at the heart touched with the griefe thereof) so liuely represented, as that it mooued the whole assemblie with the like simpathie of heauinesse and griefe. Which the Pope perceiuing, tooke thereupon occasion to enter into a large discourse concerning that matter, with many effectuall reasons perswading the Fathers and Princes there present, of the necessitie of so religious a warre to be taken in hand, for the deliuerance of their oppressed brethren out of the thraldome of the Infidels; and now as well with their present decree, as afterwards at their returne home into their countries, by all meanes to further the same. Which notable perswasion, with the H heauie complaint of the hermit, and the equitie of the cause, so much mooued the whole counsell and the rest there present, that they all as men inspired with one spirit, declared their consent by their often crying out, Deus vult, Deus vult, God willeth it, God willeth it: which words so then vttered by way of applause, were in the great and most sacred expedition following, much vsed of the deuout Christians, as the fortunate signall of their cheerefull forwardnesse, euen in their most dangerous enterprises. Strange it were to tell, and hardly to be beleeued (but that the ancient histories beare witnesse of the like) how farre in one dayes space the report of this religious decreed warre, was by flying fame dispersed.

An expedition agreed vpon by the Counsell, for the relieſe of the Christians oppreſſed in the Holy Land.

The Counsell dissolued, and the reuerend Fathers returning euery man home into his owne countrey; it pleased God by their effectuall perswasions so to worke with the rest of the Chri- I stian Princes, and people in generall, that in all countries and prouinces in Christendome, were shortly to be seene men of all sorts in great number, with red crosses on their brests, (the cognisance of that sacred expedition) readie of themselues to spend both life and goods for the defence of the Christian religion, and recouerie of the Holy Land. The number of whom is of diuers diuersly reported, but of most supposed to haue beene three hundred thousand fighting men: of whom the chiefe commanders were Godfrey Duke of LORRAINE, with his two brethren, Eustace and Baldwin, all of the honourable house of BVILLON; Hugh surnamed the Great, brother to Philip then the French King; Raymond and Robert, Earles of FLANDERS; Robert Duke of NORMANDIE, William the Conquerours sonne; Stephan de Valois Earle of CHARTIERS; Ademar Bishop of PODIE, the Popes Legat; and Peter the hermit, not to be K numbred amongst the least, as chiefe author of this most famous expedition: vnto whom many other honourable Princes ioyned themselues as partakers of their trauels, though not with like charge.

The chiefe commanders of the Christians in their expedition into the Holy Land.

The first that set forward in this expedition, was one Gualter Sensauier, a noble gentleman, with a great band of men: not long after whom, followed Peter the hermit, with fortie thousand moe: who both, trauelling thorow GERMANIE, HVNGARIE, and BVLGARIA, were glad oftentimes, especially in the further part of HVNGARIE & BVLGARIA, to open themselues a way with the sword; and so with much labour, and no lesse losse, came at length to CONSTANTINOPLE: where they were not greatly welcome vnto the Emperour Alexius Comnenus, who guiltie vnto himselfe of the vnlawfull meanes whereby he had extorted the em- L pire from Nicephorus his predecessour, had that expedition of the Christians into the East, in distrust, as purposed against himselfe: vntill that fully resolued to the contrarie, by the hermit and others, and that a far greater power was comming after, for the inuasion of the Turks and recouerie of the Holy Land, he was content to relieue them now weary of their long trauell:
and afterward to make roome for them that were to come, shipped them ouer the strait of Bos-PHORVS into ASIA; who marching forward into BYTHINIA, encamped their armie in the countrey not farre from the citie of NICE. In the meane time Godfrey with his brethren, and diuers other Princes that had ioyned themselues vnto him, with the Germaines and Loranois, and the greatest part of the armie, followed the same way that the hermit had taken before him.
At which time also Hugh the French Kings brother, with the Legate, the two Roberts (the one M Duke of NORMANDIE, and the other Earle of FLANDERS) and the rest of the French commanders, passing ouer the mountaines into ITALY, came to ROME, with a wonderfull great armie: where taking their leaue of the Pope, because they would be lesse troublesome vnto the cities and countries whereby they were to passe, they diuided their great armie into three parts; whereof the one part went to BRVNDVSIVM, and the other to BARY, and

A the third to HYDRVNTVM, vnto whom alſo Bohemund, one of the great Princes of APVLIA, ioyned himſelfe with twelue thouſand good ſouldiers that followed him. From theſe three ports the Chriſtian armie departing, and croſſing the ADRIATIKE, arriued in ſafetie at DIRRACHIVM, and nigh thereabout, vpon the coaſt of DALMATIA: from whence they trauelled by land thorow MACEDONIA to CONSTANTINOPLE, where they met with the Duke Godfrey, and the reſt of the armie: whom alſo at the firſt, Alexius the Emperour is reported to haue but coldly entertained, as iealous of his owne ſtate; vntill that better perſwaded of their deſignements and good meaning towards him, confirmed by many rich preſents ſent vnto him from theſe ſtrange Princes, he ioyned with them in league: wherein it was agreed, That the B Emperour during the time of this expedition, ſhould furniſh them with new ſupplies of men, armour, victuals, and whatſoeuer elſe they ſhould want: in regard whereof, the Princes on the other ſide, promiſed to reſtore againe vnto the empire, what prouinces, countries, or cities they ſhould happily gaine out of the hands of the Turks and Saraſins, the citie of IERVSALEM only excepted: which agreement was afterward on the ſuſpicious Emperours part, but ſlenderly performed. Neuertheleſſe this league ſo made, he granted them paſſage, and ſo tranſported them ouer the ſtrait into ASIA; only Bohemund, for an old grudge betwixt the Emperour Alexius and his father, would not come to CONSTANTINOPLE, but marching with his armie thorow the vpper MISIA and THRACIA, came ſooner than any man had thought vnto the ſtrait of HELLESPONTVS, and ſo paſſed.

Godfrey duke of Buillon and the other Chriſtian princes meet together at Conſtantinople.

C Now had Gualter, and the hermit Peter, with their armie, lien two moneths in the countrey about NICE, expecting the comming of the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes: for why, they thought it not good, before their comming, to attempt any thing againſt the enemie, whom they knew to lie not farre off very ſtrong. But the common ſouldiers, wearie of ſo long lying, and nought doing, and pinched with ſome wants; and withall diſliking of Gualter their chiefe commander, and the hermit Peter, of whoſe integritie and holineſſe they had a greater opinion than of his proweſſe and direction; riſe vp in mutinie, and diſplacing Gualter, made choiſe of one Raymund, a valiant Germaine captaine, for their Generall: by whoſe conduct they tooke EXORGVM, a towne of purpoſe forſaken of the Turks. For they long before vnderſtanding what a tempeſt of warre was growing vpon them out of EVROPE, ſought by all meanes to cut off
D theſe that were already come ouer, as the forerunners of a greater armie following, and therefore had left them this towne, as a bait to traine them out of their trenches. And after that the Chriſtians were thus poſſeſſed of the towne, hauing laid certaine ſtrong ambuſhes, they draue out certaine heards of cattell, the more to allure them: all which, certaine companies of the Chriſtians brought in, without any loſſe, the Turkes ſtill winking thereat. With which bootie the Chriſtians encouraged, went out (three thouſand of them) to take in a little towne not farre off, who were by the Turkes cut off and ſlaine euery mothers ſonne, as they were about to haue diuided the ſpoile: which ouerthrow reported into the towne, diſcouraged euen the chiefe commanders of the armie, ſo that they reſolued no more to trie the fortune of the field, before the comming of their friends. Neuertheleſſe the common ſouldiers, condemning them of E cowardiſe, choſe them a new Generall, one Godfrey Burell, whom they now requeſted not, but enforced to goe out to reuenge the death of their fellowes: which their raſhneſſe not long after turned to their owne deſtruction. For ten thouſand of them going out of EXORGVM, to forrage the countrey, were by the Turkes entrapped, and almoſt all ſlaine, except ſome few which by ſpeedie flight eſcaped. The Turks proſecuting their victorie, laid hard ſiege to them in the towne alſo, vntill they had partly with famine, and partly with the ſword conſumed the moſt part of them. The hermit with the poore remainder of his armie, tooke his refuge to CINITE, a towne not farre off, before abandoned by the Turkes; where with much adoe he defended himſelfe, vntill the comming of Duke Godfrey, and the reſt of the Princes.

F countries & prouinces, altogether gained from the Chriſtians in ASIA, whom he held in great ſubiection & thraldome. This warlike Prince hauing diſcomfited, & almoſt brought to nought the hermits forces, was no leſſe carefull for the withſtanding of the great army following: which now being come into BYTHINIA, and lying before NICOMEDIA, remouing thence, laid ſiege to the citie of NICE, called in ancient time ANTIGONIA of Antigonus, the ſon of Philip that built it, and afterwards NICEA, of Nicea the wife of King Liſimachus. In this citie dwelt many deuout Greekes, Christians; but in such thraldome vnto the Turks, as that they could not doe G any thing for the deliuerie of themselues. This siege endured longer than the Christian Princes had at the first supposed: who although they to the vttermost of their power, forced the citie on three sides, yet was it still notably defended; new supplies still comming from the Turks by the lake of ASCANIVS ioyning vpon the other side of the citie. But after that the Christians, possessed of the lake, began on that side also to lay hardly vnto the citie, the Turkes discouraged, and seeing themselues beset round with their enemies, yeelded vp the citie the fift 1097 of Iuly, in the yeere 1097, after it had beene fiftie daies besieged. But whilest the Christians thus lay at the siege, the Turks assailed that quarter of the campe where the Legat lay; by whom they were notably repulsed, and with great losse enforced to retire vnto the mountaines. In H this citie, amongst the rest of the Turkes, was taken Solymans wife, with two of her children, whom the Princes sent prisoners to CONSTANTINOPLE. This citie so won, was according to the agreement before made, restored vnto Alexius the Emperour, whose fleet had in that siege done good seruice, by taking the lake from the Turkes.

The citie of NICE thus won, the Christian Princes remouing thence with their armie, and marching thorow the country, came the fourth day after vnto a riuer which watred many rich pastures: where, as they were about to haue encamped for the commodiousnesse of the place, and refreshing of the armie, suddenly newes was brought into the quarter where Bohemund lay, now busie in casting vp his trenches, that the Turks with a great armie were ready euen at hand to charge him. For Solyman hauing raised a great power of his owne, and aided by the Sultan of I PERSIA his kinsman, was now come with an armie of threescore thousand strong, to giue the Christians battell: of whose approch Bohemund aduertised, left the fortifying of his trenches, and putting his souldiers in array, set forward to meet him, sending word to the rest of the Princes that lay a far off, to be ready as occasion should require, to relieue him. These two armies conducted by their most resolute chieftaines, meeting together, ioyned a most fierce & terrible battell, where in a short space the Turks lay slaine vpon heaps, in such sort that they serued the Christians in stead of bulwarks. But whilest Bohemund thus preuaileth in the battell, certaine of the Turks horsemen wheeling about, brake into Bohemunds campe; (not as then altogether fortified, & but slenderly manned) where among the women, & other weake persons there left, they raised a great tumult & outcry, to the great appalling of them that were fighting in the bat- K tell: which Bohemund perceiuing, withdrew himselfe with certaine companies vnto the campe, from whence he with great slaughter repulsed the enemie. But returning againe into the battell, he found there a great alteration: for his souldiers whom before he had left, as it were in possession of a most glorious victorie, were now so hardly laid vnto by the Turkes, as that they were ready to haue turned their backs and fled. Neuertheless by his comming in, the battell was notably restored, and againe made doubtfull: when the enemie perceiuing how much the assaulting of the campe had troubled the Christians in battell, sent out certaine troupes of horsemen againe to assault the same: and had not failed vndoubtedly to haue taken it, being as aforesaid not yet fortified, had not Hugh the French Kings brother come in good time to the rescue: who comming in with thirty thousand horsemen, after he had relieued the campe, entring directly L into the battell, was notably encountred by a squadron of fresh souldiers of the Turks, by them of purpose reserued for such euent. There began a battell more terrible than the first, with most doubtfull victorie. But at the length, the Turkes wearie of the long and cruell fight, and seeing most of their fellowes slaine, began by little and little to giue ground, and so retired into the mountains, which were not far off. In this battell, which continued a great part of the day, were slaine of the Turks fortie thousand, and of the Christians about two thousand. The next morning Bohemund with the French Kings brother, came againe into the field, in such order, as if they should presently haue giuen or receiued battell: where after they had staid a great while, and saw no enemie to appeare, they fell to the honest buriall of their dead: which were easily knowne from the Turks, by the red crosses vpon their garments, the cognisance of their sacred M Solyman flieth. warfare. Solyman flying with the remainder of his armie, notably dissembled his losse, giuing it out that he had got the victorie: yet by the way as he went, he burnt vp the countrey villages, and destroied or carried away whatsoeuer else he thought might stand the Christians in any stead, if they should further follow after him, leauing nothing for them but the bare ground.

A cruell battell fought betwixt the Turkes and the Christians.

After this victorie, Bohemund and the Christian Princes, without resistance marching through

A through the hot & drie countries of the leſſer Asia, came to Antiochia, a citie of Pisidia, which they tooke with ſmall labour: & ſo marching vnto Iconivm the principall citie of Cilicia, neere vnto the mountaine Tavrvs, were there alſo of the citizens courteouſly receiued, where they ſtaid certaine dayes for the refreſhing of the armie. From thence they ſet forward toward Heraclea, where a great power of the Turks were reported to be aſſembled. But they, together with the garriſon ſouldiers, vpon the approch of the victorious armie of the Chriſtians, forſooke the citie and fled. The citizens being Chriſtians (as they were yet generally in all the prouinces of the leſſer Asia, but in great ſubiection to the Turks) and now rid of their cruel maſters the Turkiſh garriſons, came forth, and meeting the Princes, gladly yeelded themſelues with their citie vnto them, as vnto their deliuerers. Here the Chriſtian Princes fully inſtructed of the great feare & deſperation of the Turks, who now in no place durſt abide their comming; for the more ſpeedie taking in of thoſe countries but lately oppreſſed by the Turks, diuided their armie into two parts, leauing the one part thereof with Baldwin and Tancred in Cilicia, for the full ſubduing thereof (who in ſhort time tooke the cities of Tarsvs, Edessa, and Manvssa, with all the reſt of the countrey, the Turkes not daring any where to abide their comming:) the other part of the armie in the meane time entring into the leſſer Armenia, tooke the ſame from the Turkes, which the Princes gaue to one Palmurus an Armenian, who had in that expedition done them great ſeruice. From thence they tooke their way into Cappadocia, which they alſo ſubdued, driuing out the Turks in euery place, and tooke the cities of C Cesarea and Socor, where they ſtaid a few dayes for the refreſhing of the armie: with like ſucceſſe they paſſed thorow the reſt of the prouinces of the leſſer Asia, of late poſſeſſed by the Turks, ſtill chaſing them out before them, and ſetting at libertie the poore oppreſſed Chriſtians of thoſe countries. Whereof Solyman (crauing aid of Axan the Perſian Sultan his couſin) grieuouſly complained by his letters to him directed in this ſort. The famous citie of Nice, with the countrey of Romania, which we by your aid and power haue gotten from the kingdome of the Greekes, and of your bountie poſſeſſed: the Chriſtians of the kingdome of France haue againe taken from vs. Thus was the late erected kingdome of the Turks in the leſſer Asia, by theſe valiant Chriſtian champions againe brought low, and they glad to retire themſelues farther off into the mountaines and more Eaſterne countries, vntill this heat was ouerpaſt; and that they, taking D the benefit of the troubled ſtate of the Greeke empire (afterwards rent in ſunder by ambition and ciuill diſcord, the ruine of the greateſt monarchies) recouered not onely their former ſtate, but became alſo dreadfull vnto the Greeke Emperours themſelues: vpon whom they daily gained in one corner or other, ſtill maintaining the honour of their eſtate, vntill the riſing of the Othoman familie, as in the proceſſe of this hiſtorie ſhall God willing be declared.

Theſe victorious Princes then, and to the worlds end famous, not contented to their immortall praiſe, to haue thus driuen the Turks out of the leſſer Asia, and recouered ſo many countries; bound themſelues, as well the Princes as the common ſouldiers, by ſolemne oath, neuer to return again into their countries, vntil they had accompliſhed that ſacred war, with the conqueſt of the Holy citie. So mounting together the high mountaine Tavrvs, and deſcending thence E as into another world, they came to the citie Maresia, which they tooke without reſiſtance, the Turks there in garriſon, being by night before for feare fled: where the Chriſtians for the refreſhing of themſelues, certaine dayes ſtaid. In the meane time Robert Earle of Flanders with a thouſand men at armes, was ſent out to giue ſummons vnto a citie called Artasia, about fifteene miles diſtant from Antioch: when as the citizens beholding the enſignes of the Chriſtians, ſuddenly tooke vp armes againſt the Turks there in garriſon, which had of long holden them in ſubiection, and preuailing vpon them, ſlew them euery mothers ſonne: whoſe heads they preſented vnto the Earle, and receiued him into their citie. The Turks to reuenge the death of their friends, and to recouer againe the citie before the comming of the reſt of the armie, ſent out about ten thouſand men out of Antioch; for thither was aſſembled a great power of F them to haue hindred the farther proceedings of the Chriſtians: and being come neere to Artasia, they ſent before certaine ſtragling companies, of purpoſe to draw the new come Chriſtians out of the citie, lying in the mean time in ambuſh with the reſt, of purpoſe to entrap them. With theſe ſtragling companies, the Flemings ſallying out luſtily, encountred, & eaſily put thē to flight; the Turks indeed flying of purpoſe to bring them within the danger of the other, lying in ambuſh. After whom the Flemings eagerly following, were before they were aware enclosed round with their enemies, and there had vndoubtedly perished, had not the citizens (be- G ing Christians) presently sallied out, and right worthily relieued them.

Shortly after, the Christian Princes marching forward with their armie, were encountred by the Turke at the riuer ORONTES, who had there thought to haue staid their farther passage: with whom Robert Duke of NORMANDIE, who had the leading of the vantgard, had a hard conflict, vntill that the Turkes, discouraged with the sight of the armie still comming on, forsooke the bridge, and betooke themselues to flight. So the Christians passing the riuer, came and encamped with their armie before the famous citie of ANTIOCH, the one and twentieth day of October, in the yeere 1097: the gouernour whereof vnder the Persian Sultan, was one Cassianus, (of some also honoured with the name of a King) who at the comming of the Christi- H ans, had with him in the citie seuen thousand horsemen, and twentie thousand foot of the Turkes, with great store of victuals, and all manner of other prouisions necessarie for the defence thereof. This citie, called in ancient time EPIDAPHANE, or EPIPHANE, and of the Hebrewes, REBLATHA, sometime the seat of the Syrian Kings, and afterwards the Metropoliticall citie of SYRIA, hauing vnder it an hundred and fiftie Bishops (famous for many things, and amongst others, for that it was the seat of the blessed Apostle S. Peter, and first place whereas the professours of the Christian religion tooke the name of Christians) is situate vpon the riuer ORONTES, about twelue miles from the sea, and was then strongly fortified both by Nature and Art, being compassed about with a double wall; the vttermost whereof was of hard stone, and the other of bricke, with 460 towers in the same, and an inpregnable castle at the East I end thereof, whereunto was ioyning a deepe lake, comming out of the great riuer which watred the South side of the citie. Round about this strong citie (one of the most assured refuges of the Turkes) although it were in circuit great, lay the Christian Princes encamped, except on that side which being defended with the high broken mountaines, is not there to be besieged. Vpon whom the Turks out of the citie, during the time of the siege, made many a fierce and desperate sallie, being still by the Christians most valiantly repulsed: especially at the bridge which the Christians had made of boats for their more commodious passage too and fro ouer the riuer. In this sort was the siege continued, vntill the beginning of Februarie, with many a bloudie skirmish. At which time such abundance of raine fell, as that hardly could a man finde any place to lie drie in: and the scarcitie of victuall grew so great in the campe, that many (horrible it is to K say) to asswage their hunger, were glad to eat the dead bodies of their late slaine enemies. In these extremities, many died of hunger & cold; yea their horses also perished for want of meat, so that in the whole campe were scarcely left two thousand horses fit for seruice, the rest being either all dead, or brought so low, as that they were altogether vnseruiceable. These miseries daily increasing, diuers men of great account, whom no terrour of the enemie could haue dismaid, began secretly to withdraw themselues out of the campe, with purpose to haue stolne home; among whom were Peter the hermit, author of this warre, and Tancred the nephew of Bohemund, who taken by the way, and brought backe with the rest as fugitiues, were sharply reproued by Hugh the French Kings brother, as cowards, and traitors to their brethren & fellow souldiers, and so enforced to take a new oath for their fidelitie and perseuerance. Bohemund in L the meane time going to ARETHVSA, a towne not far off, by good fortune cut off a great part of the Turks there in garrison: who after their vsuall manner sallying out to haue cut off the forrages of the Christians, were now themselues caught tardie: whereby the countrey for a time was more open for the distressed Christian souldiers to seeke abroad for reliefe. But this libertie so lately gained, lasted not long, when newes was brought vnto the campe, that the Turks in great number out of the prouinces about ALEPPO and DAMASCO, were comming to the reliefe of their besieged friends in ANTIOCH. Neuertheless the Christians trusting vnto their owne strength, and the strength of the place wherein they were encamped, lay still, and at their comming so encountred them, that they slew 2000 of them, and put the rest to flight: In which conflict the Christians got great store of prouision and victuals, which the Turkes had thought to M haue put into the citie. The heads of the slaine Turkes the Christians set vpon stakes before the citie, to the more terrour of the defendants. This ouerthrow of the Turkes, wherein Cassianus had lost his eldest sonne, with others of his best captaines, so daunted the besieged, that they requested a truce for a time of the Christian Princes: which granted, they of the citie came oftentimes into the campe, and they of the campe likewise into the citie: Cassianus still expecting reliefe

The description of the famous citie of Antioch.

A liefe from the Perſian Sultan. Whileſt the Chriſtian Princes were thus buſie in ASIA, the Venetians with a great fleet of two hundred gallies ſcowring the ſeas, vnder the condct of Henrie Contarenus the Biſhop, and of Vitalis the Dukes ſonne, meeting with the gallies of Piſa at the RHODES, and falling out with them, had with them a great fight, wherein the Venetians hauing the vpper hand, tooke eighteene of their gallies, & in them fiue thouſand ſouldiers: whom they ſeeing to be marked with the red croſſe, the cogniſance of the ſacred warre, they preſently ſet at libertie, together with the gallies, detaining only thirtie of the better ſort as hoſtages. After that, the Venetians ſailing into IONIA, tooke the citie of SMYRNA, and ſpoiled all along the coaſts of LYCIA, PAMPHILIA, and CILICIA, before for feare abandoned by the Turkes.

B The truce before taken betweene the Turks and the Chriſtians at the ſiege of ANTIOCH, being in ſhort time after broken by the death of one Vollo a Frenchman, ſlaine by the Turkes: the warre was againe begun, and the citie more hardly laid vnto than before. At which time the gouernor, who in the time of this long ſiege, which had now continued nine months, had loſt moſt part of his beſt ſouldiers, was glad for the defence of ſo great a citie, to vſe the ſeruice of diuers Chriſtians, then dwelling in the citie. Amongſt whom was one Pirrhus, a citizen of great reputation, vnto whom he had cõmitted the guarding of a tower, called the two Siſters, but afterward S. Georges tower. This Pirrhus had ſecret intelligence with Bohemund Prince of TARENTVM, with whom he agreed to giue him there entrance into the citie, vpon condition, that he ſhould of the other Chriſtian Princes procure the gouernment of the citie vnto himſelfe; and that he, with

C the reſt of the Chriſtian citizens in the citie, might be at his hands well vſed: which thing being eaſily obtained, and all things agreed vpon, Bohemund with his ſouldiers were by night by Pyrrhus let into the citie, who made way for the reſt of the armie to enter. The citie thus taken, many of the Turks fled into the caſtle, the reſt were put vnto the ſword, man, woman, and childe; and amongſt them alſo many of the Chriſtians, the furious ſouldiers taking of them no knowledge. Great wealth was there found, but ſmall ſtore of victuals. Caſſianus the late gouernour flying out of the citie to ſaue himſelfe, in wandring thorow the mountaines, fell into the hands of the Chriſtian Armenians, who lately thruſt out of IERVSALEM, were fled thither for refuge, by whom he was there ſlaine. In the citie were ſlaine about ten thouſand perſons. Thus was the famous citie of ANTIOCH, which the Turks had long before by famine taken from the Caſſianus gouernour of Antioch in flying ſlaine.

D Chriſtians, againe recouered the third day of Iune, in the yeere of our Lord God 1098. The poore oppreſſed Chriſtians in IERVSALEM hearing of this ſo notable a victorie, gaue ſecret thanks vnto God therefore, and began to lift vp their heads in hope that their deliuerie was now at hand. Of this victorie, the Princes of the armie by ſpeedie meſſengers and letters certified their friends in all countries, ſo that in ſhort time the fame thereof had filled a great part of the world. Amongſt others, Bohemund Prince of TARENTVM, vnto whom the citie was deliuered, ſent the ioyfull newes thereof vnto Roger his brother Prince of APVLIA: whoſe letters, as the moſt certain witneſſes of the hiſtorie before reported, I thought it not amiſſe here to ſet downe.

E I ſuppoſe you to haue vnderſtood by the letters of your ſonne Tancred, both of the great feare of ſome of vs, and the battels which wee haue of late with our great glorie fought. But concerning the truce, and the proceeding of the whole action, I had rather you ſhould be certified by my letters, than the letters of others. King Caſſianus had required a time of truce: during which, our ſouldiers had free recourſe into the citie without danger, vntill that by the death of Vollo a Frenchman, ſlaine by the enemie, the truce was broken. But whilſt it yet ſeemed an hard matter to winne the citie, one Pyrrhus a citizen of ANTIOCH, of great authoritie and much deuoted vnto mee, had conference with mee concerning the yeelding vp of the citie; yet vpon condition, That the gouernment thereof ſhould be committed to me, in whom he had repoſed an eſpeciall truſt. I conferred of the whole matter with the Princes and great commanders of the armie, and eaſily obtained that the gouernment of the citie was by their generall conſent allotted vnto me. So our armie entring by a gate opened by Pyrrhus, tooke the

F citie. Within a few dayes after, the towne ARETVM was by vs aſſaulted, but not without ſome loſſe and danger to our perſon, by reaſon of a wound I there receiued. I aſſure you much of the valour of your ſonne Tancred, of whom I and the whole armie make ſuch account and reckoning, as is to be made of a moſt valiant and reſolute generall. Farewell. From ANTIOCH.

lieutenant) with a great armie besieged EDESSA, with purpose after the taking thereof, to haue C relieued the citie of ANTIOCH. But this citie being notably defended by Baldwin left there of purpose with a strong garrison for the defence thereof; the Turke fearing in the meane time to lose ANTIOCH, the safest refuge of the Turks in all those parts, rise with his armie and set forward against the Christians: where by the way it was his fortune to meet with Sansadolus, Cas- sianus his sonne, but lately fled from ANTIOCH, by whom he vnderstood of the losse of the citie, and by what meanes the same was most like to be againe recouered: vpon which hope, Corbanas with his mightie armie kept on his way, with a full resolution to set all vpon the fortune of a battell. Whose comming much troubled the Christians; for that although they were possessed of the citie, yet was the castle still holden by the Turks. Neuertheless leauing the Earle H of THOLOVS in the citie, with a competent power for the keeping in of them in the castle, they tooke the field with the whole strength of the armie, and so in order of battell expected the comming of their enemies: who couragiously comming on, as men before resolued to fight, ioyned with them a most terrible and bloudie battell. Neither were they in the citie in the meane time idle; for that the Turks in the castle hauing receiued in vnto them certaine supplies from Corbanas, sallied out vpon them that were left for the safegard of the citie, and had with them a cruell conflict. Thus both within the citie and without was to be seene a most dreadfull fight of resolute men, with great slaughter on both sides: yet after long fight and much effusion of bloud, the fortune of the Christians preuailing, the Turks began to giue ground, and afterwards betooke themselues to plaine flight, whom the Christians hardly pursuing, made of them I a wonderfull slaughter. In this battell were slaine of the Turks aboue an hundred thousand, and of the Christians about foure thousand two hundred. There was also taken a great prey: for besides horses and other beasts for burden, were taken also fiue thousand camels with their lading. The next day, being the 28 of Iune, the castle was by the Turks (now despairing of re-liefe) yeelded vp vnto the Christians.

ANTIOCH thus taken, Hugh the French Kings brother, surnamed the Great, was sent from the rest of the Princes to CONSTANTINOPLE, to haue deliuered the citie vnto Alexius the Emperour, according to the agreement before made. But he, guiltie in conscience of his owne foule dealing with them, vnto whom he had sent no reliefe at all during the long and hard siege of ANTIOCH; neither performed any thing of that he had further promised, and therefore K knowing himselfe hated of them, had in distrust so great an offer of the Princes, so euill deser-ued, and therefore refused to accept thereof. Whereupon Bohemund by the generall consent of the whole armie was chosen Prince, or (as some call him) King of ANTIOCH.

The plague in the Christian armie.
After this long siege and want of victuals, ensued a great plague in the armie of the Christians, the Autumne following, whereof it is reported fiftie thousand men to haue died, and amongst them many of great account. But the mortalitie ceasing, the Christians, in Nouember following, by force tooke RVGIA, and ALBARIA, two cities, about two dayes iourney from Discord arising vpon emulation betwixt Bohemund and Raimund.
ANTIOCH: where dissention arising betwixt Bohemund & Raimund, who of all others only enuied at his preferment vnto the principalitie of ANTIOCH: Bohemund for the common causes sake, gaue way vnto his aduersarie, & retired with his souldiers backe againe to ANTIOCH; after L whom followed the Duke Godfrey, and the Earle of FLANDERS with their regiments. The rest of the Princes wintred some at RVGIA, some at ALBARIA, from whence Raimund made sundrie light expeditions further into the enemies country: But the spring approching, the Christian Princes with all their power tooke the field againe. Bohemund with them that remained with him, departing from ANTIOCH, besieged TORTOSA. Raimund in the meane time with the rest, besieging the citie of TRIPOLIS: who become much more insolent than before, by reason of some fortunate roads he had made vpon the enemies the last winter, ceased not still to ma-ligne Bohemund and his proceedings: matter enough to haue diuided the whole power of the Christians, & to haue turned their weapons vpō themselues: which Bohemund well considering, rise with his armie; and because he would not with his presence trouble the proceeding of the M religious warre, retired himselfe to ANTIOCH. After whose departure, Godfrey and the Earle of FLANDERS, tooke GABELLA, a citie about twelue miles from LAODICIA, & from thence returned againe to the siege of TORTOSA, whither Raimund came also with his armie, hauing before driuen the gouernour of TRIPOLIS to such composition as pleased himselfe, and to furnish him with such things as he wanted. Thus was TORTOSA hardly on three sides besieged by

A by the Christians, but so notably defended by the Turkes, that after three moneths hard siege, the Christians were glad to depart thence: and marching alongst the sea side, spoiled the countrey about SIDON. But forasmuch as that citie was not easily to be won, they left it, and encamped before PTOLEMAIS, which they also passed by: the gouernor thereof sending them out victuals, with such other things as they wanted; and vpon summons giuen, promising to yeeld the citie after they had once won the citie of IERVSALEM. From thence they came to CESARIA in PALESTINE, where they solemnly kept the feast of Whitsontide, and so to RAMA, which they found for feare forsaken of the Infidels. Marching from RAMA, and drawing neere to IERVSALEM, they in the vantgard of the armie, vpon the first descrying of B the Holy citie, gaue for ioy diuers great shouts and outcries, which with the like applause of the whole armie was so doubled and redoubled, as if therewith they would haue rent the very mountaines, and pierced the higheſt heauens. There might a man haue seene the deuout passions of these most worthy and zealous Christians, vttered in right diuers manners: Some, with their eies and hands cast vp towards heauen, called aloud vpon the name and helpe of Christ Iesus; some, prostrate vpon their faces, kissed the ground, as that whereon the Redeemer of the world sometime walked; others, ioyfully saluted those holy places which they had heard so much of, and then first beheld: In briefe, euery man in some sort expressed the ioy he had conceiued of the sight of the Holy citie, as the end of their long trauell.

This most ancient and famous citie, so much renowned in holy writ, is situate in an hillie
C countrey; not watred with any riuer or fresh springs, as other famous cities for most part be; neither yet was it well seated for wood, or pasture ground: But what wanted in these, and such other benefits of nature, was by the extraordinary blessings of the most higheſt so supplied, as that the Iewes there dwelling, so long as they kept the ordinances of the Lord, were of all other people in the world iustly accounted the most happie and fortunate. Yet in those so blessed times, was this citie for the sinne of the people oftentimes deliuered into the enemies hand, and the glorie thereof defaced; as well appeareth by the whole course of the historie of holy Scripture, as also by the ancient and approoued histories as well of the Iewes themselues, as others. Neuertheleſſe, it still rise againe (though not in like glory as before in the time of King Dauid, Salomon, & the other next succeeding Kings) and so was still repeopled by the Iewes, vntill that
D at last according to the foretelling of our Sauiour Christ, it was with a great and of all others most lamentable destruction, vtterly rased and destroied by the Romans, vnder the leading of Vespatian the Emperour, and his noble sonne Titus, fortie yeeres after our Sauiour his pretious death and passion. Sithence which time, it was neuer vntill this day againe repaired, or yet well inhabited, by the Iewes; but lying buried in the ruines of it selfe, all the raigne of Domitian, Nerua, and Traian, vntill the time of the great Emperour Aelius Adrianus, it was againe by him reedified about the yeere 136, and after the name of him called ÆLIA; who together with the name changed also in some part the ancient situation of the citie. For whereas before it was seated vpon the steepe rising of an hill, in such sort that towards the East and the South it ouerlooked the whole ground, hauing only the Temple and the Castle called ANTONIA, in the higheſt
E part of the citie: Adrian translated the whole citie vnto the very top of the hill, so that the place where our blessed Sauiour suffered his most bitter passion, with the Sepulchre wherein he was also laid, and from whence he in glorie rise againe, before without the citie, were then enclosed within the walles thereof, as they are at this day to be seene. Yet for all that the Emperour being dead, in processe of time this new built citie recouered againe the ancient name of IERVSALEM, whereby it hath euer since, and is at this day yet knowne. This citie so reedified, the Emperour first gaue vnto the Iewes, whom he afterwards againe thrust out for their rebellion, and gaue it to the Christians to inhabit: ouer whom, one Marke, first Bishop of the Gentiles there, had the charge. But forasmuch as the Romane Emperours were at that time altogether Idolaters and persecutors of the poore Christians, the Church also at IERVSALEM, with others endured F sundrie and many grieuous persecutions, vnder the Emperours Antoninus, Commodus, Seuerus, Maximinus, Valerianus, Aurelianus, Diocleſianus, and Maxentius, vntill that at length Conſtantine the Great conuerted vnto the faith of Christ, about the yeere of Grace 320, suppressing the Pagan Idolatry, gaue general peace vnto the afflicted Church: wherby the Christian Church at IERVSALEM, for the space of three hundred yeeres after, happily flouriſhed vnder the Greeke Emperors, vntill the time of the Emperor Phocas; who hauing most cruelly slaine the good Empe-

A briefe discourse of the state & fortune of the Holy citie of Ieruſalem, from the destruction thereof, vnder Veſpatianus the Emperor and Titus his ſonne, vntill it was now againe recouered out of the hands of the Infidels by Godfrey of Buillon and the other Christian Princes of the Weſt.

vnto Choſroe the Perſian King, in reuenge of the death of Maurice his father in law, with all his power to inuade SYRIA: who as a tempeſt bearing downe all before him, tooke alſo by force the citie of IERVSALEM, hauing that yeere, which was about the yeere ſix hundred and ten, ſlain almoſt an hundred thouſand Chriſtians. But Phocas the vſurper being by them of his guard moſt cruelly ſlaine, and Heraclius ſucceeding in his ſtead, Choſroe was by him againe driuen out of SYRIA, and the Holy citie againe recouered, about the yeere 624. In theſe great wars againſt the Perſians, Heraclius had vſed the helpe of the Arabians, called Scenite, a warlike people of ARABIA DESERTA, altogether giuen to the ſpoile: who, the wars now ended, expecting to haue receiued their pay, were contrary to their expectation, and without all reaſon reiected by H them that ſhould haue paid them, with very foule and contumelious words; as, that there was not mony enough to pay the Chriſtian ſouldiers of the Latines & the Greekes, much leſſe thoſe vile dogs (whom they ſo called, for that they had but a little before receiued the damnable doctrine of the falſe prophet Mahomet, the great ſeducer of the world, who euen in that time flouriſhed.) Vpon which diſcontentment they at their returne reuolted from the empire, and ioined themſelues vnto their great prophet, and ſo afterwards vnto the Caliphs his ſucceſſors, extending his doctrine, together with his ſoueraigntie, to the vttermoſt of their power: and that with ſo good ſucceſſe, that in ſhort time they had ouerrun all ÆGYPT, SYRIA, the land of promiſe, and taken the Holy citie. With theſe (the diſciples of Mahomet and his ſucceſſors, the Saraſins, for ſo now they would be called) the Greeke Emperours enſuing, had for certain yeeres I diuers conflicts, with diuers fortune, for the poſſeſſion of SYRIA. But at length wearied out, and by them ouercome, they left the aforeſaid countries wholly vnto their deuotion. Hereby it came to paſſe, that the Saraſins for the ſpace of 370 yeeres following held thoſe countries, with many others, in great ſubiection, oppreſſing ſtill the poore Chriſtians in IERVSALEM with moſt grieuous tributes and exactions: vnto whom they yet left a third part of the citie for them to dwell in, with the Temple of the Sepulchre of our Sauiour, and mount SION; not for any deuotion, either vnto them, or thoſe places, but for that it yeelded them a great profit by the recourſe of deuout Chriſtians trauelling thither: reſeruing in the meane time vnto themſelues, the other two parts of the citie, with the Temple of Salomon, before reedified by the Chriſtians.
Now whileſt the Saraſins thus triumph it in the Eaſt, and not in the Eaſt onely, but ouer a great K part of the Weſt alſo, contenting themſelues with ſuch tributes as they had impoſed vpon the ſubdued nations and countries: vp ſtart the Turks, a vagrant, fierce, and cruell people; who firſt breaking into ASIA (as is before declared) and by rare fortune aſpiring vnto the kingdome of PERSIA, ſubdued the countries of MESOPOTAMIA, SYRIA, with the greateſt part of the leſſer ASIA, and IVDEA, together with the Holy citie: who both there and in all other places held the poore oppreſſed Chriſtians in ſuch ſubiection and thraldome, as that the former go-uernment of the Saraſins ſeemed in compariſon of this to haue beene but light and eaſie. Neither was there any end or releaſe of theſe ſo great miſeries to haue beene expected, had not God in mercy by the weake meanes of a poore hermit, ſtirred vp theſe moſt worthy Princes of the Weſt to take vp armes in their defence, who hauing with their victorious armies recouered the L leſſer ASIA, with a great part of SYRIA, were now come vnto this Holy citie.

Ieruſalem beſieged by the Chriſtians.

The gouernour of IERVSALEM vnderſtanding by his eſpials, of the proceedings of the Chriſtians, had before their approch, got into the citie a very ſtrong garriſon of right valiant ſouldiers, with good ſtore of all things neceſſarie for the holding out of a long ſiege. The Chriſtians with their armie approching the citie, encamped before it on the North; for that towards the Eaſt & the South, it was not well to be beſieged, by reaſon of the broken rocks and moun-taines. Next vnto the citie lay Godfrey the Duke, with the Germans and Loranois: neere vnto him lay the Earle of FLANDERS, and Robert the Norman: before the Weſt gate lay Tancred, and the Earle of THOLOVS: Bohemund and Baldwin were both abſent, the one at ANTIOCH, the other at EDESSA. The Chriſtians thus ſtrongly encamped, the fift day after gaue vnto the M citie a fierce aſſault, with ſuch cheerfulneſſe, as that it was verily ſuppoſed, it might haue beene euen then won, had they beene ſufficiently furniſhed with ſcaling ladders: for want whereof, they were glad to giue ouer the aſſault, and retire. But within a few daies after, hauing ſupplied that defect, & prouided all things neceſſarie, they came on againe afreſh, and with all their power gaue vnto the citie a moſt terrible aſſault, wherein was on both ſides ſeene great valour, po-licie,

A licie, and cunning, with much ſlaughter, vntill that at length the Chriſtians wearie of the long fight, and in that hot countrey, and moſt feruent time of the yeere, fainting for lacke of water, were glad againe to forſake the aſſault, and to retire into their trenches: only the well of Siloe yeelded them water, and that not ſufficient for the whole campe; the reſt of the wels, which were but few, being before by the enemie either filled vp or elſe poiſoned.

Whileſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the ſiege of IERVSALEM, a fleet of the Genowaies arriued at IOPPA; at which time alſo a great fleet of the Ægyptian Sultans lay at ASCALON, to haue brought reliefe to the beſieged Turks in IERVSALEM, wherof the Genowaies vnderſtanding, and knowing themſelues too weake to encounter them at ſea, tooke all ſuch things out of their B ſhips as they thought good, and ſo ſinking them, marched by land vnto the campe. There was amongſt theſe Genowaies diuers enginers, men (after the manner of that time) cunning in making of all manner of engines fit for the beſieging of cities: by whoſe deuice, a great mouing tower was framed of timber and thicke plancks, couered ouer with raw hides, to ſaue the ſame from fire: out of which the Chriſtians might in ſafetie greatly annoy the defendants. This tower being by night brought cloſe vnto the wall, ſerued the Chriſtians in ſtead of a moſt ſure fortreſſe in the aſſault the next day: where whilſt they ſtriue with like valour & doubtfull victorie on both ſides, from morning vntill midday, by chance the winde fauouring the Chriſtians, carried the flame of the fire into the face of the Turks, wherewith they had thought to haue burnt the tower, with ſuch violence, that the Chriſtians taking the benefit thereof, and holpen by the tower, C gained the top of the wall: which was firſt footed by the Duke Godfrey, and his brother Euſtace, with their followers, & the enſignes of the Duke there firſt ſet vp, to the great encouraging of the Chriſtians; who now preſſing in on euery ſide, like a violent riuer that had broken ouer the banks, bare downe all before them. All were ſlaine that came to hand, men, women, & children, without reſpect of age, ſex, or condition: the ſlaughter was great, and the ſight lamentable, all the ſtreets were filled with bloud, and the bodies of the dead, death triumphing in euery place.

Yet in this confuſion, a wonderfull number of the better ſort of the Turks, retiring vnto Salomons Temple, there to doe their laſt deuoire, made there a great and terrible fight, armed with deſpaire to endure any thing; and the victorious Chriſtians no leſſe diſdaining, after the winning of the citie, to finde there ſo great reſiſtance. In this deſperate conflict, fought with won- D derfull obſtinacie of minde, many fell on both ſides: but the Chriſtians came on ſo fiercely, with deſire of bloud, that breaking into the Temple, the foremoſt of them were by the preſſe of them that followed after, violently thruſt vpon the weapons of their enemies, and ſo miſerably ſlaine. Neither did the Turks thus oppreſſed, giue it ouer, but as men reſolued to die, deſperately fought it out with inuincible courage, not at the gates of the Temple only, but euen in the middeſt thereof alſo, where was to be ſeene great heaps, both of the victors and the vanquiſhed, ſlaine indifferently together. All the pauement of the Temple ſwam with bloud, in ſuch ſort, that a man could not ſet his foot, but either vpon ſome dead man, or ouer the ſhooes in bloud. Yet for all that, the obſtinate enemie ſtill held the vaults and top of the Temple, when as the darkneſſe of the night came ſo faſt on, that the Chriſtians were glad to make an end of the E ſlaughter, and to ſound a retrait. The next day (for that proclamation was made, for mercy to be ſhewed vnto all ſuch as ſhould lay downe their weapons) the Turkes that yet held the vpper part of the Temple, came downe and yeelded themſelues. Thus was the famous citie of IERVSALEM with great bloudſhed, but farre greater honour, recouered by theſe worthy Chriſtians, in the yeere 1099, after it had beene in the hands of the Infidels aboue foure hundred yeeres. 1099

A moſt cruell and bloudie fight betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks, euen in the Temple of Ieruſalem.

The next day after, hauing buried the dead and cleanſed the citie, they gaue thankes to God with publike praiers, and great reioycing. The poore Chriſtians before oppreſſed, now ouercome with vnexpected ioy, welcomed their victorious brethren with great ioy and praiſe; and the ſouldiers embracing one another, ſparing to ſpeake of themſelues, freely commended each others valor. Eight daies after, the princes of the army meeting together, began to conſult about F the choice of their King: amongſt whom was no ſuch difference, as might well ſhew which was to be preferred before the others. And although euery one of them for proweſſe and deſert, ſeemed worthy of ſo great an honour; yet by the generall conſent of all, it was giuen to Robert Duke of NORMANDIE: who about the ſame time hearing of the death of the Conquerour his father, and more in loue with his fathers new gotten kingdome in ENGLAND, in hope thereof, refuſed the kingdome of IERVSALEM, then offered vnto him: which at his returne he found found poſſeſſed by William Rufus his younger brother, and ſo in hope of a better refuſing the worſe, vpon the matter loſt both. G

Godfrey Duke of Buillon by the generall conſent of the Chriſtian armie choſen firſt king of Ieruſalem.

After whoſe departure, Godfrey of BVILLON Duke of LORAINE (whoſe enſigne was firſt diſplaid vpon the wals) was by the generall conſent both of the Princes and the armie, ſaluted King. He was a great ſouldier, and endued with many heroicall vertues, brought vp in the court of the Emperour Henry the fourth, and by him much emploied. At the time of his inauguration, hee refuſed to be crowned with a crowne of gold: ſaying, That it became not a Chriſtian man, there to weare a crowne of gold, where Chriſt the Sonne of God had for the ſaluation of mankinde, ſometime worne a crowne of thorne. Of the greateſt part of theſe proceedings of the Chriſtians, from the time of their departure from ANTIOCH vntill the winning of the Holy Citie, Godfrey by letters briefly certified Bohemund, as followeth. H

After long trauell, hauing firſt taken certaine townes, wee came to IERVSALEM: which citie is enuironed with high hils, without riuers or fountaines, excepting onely that of Salomons, and that a very little one. In it are many ceſternes, wherein water is kept, both in the citie and the countrey thereabout. On the Eaſt are the Arabians, the Moabits, and Ammonits: on the South, the Idumeans, Ægyptians, and Philiſtians: Weſtward alongſt the ſea coaſt lie the cities of PTOLEMAIS, TYRVS, I and TRIPOLIS: and Northward, TIBERIAS, CESAREA, PHILIPPI, with the countrey DECAPOLIS and DAMASCO. In the aſſault of the citie, I firſt gained that part of the wall that fell to my lot to aſſaile, and commanded Baldwin to enter the citie: who hauing ſlaine certaine companies of the enemies, broke open one of the gates for the Chriſtians to enter. Raymond had the citie of Dauid, with much rich ſpoile, yeelded vnto him. But when wee came vnto the Temple of Salomon, there wee had a great conflict, with ſo great ſlaughter of the enemie, that our men ſtood in bloud aboue the ancles: the night approching, wee could not take the vpper part of the Temple, which the next day was yeelded, the Turkes pitifully crying out for mercie: and ſo the citie of IERVSALEM was by vs taken, the fifteenth of Iuly, in the yeere of our redemption 1099, 39 dayes after the beginning of the ſiege, 409 yeeres after it fell into the hands of the Saraſins in the time of Heraclius the Emperour. Beſides this, the Princes with one conſent ſaluted mee (againſt my will) King of IERVSALEM: who although I feare to take vpon mee ſo great a kingdome, yet I will doe my deuoire, that they ſhall eaſily know me for a Chriſtian King, and well deſeruing of the vniuerſall Faith. But loue you mee as you doe. And ſo farewell. From IERVSALEM. K

Whileſt theſe things were in doing at IERVSALEM, ſuch a multitude of the Turkes, and Saraſins their confederates (now in their common calamitie all as one) were aſſembled at ASCALON (a citie about fiue and twentie miles from IERVSALEM) to reuenge the iniuries they had before receiued, as had not before met together in all the time of this ſacred warre. Againſt whom, Godfrey (the late Duke, and now King) aſſembled the whole forces of the Chriſtians in L thoſe countries, and leauing a ſtrong garriſon in the new won citie, ſet forward: and meeting with them, ioined a moſt dreadfull and cruell battell, wherein (as moſt report) were ſlaine of the Infidels an hundred thouſand men, and the reſt put to flight. The ſpoile there taken, farre exceeded all that the Chriſtians had before taken in this long expedition. Godfrey after ſo great a victorie, returning to IERVSALEM, gaue vnto God moſt humble thankes. The reſt of the Princes returned either to their charge, as did Bohemund to ANTIOCH, Baldwin to EDESSA, Tancred into GALLILEY, whereof he was created Prince: or elſe hauing now performed the vttermoſt of their vowes, returned with honour into their owne countries. This was of all others the moſt honourable expedition that euer the Chriſtians tooke in hand againſt the Infidels, and with the greateſt reſolution performed, for the moſt part, by ſuch voluntary men, as moued with M a deuout zeale, to their immortal praiſe, ſpared neither life nor liuing in defence of the Chriſtian faith and religion; all men worthy eternall fame and memorie. Not long after enſued a great peſtilence (the ready attendant of long war & want) whereof infinite numbers of people died, and among the reſt Godfrey, the firſt Chriſtian King of IERVSALEM, neuer to be ſufficiently commended: who with the generall lamentation of all good Chriſtians, was honourably buried

An hundred thouſand Turks and Saraſins ſlaine.

Godfrey of Buillon firſt Chriſtian King of Ieruſalem, dieth of the plague.

A ried in the church of the ſepulchre of our Sauiour on the mount CALVARIE, where our Sauiour ſuffered his paſſion: in which the Chriſtian kings ſucceeding him, were alſo afterwards buried. He departed this life the eighteenth of Iuly, in the yeere of our Lord 1100, when he had yet ſcarce raigned a full yeere. Whoſe tombe is yet at this day there to be ſeene, with an honourable inſcription thereupon. 1100

After the death of Godfrey, the Chriſtians made choice of Baldwin his brother, countie of EDESSA; who leauing his former gouernment to Baldwin ſurnamed Burgenſis, his neere kinſman, came to IERVSALEM honorably accompanied, and was there by the Patriarch on Chriſtmas day with all ſolemnitie crowned king, in the yeere 1101. He aided by the Venetians and Genowaies at ſea, and by Bohemund king of ANTIOCH by land, tooke from the Infidels the citie of CESAREA STRATONIS, ſtanding vpon the ſea ſide; & ouerthrew certaine companies of the Ægyptian Sultans at RAMA. But vnderſtanding that the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt were comming to his aid with a new power; he glad thereof, went to meet them, & ſafely conducted them to IERVSALEM alongſt the ſea coaſt, by the cities of BERYTVS, SIDON, TIRE, and PTOLEMAIS, all yet holden by the enemies. At which time the Turkes at ASCALON hauing receiued great aid from the Arabians and Ægyptians, inuaded the country about RAMA: where betwixt them and the Chriſtians was fought a moſt cruell battell, wherein the Chriſtians receiued a moſt notable ouerthrow; many of their great commanders being there ſlaine, and among the reſt Stephen Earle of CHARTERS (but lately returned home from the former expedition, & now come backe againe) and Stephen Earle of BVRGVNDIE and THOLOVS: yea the king himſelfe hardly eſcaped the enemies hands, and after many dangers, came at length to IOPPA, after it had been conſtantly before reported him to haue been in that battell alſo ſlaine. Who hauing there in haſte repaired his armie, came again ſpeedily vpon his enemies, fearing as then nothing leſſe; and ouerthrew them with ſuch a ſlaughter, as that they had ſmall cauſe to reioyce of the former victorie. Neither were the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes in the other parts of SIRIA & PALESTINE, in the meane time idle, but ſought by all meanes to enlarge their territories. Tancred Prince of GALLILIE, hauing raiſed a great power, tooke APAMEA, the Metropoliticall citie of Cœleſyria, and after much toile, won alſo the citie of LAODICEA. Baldwin alſo gouernor of EDESSA beſieging the citie of CARRAS, had brought the beſieged Turkes to ſuch extremitie, that they were about to haue yeelded the citie: when ſuddenly he was ſet vpon by a great armie of the Turks ſent frõ the Perſian Sultan, for the reliefe of the beſieged; and being there ouerthrown, was himſelfe there taken, with Benedict the Biſhop, & one Ioſcelin his kinſman: who after fiue yeeres captiuity, found means with the Turke that had taken them, to redeeme themſelues, to the great offence of the Perſian Sultan, & of the Sultan Solyman.

Baldwin county of Edeſſa, and brother to Godfrey ſecond king of Ieruſalem.

King Baldwin after the late victorie, liued for a ſeaſon at ſome good reſt in IERVSALEM, vnmoleſted by his enemies: but knowing his greateſt ſafetie among ſuch warlike people, to conſiſt in armes, he vpon the ſudden raiſed the whole ſtrength of his kingdome, and laid ſiege to PTOLEMAIS, otherwiſe called ACON, a citie of PHŒNICIA, ſtanding vpon the riuage of the ſea; where he found ſuch reſiſtance, that he was glad to raiſe his ſiege & depart, hauing done nothing more than ſpoiled the pleaſant places without the citie. By the way in his return backe againe, it fortuned him to meet with certaine companies of the enemies aduenturers, by whom he was in a skirmiſh mortally wounded, although he died not thereof in long time after: for albeit that the wound was by his ſurgeons healed vp, yet was the griefe thereof ſo great, that at length it brought him to his end. Yet he notwithſtanding the former repulſe, the next yeere encouraged by the comming of the Genua fleet, laid hard ſiege againe to PTOLEMAIS both by ſea and land, which after twenty dayes ſiege was by compoſition yeelded vnto him.

King Baldwin mortally wounded.

Ptolemais woon by K. Baldwin.

Shortly after, the gouernour of ALEPPO, with certaine other of the Turks great captaines in thoſe quarters, hauing ioyned their forces together, and ſo inuaded the countrey about ANTIOCH, were by Tancred (whom Bohemund at his departure into ITALIE, had left gouernour of that citie) notably encountred and put to flight. At which time alſo the Caliph of ÆGYPT ſending great forces both by ſea and land againſt the king of IERVSALEM, was in both places diſcomfited, at land by the Chriſtians, and at ſea by tempeſt.

Bohemund in the meane time, with a great armie of voluntary men, and others (wherein he is reported to haue had fiue thouſand horſe, and fortie thouſand foot) returning towards the Holy Land, in reuenge of many iniuries done by Alexius the Emperour, vnto the ſouldiers of this sacred war, contrarie to his faith and promise to them before giuen; by the way landed his G men in EPIRVS, and grieuously spoyled the countrey about DIRRACHIVM, part of the Emrors dominion. Neither made he an end of spoyling, vntill he had enforced the Emperour for redresse of so great harmes, to make peace with him; and againe by solemne oath to promise all securitie and kindnesse, vnto all such Christian souldiers as should haue occasion to trauell to or fro through his countries, during the time of this religious war. After which agreement he put to sea again, and so returned for IERVSALEM. But whilst he staied at ANTIOCH, he short-Bohemund dieth at Antioch. ly after there died in the yeare 1108, leauing the principalitie therof vnto his yong sonne Bohe- mund, a child vnder the tuition of his nephew Tancred.

Yet were the cites of BERYTVS, SIDON, and TIRE, alongst the sea coast, in the enemies possession: for the gaining whereof, Baldwin the king raised a great armie and so came and layd H siege to BERITVS, which after many sharpe assaults he at length woon, the 23 day of April in IIII the yeare 1111, & put to sword most part of them that he found therein. The same yere also he, Sidon woon. assisted by a fleet sent vnto him out of NORVVAY, besieged the citie of SIDON: which the citizens seeing themselues now beset both by sea and land, at length yeelded vnto him by compositiõ, the 19 day of December. After which victorie he dismissed the fleet, & returned himselfe in triumph to IERVSALEM. Now of all the famous cities alongst the sea coast of PHŒNI-CIA and PALESTINE, from LAODICEA to ASCALON, was only the citie of TYRE that remained in the hands of the enemies: which citie Baldwin also hardly besieged; neuerthelesse, it was so well defended by the Turkes, that after he had all in vaine lyen before it by the space of foure moneths, he was glad to rise with his armie and depart. I

It fortuned, that within two yeres after, the Turks with a mightie armie sent from the Persian Sultan, inuaded the countrey of CŒLISYRIA, where spoyling all before them as they went, they came and encamped vpon the sea coast neere vnto TYBERIAS. Against whom Baldwin gathered the whole strength of his kingdome, with whom also Tancred (who now raigned in ANTI-OCH, the young Bohemund being dead) with the countie of TRIPOLIS, and the rest of the Christian princes, joyned their forces: who altogether marching forward, came and encamped, not far from the enemie, being in number far more than they. Mendus generall of The Turks armie (for so I find him called) vnderstanding of their approch, sent out certaine companies of his men to skirmish with them: against whom the Christians also sent out others; who encountring them, easily put them to flight, being before commanded so to do of purpose to draw the Christians K into the danger of a great strength, lying in ambush to entrap thẽ: which according to the Turks desire fell out. For the Christians fiercely pursuing the flying enemie, fell into the ambush, and so before they were well aware, were beset on euerie side with their enemies: vnto the rescue of whom, other companies of the Christians comming in, & others likewise from the Turks, both the great armies were at length drawne into the field, where betwixt them was ioyned a most fierce and terrible battell, with great slaughter on both sides. But at length the multitude of the Turks preuailing, the Christians were put to the worse, and so glad to flie: after whom the fierce enemie hardly followed, not without great slaughter. In which flight the King himselfe hardly escaped, with Arnolphus the Patriarch. Whilest Baldwin was thus busied abroad, the Turks, and Sarasins from ASCALON, came and besieged IERVSALEM, being then but weakly manned: L but hearing of the Kings comming, and that the armie of the Christians daily increased with new supplies out of the West by sea, they retired home againe, hauing burnt certaine storehouses full of corne, and spoiled such things as was subiect to their furie.

Long it were to recount all the hard conflicts and combats this king had with the Sarasins and Turks, which for breuitie I passe ouer, contented to haue briefly touched the greatest. In the last yeare of his raigne, hauing for certaine yeares before liued in some reasonable peace, he made an expediton into ÆGYPT, wheare he with much difficultie woon PHARAMIA, a strong citie vpon the sea coast, which he ioined vnto his owne kingdome. After that hee went to the mouth of the riuer NILVS, and with great admiration, learned the nature of that strange riuer.
And hauing therein taken abundance of fish, returned into the citie, and there with the same fea- M sted himselfe with his friends. But after dinner he began to feele the griefe of his old wound, and growing therof sicker and sicker, returned with his armie toward IERVSALEM, where by the way neere vnto a citie called LARIS, he died (to the great griefe of all the Christians) in the 1118 yeare 1118. His dead bodie being brought backe vnto IERVSALEM, was there royally buried,

A neere vnto his brother Godfrey, after he had raigned eighteene yeeres: whose ſepulchre is yet there alſo to be ſeene, faſt by the ſepulchre of his brother.

The late King thus dead and buried, the Chriſtians with one conſent made choiſe of his couſin Baldwin, ſurnamed Brugenſis, gouernour of EDESSA: who by the name of Baldwin the ſecond, was the ſecond of Aprill in the yeere 1118, ſolemnly crowned King of IERVSALEM. He was of ſtature tall and well proportioned, of countenance comely & gratious, hauing his haire thinne and yellow, his beard mingled with ſome gray haires hanging downe to his breaſt, his colour freſh and liuely for one of his yeeres. He was a man of great courage, and therefore no leſſe redoubted of his enemies than beloued of his ſubiects, who had in him repoſed great hope
B both for the defence and enlarging of that new gained kingdome. Againſt him the ſame Summer the Caliph of ÆGYPT, aided by the King of DAMASCO and the Turks, in reuenge of the loſſe he had in the expedition the yeere before receiued, raiſed a great power to inuade him both by ſea and land. Againſt whom Baldwin alſo oppoſed himſelfe with his whole ſtrength, and ſo came and encamped within the ſight of his enemies. In which ſort, when both armies had lien the one facing the other by the ſpace of three months, they both riſe: the Chriſtians fearing the multitude of the Turks, and the Turks the valour of the Chriſtians, and ſo retired without any notable thing doing.

This yeere died Alexius the Greeke Emperour, who euen from the beginning of this ſacred warre, ſecretly repined at the good ſucceſſe of the Chriſtians in SYRIA, although his empire
C were thereby greatly enlarged: after whom ſucceeded Calo Ioannes his ſonne, who all the time of his raigne right worthily defended his territories in the leſſer ASIA, againſt the inuaſion of the Turks.

Not long after, Gazi one of the greateſt Princes of the Turks in the leſſer ASIA, with the King of DAMASCO, and Debeis King of ARABIA, ioyning their forces together, with a great armie inuading the countrey about ANTIOCH, came and encamped not far from ALEPPO: againſt whom Roger Prince of ANTIOCH, not expecting the comming of Baldwin and the other Chriſtian Princes his confederats, but preſuming of his owne ſtrength, went forth with greater courage than diſcretion, whereunto his ſucceſſe was anſwerable: for encountring with them at too much ods, he was by them in a great battell ouerthrowne, wherein he himſelfe was ſlaine with D moſt part of his armie. Of which ſo great a ſlaughter, the place wherein this battell was fought, was afterward called, The field of bloud. But whilſt the Turks after ſo great a victorie, careleſly and at pleaſure roame vp and downe the country, Baldwin ſetting vpon them, ouerthrew them with a great ſlaughter, and ſo put them to flight. After this victorie gained by the Chriſtians the fourteenth of Auguſt, in the yeere 1120, King Baldwin in great triumph entred into ANTIOCH, and ſo ioyned that principalitie vnto his owne kingdome.

The yeere following, the Turks with another armie inuaded the ſame countrey againe: for repreſſing of whom, whilſt Baldwin with the other Chriſtian Princes were making their preparations, it fortuned that Gazi their great commander ſuddenly died of an Apoplexie; vpon whoſe death they retired without further harme doing. Neuertheleſſe the next Spring, the King
E of DAMASCO aided by the Arabians, entred againe with a great power into the countrey about ANTIOCH, and there did ſome harme: for the Antiochians now deſtitute of their owne Prince, and Baldwin (who had taken vpon him their protection) being farre off, and otherwiſe buſied at IERVSALEM, were much more ſubiect vnto the inrodes of their enemies (ſtill at hand) than before when they had a Prince of their owne ſtill preſent amongſt them. But Baldwin aduertiſed thereof, was making towards them with a puiſſant armie, ſooner than they had thought it could haue beene poſſible. Of whoſe approch the Turks vnderſtanding, retired againe out of the countrey: after whom, the King thinking it not good to make further purſuit, turned a little out of the way, and tooke by force GARAZE, one of the ſtrongeſt caſtles of the Kings of DAMASCO, built but the yeere before; which becauſe it was not without great F charge and danger to be holden, he raſed downe to the ground.

Baldwin notwithſtanding that he had many times thus honourably repulſed his enemies, wiſely conſidering how he was on the one ſide beſet with the Turks, and on the other ſide with the Saraſins (which yet raigned in ÆGYPT, the kingdome of IERVSALEM lying as it were in the mouth of them both) thought it good betime to pray aid of the Chriſtian Princes of EVROPE, and to that purpoſe had ſent diuers his embaſſadors vnto diuers of them, but eſpecially vnto the Venetians; whom of all others he thought fitteſt at his need to yeeld him reliefe by ſea. It fortuned in the meane time, that Balac the Perſian Sultan with a great armie of the Turks, inuaded the countrey about ANTIOCH, whereof Baldwin vnderſtanding (although he certainly knew he ſhould ere long receiue aid from the other Chriſtian Princes his friends, but eſpecially from the Venetians, and might therefore with great reaſon haue protracted the warre vntill their comming, yet being therewith much mooued, or elſe his deſtinie ſo requiring) raiſed ſuch forces as he had of his owne, and without longer ſtaying for his friends, with greater courage than good ſpeed, ſet forward: and ſo ioyning battell with the enemie, was therein ouerthrowne, with the greateſt part of his armie, & himſelfe taken priſoner in the fight, with certaine other of his beſt commanders; who all together were carried away captiues vnto CARRAS. G H

Vpon the report of this ouerthrow, and taking of the King, the Caliph of ÆGYPT on the other ſide tooke occaſion with all his power to inuade the kingdome of IERVSALEM; and hauing in himſelfe purpoſed the vtter ruine thereof, beſide the great armie which he ſent thither by land, which lay encamped not far from ASCALON, he put to ſea an huge fleet alſo, of ſeuen hundred ſaile, for the diſtreſſing of the ſea townes, which he well knew were not otherwiſe to be woon. This fleet of the Saraſin kings (for ÆGYPT with the kindomes of TVNES and MOROCCO were yet in poſſeſſion of the Saraſins) arriuing at IOPPA, there put a ſhore their land forces, and hardly beſieged the towne both by ſea and land. But whilſt they thus lay in great hope to haue wonne the towne, Dominicus Michael, duke of VENICE, ſtirred vp by Calixtus then Biſhop of ROME, was come to CIPRVS with a fleet of two hundred ſaile, for the I. reliefe of the Chriſtians in SYRIA, and the Holy land: And hearing of the diſtreſſe of IOPPA, nothing diſmaid with the number of the enemies fleet, haſted thither, and came ſo ſuddenly vpon them, that he had (as ſome report) ouerthrowne them, before they could put themſelues in order, or be in readineſſe to fight: or as ſome others ſay, after a great and doubtfull fight, hauing ſunke or taken a great number of them, and put the reſt to flight, he obtained of them a moſt glorious victorie. With like good fortune alſo, were the Saraſins ouerthrown in a notable battell at land, neere vnto ASCALON, by the lord Euſtace, vnto whom the defence of the kingdome was committed after the taking of the King, who not long after ſo great a victorie died.

IOPPA relieued (as is aforeſaid) the duke of VENICE trauelled by land to IERVSALEM, where he was honourably receiued by Guarimund the Patriarch, and the confederation before K made betwixt king Baldwin & the Venetians, vpon the ſame conditions ſolemnly again renued.

The Saraſins thus notably diſcomfited both by ſea and land, and the Chriſtians thereby not a little encouraged, and joining their forces together with the Venetians, came and the firſt of March laid ſiege vnto the antient and ſtrong citie of TYRE: which they hauing beſet both by ſea and land, gaue thereunto many a ſharpe aſſault: which the Turks as men fighting for their liues, and wiues, right valiantly repulſed. In which ſort the ſiege was continued longer than the Chriſtians had at the firſt thought ſhould haue needed: yet at length, after foure moneths ſiege, the Turks ſore weakned with often aſſaults, and hardly pinched with want of food, all their ſtore being ſpent, yeelded the citie by compoſition. Thus was the citie of TYRE (the moſt famous port of PHŒNICIA) yeelded vnto the Chriſtians the nine and twentieth of Iune, in L 1124 the yeere 1124. The third part of this citie was giuen vnto the Venetians, according to the compoſition made betwixt them and the Kings of IERVSALEM, That of all ſuch cities as were by their helpe won from the Infidels in SYRIA, they ſhould haue a third part, with one ſtreet, and free trafficke in all the reſt of the cities of the kingdome of IERVSALEM. Shortly after was King Baldwin ſet at libertie for the ranſome of an hundred thouſand ducats, after hee had beene eighteene moneths priſoner among the Turks.

The Duke of VENICE hauing now ſpent almoſt three yeeres in this ſacred expedition, and well confirmed the ſtate of the Chriſtians in SYRIA, returning home, by the way tooke the Iſlands of CHIOS, RHODVS, SAMOS, MITYLEN, and ANDRVS, with the citie of MODON in PELOPONESVS; all, places belonging vnto the Greekes empire. Which he did in M reuenge of the iniuries done by the Emperour, in the time of his abſence, who enuying at the ſucceſſe of the Chriſtians in SYRIA, as had his father Alexius before him, had in the abſence of the Duke, infeſted the territories of the Venetians, for the which hee was now iuſtly requited with the loſſe of a good part of his owne.

Baldwin alſo not vnmindfull of the iniuries vnto him before done by the Turks, in requitall thereof,

A thereof, inuaded the countrey abou DAMASCO, and there in three notable battels ouerthrew the king, and ſpoiled the countrey: wherin he tooke ſo great a prey, that therewith he redeemed his daughter, whome he had at the time of his deliuerance left in hoſtage with the Turks for the payment of his ranſom. He alſo ouerthrew the Saraſins at ASCALON, who aided by the Caliph of ÆGYPT, had ſundrie times inuaded the countrey about IERVSALEM. And ſo hauing well repreſſed his enemies, for a ſpace liued in peace.

Damaſco in vaine beſieged by the Chriſtians.

Not long after, Hugh Paganus firſt maſter of the Templars, (an order of knights firſt begun in the raigne of this Baldwin) before ſent to craue aid of the Chriſtians princes of the Weſt, againſt the Turks and Saraſins, returned with a great number of zealous chriſtians, readie to lay down
B their liues for defence of the Chriſtian faith and religion: with whom Baldwin and the other Chriſtian Princes of SYRIA joyning their forces, ſet forward and beſieged DAMASCO, the regall ſeat of the Turks in thoſe quarters. But ſuch was the ſtrength of this citie, with the valour of the defendants, and contagiouſneſſe of the aire, that the Chriſtians (the heauens as it were then fighting againſt them) were glad to raiſe their ſiege in vaine begun, and ſo to retire.

Whilſt things thus paſſed in SYRIA, Fulke countie of TVRIN, MAYN, and ANIOV, a man almoſt of threeſcore yeeres, hauing as he thought beſt diſpoſed of his things at home, had for deuotion ſake taken vpon him an expedition into the Holy land. In the time of which his preparations, embaſſadours came vnto him from king Baldwin, offring him in marriage Meliſſenda (or as ſome call her Margaret) his eldeſt daughter, with the ſucceſſion into the kingdome
C of IERVSALEM in dowrie, if hee ſhould ſuruiue the king; and in the meane time to content himſelfe with the cities of TYRE and PTOLEMAIS: of which offer he accepted, and ſo held on his journey before intended. It fortuned about three yeeres after, that the king fell dangerouſly ſicke, and feeling his death drawing on, hauing laid aſide al regall dignity, cauſed himſelfe to be remooued out of his owne palace, into the Patriarchs houſe, which was neerer vnto the temple of the Sepulchre: and there calling vnto him Fulke the countie, his ſonne in law, with his daughter and his ſonne Baldwin, then but two yeeres old, in the preſence of the Patriarch, and diuers other princes & great commanders, commended vnto them the gouernment & defence of the kingdome, appointing Fulke to ſucceed him. And taking vnto himſelfe the habit and profeſſion of a Monke, if hee ſhould haue longer liued, preſently after gaue vp the ghoſt the two and D twentith day of Auguſt, in the yeere 1131; whereof hee raigned with much trouble thirteene yeeres, and was ſollemnly buried in the temple vpon mount CALVARIE, with the other two kings Godfrey and Baldwin, his predeceſſors. 1131

The death of Baldwin the ſecond, the third King of Ieruſalem.

The kings funeral ended, the princes of the kingdome with one accord made choiſe of Fulke the old countie, earle of ANIOV, for their king: who the ſixteenth day of September, was with all ſollemnitie by William the Patriarch crowned in IERVSALEM. This man in the beginning of his raigne, beſides his troubles abroad, was alſo vext with domeſticall and inteſtine diſcord: Pontius countie of TRIPOLIS, ſeeking by force of armes to haue rent the dukedome of ANTIOCH from the kingdome: and Hugh countie of IOPPA, for feare of due puniſhment for his treaſon, joyning himſelfe with the Saraſins of ASCALON, and ſo with them infeſting the terri-
E tories of IERVSALEM, to the great hurt of the Chriſtian ſtate, and aduantage of the infidels. Which troubleſome broiles were yet afterwards by the king, partly by force, partly by the mediation of the Patriarch & other princes (who ſeeing the danger thereof like to enſue, had enterpoſed themſelues) well againe appeaſed. Vengeance yet neuertheleſſe ſtill following both the aforeſaid traitors: Pontius being ſhortly after ſlaine by the Turks, and Hugh dying in exile.

Beſides theſe domeſtical troubles, the Turks alſo inuaded the countrey about ANTIOCH, where they were by the ſudden comming of the king ouerthrowne, with the loſſe of their tents, & exceeding great riches. And that nothing might be wanting vnto the diſquieting of the ſtate of that new erected kingdome, not long after, Iohn the Conſtantinopolitan emperour (together with the empire, inheritour alſo of his fathes malice, againſt the proceeding of the Chriſtians F in SYRIA) with a puiſſant armie paſſing through the leſſer ASIA, and by the way taking by force TARSVS the metropoliticall citie of CILICIA, with the whole prouince thereunto belonging, came and beſieged ANTIOCH; which Fulke but a little before had together with Conſtance, the daughter and heire of the late duke of ANTIOCH, giuen in marriage to Raymund countie of POITOV, for that purpoſe ſent out of FRANCE. But in this ſo dangerous a ſtate of that Chriſtian kingdome, the other zealous Chriſtian princes interpoſed themſelues as me-

that was in poſſeſſion thereof. And in fine brought it to this end, that Raymund for the preſent ſubmitting himſelfe vnto the Emperour, ſhould from thenceforth hold his dukedome of him as of his Lord and Soueraigne: vpon which agreement the Emperour returned vnto TARSVS, where he wintred, and ſo afterwards vnto CONSTANTINOPLE.

Much about the ſame time, Sanguin one of the Turks great Princes, inuading the countrey about TRIPOLIS, beſieged the caſtle of MONTE-FERRAND: vnto the reliefe whereof, Fulke comming with his armie, was by the Turks ouerthrowne; and for the ſafegard of his life, glad to take the refuge of the caſtle, the Countie himſelfe being in that battell taken priſoner. After which victorie, the Turks laid harder ſiege vnto the caſtle than before: the beſieged in the H meane time being no leſſe pinched within with famine, than preſſed without by the enemie. In this the Kings hard diſtreſſe, the other Princes hauing raiſed the whole power of the kingdome, were comming to his reliefe: whereof the Turke vnderſtanding, offred of himſelfe to giue them all leaue freely to depart, and to ſet the Countie at libertie, ſo that they would deliuer vnto him the caſtle: of which his offer they gladly accepting, yeelded vp the ſtrong hold, and ſo departed. The King by the way meeting with the armie, thanked his friends for their forwardneſſe, and ſo returned to IERVSALEM.

About foure yeeres after, Iohn the Conſtantinopolitan Emperour, with a great armie came againe into SYRIA, with purpoſe to haue vnited the famous citie of ANTIOCH vnto his empire, and ſo to haue made a way into the kingdome of IERVSALEM, whereafter he had now I a good while longed. But comming thither, in hope to haue found the Cilicians and Syrians ready to haue receiued him, he was deceiued of his expectation, being ſhut out by the Latines, and not ſuffered to enter, but vpon his oath, and that with ſome few of his followers; and ſo after due reuerence done vnto him, quietly to depart without any ſtirre or innouation in the citie. In reuenge of which diſgrace, at his departure he gaue the ſuburbs of the citie as a prey vnto his greedie ſouldiers; pretending the ſame to be done for want of victuals: who made hauocke of whatſoeuer came to hand, not ſparing the very fruit trees, but cutting them downe to dreſſe their meat withall. Hauing thus vnder colour of neceſſitie, reuenged the diſgrace receiued, hee returned into CILICIA, and there wintred: where one day for his diſport, hunting of the wild boare, and hauing wounded him with his boare ſpeare, the wild beaſt therewith inraged, and K with all his force bearing forward vpon the weapon, forced the Emperors hand backward vpon the point of a poiſoned arrow, that was hanging in a quiuer at his backe, and ſo was therewith lightly wounded. Neuertheleſſe, as light as the wound was, ſuch was the ſtrength of the poiſon, that the griefe thereof ſtill increaſing, and his hand and arme more and more ſwelling, there was no remedie to be found, but that his arme muſt be cut off; which deſperate and vncertaine cure he abhorring, and in the extremitie of his paine oftentimes pleaſantly ſaying, that the Greeke empire was not to be gouerned with one hand: ouercome with the ſtrength of the poiſon died. In whoſe place ſucceeded his youngeſt ſonne Emanuel, Alexius and Andronicus his two elder ſonnes being both dead at his ſetting forth vnto this ſo vnhappie an expedition.

The miſerable death of Fulke, fourth King of Ieruſalem.

It fortuned about this time alſo, the kingdome of IERVSALEM being now at peace, that L Fulke the King with the Queene his wife, lying at the citie of PTOLEMAIS in the time of Autumne, it pleaſed the Queene for her diſport, to walke out of the citie, vnto certaine pleaſant fountaines there by in the countrey; for whoſe companie the King would needs goe alſo, with certaine of his courtiers, where by the way it chanced that certaine boyes running along the field, put vp an hare that was ſitting in a furrow: after which, all the courtiers on horſebacke galloped a maine, with notable outcrie and hallowing. Amongſt the reſt, the King to be partaker of the ſport, forcing his horſe to the vttermoſt of his power, in the midſt of his courſe fell, together with his horſe foundring vnder him, and in falling, chanced to fall with his head vnder the horſe: with whoſe waight, and the hardneſſe of his ſaddle, he was ſo cruſhed, that the braines came out both at his noſe and eares. In this pitifull caſe being taken vp for dead, and M with great heauineſſe carried backe, he yet breathing, lay ſpeechleſſe three dayes, and ſo died the thirteenth of Nouember, in the yeere of Grace 1142. His dead body afterwards brought to IERVSALEM, was there with great magnificence, and the generall lamentation of all his ſubiects, buried with the other Kings his predeceſſours.

Now had the late King left behinde him two ſons, Baldwin about the age of thirteene yeeres, and

A and Almerike about the age of ſeuen. Of the elder of theſe two, the Chriſtian Princes made choice, who by the name of Baldwin the third, was together with Meleſinda his mother, partner with him in the kingdome, vpon Chriſtmas day with great ſolemnitie crowned King of HIERVSALEM, in the yeere 1142. About which time, Sanguin the Turke, taking hold of the diſcord betwixt Raymund Prince of ANTIOCH, and Ioſcelin Countie of EDESSA, came and with a great power beſieged EDESSA, the Countie being at the ſame time abſent: and did ſo much, that at length he tooke the citie by vndermining of it, where the bloudie Turke exerciſed all manner of crueltie vpon the poore Chriſtians in the citie. By the loſſe of this famous citie, ſo large a territorie fell againe into the hands of the Turkes, as that three Archbiſhopricks
B were thereby drawne from the Church of ANTIOCH. The Turke encouraged with this victorie, ſtraightwaies after beſieged COLOGENBAR, another ſtrong towne of the Chriſtians: one night drinking liberally with his friends, he was by one of them in his drunkenneſſe ſtabbed, and ſo ſlaine, and the ſiege raiſed. In whoſe ſtead Noradin his ſonne ſucceeded.

Baldwin, in the firſt yeere of his raigne, recouered from the Turkes the caſtle of SOBAL, a ſtrong hold beyond IORDAN, which he notably fortified, for the defence of that ſide of his kingdome againſt the incurſions of the Turks. But the next yeere vndertaking an expedition againſt the King of DAMASCO, he was by Noradin the Turke, the Kings ſonne in law, ſo hardly beſet in his returne, as that it was accounted a thing miraculous, how he with his armie eſcaped his hands.

C The report of the loſſe of EDESSA, with the miſeries there endured by the Chriſtians, being bruted thorow all parts of Chriſtendome, greatly mooued the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt. Whom Eugenius the third, then Biſhop of ROME, ceaſed not both by himſelfe and by his Legates to ſtirre vp to take that ſacred warre in hand. And therein wrought ſo effectually, that almoſt in euery prouince of Chriſtendome preparation was made for the reliefe of the diſtreſſed Chriſtians in SYRIA. Of all others, Conrade the third then Emperour of GERMANIE, was moſt forward, who aided by the Germane Princes and others, with an incredible number of voluntarie men out of all parts of Chriſtendome, had raiſed a moſt puiſſant armie, and therewith ſet forward on this ſacred expedition. Of this his deuout purpoſe he had before certified Emanuel the Greeke Emperour, thorow whoſe countries he was to paſſe, crauing that he might by his D good fauour ſo doe, and for his money to be relieued with victuals, and other ſuch things as he ſhould haue need of for himſelfe or his people; promiſing in moſt quiet and peaceable manner to paſſe, without any harme doing vnto his territories or ſubiects. All which the Greeke Emperor, commending his zeale, ſeemed in moſt large tearmes willingly to condeſcend vnto. Neuertheleſſe he inwardly repined therat, wiſhing indeed no better ſucceſſe vnto the Chriſtians in this ſo honorable an expedition, than did the Infidels themſelues, as by the ſequel of his doings well appeared. For Conrade with his populous armie, indeed a terrour vnto the Greekes, entring into the frontiers of the Conſtantinopolitan empire, found al things in ſhew friendly (for why, Emanuel had before giuen out ſtrait command, that good ſtore of victuals and all other neceſſaries ſhould be ready at all places to be ſold as the armie was to paſſe:) but they were not farre come
E into the countrey, but that in the taile of the armie ſtill followed certaine ſtrong companies of the Greeks, to keepe the ſouldiers from ſtragling frō their enſignes, roaming about in the country, now and then cutting them ſhort, as they tooke them at aduantage. And ſtill the further that they trauelled, the more it was to be ſeene in the countenances of the diſcontented Greeks, how vnwelcome gueſts they were. Yet ſtill on they went thorow the countries of their diſſembling friends, little differing from open enemies, vntill they came to PHILIPPOPOLIS: in departing from whence, ſuch contention riſe betweene them that were in the rereward of the armie, and the Greekes that followed them, that it was like to haue come to plaine battell, had not thoſe broiles, by the diſcretion of ſome of the wiſer ſort, been in good time appeaſed. So marching on they came to ADRIANOPLE, & in a few dayes after to the plaine called CHERROBACHI, thorow F which the riuer MELAS hath his courſe; which in Summer being almoſt drie, in Winter or any other great downefall of water, right ſuddenly ouerfloweth his bankes, and ſo drowneth the whole country, that then it ſeemeth no more a riuer, but a ſea; and ſwelling with the winde, is not to be paſſed ouer, but by great boats. This riuer then ſuddenly riſing by night, by reaſon of the great rain that then fell, in ſuch abundance, as if the floud-gates of heauen had been opened, ſo ouerflowed the place wherein the armie lay encamped vpon the ſide thereof, that with the violence violence of the water were carried away not only many weapons, ſaddles, garments, and ſuch other the ſouldiers neceſſaries; but euen the horſes and mules, with their burdens, yea and great numbers of armed men themſelues alſo, a moſt miſerable & lamentable thing to behold. Many valiant men there fell without fight, and died no man killing them: to be tall, helped not; neither did valour ſtand them in any ſtead: they periſhed like hay, & were carried away like chaffe, with ſuch outcries and lamentation, that they which ſaw it, verily ſaid, That the wrath of God was broke into the campe: ſuch a ſudden inundation had ouerwhelmed all, that happie was hee could make ſhift for himſelfe, without regarding one another. This misfortune ſore troubled the Emperour with his whole armie. Neuertheleſſe, the water being againe fallen, and all put in ſo good order, as in ſuch a confuſion was poſſible, he marched on vnto the imperial citie: which the ſuſpicious and malicious Greeke had before notably fortified and ſo ſtrongly manned with armed men gliſtring vpon the wals, in ſuch ſort as if it ſhould haue preſently beene aſſaulted. G H

Conrade approching the citie, was not ſuffered to enter, but perſwaded by the Greeke Emperour forthwith to tranſport his armie ouer the ſtrait, with promiſe to ſupplie his wants with whatſoeuer he ſhould require. Which was done with ſuch haſte, as if nothing had beene farther to haue beene regarded, but only to haue them ſhipped ouer: in which ſeruice the Greekes ſpared no labour, or kinde of veſſell, that might ſerue to tranſport them. The Greeke Emperour in the meane time, by men ſecretly appointed for that purpoſe, keeping account of the number that paſſed, vntill that they wearied with the multitude, ceaſed farther to number them. But when they were once ſhipped ouer, then began the couert malice of the Greeke Emperor forthwith to appeare. For beſides that they truſting vnto his promiſes, had brought little or no prouiſions ouer with them, the countrey people by his appointment brought nothing vnto them to ſell, as before: and they of the townes and cities ſhut their gates againſt them as they marched, not affoording them any thing, but at an extreme rate, for which they would firſt receiue their money by ropes caſt downe from the wals, and then deliuer them what they pleaſed therefore, yea and oftentimes nought at all. Amongſt many other vile practiſes, not beſeeming Chriſtians, the miſchieuous Greekes, to poiſon the ſouldiers, mingled lime with the meale which they ſold vnto the armie, whereof many of the hungrie ſouldiers greedily feeding, died. Whether the Greeke Emperour were priuie thereunto, or no, is not certainly knowne; but certaine it is, that he cauſed counterfeit money to be coined, of purpoſe to deceiue them: and in briefe, that there was no kinde of miſchiefe to be practiſed againſt them, which either he himſelfe deuiſed not, or ſet not others to deuiſe; to the intent that their poſteritie, terrified by this ſo vnfortunate an expedition, might for euer be afraid to take the like in hand againe. And that nothing might be wanting that malice could deuiſe, hee had ſecret intelligence with the Turks themſelues, concerning the ſtrength of the armie, plotting vnto them the means how the ſame might beſt be defeated: whereby it came to paſſe, that ſome part thereof was by Pamplano, a captaine of the Turks, ouerthrowne neere BATHIS, and many ſlaine. But attempting to haue done the like vnto that part of the armie that marched thorow PHRYGIA, they were themſelues ouertaken in their owne deuice, and ouerthrowne, with a great ſlaughter. After which, the Turks in great number, to ſtay the Chriſtians further paſſage, kept the riuer of MŒANDER, encamping vpon the farther banke of that winding riuer, with a moſt huge armie. There theſe worthy Chriſtians right well declared, that it was but their patience, that the Grecian legions that had before ſo long followed them, with their countries and cities they had paſſed by, were not vnto them become a prey. For the Emperour comming vnto the riuer ſide, where was neither bridge nor boat to paſſe ouer, and finding the great armie of the Turks on the other ſide, ready to giue him battell if he ſhould aduenture the riuer, with their archers ſtanding vpon the very banke ſide: he retired a little out of the danger of the ſhot, and there encamping, commanded his ſouldiers to refreſh themſelues and their horſes that night, and to be ready againſt the next morning to ioyne battell with their enemies they were ſo farre come to ſeeke for. Little reſt ſerued him that night; early in the morning before day he aroſe, and arming himſelfe, put his whole armie in order of battell: as did alſo the enemie on the other ſide of the riuer, with their battalions orderly placed, and their archers vpon the banke ſide, ready to giue the firſt charge vpon the Chriſtians, if they ſhould aduenture to come ouer. Both armies thus ſtanding in readineſſe the one in ſight of the other, and nothing but the winding riuer betwixt them, the Emperour before reſolued to fight, with cheerefull countenance and ſpeech encouraged his men as followeth. That

A That this expedition was of vs taken in hand, for Christ his sake, and for the glorie of God, and not of man, you know right well fellow souldiers. For, for this cause hauing contemned a pleasant life at home, voluntarily separated from our neereſt and deereſt friends, wee endure miſeries in forraine countries; wee are expoſed vnto dangers; weepine with hunger; wee quake with cold; wee languiſh with heat; wee haue the earth our bed, the heauen our couering: and although we be noble, famous, renowmed, rich, ruling ouer many nations; yet weare wee alwayes our gorgets as neceſſarie bonds, and are with them and our armour loaded, as was the greateſt ſeruant of Christ, Peter, ſurcharged with two chaines, and kept with foure quaternions of ſouldiers. But theſe Barbarians (diuided from vs by this riuer) to be the enemies of the croſſe of Christ, whom wee of long haue deſired to encounter withall, in whoſe

B bloud (as Dauid ſaith) wee haue vowed to waſh our ſelues: who is there that knoweth not, except he be altogether blockiſh, and will not with open eyes ſee, nor open eares heare? If we wiſh to aſcend ſtraight way into heauen, (for neither is God vniuſt, that he knoweth not the cauſe of this our iourney, or will not in recompence giue vnto vs the immortall fields, and ſhadie dwellings of Paradice, which hauing forſaken our owne dwellings, haue choſe rather for his ſake to die than to liue) if wee call to remembrance what things theſe men of vncircumciſed hearts doe commit againſt our friends and countreymen, if wee remember what grieuous tortures they inflict vpon them, or if wee be any thing touched with the compaſſion of their innocent bloud, vnworthily ſpilt; ſtand now couragiouſly, and fight valiantly, and let not any feare or terrour daunt vs. Let theſe Barbarians know, that by how much Christ our maſter and inſtructer doth excell their falſe prophet and ſeducer, author of their vaine impietie; ſo

C much are wee ſuperiours vnto them in all things. Seeing therefore wee are an holy campe, and an armie gathered by the power of God, let vs not cowardly loſe our ſelues, or feare for Christ his ſake honourably to aduenture our liues. For if Christ died for vs, how much more right is it that we for him ſhould die alſo? Vnto this ſo honourable an expedition, let vs alſo giue an honourable end: let vs fight in Christs name, with a moſt aſſured hope of an eaſie victorie. For none of them (I truſt) ſhall be able to abide our force, but ſhall all giue way, euen to our firſt charge. But if wee ſhall die (which God forbid) there ſhall be an honourable place of our buriall, whereſoeuer wee ſhall for Christ fall. Let the Perſian archer for Christ his ſake, ſtrike me, I will die in an aſſured hope; and with that arrow, as with a chariot, I will come vnto that reſt, which ſhall be to me deerer than if I ſhould with a baſe ordinarie kinde of

Now at length let vs take reuenge of them, with whoſe impure feet our kinſmen and Christian brethren troden downe, are gone into that common ſanctuarie, in which Christ our Sauiour, equall and aſſociate to his Father, is become a companion of the dead. Wee are thoſe mightie men, we all haue drawne our ſwords, which ſtand about the liuely and diuine ſepulchre, as about* Salomons bed. Wherefore wee that be free borne, let vs take out of the way theſe Agarens, the children of the bondwoman; and let vs remooue them as ſtones of offence out of the way of Christ: whom (I know not why) the Grecians feed vp as greedie wolues to their owne deſtruction, and with ſhame fat them with their bloud; when as with couragious mindes and thoughts beſeeming wiſe men, they ought ſo to haue beene driuen from their prouinces and cities, as rauening wilde beaſts from their flocks. Now for as much as this riuer, as it ſeemeth, is not, but by ſome aduenture to be paſſed ouer, I my ſelfe will ſhew you the way, and be the firſt that ſhall take it. Let vs, ſerred together, forci-

By not vnlike meanes the Iſraelites in ancient time on foot paſſed ouer* Iordan, the courſe of the riuer being ſtaid. This attempt ſhall be ſpoken of in all poſteritie, it ſhall by no tract of time be worne out or forgotten, but ſtill remaine in freſh remembrance, to the great diſhonour of the Turks, whoſe dead bodies ouerthrowne at this riuer, ſhall lie like a mountaine, and be ſeene as a Trophey of our victorie, vnto the worlds end, and our immortall praiſe and glorie.

A notable ſpeech of Conrade the Emperour to encourage his ſouldiers to aduenture the riuer Meander.

Hauing thus ſaid, and the ſignall of battell giuen, euery man hauing before by deuout praier commended himſelfe vnto almightie God: he was the firſt that put ſpurs to his horſe, and tooke

F the riuer; after whom followed the reſt, ſo cloſe and ſo forcibly, with ſuch a terrible outcrie, that the courſe of the water, being by the force of their horſes ſtaid, and as it were beaten backe towards the fountaine, the whole armie paſſed ouer with leſſe trouble than was feared. And then charging the Turks, already diſcouraged to haue ſeene them ſo deſperatly, & contrary to their expectation, to haue paſſed the riuer; after ſome ſmall reſiſtance put them to flight, wherein ſuch infinite numbers of them fell, the Chriſtians like fierce Lions purſuing the chace, that all the valies lies ran with bloud, and the fields were couered with the bodies of the dead. Many of the Italians were wounded with the Turks arrowes, and but few or none slaine. But what a multitude of the enemies there fell, the sundrie and hugie heapes of bones, to be compared vnto great hils, did long time after well declare; whereat euery man that trauelled that way did worthily wonder, as did I my selfe (saith Nicetas Choniates) in reporting this historie. Not much vnlike that, is reported of the Cimbers, slaine by Marius in such number, that of their bones the countrey people about MARCELLIS where the field was fought, long time after made wals for the defence of their vineyards. G

After this so great a victorie, the Christians without resistance came to ICONIVM, the chiefe seat of the Turkish Kings in the lesser ASIA, which they hardly besieged. Neuertheless, such was the strength of the citie, being strongly fortified both by Nature and Art, together with the valour of the defendants; that lying there long, they little preuailed, pressed in the meane time with greater extremities and wants in the campe, than were the besieged in the citie: whereupon ensued such a mortalitie, people daily without number dying in the armie, that the Emperour was glad to raise his siege and to returne into his countrey. The chiefe cause as well of this so great a mortalitie, as of the ouerthrow of so notable an action, most men ascribe vnto the malice of the Greekes; who not without the priuitie of their Emperour (as it was commonly bruited) mingled lime with the meale which they brought to sell into the armie, whereof the hungrie souldiers desirously feeding, were therewith poisoned, and so miserably died. Of the certaine time of this iourney of the Emperours into ASIA, Authors agree not; howbeit most referre it vnto the yeere 1146. H

Iconium in vaine besieged by the Christians.

This expedition, though not so fortunate as was at the first well hoped of, yet profited the Christian common weale in this, That the Turks therewith throughly busied, and doubtfull of the euent thereof, Baldwin in the meane time fortified GAZA (sometimes a famous citie of the Philistines, but as then ruinous) which serued as a most sure bulwarke for the defence of that part of his kingdome towards ÆGYPT; and also for the distressing of ASCALON, the onely refuge of the Ægyptians, then left in that countrey: which strong citie standing vpon the sea side, he with all the power of his kingdome afterward besieged both by sea and land; vnto the reliefe whereof, the Caliph of ÆGYPT, after it had beene fiue moneths by the Christians besieged, sent a strong fleet of threescore and ten gallies. At which time also on the other side Noradin the Turke, who had now got into his hand all the kingdome of DAMASCO, to withdraw the Christians from the siege of ASCALON, besieged PANEADA, from whence he was by the valour of the citizens repulsed, as was also the Caliphs fleet at sea, and the siege at ASCALON continued. Where at length the Christians after long batterie had made a breach in the wall, but giuing thereunto an assault, they were with great losse of their men repulsed, and the breach againe by the enemie repaired; who to the greater despight of the Christians, hanged ouer the wals in roaps the dead bodies of their slaine: with which spectacle, the chiefe commanders of the armie were so moued, that they with all their power returned againe to the assault, with a full resolution to gage thereon their whole forces: which they so couragiously performed, that the besieged discouraged with the great slaughter of their men, and now with true valour ouercome, craued parley; and so couenanting that they might with their liues in safetie depart, agreed to yeeld vp the citie, which they accordingly performed. The spoile of the citie was giuen to the souldiers, and the gouernment thereof vnto Almericke the Kings brother, Earle of IOPPA. By this victorie, great securitie was gained vnto that side of the kingdome, the enemie hauing now no place left in those parts whereon to set his foot. K L

The honourable expedition of Lewis the French King, by the malice of the Greekes, and enuie of other Christian Princes of Syria frustrated and brought to nought.

About the same time also (or as some write, euen at the same time together with the Emperour) Lewis the French King, the eight of that name, tooke vpon him the like expedition for the reliefe of the Christians in the Holy Land: who setting forward with all the chiualrie of FRANCE, and accompanied with diuers other great Princes, with a right puissant armie came to CONSTANTINOPLE, where he was by Emanuel the Emperour honourably receiued, with all the outward shewes of faigned courtesie that could be deuised. But hauing passed the strait, and landed in ASIA, he found nothing answerable to that the dissembling Greeke had before most largely promised. And to distresse him the more, was by false guides before corrupted by the Emperor, conducted thorow the most desolate and barren countries, where by the way a wonderfull number of his souldiers perished of hunger and thirst: many of them also being cut off in M

A the ſtrait and difficult paſſages, or as they ſtraied from the armie by the Greekes themſelues, appointed by the malicious Emperour for that purpoſe. Yet after many dangers paſſed, and his armie ſore waſted, he came at length into SYRIA, and laid ſiege vnto DAMASCO, the royall ſeat of Noradin the Turkiſh king; which he ſo notably impugned, that the defendants were almoſt out of hope to be able for any long time to hold out. Neither had it otherwiſe happened, had not enuie, the inſeparable attendant of all honourable actions, fruſtrated ſo great an hope: for the beſieged Turkes being brought to great extremitie, and now euen at the point to haue yeelded the citie, certaine of the Chriſtian Princes of that countrey, vnderſtanding that the king had promiſed the gouernment of that ſo famous a citie, vnto Philip Earle of FLANDERS, if it Damaſco in vaine beſieged by Lewis the French king.

B ſhould be won; & ſecretly grudging to haue a ſtranger preferred before themſelues, corrupted alſo (as ſome ſay) with the Turks gold, fraudulently perſwaded the King to remoue from that part of the citie where he lay, and might in fine haue taken the ſame, vnto another farre ſtronger: where, after hee had lien a great while, ſtriuing with no ſmall extremities, hee was inforced for want of victuals to raiſe his ſiege and to depart. And ſo without any thing done worth the remembrance, returned againe into FRANCE, deteſting the very name of Emanuell the Greeke Emperor; by whoſe ſiniſter dealing ſo notable an expedition was brought to be of none effect, to the great diſcouraging of all other Chriſtian Princes for taking the like againe in hand.

Now had the ſtate of the Chriſtians in SYRIA, for certaine yeeres after the aforeſaid expeditions, reſted in good peace: when Noradin the Turke (moued with ſome iniuries done by the

C Chriſtians vnto the Turks and Arabians, who by the leaue of King Baldwin dwelt in the forreſt of LYBANVS) came and ſtraitly beſieged PANEADE, a citie of the Chriſtians there by: vpon whom the Chriſtians in the citie, now brought vnto great extremitie, made a moſt deſperate ſallie, and had with the Turkes a ſharpe and cruell fight: but oppreſſed with the multitude, and inforced to retire, they were ſo hardly purſued, that the Turkes together with them entred the citie, and put to ſword all that came in their way. Neuertheleſſe, the greater part of the citizens (by good fortune) had in good time before retired themſelues into the caſtle, which was of great ſtrength, and there ſtood vpon their guard. Of whoſe diſtreſſe, with the taking of the citie, Baldwin hearing, raiſed a great armie, and ſo ſet forward to relieue them. But Noradin hearing of his comming, and doubtfull of his owne ſtrength, after he had taken the ſpoile of what he could, ſet Paneade taken and ſacked by the Turks.

D fire on the citie, and ſo departed. The citizens thus deliuered, repaired againe the wals of the citie, the Kings power ſtill defending them. Noradin with his power all the while lying cloſe in the woods not farre off, ſtill awaiting the offer of ſome good opportunitie to take the Chriſtians at aduantage, which ſhortly after fell out according to his owne deſire: for the King doubting no ſuch matter, but ſuppoſing him to haue beene quite gone, hauing at his returne ſent away all his footmen, followed after himſelfe, accompanied only with his horſemen, and they alſo not very ſtrong: but as he was paſſing the riuer IORDAN, he was ſuddenly ſet vpon by Noradin and the Turks, and after a ſharpe conflict ouerthrowne. The King himſelfe with ſome few hardly eſcaped to SAPHET, a towne there by; moſt part of his nobilitie being there either ſlaine or taken priſoners: amongſt the reſt, Bertrand of BLANQVEFORT, maſter of the Templars, with diuers Paneade again repaired by the Chriſtians.

E others of great name, fell at that time into the enemies hands, & ſo were carried away priſoners.

After this victorie, Noradin ſtrengthned with new ſupplies from DAMASCO, came againe and beſieged PANEADE, in good hope, that the citizens diſcouraged with ſo great an ouerthrow of the King, and out of hope to be by him relieued, would now either yeeld the citie, or elſe not be able long to hold it out. But the King, contrary to his expectation, had in ſhorter time than was thought poſſible, raiſed a great power; and aided by the Prince of ANTIOCH, and the countie of TRIPOLIS, was marching to the reliefe of his citie: of whoſe approach Noradin vnderſtanding, although he had made diuers breaches in the wals, and brought the citizens almoſt vnto vtter deſpaire, roſe with his armie and departed. And ſo Baldwin hauing now twice relieued the beſieged citie, returned alſo to HIERVSALEM.

F Many an hard conflict with the Turks had this young King afterwards, during the fortunate time of his raigne: wherein that troubleſome kingdome happily flouriſhed amidſt the miſcreants; all which to recount, were long and tedious. Yet among other things, it is worth the remembrance, how that Noradin the Turke, then King of DAMASCO, beſieging SVETA, a caſtle belonging to the kingdome of HIERVSALEM, was in a ſet battell by Baldwin ouerthrowne and put to flight, with the loſſe of the greateſt part of his armie. King Baldwin had before married ried Emanuell the Greeke Emperours neece: and now the ſame Emperour by Guido Stephanus, G and Triſillus his embaſſadours, requeſted to haue giuen him againe in marriage one of the kings nigh kinſwomen. Vnto whom the king after mature deliberation had concerning that matter, offered him Matilde, an honourable Lady, the ſiſter of the countie of TRIPOLIS; whom the Emperour refuſed: and afterward by the conſent of the king, made choice of Mary the daughter of Raymund prince of ANTIOCH lately dead. Which the countie of TRIPOLIS taking in euill part, in reuenge thereof, by certaine men of warre whom he put to ſea, grieuouſly infeſted the frontiers of the Emperours dominions. Now during the time that the marriage was in ſolemnizing, the king made his abode at ANTIOCH, at which time hee fortified the caſtle of PONTISFER vpon the riuer ORONTES, againſt the incurſions of the enemies. But lying H there, he according to his wonted manner, to preuent ſickneſſe, vpon the approach of Winter tooke phyſicke of Barac a Iew, the countie of TRIPOLIS his phyſitian. After the taking whereof, he fell preſently into the bloudy flix, and afterward into a conſumption: whereby it was verily ſuppoſed, that he was poiſoned by the Iew, and the rather, for that ſome little part of the ſame medicine that was left, being giuen to a dogge, he thereof in ſhort time died. The king thus languiſhing in paine, to change the aire, remoued firſt to TRIPOLIS, and afterward to BERYTVS, where he departed this troubleſome life, to liue with his Sauiour Chriſt in bliſſe for euer. His dead body was afterward with the generall mourning of his ſubiects conueied to HIERVSALEM, and there ſolemnly enterred by the body of his father. He departed the 13.

The death of king Baldwin lamented by his enemies. of Februarie, in the yeere of grace 1163, when he had raigned 21. yeeres. Hee was a man ſo I gracious, that not only his friends, but euen the Infidels themſelues (as it is reported) lamented his death. Inſomuch that Noradin king of DAMASCO, his ancient enemie, being incited by 1164 ſome of his captaines to inuade his kingdome at ſuch time as his funerals were in ſolemnizing, refuſed ſo to doe, anſwering, That compaſſion and regard was to be had of the iuſt ſorrow of the Chriſtians his ſubiects; for that they had loſt ſuch a king, as the like was hardly againe to be found in the world.

But leauing the kingdome of HIERVSALEM, with the greater part of SYRIA, thus victorioully gained from the Infidels: let vs for the orderly continuation of our hiſtorie, againe returne to ſee the proceedings of the Turkes at the ſame time in the leſſer ASIA alſo: wherein they yet held the ſtate of a kingdome, though not ſo great as before the comming of the Prin- K ces of the Weſt into thoſe countries. After the death of Sultan Solyman (with whom Duke Godfrey and the other Chriſtian Princes had much to doe as they paſſed into SYRIA) as is aforeſaid, one Muhamet ſucceeded him: betwixt whom and Maſut, Sultan of ICONIVM, Diſcord amongſt the Turkes in the leſſer Aſia. great diſcord aroſe, which at length broke out into open warre, to the farther weakning of that late ſhaken kingdome. For the maintenance of which quarrell, as profitable for his ſtate, Iohn Comnenus the Greeke Emperor, gaue aid to Maſut againſt his enemie Muhamet. Neuertheleſſe in ſhort time the two Infidels (profeſſing both one ſuperſtition) became friends, and ioyning their forces, ouerthrew the Emperour with his whole armie, as he lay at the ſiege of ICONIVM, at Maſut the Sultan diuideth his kingdome amongſt his three ſonnes. which time he himſelfe with much adoe eſcaped by flight. Maſut afterwards hauing got into his hands the whole kingdome of the Turks, at the time of his death diuided the ſame amongſt L his three ſonnes: vnto Clizaſthlan his eldeſt ſonne he gaue ICONIVM his chiefe citie, with the townes & prouinces ſubiect thereunto: Vnto Iagupaſan his other ſonne (or rather as ſome will haue it, his ſonne in law) he allotted AMASIA and ANCYRA, with the fruitfull countrey of CAPPADOCIA, and the places adioyning: But vnto Dadune his other ſonne (or ſonne in law) he gaue the great cities of CESAREA and SEBASTIA, with the large countries thereabouts, all ſometime a part of the Greeke empire, but then the portions of the Turks. Long it was not after this diuiſion of the kingdome, but that theſe brethren after the maner of ambitious men, forgetfull of the bonds both of loue & nature, fell at diſcord among themſelues; the Sultan ſeeking the deſtruction of Iagupaſan, and he likewiſe of him, and that not by ſecret meanes, but euen by open force of armes. Emanuell the Greeke Emperour in the meane time wiſhing the deſtru- M ction of them both, heartily reioycing thereat, and by his embaſſadours ſecretly animating the one againſt the other, yet in open ſhew more fauoring of the part of Iagupaſan thã of the Sultan, by whoſe aid he obtained againſt him many notable and bloudie victories: in ſo much that the Sultan wearie of the quarrell, was glad not only by his embaſſadours to ſeeke the Emperors fa-uour, but euen in perſon himſelfe to goe and meet him, as he came with his army out of SIRIA,

and

A and ſo to accompanie him vnto CONSTANTINOPLE, where he was together with the Emperour moſt honorably receiued, with all the ſignes of ioy and triumph that could poſſibly be deuiſed. The Emperour no leſſe reioycing to be ſued vnto by ſo great a Prince, than did the Sultan at his ſo honourable entertainment.

Among other queint deuices of many, for the ſolemnizing of ſo great a triumph, there was an actiue Turke, who had openly giuen it out, That againſt an appointed time hee would from the top of an high tower in the tilt-yard, flie by the ſpace of a furlong: the report whereof had filled the citie with a wonderfull expectation of ſo ſtrange a noueltie. The time prefixed being come, and the people without number aſſembled, the Turke according to his promiſe, vpon the B top of the high tower ſhewed himſelfe, girt in a long and large white garment, gathered into many pleites and foldings, made of purpoſe for the gathering of the winde: wherewith the fooliſh man had vainly perſwaded himſelfe to haue houered in the aire, as doe birds vpon their wings, or to haue guided himſelfe as are ſhips with their ſailes. Standing thus houering a great while, as ready to take his flight; the beholders ſtill laughing, and crying out, Flie Turke, flie, how long ſhall we expect thy flight? The Emperour in the meane time diſſwading him from ſo deſperate an attempt: and the Sultan betwixt feare and hope hanging in doubtfull ſuſpence what might happen to his countryman. The Turke, after he had a great while houered with his armes abroad, (the better to haue gathered the winde, as birds doe with their wings) and long deluded the expectation of the beholders; at length finding the winde fit, as he thought, for his
C purpoſe, committed himſelfe with his vaine hope vnto the aire: But in ſtead of mounting aloft, this fooliſh Icarus came tumbling downe headlong with ſuch violence, that he brake his necke, his armes, and legs, with almoſt all the bones of his body. This fooliſh flight of the Turke gaue ſuch occaſion of ſport and laughter vnto the vulgar people, alwaies ready to ſcoffe and ieſt at ſuch ridiculous matters, that the Turkes attending vpon the Sultan could not walke in the ſtreets vnderided; the artificers in their ſhops ſhaking their armes, with their tooles in their hands, as did the Turke, and ſtill crying out, Flie Turke, flie: whereof the Emperour hearing, although he could not chuſe but thereat ſmile himſelfe, as not ignorant of the ſcoffes & taunts of the vulgar people; yet in fauour of the Sultan, who was not a little grieued therewith, he commanded ſuch their inſolencie to be reſtrained.

D The ſolemnitie of the triumph ouerpaſſed (which by an ominous earthquake at the ſame time happning, was ſomewhat obſcured) the Emperor to ſhew his wealth, and to gratifie the Sultan, gaue vnto him many rich & royall preſents, with ſuch a maſſe of treaſure, as that he much wondered thereat. In requitall whereof, and in token of his thankfulneſſe, he againe honoured the Emperour with the name of his father, and tearming himſelfe by the name of his ſonne, promiſed to reſtore vnto him the citie of SEBASTIA, with the territorie thereunto belonging, then part of Dadune his inheritance. Neuertheleſſe, all this was nothing elſe but meere diſſimulation, as afterward by proofe appeared. For returning home, hee thruſt Dadune indeed out of SEBASTIA, which he ſpoiled, with the country thereabout: but forgetfull of his promiſe, kept it wholly to himſelfe; and by force tooke alſo from him the citie of CÆSAREA, with the coun-
E try of AMASIA, by him before but lately poſſeſſed. In like manner, he bent his forces alſo vpon Iagupaſan his other brother, who in the very preparation of thoſe warres died: by whoſe vntimely death the citie of ANCYRA, (with all his dominions in CAPADOCIA, fell into the Sultans hands. Who now poſſeſſed of all his fathers kingdome, and ſwelling with pride, forgetting all former courteſies, inuaded the Emperors territories, & tooke from him the citie of LAODICEA in PHRYGIA, where he did great harme, as alſo in the country thereabouts, killing the people as he went, or elſe carrying them away with him captiues. For the repreſſing of which outrages, the Emperour with a ſtrong armie paſſed ouer into ASIA, and there in the frontiers of his territories fortified DORILEVM againſt the incurſions of the Turks. In performing whereof, he, to the example and ſtirring vp of others, carried the firſt basket of ſtones himſelfe vpon his F ſhoulders; & vſed ſuch farther diligence, that in ſhort time the citie was compaſſed about with ſtrong walls, and deepe ditches, maugre the Turks, who ceaſed not with continuall alarmes and skirmiſhes to haue hindered the worke. With like care and for like purpoſe hee alſo fortified SYNNAVM, another ſtronghold: and leauing in either place a ſtrong garriſon, returned againe to CONSTANTINOPLE. Neuertheleſſe the Turkes ceaſed not with continuall inrodes to doe what harmes they might vpon the frontiers of the empire, though not altogether with ſo good ſucceſſe as before, being many times cut off by the garriſons of the late fortified townes: which grieuances ſtill increaſing, cauſed the Emperor to expoſtulate with the Sultan, as with an vnthankfull man, and forgetfull of ſo great kindneſſe before done vnto him, as the eſtabliſhment of him in his kingdome came vnto: who with no leſſe vehemencie vpbraided him againe with vnconſtancie and breach of promiſe, as well for fortifying the aforeſaid places contrary to the league betwixt them, as for that hauing promiſed much more, hee had thereof performed nothing. Thus vnkindneſſe daily growing vpon euery trifle, as it commonly falleth out among men of great ſpirit, and iealous of their owne honours: it was daily expected when the matter ſhould fall out into open and bloudie warre; both of them being men of great valour, and apt to reuenge the leaſt iniurie to them offred. Yet was it the Sultans manner warily to manage his warres by his politike and expert captaines: whereas the Emperour being of an hotter nature, and couragious aboue meaſure, commonly in all his great expeditions aduentured his owne perſon, without reſpect what danger might therof enſue vnto himſelfe or his ſtate. Long it was not but that the Emperor, fully reſolued to be reuenged of ſo many wrongs done vnto him and his ſubiects by the Turkes, raiſed the whole power of his empire both in EVROPE and ASIA, in ſuch ſort, as if he had therewith purpoſed, not only to haue raſed to the ground ICONIVM, the regall ſeat of the Turkiſh Sultan, but euen vtterly to haue deſtroied the whole nation of the Turkes. Thus with a moſt puiſſant and populous armie, well appointed of all things neceſſary, he paſſed ouer into ASIA, and ſo in good order marching through PHRYGIA, LAODICEA, CHONAS, (called in ancient time PASSAS) S. ARCHANGEL, LAMPIS, CÆNAS, (where the head of the great and famous riuer MÆANDER riſeth, whereinto the riuer MARSYAS falleth) and from thence to CHONIA, he with euill lucke, and worſe ſpeed, paſſed by MYRIOCEPHALON, an old ruinous caſtle, ominous by the name thereof, as by the euent in ſhort time after it prooued. And albeit that hee marched very circumſpectly, ſtill intrenching his armie in euery place where he lodged; yet could hee make but ſmall ſpeed, by reaſon of the multitude of his carriages, and of the baſe people that attended the ſame. The Turkes in the meane while oftentimes ſhewing themſelues in troupes, and in places of aduantage, skirmiſhing ſometime with one part of the armie, and ſometime with another, but neuer daring to aduenture the fortune of a iuſt battell: yet by ſuch meanes were the victuallers of the armie oftentimes cut off, and the paſſages for the Emperor made very dangerous. And the more to diſtreſſe the Chriſtians in their long trauell, they found the countrey before them of purpoſe deſtroied by the Turks, and the water in many places poiſoned, whereof the Chriſtians vnadviſedly drinking, fell into many grieuous diſeaſes, eſpecially the flix, and thereof died in great number. The Sultan in the meane time, although he had in readineſſe a right puiſſant armie of his owne, and had procured great aid from the Perſian Sultan his kinſman & chiefe ſupporter: yet fearing the doubtfull euent of warre, & loth to aduenture his whole eſtate vpon the fortune of a battell, ſought by his embaſſadours (ſent for that purpoſe) to grow to ſome peace with the Emperor, and that vpon ſuch honourable conditions, as by the wiſer ſort were thought not to be at any hand refuſed: which large offers, the Sultan as deſirous of peace, made vnto him not once, but againe and againe; which the Emperor neuertheleſſe (repoſing great confidence in his owne power, and prickt forward by the gallants of the court, better acquainted with the braue triumphs of peace, than the hard warres of the Turkes) proudly reiected; and ſo diſmiſſing the embaſſadours, ſcornfully willed them to tell their maſter, That he would giue him anſwer vnto his requeſts vnder the wals of ICONIVM. Which cauſed the Sultan, now out of all hope of any reconciliation to be made betwixt the Emperour and him, with all his power to take the ſtraits of ZIZRICA; whereby the armie of the Chriſtians, departing from MYRIOCEPHALON, muſt of neceſſitie paſſe. The entrance into theſe ſtraits was by a long valley, on either ſide encloſed with high mountaines, which toward the North riſing and falling, according as the hils gaue leaue, opened into diuers large vallies, which by little and little growing againe ſtraiter and ſtraiter, with high and craggie rockes hanging ouer on either ſide, and almoſt touching one another, gaue vnto the painfull traueller a moſt hard and difficult paſſage.

Vnkindneſſe betwixt the Emperour and the Sultan.

A great ouerſight of the Emperour.

Into this ſo dangerous a valley, the Emperour not fearing the enemies force, deſperately entred with his army, hauing neither prouided for the cleering of the paſſages, or ſafetie of his carriages, in no other order than as if he had marched through the plaine and champaine countrey, although it were before told him (that which hee ſhortly after, but too late, ſaw) that the ene-

A enemie had ſtrongly poſſeſſed both the ſtraits and the mountains, to hinder his farther paſſage. The Vauward of his armie was conducted by Iohn and Andronicus, the ſonnes of Angelus Conſtantine, accompanied with Macroducas Conſtantine and Lapardas Andronicus: In the right wing was Baldwin, the Emperours brother in law; and in the left Maurozomes Theodorus: After them followed the drudges and ſcullions, with an infinit number of carters and other baſe people, attending vpon the carriages, with the baggage of the whole armie: Next vnto theſe came the emperour with the maine battell, conſiſting for the moſt part of right valiant and worthie ſouldiers: The rereward was ſhut vp by Andronicus Contoſtephanus, with a number of moſt reſolute men. They were not farre entred into theſe ſtraits, but that the Turks from the mountains
B & broken cliffes, ſhewed themſelues on euery ſide, deliuering their deadly ſhot from the vpper ground vpon the Chriſtians below, as thicke as haile. Neuertheleſſe the ſonnes of Angelus with Macroducas and Lapardas, and the Vauntguard, caſting themſelues into a three ſquare battell in forme of a wedge, with their targuets in manner of a penthouſe caſt cloſe together ouer their heads, and their archers on euerie ſide luſtely beſtowing their ſhot amongſt the thickeſt of their enemies, by plaine force driue them out of the ſtraits they had before poſſeſſed, and cauſed them to retire farther off into the mountains; and ſo hauing made themſelues way, with litle or no loſſe paſſed thoſe dangerous ſtraits: vntill that at length hauing recouered the top of an hil, very commodious for their purpoſe, as the caſe ſtood, they there ſtaied, & preſently encamped themſelues. And happely, with like good fortune might the reſt of the armie haue paſſed alſo, had
C they in like order, and with like courage, preſently followed after. But failing ſo to do, and troubled with the multitude of their carriages, which could not poſſibly make any way through thoſe ſtrait and rough paſſages (but troubled themſelues one another, as alſo the whole armie) they were from the vpper ground miſerably ouerwhelmed with the multitude of the Turkiſh archers, whoſe arrowes fell as thicke vpon them from the mountaines, as if it had been a perpetuall tempeſt or ſhoure of haile, to the great diſordering & diſmaying of the whole armie: which the Turks quickly perceiuing, and therewith encouraged, in great numbers came downe from the mountaines where they had before houered ouer the heads of the Chriſtians, and forcibly entring the plaine ground, & comming to handie blowes, firſt ouerthrew the right wing; where Baldwin himſelfe ſeeking to reſtore his diſordered companies, and to ſtay the fury of the enemy, D (now raging in the bloud of the Chriſtians) with a troupe of valiant horſemen breaking into the thickeſt of them, as became a worthy captaine, was there compaſſed in with the multitude of his enemies, and ſlaine, together with all his followers, and the greateſt part of the whole wing by him commanded. With this victorie the Turks were ſo encouraged, that comming downe with all their power, they ſtopped all the waies whereby the Chriſtians were to paſſe, who as men couped vp in thoſe dangerous ſtraits, were not able either to defend themſelues, or to help one another: but incloſed as deere in a toyle, and one troubling another, were the cauſe both of the deſtruction of themſelues and others. For by reaſon of the ſtraitneſſe of the place, neither could they that were before, retire, neither they that were behind in the rereward, come forward to relieue the one the other, as need required: the carriages alſo, which were many, and in the E middle of the armie, ſeruing them to no other purpoſe than to the hurt of themſelues. There were the beaſts that ſerued for burden, together with the ſouldiers, ouerwhelmed with the Turks ſhot, the vallies lay full of dead bodies, the riuers ran mingled with the bloud of men and beaſts, in ſuch terrible manner, as is not by pen to be expreſſed. For the Chriſtians not able either to goe forward, or retire, were there in thoſe ſtraits ſlaine like ſheepe: if any courage or ſparke of valour were by any ſhewed againſt the enemie, fighting at ſo great aduantage, it was but loſt, ſeruing to little or no purpoſe. And to increaſe theſe miſeries, the Turks in ſcorn ſhewed vpon the point of a launce the head of Andronicus Bataza, the Emperors nephew, who comming with an armie out of Paphlagonia, and Heraclea Pontica, againſt the Turks of Amasia, was now by the way by them ouerthrowne and ſlaine. The report whereof, confir-
F med by the ſight of his head, and the conſideration of the deſperate danger wherein the whole armie preſently ſtood, ſo troubled the Emperour, that he was at his wits end: and with drie teares (if it may be ſo ſaid) diſſembling his inward griefe, as one out of comfort, ſtood doubtfull which way to turne himſelfe. For the Turks hauing ſuffered the vantguard to paſſe, with al their power charged the Emperours maine battell, as his chiefe ſtrength, nothing doubting, but that hauing once ouerthrowne it, they ſhould eaſily and at pleaſure ouerthrow the reſt. Oftentimes

The miſerie of the Chriſtians by the Turks incloſed in the ſtraits.

The Emperour in great perplexitie.

had the Emperour attempted to haue driuen the enemie out of thoſe ſtraits, and ſo to haue ope- G ned a way for his armie to haue paſſed, but all in vaine, the power of the Turks ſtill increaſing, and they at great aduantage notably maintaining the paſſages before by them taken. Neuerthe-
The deſperate reſolution of the Emperour. leſſe, ſeeing no leſſe danger in ſtaying ſtill, than in going forward, he with a few of his beſt ſouldi-ers, armed with deſpaire, and reſolued to die, (vnto which kinde of men nothing is terrible) ſet forward directly vpon his enemies, willing the reſt with like reſolution euery man to make for himſelfe the beſt ſhift he could. And ſo with many wounds and ſturdie blowes both giuen and receiued, he by plaine force and might of hand brake thorow the thickeſt of his enemies, and ſo eſcaped out of thoſe ſtraits, as out of a trap. But yet not without many wounds receiued in his perſon, and himſelfe ſo wearied as that he was not able to lift vp his helmet, being beaten cloſe H to his head, and in his target were found ſticking thirtie of the Turks arrowes or thereabouts, the manifeſt tokens of his danger. The other legions ſeeking to follow the Emperor (for other way they had none) were on euery ſide hardly aſſailed by the Turks, and infinite numbers of them ſlaine, beſide many others that periſhed in thoſe ſtraits, ouerborne and troden to death by their owne fellowes. Yea ſuch as had the fortune to eſcape out of one of theſe perillous ſtraits, were forthwith ſlaine in the next: for this ſo dangerous a paſſage thorow the mountaines, was diuided (as is aforeſaid) into ſeuen vallies, which giuing faire and broad entrances, the farther a man went, grew ſtill ſtraiter and ſtraiter, all which ſtraits the Turks had before ſtrongly poſſeſſed. At which time alſo, the more to increaſe the terrour of the day, the light ſand raiſed with the feet of the men & horſes, was with the violence of a moſt tempeſtuous winde which then blew, carried I ſo forcibly and thicke, that both the armies grapling together, as if it had beene in the darkneſſe of the night, killed whomſoeuer they met withall, without reſpect of friend or foe; by which er-rour many were euen of their owne friends ſlaine. In euery place lay great heapes of the Turks ſlaine together with the Chriſtians, and with them great numbers of horſes and other beaſts for carriage, ſo that thoſe vallies where this bloudie conflict was, ſeemed to be nothing elſe but a large burying place of the Turks and Chriſtians with their horſes: but the greater number was of the Chriſtians that periſhed, and they not altogether of the common ſort, but euen of the A moſt miſera- braueſt captaines, and the Emperours neereſt kinſmen. The violence of the winde ceaſing, and ble ſpectacle. the day cleering vp, there was of all others to be ſeene (a moſt wofull ſpectacle) men yet aliue, ſome wounded, ſome whole, couered ſome to the middle, ſome to the necke, with dead carkaſ- K ſes, in ſuch ſort, as that they were not able with any ſtrugling to get out: who with their hands caſt vp towards heauen, with ruthfull voices cried out for helpe to ſuch as paſſed by; but all in vaine, for euery man poſſeſſed with the common feare, and by their danger meaſuring their owne, paſſed by them without compaſſion, as more carefull of their owne ſafetie, leauing them yet liuing as men to be numbred among the dead.

The Emperour in danger to haue beene taken, notably defendeth himſelfe. The Emperor himſelfe, as a man almoſt now ſpent, being got out of the danger, ſtood a while to breathe himſelfe vnder the ſhadow of a wilde peare tree, without any page or man to attend him; whom a poore common ſouldier eſpying, and moued with compaſſion, came vnto him, and offring him the beſt ſeruice he could, helped him vp with his helmet, and buckled vp his armour, which before hung dangling here and there about him: when in the meane while a Turke L cõming in vpon him, had taken his horſe by the bridle, in hope to haue led him away priſoner: whom for all that, the Emperour as wearie as he was, with the trunchion of his broken launce which he had yet in his hand, ſtrucke downe to the ground, and ſo cleered himſelfe of him. Pre-ſently after came alſo another ſort of the ſtragling Turks, ready alſo to haue ſeized vpon him, and to haue taken him priſoner, of whom he ſlew one with the aforeſaid horſemans ſtaffe, and with his ſword ſtrucke off the head of another of them, and ſo kept them off vntill that by the comming in of ten of his owne ſouldiers he was releeued. Departing thence with purpoſe to haue ioyned himſelfe vnto the legions that were gone before in the vauward, hee had not gone farre but that hee was much troubled by other Turks that hee met, and the heapes of the dead bodies that lay in his way: yet at laſt, hauing with much labour and more danger paſſed thoſe M ſtraits, & a riuer running thereby, being glad in many places to ride ouer the dead bodies of his owne people, and ſome other of his owne ſouldiers now reſorting vnto him, he there ſaw Iohn Cataeuzene, a noble & right valiant gentleman that had maried his neece, fighting alone againſt a great number of the Turks, to be compaſſed in and ſlaine; whom he was no way able to re-lieue. Which Turks alſo ſeeing him paſſe by, followed after him as after a moſt rich prey, in hope

A hope to haue either presently taken or slaine him : whom neuertheless hee (encouraging the small company he had about him) notably repulsed; and so sometime marching forward, and againe as occasion required, making a stand, came at length long looked for, but most welcome, vnto the legions that were gone before, not so sorrie for their owne hard estate, as carefull of his danger.

But before he could come to those his Legions, he ready to faint for thirst, commanded water to be brought him out of the riuer that ran fast by; which after he had tasted, and by the vnpleasant taste thereof perceiued the same to be infected, he fetching a deepe sigh, said, O how vnfortunately haue I tasted Christian bloud ! whereunto an audacious and malapert souldier there

B present, and more bitter than the cruell time it selfe, replied ; Emperour, thou didst not now, thou didst not now, I say, first, but long since, and oftentimes, drinke the bloud of the Christians, euen vntill thou wast drunke againe, at such time as thou didst with most grieuous exactions vex and deuoure thy poore subiects. Which reproachfull speech the Emperour put vp in silence, making as if hee had not heard it. With like patience he also forbare the same railing companion, at such time as he seeing his treasures hardly beset, and in danger to be taken by the Turkes, to animate his souldiers, willed them to doe what they could to rescue the same, and to take it for their labour. This treasure (said this impudent fellow) should before haue beene giuen vnto thy souldiers, rather than now, when as it cannot be recouered but with great danger and bloudshed : and therefore, if thou be a man of valour, as thou wouldest be accounted, and as the present case requireth, valiantly charge the Turks (now

C ready to carry it away) thy selfe, and so recouer thine euill gotten goods. Whereunto the Emperour answered no more, but, Good words souldier, and so put it vp, as did Dauid the railings of Shimei. Shortly after the comming of the Emperour vnto those Legions of his vauntguard (the onely remainder of his armie that was left whole & vnbroken) came also Andronicus Contostephanus, who had the leading of the rereward, with diuers others of great place, who had by good fortune escaped the furie of the Turkes. The miseries of that day (not well to be expressed) being ended by the comming on of the night, the Christians sate in the campe oppressed with a generall heauinesse, leaning their heads vpon their elbowes, and considering the present danger wherein they were, scarcely accounted themselues among the liuing : the Turkes in the meane time to increase their feare, all the night running about the campe, and crying aloud vnto such

D of their countrymen in the campe, as had abiured their religion, or for other respects had taken part with the imperials, that they should that night get them out of the campe, whereas otherwise, if they staied vnto the morning, they should be all but lost men. In this so great an extremitie the Emperor not knowing what to doe, calling together his chiefe commanders, declared vnto them the desperate danger they were in, together with his resolution : which was, secretly himselfe to flie, and to leaue the rest, euery man to make what shift he could for himselfe. Which his base determination, so foule as fouler could not be, they all wondering at, as proceeding from a distraughted minde: and by chance ouerheard by one of the common souldiers, that stood without the tent, the same souldier fetching a deepe sigh, in detestation thereof cried out with a loud voice, What meanes the Emperour ? and so turning himselfe vnto him, said :

The malapert speech of an insolent souldier to the Emperor.

The great patience of the Emperour.

The fearfull resolution of the Emperour.

E Art not thou he that hast thrust vs into this desolate and strait way, and cast vs headlong into destruction ? and hast as it were in a morter enclosed vs in these rockes and mountaines, ready as it were to ouerwhelme vs. What had we to doe with this vaile of mourning, and mouth of hell ? Wherefore came we into these mischieuous & rough straits ? What can we particularly complaine of the Barbarians, which in these inextricable windings and straits haue thus entangled and beset vs ? Was it not thou that brought'st vs hither ? And wilt thou now, as sheepe appointed to the slaughter, thy selfe betray vs ? With which so sharpe a reprehension the Emperour throughly pierced, changed his former determination for flight, resoluing now to stand by it, whatsoeuer happened. But what should he now doe, beset with his enemies, still ready to deuoure him ? Helpe he saw none, either in himselfe, or to be expected from others; nought remained but death and despaire. In this extremitie, all mans helpe

F now failing, it pleased the most mighty (which chastiseth and healeth againe, which striketh and yet giueth life, and suffereth not the staffe of the sinners alwayes to rage into the portion of the iust) with mercifull eye to looke downe vpon these distressed men, and with an vnwonted kind of clemencie to touch the Sultans heart, in such sort, as that hee which but the other day stood in dread of the Emperour, and now hauing him as it were in his power, was ouercome with his miserie : or as in times past he by Husai ouerthrew the counsell of Achitophel, and changed the minde of Abſolon to follow ſuch aduice as ſhould bring him to deſtruction: ſo then G alſo he turned the minde of the Turkiſh Sultan, that (perſwaded by certaine of the chiefe men about him, who in time of peace had vſed to receiue great gifts and preſents from the Emperor) he of his owne accord by his embaſſadours offered peace vnto the Emperor, before that he in ſo great diſtreſſe ſued vnto him for any; & that vpon the ſelfeſame conditions they had made their leagues before. The Turkes in the meane time ignorant of the Sultans reſolution, early in the morning were ready to aſſault the Emperours campe, in hope at once to haue ouerthrowne his whole power; and with a barbarous outcrie ſtill riding about it, came ſo nigh, that with their ar-rowes they ſlew diuers of the Chriſtians within their owne trenches: Againſt whom the Emperor ſent out Iohn the ſonne of Conſtantinus Angelus, and after him Macroducas Conſtantinus, but to little or no purpoſe. In the meane time came one Gabras, a man of the greateſt reputation H among the Turkes, embaſſadour from the Sultan, by whoſe commandement the Turkes ceaſed farther to aſſault the campe. This Gabras comming vnto the Emperour, and after the manner of the Barbarians, honouring him with reuerence done euen downe to the ground: Firſt preſented him with a goodly horſe, whoſe furniture was all of ſiluer, as if it had beene for triumph, & a faire two edged ſword. Afterwards falling into a large diſcourſe concerning a peace to be made, & with many kinde words, as with an enchantment, appeaſing the Emperours heauineſſe conceiued of his late loſſe; hee among other pleaſant conceits then vttered, ſeeing the Emperor in a rich roabe of yellow ouer his armour, told him, that the colour was not fit for war, as ominous and portending euill lucke: whereat the Emperor a little ſmiling, gaue it him, with the fortune thereof: and receiuing the horſe and ſword ſent him from the Sultan, ſigned the I peace. Amongſt other conditions of the peace (which the dangerouſneſſe of the time ſuffered not the Emperor curiouſly to examine; one was, That DORILEVM and SVBLEVM, before by him fortified, and the ground of this vnfortunate warre, ſhould be againe raſed. Peace thus beyond all hope being concluded, & the Emperor deliuered of a great feare, purpoſed another way to return home, to auoid the ſight of the ſlaine: yet was he by his guides, euen of purpoſe as it was thought, lead back the ſame way, to behold with his eies thoſe miſerable ſpectacles of the ſlain, which could not with any teares be ſufficiently lamented: for the ſtraits were made plaine, the vallies were raiſed into hils, and the forreſt lay couered with the carkaſſes of the ſlaine: no man paſſed by, but with heauineſſe and griefe, calling by name vpon their friends and familiars there loſt. Hauing againe paſſed thoſe dolefull ſtraits, the Turkes were againe in the taile of the K armie: for it was reported, that the Sultan repenting himſelfe to haue ſuffered his enemies ſo to eſcape out of his hands, had giuen leaue vnto ſuch as would, to purſue them, but followed not himſelfe with his whole power as before; for moſt of the better ſort of his ſouldiers loaded with the ſpoile, were now returned home. Yet theſe that followed after the armie, ſlew many, eſpecially ſuch as were weake or wounded, and ſo vnable to follow the reſt: although the Emperor to helpe the matter, had for the repulſing of them placed the beſt of his captaines and ſouldiers in the rereward. Being come to CHONAS, and now out of feare of his enemies, he gaue vnto euery one of his hurt ſouldiers mony to pay for the curing of their wounds, and to bring them into their countries. And comming to PHILADELPHIA, there ſtaied for the refreſhing of himſelfe after ſo great miſeries. In his return he raſed SVBLEVM according to his promiſe, but not DO- L RILEVM: whereof the Sultan by his embaſſadours complaining, he anſwered, That what he had, enforced thereunto by neceſſitie, promiſed, he greatly forced not to performe. In reuenge wherof, the Sultan ſent out one of his moſt valiant captains, called Atapacke, with foure & twentie thouſand good ſouldiers, choſen out of his whole armie, with ſtrait charge to waſt & deſtroy all the Emperors prouinces and townes, euen vnto the ſea ſide, without ſparing man, woman or childe; and in token thereof, to bring with him ſome of the ſea water, an oare, and ſome of the ſea ſand: who according to his charge, ſpoiled PHRYGIA, with the cities along the riuer MEANDER, euen vnto the ſea ſide. And ſo returning with a rich prey, by the way ſpoiled what before he had left vntouched. But in paſſing the riuer MEANDER, when he feared leaſt, he fell into the hands of Iohn Bataza the Emperours nephew, and of Ducas Conſtantine, a moſt valiant M captaine, of purpoſe ſent againſt him by the Emperour with a great power; where hee was by them ſlaine, together with all his armie, and the rich bootie he had taken all againe recouered. Many other hard conflicts paſſed after this betwixt the Imperials and the Turkes, the one continually ſeeking to annoy the other; all which, for that therein nothing fell out much worth the remembrance,

A remembrance, I for breuitie willingly paſſe ouer. In theſe endleſſe troubles died Emanuell the Greeke Emperour, when he had by the ſpace of eight and thirtie yeeres worthily gouerned that great empire, hauing in the time of his ſickneſſe but a little before his death taken vpon him the habit of a Monke, in token he had forſaken the world. All the time of his raigne he was no leſſe iealous of the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt, than of the Turkes in the Eaſt, and therefore euer dealt with them vnkindly. In time of warre he was ſo laborious, as if he had neuer taken felicitie but in paine; and againe in peace ſo giuen ouer to his pleaſure, as if he had neuer thought of any thing elſe. After whoſe death the Turkiſh Sultan, without reſiſtance inuading the frontiers of the empire, tooke SOZOPOLIS, with diuers towns thereabout in PHRYGIA, and long beſie-
B ged the famous citie of ATTALIA, and ſo daily encroched more & more vpon the prouinces of the empire, ioyning the ſame vnto his owne, which was no great matter for him to doe, the Greeke empire being then no better gouerned than was the chariot of the Sunne (as the Poets faigne) by Phaeton, farre vnfit for ſo great a charge: for Alexius Comnenus, otherwiſe called Porphyrogenitus, being then but a childe of about 12. yeeres old, ſucceeding his graue father in the empire, after the manner of children altogether following his pleaſure; his mother with his fathers kinſmen & friends, who aboue all things ought to haue had an eſpeciall care of his education, neglecting the old Emperours truſt in them repoſed, followed alſo their owne delights, without regard of the ruine of the commonweale. Some enamoured with the beautie of the young Empreſſe, gaue themſelues all to brauerie, & the courting of her: otherſome in great au-
C thoritie, with no leſſe deſire in the meane time, with the common treaſures filled their emptie cofers: and a third ſort there was (of all the reſt moſt dangerous) who neither reſpecting their ſenſual pleaſure, neither the heaping vp of wealth, looked not ſo low, aiming at the very empire it ſelfe. As for the cõmon good, that was of all other things of them all leaſt regarded. Amongſt theſe third ſort of the ambitious, was one Andronicus, the couſin of the late Emperor Emanuell, a man of an haughtie & troubleſome ſpirit, whom he the ſaid Emperor Emanuell had for his aſpiring, moſt part of the time of his raigne kept in priſon, or elſe in exile, as he now was, being by him not long before, for feare of raiſing of new troubles, confined to liue farre off frõ the court at ORNVM: who now hearing of the death of the Emperor Emanuell, of the factions in court, of the childiſhneſſe of the young Emperor Alexius, giuen wholly to his ſports; and the great men Andronicus aſpireth.
D put in truſt to haue ſeene to his bringing vp, and to the gouernment of the empire, ſome like Bees to flie abroad into the country, ſeeking after mony as the Bees doe for hony; ſome others in the meane time like hogs, lying ſtill and fatting themſelues with great and gainfull offices, wallowing in all exceſſe and pleaſure, to haue no regard of the honour or profit of the common weale: thought it now a fit time (in ſuch diſorder of the ſtate) for him to aſpire vnto the empire, after which he had all his life time longed. That he was generally beloued of the Conſtantinopolitans, yea and of ſome of the nobilitie alſo, he doubted not: for them he had long before by his popular behauiour gained, together with the diſtruſt of the late Emperour, iealous of his eſtate; which as it coſt him his libertie, ſo miſſed it not much but that it had coſt him his life alſo: but now that he was dead, wanted nothing more than ſome faire colour for the ſhadowing of E his foule purpoſe. Amongſt many and right diuers things by him thought vpon, was a clauſe in the oath of obedience which he had giuen vnto the Emperour Emanuell and Alexius his ſonne, (which oath he had deliuered vnto him in writing) That if he ſhould ſee, heare, or vnderſtand of any thing dangerous or hurtfull to their honour, empire, or perſons, he ſhould forthwith bewray it, and to the vttermoſt of his power withſtand it: which words (not ſo to haue beene wreſted) as beſt ſeruing for his purpoſe, he tooke firſt occaſion for to worke vpon. And as he was a ſtout and imperious man, thereupon writ diuers letters vnto the young Emperour his couſin, vnto Theodoſius the Patriarch, and other ſuch as he knew well affected vnto the late Emperour Emanuell: wherein among other things which he wiſhed to be amended in the preſent gouernment, he ſeemed moſt to complaine of the immoderate power and authoritie of Alexius, then F preſident of the Counſell: who in great fauour with the young Emperour, and more inward with the Empreſſe his mother than was ſuppoſed to ſtand with her honor, ruled all things at his pleaſure, in ſo much, as that nothing done by any the great officers of the empire, or by the Emperor himſelfe, was accounted of any force, except his approbation were thereunto annexed: whereby he was growne vnto ſuch an exceſſiue pride, hauing all things in his power, as that no man could without danger, as vpon the venemous Baſiliske, looke vpon him. Of which his ſo excessiue and insolent power Andronicus by his letters now greatly complained, moued there- G unto (as he would haue it beleeued) with the care he had of the young Emperors safety, which could not (as he said) long stand with the others so great power, which he therefore (as in duty bound) wished to be abridged: aggrauating withall the infamous report of Alexius his too much familiarity with the Empresse, which first muttred in court, afterwards flew (as he said) throughout the whole world. The reformation of which things, as tending to the danger of the person of the Emperor, and dishonour of the estate; he forsooth as one in conscience bound, with great grauity and eloquence (being a very learned man) both in open speech and writing most earnestly desired: and thereby so wrought, as that hee was generally accounted for a man of great experience (as indeed he was) and a faithfull counsellor to the state, a thing much to haue been H wished. Wherefore leauing OENVM, the place whereto he was by the Emperour Emanuell in a sort banished, trauelling towards CONSTANTINOPLE, he gaue it out in euery place where he came, what he had sworne, and what he would for his oathes sake do: vnto whom men desirous of the change of the state, & such as gaue credit vnto the report long before giuen out, That he should at length become Emperor; flockt in great numbers, as birds about an owle to see him, and with vaine praises to chatter about him. In this sort he came as farre as PAPHLAGO-NIA; in euery place honourably receiued, as if hee had beene a deliuerer of his countrie sent from God. And in the imperiall citie he was not longed for of the vulgar people only, as their light and load star: but diuers of the nobility also by secret messengers & letters, perswaded him to hasten his comming, and to take vpon him the gouernment; assuring him that there would be I none to resist him, or to oppose themselues against his shadow, but all ready to receiue him: Especially Mary the young Emperours sister by the fathers side, with her husband Cæsar (who being a woman of great spirit, and grieuing much to see her fathers empire made a prey vnto Alexius the president, and the Empresse her stepmother, whom she naturally hated) had raised a great and dangerous tumult in the citie against them both, which was not without much bloodshead appeased: and now ceased not by often and most earnest letters (to her owne destruction and her husbands, as it afterwards fell out) to pricke forward Andronicus and to hasten his com-ming: who by letters and messengers daily comming vnto him from the court, still more and more encouraged, leauing behind him the countrey of PAPHLAGONIA, came to HERACLEA in PONTVS, and still on towards the imperiall citie, with great cnnning & dissimulation win- K ning the hearts of the people as he went. For who was so stonie hearted, whom his sweet words and abundant teares flowing from his gracious eyes, as from two plentifull fountaines downe by his hoary cheekes, might not haue mooued? All that hee did or desired, was (as hee saide) for the common good and liberty of the Emperour. By which meanes hee had drawne vnto him a wonderfull number of the rude countrey people by the way as hee came. But comming into BYTHINIA, hee was by Iohn Ducas gouenour of the great citie of NICE, shut out as an enemy to the state, and so at NICOMEDIA also. Neuertheless, passing by those cities, he held still on his way, vntill at length hee was neere vnto a castle called CHARACE, encountred by Andronicus Angelus, sent with a great power against him, by the great president Alexius; who otherwise as an effeminat man, giuen ouer to his pleasure, spending the greatest part of the night L in rioting by candle light, and most part of the day in his bed, with curtaines close drawne as if it had been night; yet doubtfull now of the comming of his enemy, left nothing vndone which hee thought might helpe for the assuring of his estate. Many of the nobility of whom he stood in doubt, hee gained vnto him by meanes of the Emperors mother; who by her rare beautie, sweet words, and gracious behauior, as with a line drew all men vnto her: Other some he ouercame with gifts and great summes of money, whereof hee now made no spare: And so wrought the matter that no man of any account or marke, went ouer to Andronicus. Who ne-uertheless with such followers as he had, ioyning battell with Angelus (sent against him, as is before saide) ouerthrew him and put him to flight. Wherewith Alexius much troubled) in great displeasure and without reason, called Angelus (now fled to CONSTANTINOPLE) to an M account for the money deliuered vnto him for the defraying of the charges of that vnfortunate war: who seeing his misfortune to be so taken as if he had framed it himselfe, & of purpose betrayed the armie committed to his charge; by the counsell of his sixe sonnes, being all men of great valour and wisedome, first tooke the refuge of his owne house: but finding himselfe there in no safety, with is wife and his said sonnes (two of which came afterwards to be Emperours) presently

A preſently fled ouer the ſtrait to Andronicus: who ſeeing of him comming towards him, is reported to haue vſed this text of Scripture, Behold I will ſend mine Angell before thy face, to prepare thy wayes, alluding to his name of Angelus, as the preſage of his good ſucceſſe. Wherefore encouraged with the comming of theſe noblemen his kinſmen, he without longer ſtay marched directly vnto the ſea ſide, and there a little aboue CHALCEDON encamped almoſt right ouer againſt CONSTANTINOPLE: cauſing many great fires (moe than needed) to be made in his armie, to make it ſeeme vnto them of the citie greater than indeed it was; and with the ſight thereof to keepe the citizens in ſuſpence, with the doubtfull expectation of ſome great matter to enſue. Wherein he was no whit deceiued, for they hauing him now as it were in ſight, leauing
B their worke, ran ſome to the ſea ſide, ſome vp to the hils and high towers to behold his armie a farre off, willing with their friendly lookes, if it had beene poſſible, to haue drawne him ouer the ſtrait into the citie. Alexius knowing himſelfe not able by land to encounter with ſo ſtrong an enemie, (for now ſome which on foot could not goe ouer to Andronicus, were ſecretly in heart alreadie with him, otherſome thought themſelues ſufficiently to ſhew their fidelitie vnto the Emperour, if ſitting ſtill at home, they ſhould take part with neither: for ſo haue ſubtill heads and aſpiring mindes, for the furtherance of their deſires, taught the common people both to ſay and thinke) thought it beſt by ſea to auert the preſent danger: and therefore commanded all the Emperours gallies (being before rigged vp and readie) to be ſtrongly manned and put to ſea, for the keeping of PROPONTIS and the ſtrait of BOSPHORVS, that Andronicus ſhould not that C way paſſe. Now had he determined to haue made eſpeciall choice of ſome aſſured friend of his owne for to be Generall of this fleet, as he had done of the captaines and maſters, being all his own kinſmen or domeſticall ſeruants: but as he was about to haue ſo done, Contoſtephanus (ſurnamed the great captaine) oppoſed himſelfe againſt it, challenging that place as due vnto himſelfe, before all others: So that ouercome by his authoritie (which it was no time for Alexius now to diſpute) he was glad to commit the charge & truſt of the whole fleet vnto him, as Generall. Thus hauing (as he thought) made the ſea ſure, he ſent ouer vnto Andronicus, as from the Emperour, (for all was done in his name) one George Xiphilinus, with letters and other inſtructi-ons, whereof the effect was, to command him forthwith in peace to returne vnto the place from whence he came, & not farther to trouble the ſtate: promiſing him in ſo doing, the Emperors fa-D uour, with many great honours and preferments to be afterward beſtowed vpon him; which otherwiſe might turne to his vtter deſtruction. Which letters Xiphilinus hauing deliuered, and done his meſſage, is reported to haue ſecretly aduiſed Andronicus to proceed in his purpoſe, and not in any caſe to yeeld to that which was of him required: wherewith Andronicus encouraged, proudly reiected the graces offred, & willed the meſſenger to tell them that ſent him, that if they would haue him to returne vnto the place from whence he came, they ſhould firſt diſplace the proud preſident Alexius, & cal him vnto an account for the villanies he had done; then the Emperors mother they ſhould depriue of her honours, & ſhut her vp as a Nun into ſome cloyſter, there to learne to amend her life; and laſt of all, that the Emperor according to his fathers will,

E ſhould take vpon himſelfe the gouernment, and not be ouertopt by others, by whoſe too much authoritie, his maieſtie & honor was (as he ſaid) too much impaired. But within a few daies after, Contoſtephanus, the great captaine & generall, carried ouer all the gallies to Andronicus, leauing nothing but their names for the preſident in his rols to looke vpon: whoſe reuolt aboue al other things encouraged Andronicus, & caſt Alexius euen into the bottome of deſpaire. For now Andronicus his friends flocked together in the citie, not ſecretly as before, but openly in all places: and ſuch as wiſhed a change in the ſtate, impudently ſcoffing at Alexius, paſſed ouer the ſtrait to CALCEDON in great numbers to Andronicus, where hauing filled their eies with the beholding of his goodly perſon, his cheerefull countenance, & reuerend age, and their eares with his ſweet words & great promiſes, returned home merrie & ioyfull, as if they had been in ſome terreſtriall paradice, filling the citie with his praiſes. After that, Andronicus his two ſons, Iohn and Manuel, F with diuers others, whom the preſident had caſt in priſon, were ſet at libertie, and other of his chiefe fauorits laid faſt in their roomes. As for Alexius, the preſident himſelfe, with all his friends and faction in the court, they were taken and committed to the keeping of the guard: a right ſtrange alteration. But about midnight, Alexius himſelfe was ſecretly conueyed out of the court vnto the Patriarchs houſe, & there kept with a ſtronger guard than before. A wonderful change, and worth the marking, a man ſo honorably borne, but yeſterday in greateſt honour attended vpon with many thouſands, all at his command, hauing the power to ſpill or ſaue: to day in bonds, in diſgrace, in miſerie and deſpaire, and not ſo much as a page to wait vpon him. Which he taking very grieuouſly, yet complained of nothing more, than that they which had the keeping of him, would not ſuffer him to ſleepe nor take any reſt. Of whoſe miſerie, the Patriarch taking pitie (although he had of him very euill deſerued) yet cheered him vp with comfortable words, perſwading him with patience to endure his hard fortune, and not with ſuch ſpeeches as fitted not his preſent ſtate, to prouoke his keepers to vſe him euill. Within a few dayes after early in a morning, he was brought out of the Patriarchs houſe, and ſet vpon a very little bad Iade, and ſo with a ragged clout vpon the top of a reed in manner of an enſigne, carried before him in deriſion, was brought to the ſea ſide, and there caſt into a little boat, was ſo brought to Andronicus, by whoſe commandement, with the generall conſent of the nobilitie, he for his euill gouernment ſhortly after had his eyes put out. This was the miſerable end of the immoderate power, or rather of the inſolent ſoueraignetie of Alexius: who, had he with more moderation and vigilancie gouerned, might both haue kept Andronicus out of the citie, and himſelfe from ſo great miſerie; hauing at his command all the Emperours treaſure, his gallies, with moſt part of the ſtrength of the empire. Now came the noble men ouer apace to Andronicus: the laſt that came, was the reuerend Patriarch Theodoſius, with the chiefe of the Clergie: of whoſe approch, Andronicus hearing, went out of his tent to meet him, and falling downe (as great as he was) flat at his horſes feet, and in a while after ariſing againe, kiſſed the Patriarchs foot, calling him, The Emperours Sauiour, The louer of vertue, The defender of the truth; and comparing him with the famous Father Iohn Chryſoſtome, omitted not any honourable title he could poſſibly deuiſe to giue him. But the deuout Patriarch, that had neuer ſeene Andronicus before, hauing now well viewed him, and marked his ſterne countenance, his ſubtill nature, his craftie and diſſembling manners, his exceeding ſtature, being almoſt ten foot high, his ſtately gate, his proud looke, his continuall ſeueritie, and melancholie ſilence: as it were pitying them that to their owne deſtruction had called ſuch a man in, ſaid: Hitherto I haue heard, but now I haue alſo ſeene, and plainly knowne: and fetching a deepe ſigh, adioyned thereunto that ſaying of the Prophet Dauid: As we haue heard, ſo haue we alſo ſeene. In which words, he couertly quipped the diſſembled meeting and ſubmiſſion of Andronicus: and withall called to remembrance the words of the Emperour Emanuel, wherewith he had many times ſo painted forth Andronicus vnto the Patriarch, as if he would moſt liuely haue repreſented him vnto his view.

Alexius broght to Andronicus, hath his eyes put out.

The meeting of the Patriarch & Andronicus

All things in the citie and in the pallace ſet in order according to Andronicus his mind, by his two ſonnes, and leaue giuen vnto the Emperours friends to come ouer vnto him, and to be acquainted with him; at length Andronicus himſelfe departing from DAMALVM, in a gallie croſſed the ſtrait, oftentimes by the way merrily ſinging that ſaying of the heauenly Pſalmiſt: Returne my ſoule into thy reſt, becauſe the Lord hath done well vnto thee, hauing deliuered my life from death, mine eyes from teares, and my feet from falling. The Emperour with his mother Xene, then lay not in the pallace at CONSTANTINOPLE, but at another princely houſe of his in the countrey neere vnto PHILOPATIVM, as Andronicus had appointed: whither Andronicus firſt went, and comming vnto his preſence, moſt humbly proſtrate before him, with ſobbing and teares, as his deceitfull manner was, kiſſed his feet. As for the Empreſſe his mother, he lightly ſaluted her, and as it were but for faſhion ſake, not diſſembling in his countenance the old grudge he bare againſt her. And ſo without longer ſtay went vnto his tent prouided for him not farre off, round about which, all the great noble men had pitched their tents alſo, flocking vnto him as chickens ſeeking for refuge vnder the hens wings. Hauing there ſtaied with the Emperour a good while, he was deſirous to goe vnto the imperiall citie, and to ſee the late Emperour Emanuel his couſins graue. Where entring into the monaſterie of our Lady, where he was buried, and comming to his tombe, hee wept bitterly, and roared as it were mainely out. So that diuers of the ſtanders by, ignorant of his diſſembling nature, by way of admiration ſaid: O what a wonderfull thing is this! O how hee loued the Emperour, his couſin, although his fierce and cruell perſecutor! And when one of his kinſmen would haue pulled him from the tombe, ſaying that he had ſorrowed for him enough; he would not be remoued, but requeſted them to ſuffer him yet a little to tarrie by the tombe, for that he had ſomething in ſecret to ſay vnto the dead. And ſo with his hands caſt vp and cloſe together, as if he had praied, and his eyes faſt fixed vpon the tombe, he moued his lips, and ſecretly ſaid ſomething, but what, no man could tell. Some ſaid it

A was ſome charme or incantation. But others more pleaſantly conceited, ſaid, and (as it afterward appeared) more truly, that Andronicus did triumph ouer the dead Emperour Emanuell, and reuell with his ghoſt, with theſe or like words: I haue thee now faſt, my cruell perſecutor, by whom I haue beene driuen vnto many great extremities: and hauing wandred almoſt all the world ouer, haue thereunto beene made by thee a common by-word. But now this tombe riſing vp with ſeuen tops, and priſon, out of which thou canſt not ſtart, holdeth thee oppreſſed with a dead ſleepe, out of which thou ſhalt not be awaked, but by the ſounding of the laſt trumpe. And now will I be reuenged of thy poſteritie, and ſatisfie my ſelfe as a Lion with a fat prey, and take ſharpe reuenge of all the wrongs thou haſt done me, when I haue once poſſeſſed my ſelfe of this royall citie.

B After that, viſiting all the Emperors ſtately houſes, but ſtaying in no place long, he diſpoſed of all matters of ſtate, according to his owne pleaſure. Vnto the yong Emperor he allowed hunting, and other his vaine delights, with keepers ioyned vnto him, to watch not only his going in & out, but alſo that no man ſhould talke with him of any matter of importance. For all the gouernment of the ſtate he tooke vnto himſelfe: not for that he wiſhed ſo well therunto, aboue others, but ſo to driue from the court all them of the contrary faction to himſelfe, that were able to do any thing, & had before born ſome ſway. The ſouldiers, whoſe help he had vſed in aſpiring to the gouernement, hee rewarded with great bountie; all their offices and preferments he beſtowed either vpon his owne children, or other his great fauourits; diuers of the nobilitie of whom he liked not, were by him in ſhort time driuen into exile: ſome were by him depriued of C their ſight, & ſome others caſt in priſon, not knowing any cauſe why, more than that they were by him ſecretly cõdemned for that they were of the nobilitie, or had done ſome good ſeruice for the ſtate, or exiled for their perſonage, or ſome other thing that grieued Andronicus, or elſe for the ſparke of ſome old diſpleaſure which yet lay hidden as fire raked vp in the aſhes. So that the ſtate of that time began to grow moſt miſerable: and the treacherie, euen of men neareſt in blood, ſeeking the deſtructiõ one of another, for to ſerue their own turns, or to gratifie Andronicus, moſt horrible: not only one brother betraied another, but euen the father his ſon, & the ſon his father, if Andronicus wold haue it ſo. Some accuſed their neereſt kinſmen, that they had derided Andronicus his proceedings; or that without regard of him, they more fauoured Alexius the yong Emperor, then, a great offence. Yea (ſuch was the miſchief of the time) that many in accu-
D ſing others, were theſelues accuſed; & charging others of treaſon againſt Andronicus, were theſelues charged by them whom they accuſed, & ſo clapt vp both together in one priſon. Neither were they of the nobility only, which were enemies to Andronicus, thus hardly delt withall, but euen ſome of his great fauourits & followers alſo: For ſome who but yeſterday he had vſed moſt kindly, and enrolled amongſt his beſt friends, vpon them to day he frowned & tyrannized moſt cruelly: ſo that you might haue ſeene the ſame man the ſame day (as it is reported of Xerxes his admirall) to be crowned and beheaded, to be graced & diſgraced: Inſomuch, that the wiſer ſort deemed Andronicus his praiſings, to be the beginning of a mans diſgrace; his bounty, his vndoing; and his kindneſſe, his death. The firſt that taſted of his tyrannie, was Mary, the daughter of Emanuell the Emperor, who for the hatred ſhe bare vnto Alexius the late preſident, and the Em-
E preſſe her mother in law, had (as is afore ſaid) aboue all other, wiſhed for his comming: but was now by one Pterigionites (ſometime an Eunuch of her fathers, corrupted by Andronicus, hauing in his aſpiring mind purpoſed the vtter deſtruction of all Emanuels poſteritie) cunningly poiſoned; as was her husband Cæſar, who liued not long after her, poyſoned alſo (as was ſuppoſed) with the ſame cup that his wife was. Now amongſt others of the late Emperors houſe, none had euer ſtood more in his light, than had the faire Empreſſe Xene, the yong Emperors mother, who now hee ceaſed not moſt bitterly (though wrongfully) to accuſe, as an vtter enemie both vnto the Emperour and the ſtate; making as if he would leaue all, and againe depart, if ſhee were not remooued from the Emperor her ſonne: and by his cunning ſo incenſed the giddy headed vul-
F gar people againſt her, that they came flocking vnto Theodoſius the good Patriarch, readie to teare him out of his clothes, if he conſented not vnto the remooving of the Empreſſe, as Andronicus had deſired. So a counſell being called of ſuch his fauorits & others, as were not like indifferently to heare her cauſe, but aſſuredly to condemne her; the guiltleſſe Empreſſe after many things falſely laid to her charge, was accuſed of treaſon: as that ſhe ſhold by her letters haue ſolicited Bela king of HVNGARIE, her brother in law, to inuade BRANIZORA and BELLIGRADE, two ſtrong places belonging to the empire. Whereupon ſhee was condemned, and ſhamefully caſt caſt into a moſt filthie priſon neere vnto the monaſterie of S. DIOMEDE. Amongſt other no- G blemen called vnto this wicked counſell, where Leo Monaſteriotes, Demetrius Tornicius, and Conſtantius Petrenus: who not yet altogether deuoted to Andronicus, being asked their opinions concerning the empreſſe, ſaide, They would be glad firſt to knowe, Whether that counſell a gainſt his mother, were called by the emperors conſent or not? With which ſpeech, Andronicus pearced to the heart as with a ſword, in great rage ſtart vp and ſaid, Theſe are they which encouraged the wicked preſident to all his villanies, lay hands vpon them. Whereupon they of his guard in threatning manner ſhooke their weapons & ſwords at them, as if they would euen preſently haue ſlaine them: And the tumultuous common people, catching them by their cloaks as they came out, pulling them ſome one way ſome another, were ſo fierce vpon them, H as that they had much adoe to eſcape out of their hands with life. Now lay the faire empreſſe (but the other day one of the greateſt princes of the Eaſt, and honoured of all her ſubiects) in great miſerie and diſpaire, ſcorned euen of her baſe keepers, euery houre expecting the deadly blow of the hangman. Yet was not the crueltie of Andronicus againſt her, ſo any thing aſſwaged, but greeuing that ſhe yet breathed, ſhortly after aſſembled the former counſell, the miniſters of his wrath, demanding of them, What puniſhment was by law appointed for ſuch as betraied any towne or prouince of the empire? whereunto anſwer being giuen in writing, That it was by the law, death: hee could no longer hold, but that he muſt in great choller breake out againſt the poore empreſſe, as if it had bin ſhe that had done it: And thereupon the wicked counſellers crying out with one voyce, That ſhe was to be taken out of the way, as they had before I agreed; by and by without longer ſtay, a damned writing was ſubſcribed by the young emperour her ſon, as if it had been with the blood of his owne mother, whereby ſhee was (I abhor to write it) moſt vnworthily condemned to die. The men appointed to ſee this moſt horrible and cruell execution done, were Manuel, andronicus his eldeſt ſon, and Georgius Auguſtus, his neere kinſman; who both diſmaid at the very mentioning of the matter, not regarding the emperors command, ſaid plainly, That they neuer before conſented vnto the death of empreſſe, but had cleane hands of ſo hainous an offence, and therfore would now much leſſe ſee her innocent bodie diſmembred in their ſight. At which vnexpected anſwer Andronicus much troubled, with his fingers oftentimes pluckt himſelfe by the hoarie beard, and with burning eyes caſting ſometime vp his head, & ſometime downe, ſighed at his owne moſt miſerable tyrannicall eſtate, fret- K ting inwardly that they which were neereſt vnto him, whom hee thought he might euen with a beck haue commanded to haue done any miſchiefe, abhorring his cruelty, ſhould refuſe to doe the thing he ſo much deſired to haue done: yet repreſſing his anger for a while, within a few dayes after he again commanded her to be ſtrangled; which was accordingly done by Conſtantinus Tripſycus, and Pterigionites the vngracious eunuch, by whoſe helpe hee had before poiſoned Mary the emperors daughter, with Cæſar her husband, as is before declared. Thus periſhed this great empreſſe, cruelly ſtrangled in priſon, by theſe two wicked men, the mercileſſe executioners of Andronicus his wrath. Her dead bodie lately adorned with all the graces of nature, euen to the admiration of the beholders, was without more adoe ſecretly raked vp in the ſand faſt by the ſea-ſide: a poore ſepulcher for ſo great a perſon. Dangerous to ſpeake the truth to a tyrant.

The miſerable death of the empreſſe.

What might not Andronicus now do to others, that durſt thus cruelly to deale with the yong emperors owne mother, & neereſt friends? yet was all couered vnder the pretence of the common good, and ſafety of the ſtate and empire. And the more to ſhadow Andronicus his ſecret purpoſes, as not proceeding of any priuate or hidden malice, or aſpiring humor, from which he of all men would ſeeme moſt free; and the more to manifeſt his deuotion and loyalty vnto the young emperour his couſin, he was the only perſwader vnto the reſt of the nobilitie, to haue him ſolemnely crowned (which as yet by reaſon of his tender age hee was not;) and at the time of his coronation, with his owne ſhouldees ſupported him vp, as he was (after the maner of that ſolemnitie) carried vnto the great church, and ſo backe againe; the Crocodiles teares ſtill plenteouſly running downe his aged face, as if it had beene for exceeding ioy: which many of the M meaner ſort beholding, and deeming therof the beſt, highly commended his kindneſſe, accounting the young emperour thrice happie, in ſo graue a gouernour, and faithfull counſellour; who in loue and kinde affection towards him, ſeemed not inferiour to his naturall father: ſo cunningly had he vnder the vaile of pietie, ſhadowed his moſt execrable treacherie, as that in the very plotting thereof, he was accounted moſt louing and kinde. But hidden treaſon, be it neuer

A ſo well diſſembled, muſt at length ſhew it ſelfe. So Andronicus hauing got into his power both the Emperor and the empire, and the chiefe friends of the late Emperor Emanuel being taken out of the way, or elſe driuen into exile, thought it now high time for himſelf to aſpire vnto that high ſoueraigntie, after which hee had ſo many yeeres longed. Wherefore calling together a Counſell of his flatterers and fauourites, whom hee had for ſuch purpoſe promoted vnto the higheſt places of ſtate (all or moſt part of the graue Counſellors and friends of the late Emperor Emanuel being now diſplaced, or otherwiſe taken out of the way) he as a man only carefull of the common good, declared vnto them the dangerous ſtate of the empire, by reaſon of a rebellion raiſed in BYTHINIA at NICE, by Iſaack Angelus, and Theodorus Catacuzenus; and
B another at PRVSA, by Theodorus Angelus; requiring their graue aduice for the ſuppreſſing thereof: who not ignorant of their Lords purpoſe, (as thereof before ſufficiently inſtructed) anſwered with one conſent, That of ſuch great miſchiefes there would be no end, except hee were ioyned in fellowſhip of the empire together with Alexius, by his grauitie and deepe wiſdome to ſupplie what wanted for the good gouernment of the ſtate in the young Emperour his couſin. At which ſpeech, the by-ſtanders (being in number many, and for the moſt part the followers of Andronicus his flatterers) gaue a great ſhout, and as if it had beene already granted, with one applauſe cried out, Long liue Alexius and Andronicus the Greeke Emperours; and that with ſuch a vehemencie, as if they would therewith haue rent the very heauens. The bruit thereof flying abroad into the citie, forthwith you might haue ſeene euery ſtreet and corner of the ci-
C tie full of the vulgar people, with ſome alſo of better ſort, ſwarming together like Bees, & ſounding the praiſes of Andronicus (who now was come out of his houſe into the court, with a world of people following him) and crying out, Long liue the Emperours Alexius and Andronicus: with which loud acclamation, mixt with the heauie ſighings of many good men, (for all were not mad of that frenzie) the young Emperour awaked, and ſeeing the court full of people, and Andronicus by them ſaluted his fellow in the empire: knowing now no other remedie, thought it beſt to yeeld vnto the time, & ſo with the reſt flattering the old tyrant, welcommed him full ſore againſt his will, by the name of his fellow & companion in the empire: which he now in diſſembling manner ſeeming vnwilling to take vpon him, & refuſing the place offered, was by the rout of his flattering fauourites enforced to his owne great contentment, to yeeld to their requeſt:
D ſome of them with both their hands carrying him vp, vntill they had as it were againſt his will placed him in the imperial ſeat, prepared for him faſt by the yong Emperor: others in the mean time no leſſe buſied in pulling off his priuate attire, and putting vpon him the imperiall roabes.

The ſlie practiſes of Andronicus in aſpiring to the empire.

The next day, when this participation of the empire ſhould be publiſhed, and they both proclaimed Emperors, the name of Andronicus was ſet before the name of Alexius: whereof his fauorits (though ſome others interpreted it otherwiſe) gaue this reaſon, That it fitted not with the maieſtie of the empire, that the name of a boy ſhould be ſet before the name of ſo reuerend, graue, wiſe, and excellent a man as was Andronicus his companion in the empire. Shortly after, Andronicus being broght into the great temple to be crowned, then firſt began to ſhew vnto the people a cheerefull countenance, & ſetting aſide his ſterne looke, after his long deuotion done, E filled the vain peoples heads with many large promiſes of a more happy forme of gouernment than before. All which proued nothing but meere diſſimulation and deepe deceit, that cheerefulneſſe of countenance & ſpeech ſeruing but for a while to couer his inward, ſecret, and moſt inhumane crueltie. And the more to deceiue the world, the ceremonies of his coronatiõ paſt, at ſuch time as he ſhould for the conſummation & confirmation of al, receiue the ſacred & dreadfull myſterie, the pledge of our redemption, not without due reuerence to be named, much leſſe with impure hands touched: after he had receiued the bread, and taken the cup in his hand, he with a moſt deuout countenance, framed of purpoſe to deceiue, & his eyes caſt vp to heauen, as if his ſoule had there already been (the faireſt maske of hypocriſie) ſwore by thoſe dreadfull myſteries, & moſt deeply proteſted in the hearing of the people ſtanding by, that he had taken vp-F on him the fellowſhip of the empire, for no other end or purpoſe but to aſſiſt Alexius his couſin in the gouernment, & to ſtrengthen his power: whereas his ſecret meaning was nothing leſſe, as ſhortly after appeared. For after a few dayes ſpent in faigned deuotions for the proſperous beginning of his empire, hee forthwith turned his minde vnto other his more ſecret, but moſt wicked and execrable deſignes. And hauing aboue all things purpoſed the death of the young Emperour, hee called together them of the Counſell, his owne creatures and corrupt miniſters of his wickedneſſe, who had now oftentimes in their mouthes that ſaying of the Poet: G and that the old age of an Eagle was better than the youth of a Larke. So by the generall conſent of that wicked aſſemblie, vnworthy the name of a graue counſell, a decree was made, That H Alexius deprived of the empire. Alexius ſhould (as a man vnfit for the gouernment of the ſtate) be depriued of all imperiall dignitie, and commanded to liue a priuate life. Which diſloyall decree of the conſpirators was yet ſcarcely publiſhed, but that another more cruell came out of the ſame forge, That he ſhould Alexius condemned. forthwith be put to death, as one vnworthy longer to liue. For the execution of which ſo horrible a ſentence, Stephanus Hagiochriſtophorites (one of the chiefe miniſters of Andronicus his villanies, and by him promoted euen vnto the higheſt degrees of the honours of the court) with Conſtantinus Trypſicus, and one Theodorus Badibrenus, captaine of the tormentors, were ſent out; Alexius the Emperour cruelly ſtrangled. who entring his chamber by night, without compaſſion of his tender age, or regard of his honour or innocencie, cruelly ſtrangled him with a bow-ſtring: which deteſtable murther ſo performed, Andronicus ſhortly after comming in, ſpurned the dead body with his foot, railing at I his father, the late Emperour Emanuell, as a forſworne and iniurious man; and at his mother, as a common whore. The head was forthwith ſtrucke off from this miſerable carkaſſe (the mirrour of honours vnſtabilitie) and left for the monſtrous tyrant to feed his eyes vpon: the body wrapped vp in lead, was in a boat carried to ſea by Io. Camaterius and Theodoſius Chumenus, two of Andronicus his noble fauourites; who with great ioy and glee returned with the ſame boat to the court, as if they had done ſome notable exploit. But long continueth not the ioy of the miſchieuous, vengeance ſtill following them at the heeles, as it did theſe two; who not long after, with the reſt that conſpired the innocent Emperors death, all or moſt part of them, came to ſhamefull or miſerable ends. Thus periſhed Alexius the Emperor, not yet full fifteene yeeres old, in the third yeere of his raigne: which time he liued more like a ſeruant than an Emperour, K firſt vnder the cõmand of his mother, & afterwards of the tyrant, which brought him to his end.

An vnequall marriage. Who ioyeth now but old Andronicus, made young again, as ſhould ſeeme, by his new gained honors? For immediatly after the murther cõmitted, he maried Anne the French Kings daughter (as ſome report) before betrothed to yong Alexius, a tender & moſt beautifull Lady, not yet full eleuen yeeres old, an vnfit match for threeſcore and ten. And in ſome ſort as it were to purge himſelfe & his partakers of the ſhamefull murther by them committed, and to ſtop the mouths of the people, he by much flattery & large promiſes procured of the Biſhops a generall abſolution for them all, from the oath of obedience which they had before giuen vnto the Emperour Emanuell & Alexius his ſonne: which obtained, he for a while had the ſame Biſhops in great honour, and ſhortly after in greater contempt, as men forgetfull of their duties and calling. For colour whereof, he pretended himſelfe to be ſorry for them, deepely proteſting, that they died by the ſeueritie of the law, not by his will, M and by the iuſt doome of the Iudges, whereunto he was himſelfe (as he ſaid) to giue place; and that with teares plentifully running downe his aged cheekes, as if hee had beene the moſt ſorrowfull man aliue. O deepe diſſimulation, and Crocodiles teares, by nature ordained to expreſſe the heauineſſe of the heart, flowing from the eies as ſhowers of raine out of the clouds: in good men the moſt certaine ſignes of greateſt griefe, and ſureſt teſtimonies of inward torment:

A but in Andronicus you are not ſo, you are far of another nature, you proceed of ioy, you promiſe not vnto the diſtreſſed pitie or compaſſion, but death & deſtruction! how many mens eies haue you put out? how many haue you drowned? how many haue you deuoured? Moſt of the nobilitie that fauoured the late Emperour Emanuel & Alexius his ſon, thus taken out of the way by Andronicus, ſtrook ſuch a feare into the reſt, that for ſafegard of their liues they betook themſelues to flight, ſome one way ſome another, neuer thinking themſelues in ſafetie ſo long as they were within the greedie tyrants reach; whereof ſhortly after enſued no ſmall troubles, to the ſhaking of the ſtate of the whole empire. Iſaack Comnenus, the Emperor Emanuels nigh kinſman, tooke his refuge into CYPRVS, and kept that Iſland to himſelfe. Alexius Comnenus, Emanuels brothers
B ſon, fled into SICILIA, & there ſtirred vp William King of that Iſland, againſt Andronicus: who with a great armie landing at DYRRACHIVM, tooke the citie, & ſo frō thence without reſiſtance paſſing thorow the heart of MACEDONIA, ſpoiling the countrey before him as he went, met his fleet at THESALONICA; which famous citie he alſo tooke by force, & moſt miſerably ſpoiled it with all the countrey thereabout, in ſuch ſort, as that he brought a great feare euen vpon the imperiall citie it ſelfe: vnto which ſo great euils Andronicus (entangled with domeſticall troubles, & not knowing whō to truſt) was not able to giue remedie, although for ſhew he had (to no purpoſe) ſent out certain of his moſt truſtie miniſters with ſuch forces as he could ſpare. For the maieſtie of his authoritie growing ſtill leſſe & leſſe, & the number of his enemies both at home and abroad daily increaſing, & the fauor of the vnconſtant people (who now began to ſpeak hardly C of him) declining: he vncertaine which way to turn himſelfe, reſted wholly vpon tyrannie, proſcribing in his feare, not only the friends of ſuch as were fled, & whō he diſtruſted, but ſomtimes whole families together, yea & that for light occaſions, ſometime thoſe who were the beſt of his fauorites, whoſe ſeruice he had many times vſed in the execution of his crueltie. So that now no day paſſed, wherin he did not put to death, impriſon, or torture one great man or other. Whereby it came to paſſe, that the imperiall citie was filled with ſorrow & heauines, euery man hanging the head, and with ſilence couering his inward griefe, not without danger to haue been theu vttered. Amongſt many others appointed to this ſlaughter, was one Iſaack Angelus, a man of great nobilitie, whom Hagiochriſtophorites (the chiefe miniſter of Andronicus his tyrannie, and for the ſame by him highly promoted) ſuſpecting, as one that bare no good will to the Emperour, D (cauſe enough of death) came to his houſe to apprehend him; & finding him at home, after ſome few hot words, commanded him to follow him. Whereat the noble man making ſome ſtay, & abhorring the very ſight of the wretch, as vnto him ominous & fatall: Hagiochriſtophorites himſelfe began to lay hands on him, reuiling his followers, that they had not forthwith drawne him out of his houſe by the haire of his head, vnto the priſon by him appointed. For they touched with the honour of the man, and moued with compaſſion, forced him not, but ſtood ſtill as beholders. Iſaack ſeeing himſelfe thus beſet, & no way now left for him to eſcape, reſoluing rather there preſently to die, than ſhortly after to be murdred in priſon, drew his ſword as the reſt were about to haue laid hands vpon him, and at the firſt blow cleft the wicked head of Hagiochriſtophorites downe to his ſhoulders: & ſo leauing him wallowing in his owne bloud, and like a de-E ſperat man laying about him amongſt the reſt, made himſelfe way thorow the middeſt of them. And ſo embrued with bloud, with his bloudie ſword yet in his hand, running thorow the middeſt of the citie, told the people what he had done; and crying vnto them for helpe in defence of his innocencie, fled into the great Temple, there to take the refuge of the ſanctuarie: where he had not long ſit, in the place where the guiltie flying thither for refuge, vſed to ſit, and confeſſing their offence, craue pardon of ſuch as goe in & out; but that the Temple was filled with the multitude of people flocking thither out of all parts of the citie, ſome to ſee the nobleman, ſome to behold what ſhould become of him: for all men thought that he would before the going down of the Sun (notwithſtanding the reuerence of the place) be drawne thence by Andronicus, & put to ſome ſhameful death. Thither came alſo Iohn Ducas, Iſaacks vncle, & his ſon Iſaack to increaſe
F the tumult; not for that they were any thing guiltie of the death of Hagiochriſtophorites, but for that they had before become ſureties vnto the ſuſpicious tyrant for their kinſman Iſaack, and he likewiſe for them; by whoſe treſpas they well knew themſelues now brought into no leſſe danger than if they had been abettors thereunto. And beſide thē alſo, many other there were, which ſtanding in doubt of their own eſtate, & fearing the like might happen to themſelues, prickt forward with hard ſpeeches, the cōmon people flocking thither, inſtantly requeſting them to ſtay there,and to ſtand by them now at their need,being ſo jniuriouſly wronged,whoſe pittiful com- C plaints moued right many to take part with them. At which time alſo,no man yet comming frō the emperor(being as then out of the city)to repreſſe the ſedition,nor any of the nobilitie oppo-ſing themſelues, no friend of Andronicus appearing, none of his bloodie miniſters or officers ſhewing themſelues,nor any that did ſo much as ſpeake a good word in his behalfe,or in diſlike of the tumult,the boldneſſe of the ſeditious people increaſed, euery man in ſo great libertie, ſaying what hee liſt, and after their rude manner one encouraging another. So ſpent Iſaack that long night, not thinking (God wot) of an empire, but ſtill expecting the deadly ſtroake of Andronicus. Yet had he with great intreating,ſo preuailed, that diuers of the aſſembly ſhutting the church dores,and bringing lights into the church,ſtaied there with him all night, & by their H example cauſed ſome others to ſtay alſo. The next morning by break of the the day were al the citizens flockt againe vnto the temple,curſing the tyrant to the deuill, as the commō enemy of mankind,wiſhing vnto him a ſhamefull death, & the hononr of the empire vnto Iſaack. At that time by fortune,or rather God ſo appointing it, Andronicus was out of the citie at his pallace of MELVDINVM,on the eaſt ſide of PROPONTIS,where he was by nine a clocke at night certified of the death of Hagiochriſtophorites, and of the tumult of the people: yet that night ſtirred he not, either did any thing more, but by ſhort letters aduiſed the people to pacifie themſelues, and not by fooliſh rebellion to caſt themſelues into farther danger. In the morning, Andronicus his fauorits began to ſhew themſelues, and to do what they might to haue appeaſed the tumultuous multitude;yea and preſently after came Andronicus himſelfe, and landed with his imperi- I all gally at the great pallace in the citie. But with the inraged people,naught preuailed either the perſwaſions of the one,or report of the preſence of the other: for they al as vpon a ſignall giuen, and as men inſpired with one ſpirit,or ſtirred vp with the ſame furie, flocked together into the temple of S. SOPHIA,one encouraging another, & ſcoffing at ſuch as ſtood by as idle lookers on, without weapons in their hands,reuiling them, and calling them rotten lyms that had no feeling of the common harme. After that they broke open the priſons, & ſet at libertie the pri-ſoners,as fitteſt inſtruments for the increaſing of the tumult,who were not all notable offenders of the dregs of the people,but many of them borne of good houſes,and for ſome light fault, or inconſiderat word(wherof euery man was in thoſe times bound to giue an accoūt) or for ſome friends offence againſt Andronicus,there laid faſt: theſe of all others moſt animated the people, K in ſuch ſort,as that they which before for feare of the danger, did but ſoftly murmure vnto thēſelues againſt Andronicus, did now openly joyne themſelues with the reſt of the baſe ſeditious.

Then might you haue ſeene ſome with their ſwords and targuets,ſome alſo in their armour,but the greateſt part armed but with clubs and ſtaues and other ſuch like rude weapons, armes of furie,haſtely taken vp in their ſhops as by chance they came firſt to hand,running forth in euery place. By this aſſembly of the moſt furious and promiſcuous people,was Iſaack hoyſed vp, and with a generall applauſe ſaluted emperour. At which time one of the ſextons of the church,with a ladder,tooke downe Conſtantine the Great his crowne of gold (which for a monument hung ouer the holy altar) and ſet it vpon Iſaack his head: Which hee at the firſt ſeemed vnwilling to weare,not for that he was not deſirous ynough of the empire, but for that he feared the extream L danger of the matter,and thought thoſe things that were then done, to bee but as it were a ſicke mans dream, like ynough ſtrait way to vaniſh; beſide that,he feared in ſo doing,the more to exaſperat Andronicus:which his vncle Iohn Ducas (of whom wee haue before ſpoken,ſtanding by him) perceiuing, plucking of his owne cap, and ſhewing his old bald head, requeſted the people,that if his nephew did refuſe it, they would ſet it vpon his. Whereunto the people with a great outcrie anſwered,that they would no more yeeld their obedience vnto an old bald man, as hauing receiued many harmes from the hoarie haires of old Andronicus;& therefore for his ſake,hated euery old man,more fit for Charons boat & his coffin,than for the empire, and eſpe-cially if he had a forked beard or bald head, as had Andronicus and this Ducas. Thus was Iſaack by the tumultuous multitude inueſted in the empire. And ſo royally mounted vpon one of the M emperors horſes,richly furniſhed with a ſaddle & trappings of gold,which they had by chance gotten, was by them brought from the temple vnto the court; Baſilius Camaterus the Patriarch waiting vpon him,whom the headſtrong people had enforced againſt his will,to confirme with his authoritie what was by them done for the eſtabliſhing of Iſaack in the empire. Andronicus at his comming to the great pallace,perceiuing firſt by the confuſed crie of the tumultuous multitude,

titude, and afterward by that which he ſaw with his eyes, how the world went; calling vpon his old friends and flattering fauorits, thought firſt by their helpe to haue repreſſed the furie of the rebellious: who as friends of his better fortune, and not of himſelfe, were now for the moſt part ſhrunke from him; and thoſe which were left, ſo faintly comming on, as if in his quarrell they had had no mind to ſpend their liues: with which heartleſſe companie Andronicus fearing to oppoſe himſelfe againſt the furie of the multitude, with his bow and arrowes in his hand got him vp into the higheſt tower of the pallace (called CENTENARIA) and from thence beſtowed certaine ſhot amongſt the people. But ſeeing that to be to no purpoſe, and better perſwaded to doe more with them with faire words than ſuch vaine force, he from the top of the tower cryed alowd vnto them, That if they would hold themſelues contented, and depart, he would by their conſent reſigne the empire vnto his ſonne Manuell: whereat the people more enraged, ſpared not to poure forth moſt reprochfull words in contempt both of himſelfe and his ſonne. And ſo furiouſly brake into the court, by one of the gates called CAREA: Which Andronicus beholding, and now out of all hope, caſting from him all his habiliments of honour, and diſguiſing himſelfe, fled againe vnto his galley, accompanied onely with Anna his wife, and Maraptica his minion, and ſo returned to MELVDIVM, his place from whence he came. Iſaack but yeſterday in the bottome of diſpaire, and ſhadowed as it were with the hand of death, by the ſtrange change of fortune to day mounted vnto the higheſt type of worldly honor, entering the palace, was there againe, with the greateſt applauſe of the people that might bee, ſaluted emperour. From whence he forthwith ſent out certaine companies of his moſt aſſured friends and followers, to apprehend Andronicus: who now as a man at once forſaken both of his frinds and of his better fortune, ſecretly fled with his wife and his paragon, before remembred to CHELE, attended vpon onely with a few of his truſty ſeruants, which had of long time ſerued him, before he was emperour. There taking ſhip, with purpoſe to haue fled vnto the Tauroſcythes (as not thinking himſelfe ſafe in any prouince of the empire) hee was twice or thrice by foule weather put backe againe, the wrought ſea abhorring (as it ſeemed) to carry him that had ſo polluted it with their dead bodies of the innocent by him ſlaine; and ſtill threatning (as it were) to deuour him. Thus ſtrangely ſtayed by foule weather, or more truly to ſay, by the reuenging hand of the higheſt, he was found by ſuch as were ſent out to ſeeke after him, and being by them apprehended, was with two great yron chaines faſt locked about his prowd necke, and heauie gyues vpon his legges, caſt into the caſtle of AMENA: and in that miſerable habite ſhortly after preſented to the emperor Iſaack, yet buſied in appeaſing and reforming of the diſordered citie: where by the way as hee went, hee was by the people moſt ſhamefully reuiled, and injuriouſly vſed; ſome plucking him by the beard, ſome by the haire of his head, ſome other in the meane time playing with his noſe, and bobbing him in the face, with a thouſand other deſpights done vnto him; eſpecially by ſuch women, as whoſe husbands he had before murthered or depriued of their ſight. Afterward being committed to the hatefull furie of the people, hee had his right hand cut off, and was againe committed to the ſame caſtle, without meat, drinke, or other comfort: where after hee had layne a few daies, hauing one of his eyes put out, hee was ſet vpon a foule leane cammell, with his face toward the tayle thereof, and ſo (as it were in triumph) led through the market place, his bald head all bare, as if it had beene a dead mans ſcull taken out of a charnell houſe, in a ſhort old coat; ſo miſerable a ſpectacle, as might haue expreſſed a fountaine of teares out of the eyes of a right hard hearted man. But the bedlam and moſt inſolent citizens, eſpecially they of the baſer ſort, as cookes, coblers, curriours, and ſuch like, flocking about him like bees (without regard that he had but the other day worne vpon his head the imperiall crowne, then honoured by them as a god, and extolled vnto the heauens, that they had not long before ſollemnely ſworne vnto him obedience and loyaltie) ran now as men out of their wits, omitting no kind of villanie they could deuiſe to do vnto him: Some thruſt nayles into his head, ſome caſt durt in his face, ſome the dung both of men and beaſts, ſome prickt him in the ſides with ſpits, ſome caſt ſtones at him as at a mad dog, and otherſome opprobious and deſpightfull words, no leſſe grieuous vnto him than the reſt. Amonſt others, an impudent drab comming out of the kitchin, caſt a pot full of ſcalding water in his face. And in briefe, their outrage ſo exceeded, as if they had ſtriuen among themſelues who ſhould do him the greateſt villanie. Hauing thus ſhamefully, as in a ridiculous triumph, brought him into the theatre, they there betwixt two pillars hanged him vp by the heeles: where hauing ſuffered all theſe deſpightfull indignities, Andronicus forſaken of his flattering fauorits.

dignities, with many moe, not without offence to be named, he with an inuincible courage yet G ſtill held his patience, not giuing one euill word; but ſometimes ſaying, Lord haue mercy vpon mee; and otherwhiles, Why doe you breake a bruiſed reed? Yet the furious people nothing moued with the calamitie of ſo great a man, of all others now the moſt miſerable, ſtripped him of his bad clothes as he hung, and cut off his priuities. One among the reſt, to make an end of him, thruſt his ſword in at his throat vp to the twiſt as he hung: other two with their long ſwords proued their ſtrength, who could ſtrike fartheſt into his buttocks. Thus miſerably periſhed this famous Emperour, after he had raigned two yeeres. That which was left of his body (for many had carried away ſome pieces thereof) being taken downe from the place where he hung, was caſt into a baſe vault in the Theatre: where it for a ſpace lay, as the loathſome carkaſſe of ſome H wilde beaſt, and the miſerable ſpectacle of mans fragilitie: for Iſaack the Emperour would not ſuffer it to be buried. Howbeit, afterwards the furie of the people ouerpaſſed, it was by ſome more charitable men remoued thence, and laid in a low vault neere vnto the monaſterie of the Ephori: which as Nicetas Choniates (author of this hiſtorie, ſpeaking of the time wherin he liued) ſaith, is yet there vndiſſolued to be ſeene. He was a man moſt honourably deſcended; of ſtature tall, and well proportioned: in his countenance ſate a certaine reuerend maieſtie, adorned with ſuch notable vertues, as might haue made him worthily to haue beene compared vnto the greateſt Emperours of his ſtocke and familie, had he not obſcured the ſame with too much ambition and crueltie, whereof the one cauſed him to lead the greateſt part of his life in priſon or exile, the other brought vnto him ſuch a moſt ſhamefull end. I

Iſaack Angelus his ſucceſſour, by the fauour of the people, thus exalted vnto the empire, at the firſt gouerned the ſame with great lenitie and moderation, as if he had altogether abhorred from the effuſion of his ſubiects bloud. But afterwards not a little troubled both with forraine enemies, and domeſticall rebellion, beſieged in the imperiall citie by ſuch of the nobilitie as thought themſelues no leſſe worthy of the empire than himſelfe: for repreſſing of which inſolencies, and the aſſuring of his ſtate, he became ſo ſeuere in chaſtiſing the offendors, and ſuch others as he had in diſtruſt, that he was counted of moſt men not inferiour in crueltie to Andronicus his predeceſſor, few dayes paſſing without the condemnation or execution of one great man or other, beſides them of the meaner ſort, of whom he ſeemed to make no great reckoning: whereby he in few yeeres loſt the loue and fauour of his ſubiects, who before had him in great K honour, and became vnto them no leſſe odious than was before Andronicus. Vpon which generall diſlike of the people, his ingratefull younger brother Alexius (by him before for a great ſumme of money redeemed from the Turkes) tooke occaſion to riſe vp againſt him, and by the fauour of the ſouldiers depriued him together both of the empire and his ſight: and hauing put out his eyes, thruſt him into a monaſterie, there to liue as it were out of the world, as a man condemned to perpetuall darkneſſe, after he had raigned nine yeeres and eight moneths, being not yet full fortie yeeres old. Whether it were the reuenging hand of God, for the hard meaſure vſed to Andronicus, or not, I leaue it to the wiſer to conſider; who in his deepe prouidence, wherewith he beſt gouerneth all things, would haue a moderation vſed in puniſhment of our moſt capitall enemies, as hauing alwayes before our eyes the ſlipperie ſtate of power and au- L thoritie: and that as all worldly things are ſubiect to change, ſo by the iuſt iudgement of God it oftentimes falleth out, that what hurt wee doe vnto others, the ſame wee may receiue againe from others. In theſe ſo great and ſtrange mutations of the Conſtantinopolitane empire (which I haue ſomewhat more at large proſecuted, not ſo much for the noueltie of the matter, although it were right ſtrange, as for that out of the loſſes and ruine thereof, the greatneſſe of the Turkes for the moſt part grew) Clizaſthlan Sultan of ICONIVM, after the death of the Emperour Emanuel, found meanes to take from the empire diuers ſtrong townes and caſtles in the leſſer ASIA, together with a great part of the countrey of PHRYGIA: Alexius, Andronicus, and Iſaack, the ſucceeding Emperours, troubled with dangers neerer home, hauing nothing to oppoſe againſt him, but faire intreatie, and rich preſents; ſo redeeming for a while an vnſure peace, with M no leſſe charge, in ſhort time to be renewed againe. This great victorious Sultan (for ſo he may of right be called) holding in his ſubiection a great part of the leſſer ASIA, now a man of great yeeres, dying, left behinde him foure ſonnes, Maſut, Coppatine, Reucratine, and Caichoſroes, all men growne. Amongſt whom hee diuided his kingdome. Vnto Maſut hee bequeathed AMASIA, ANCYRA, DORYLEVM, with diuers other pleaſant cities of PONTVS: vnto

A vnto Coppatine he assigned MELYTENE, CESAREA, and the colonie now called TAXARA: vnto Reucratine he allotted AMINSVM, DOCEA, with some other cities vpon the sea coast: but vnto Caichosroes, he left ICONIVM his regall seat, and with it LYCAONIA, PAMPHILIA, and all the countries thereabouts as farre as COTTIANYVM. Of these foure, Coppatine long liued not after his father, for whose inheritance Reucratine Prince of DOCEA, and Masut Prince of ANCYRA (his two brethren) fell at variance, and so at last into open warre: But Masut finding himselfe too weake for his warlike brother Reucratine, yeelded vnto him the territories, which he saw he must needs forgoe; and glad now to keepe his owne, so made peace with him. Reucratine being a man of an ambitious and haughtie spirit, with his forces thus doubled, denounced warre vnto his brother Caichosroes; who doubting his owne strength, fled vnto the Emperour Alexius Angelus for aid, as had his father done before him vnto the Emperour Manuel, although not with like good fortune. For the Emperour but of late hauing obtained the empire by the deposing of his brother, and altogether giuen to pleasure, reputing also those domesticall warres of the Turkes, some part of his owne safetie; sent him home without comfort, as one strong enough of himselfe to defend his owne quarrell against his brother.

Howbeit, hee was scarcely come to ICONIVM, but that hee was by Reucratine expulsed thence, and driuen to flie into ARMENIA, where he was by Zebune King of that countrey, a Turke also, honourably receiued and courteously vsed, but yet denied of the aid he requested: the King pretending that he was already in league with Reucratine, and therefore could not; or

C as some thought, fearing the dangerousnesse of the matter, would not intermeddle therein. Wherewith the poore Sultan vtterly discouraged, returned againe to CONSTANTINOPLE, and there in poore estate, as a man forlorne, passed out the rest of his dayes.

Now hauing thus passed through the Turkish affaires in the lesser ASIA, together with the troubled estate of the Constantinopolitan empire, no small cause of the Turkes greatnesse; the course of time calleth vs backe againe before wee passe any further, to remember their proceedings also at the same time, and shortly after, in SYRIA, IVDEA, ÆGYPT, and those more Southerly countries, where these restlesse people ceased not by all meanes to enlarge their empire, vntill they had brought all those great kingdomes vnder their obeysance.

After the death of Baldwin King of IERVSALEM, of whom we haue before spoken, Almericus his younger brother, Earle of IOPPA and ASCALON, being then about seuen and twen-Almericus fixt King of Ierusalem.

D tie yeeres old, was by the better good liking of the clergie and people, than of the nobilitie, elected King: not for that there wanted in him any good parts worthy of a kingdome, but for that some of them enuied vnto him so great an honour. Neuertheless he was (as wee said) by the generall consent of the people elected, proclaimed, and by Almericus the Patriarch with all solemnitie crowned, the 17. day of Februarie, in the yeere of Grace 1163. To begin whose troubled raigne, the Ægyptians first of all denied to pay vnto him their wonted tribute: In reuenge whereof, he in person himselfe with a puissant armie entred into ÆGYPT; and meeting with Dargan the Sultan, ouerthrew him in plaine battell, and put him to flight: who to stay the further pursuit and passage of the Christians, cut the bankes of the riuer NILVS; and so drowned

E the countrey, that the King was glad to content himselfe with the victorie he had already gotten, and so to returne to IERVSALEM.

The next yeere Almericus was againe drawne downe with his power into ÆGYPT, by Dargan the Sultan, to aid him against Saracon; whom Noradin the Turke, King of DAMASCO, had sent as generall with an armie, to restore Sanar the Sultan before expulsed, & to depose Dargan. In which expedition Dargan being slaine, and Saracon hauing won certaine townes, kept them to himselfe: Sanar doubtfull of his good meaning, ioyned his forces with Almericus, and by his helpe expulsed Saracon out of ÆGYPT. But whilest Almericus was thus busied in ÆGYPT, Noradin the Turke making an inroad into the frontiers of the Christians neere vnto TRIPOLIS, was by Gilbert Lacy, master of the Templars in those quarters, and the other Christians, Noradin the Turke discomfited by the Christians.

F when he least feared, so suddenly set vpon, that he had much ado by flight to saue himselfe, halfe naked for haste, most of his followers being at the same time slain. In reuenge of which disgrace, he not long after with a greater power came and besieged ARETHVSA: for reliefe whereof, Bohemund Prince of ANTIOCH, Raymund the yonger, Earle of TRIPOLIS, Calaman gouernour of CILICIA, and Toros Prince of ARMENIA, came with their power. Of whose comming the Turke hearing, raised his siege and departed. After whom these Christian Princes eagerly gerly following, were by the Turkes ſhut vp in certaine deepe and rotten fennes (whereinto they had vnaduiſedly too farre entred) and there with a great ſlaughter ouerthrowne. In which conflict, all the chiefe commanders of the armie were taken, except the Prince of ARMENIA, who fore-caſting the danger, had retired, after he had in vaine diſſwaded the reſt from the further purſuit of the flying enemie. The Prince of ANTIOCH there taken, was about a yeere after for a great ſumme of money redeemed, but the Countie of TRIPOLIS was after eight yeeres ſtrait captiuitie hardly deliuered. Noradin after this victorie returning againe to the ſiege of ARETHVSA, in few dayes won the towne: and encouraged with ſo good ſucceſſe, and the abſence of the King, laid ſiege to the citie of PANEADE, which was alſo deliuered vnto him, vpon condition that the citizens might at their pleaſure in ſafetie depart. G H

At the ſame time Saracon generall of Noradin his forces, tooke from the Chriſtians two caſtels; the one in the countrey of SIDON, the other beyond IORDAN vpon the borders of ARABIA, both in the cuſtodie of the Templars: twelue of whom the King at his returne hanged vp for treaſon.

Shortly after Saracon, King Noradin his great man of warre, with all the power of the Turks, came downe againe into ÆGYPT, with purpoſe to haue fully ſubdued all that notable kingdome vnto his Lord and maſter. Of whoſe power, Sanar the Sultan ſtanding in dread, praied aid of Almericus, promiſing vnto him beſide his yeerely tribute, the ſumme of forty thouſand ducats for his paines. The matter fully agreed vpon, and all things now in readineſſe, Almericus ſet forward with his armie, and encountring with Saracon and his Turkes at the riuer NILVS, I ouerthrew him in a great battell: yet not without ſome loſſe, for the Turkes in their flight lighting vpon the Kings carriages with the whole baggage of the armie, and ouerrunning them that had the charge thereof, carried away with them a moſt rich prey: whereby it came to paſſe, that as the Chriſtians had the victorie, ſo the Turkes enioyed the ſpoile.

Saracon after this ouerthrow hauing againe gathered together his diſperſed ſouldiers, tooke his way to ALEXANDRIA, where he was by the citizens receiued: after whom the King following, gaue no attempt vnto the citie, for that he knew to be but vaine, but encamped cloſe by the ſide of the riuer NILVS, from whence the citie was chiefly to be victualled. Whoſe purpoſe Saracon perceiuing, and betime foreſeeing the diſtreſſe of his whole armie for want of victuals, if he ſhould there long ſtay: leauing there his ſonne Saladin (or as ſome call him his nephew) with a thouſand horſemen for the keeping of the citie, ſecretly by night departed thence himſelfe with the reſt of his armie: and paſſing through the deſerts, did great harme in the vpper parts of ÆGYPT. Of whoſe departure Almericus vnderſtanding, was about to haue followed him, but that he was otherwiſe perſwaded by the Ægyptian captaines to continue his former purpoſe for the gaining of the citie. Wherefore now after the departure of Saracon, he began to approach the wals, and with diuers engines of warre to diſturbe the defendants: wherewith the citizens (better acquainted with the trade of marchandize, than the feats of warre) diſcouraged, began now to conſult among themſelues for the turning out of thoſe troubleſome gueſts whom they had ſo lately receiued: which Saladin perceiuing, certified Saracon his vncle thereof, requeſting his ſpeedie reliefe in that his ſo dangerous eſtate, and with much intreatie perſwaded the citizens for a while to hold it out, vntill he might from him receiue anſwer: of all which the Chriſtians and Ægyptians without, hauing intelligence, laid ſo much the harder vnto the citie. Gladly would Saracon haue done what he was by his nephew requeſted: but perceiuing it to be a matter of no leſſe danger than difficultie, he by the meanes of Hugh, Countie of CESAREA, and one Arnolphus another noble Chriſtian, both then priſoners with him, concluded a peace with the King: whereupon the citie was forthwith yeelded vp, and Saladin with his Turkes ſuffered in ſafetie to depart. At which time alſo all priſoners were on both ſides freely and without ranſome ſet at libertie. Thus Saracon for this time diſappointed of his purpoſe for the conqueſt of ÆGYPT, returned backe againe to DAMASCO: and Almericus with great glory to ASCALON, where he arriued with his armie the 21 of September in the yeere 1167. 1167

In this late expedition, K. Almericus on the one ſide enflamed with the wealth of ÆGYPT, and on the other, encouraged with the weakneſſe of that effeminate people: reſting for the moſt part vpon forraine ſtrength, had purpoſed himſelfe to inuade the kingdome, & ſo if poſſibly he might, to ioyne it to his owne. For colour whereof, it was pretended that the Sultan contrary to his faith before giuen, had ſecretly ſought to ioyne in league & amitie with Noradin the Turke,

King

A King of DAMASCO. The chiefe ſtirrer vp of the King vnto this warre, was one Gerbert maſter of the Templars; who in reſpect of the aid by them of his order to be giuen, had obtained of the King, after the victorie gained, to haue the citie of PELVSIVM with all the rich countrey about the ſame, giuen vnto him and his brethren the Knights of the order for euer: vpon which hope, he contrary to the minde of many of the Knights, for the furtherance of that warre, gaged his whole wealth and credit, with all the treaſure of his houſe. So all things now in readineſſe, for ſo great an enterpriſe, Almericus with his armie ſet forward in October, and hauing in ten dayes paſſed the ſandie deſert, came to PELVSIVM; which citie he (after three dayes ſiege) tooke by force, and put to ſword all them that were therein, without reſpect of age, ſex, or condition: Peluſium taken by Almericus.

B which citie he according to his promiſe before made, gaue vnto the Templars. After that, he began alſo to beſiege CAIRE, at which time his fleet ſacked the citie of TAPIVM. In the meane time, Sanar the Ægyptian Sultan, conſidering the danger he was in, to ſatisfie Almericus his greedie deſire, offred to pay him twentie hundred thouſand duckats to withdraw his forces: and forthwith ſent him one hundred thouſand, for the ranſome of his ſonne and his nephew taken priſoners at PELVSIVM: and for the reſt to be paid within few dayes after, he gaue two of his nephewes hoſtages. Neuertheleſſe the paiment he deferred from day to day, of purpoſe in the meane time to raiſe the whole power of ÆGYPT, as alſo to receiue aid from the Turks by Saracon, which he daily expected: of whoſe ſpeedie comming Almericus vnderſtanding, left part of his armie at PELVSIVM, and with the reſt went to haue met him: but miſſing him by

C the way, Saracon with his Turks came in ſafetie to CAIRE vnto the Sultan, as he had deſired. Wherefore Almericus diſmaid with the multitude of two ſo great armies now ioined together, retired backe againe to PELVSIVM, and there taking with him the garriſon before left, returned home to HIERVSALEM: hauing in that expedition (begun with the breach of faith) laid the foundation of the ruine of his kingdome, as in few yeeres after, it by proofe appeared, by the euill neighbourhood of the Turks, by that meanes brought downe into ÆGYPT.

Saracon the Turke after the departure of Almericus, eaſily perceiuing a moſt fit time and opportunitie to be offred for him now to obtaine that, which he had in vaine before both ſought and fought for; encamped with his armie neere vnto CAIRE, and notably counterfeited himſelfe of all others the moſt deuoted friend of the Sultans: ſo that betwixt them two paſſed all The Sultan of Aegypt vnder the colour of friendſhip ſlain by Saracon.

D the kinde tokens of loue and friendſhip, that could poſſibly be deuiſed; the Sultan oftentimes feaſting the Turke, and in kindneſſe likewiſe being feaſted of him: but at length going as his manner was, vnto the campe to viſit him, hee was by the Turkes ſlaine. So Saracon hauing brought to paſſe what hee deſired, and entring the citie with his armie, was by the great Caliph (from whom the Ægyptian Sultans, as from their ſuperiours, the true ſucceſſours of their great Prophet Mahomet, tooke their authoritie) appointed Sultan, the firſt of the Turks that euer enioyed the ſame: which royall dignitie he had not poſſeſſed fully a yeere, but that he was taken away by death. In whoſe ſtead Saladine his brothers ſonne, by and by ſtept vp: who altogether a martiall man, not regarding the reuerend maieſtie of the Caliph (as had his vncle Saracon, and all the Ægyptian Sultans before him) with his horſemans maſe ſtrucke out his braines;

E and not ſo contented, vtterly rooted out all his poſteritie, the better to aſſure himſelfe and his ſucceſſours the Turks in the poſſeſſion of his new gotten kingdome: and after that diuided the great treaſures of the Ægyptians among his Turks, to encourage them the more to follow him in his warres againſt the Chriſtians.

This glorious kingdome ſo much ſpoken of in holy Scripture, & renowned of the learned hiſtoriographers of al ages, after the ruine of the Roman empire, was ſomtime part of the Conſtantinopolitane empire, and a notable member of the Chriſtian common weale; vntill that about the yeere of our Lord 704, the Ægyptians wearie of the pride & couetouſnes of the Grecians, reuolted from them vnto the Saraſins, whoſe ſuperſtition they alſo receiued: & ſo vnder the gouernment of the Saraſin Caliphs, the ſucceſſors of the falſe prophet Mahomet liued about 464 How the kingdome of Aegypt firſt fell into the hands of the Saraſins, with the notable alterations thereof.

F yeeres, vntill that now being inuaded by Almericus, they praid aid of Noradin the Turke, Sultan of DAMASCO: who vnto their reliefe ſending Saracon with an armie, repulſed indeed the Chriſtians, but oppreſſing their libertie, tooke vnto himſelfe the kingdome, which he left vnto his nephew Saladine, in whoſe poſteritie it remained vntill it was from them againe taken by the Circaſſian ſlaues the Mamalukes: vnder whoſe ſeruile gouernment it was holden of long time, vntill that by the great Emperor of the Turks Selymus the firſt, it was againe conquered, and the

Mamalukes vtterly deſtroied: In the gouernment of whoſe poſteritie, the mightie Emperours of the Turks, it hath euer ſince remained as part of their empire, vntill this day, as in the proceſſe of this hiſtorie God willing ſhall appeare. G

1170 Saladin thus poſſeſſed of the great kingdome of ÆGYPT, and all things ſet in ſuch order as he thought beſt for the newneſſe of his ſtate, with a great armie entred into the land of PALESTINE, in the yeere 1170, and there beſieged DARON; which towne he won, and ouerthrew ſuch as were ſent by King Almericus to haue releeued the ſame: with which ſmall victorie contenting himſelfe, as with the good beginning of his riſing fortune, hee returned backe againe into his kingdome. Yet was his armie ſo great and populous, as that the like armie of the Turks had neuer before beene ſeene in the Holy Land. Wherefore Almericus conſidering in what great danger he ſtood, his kingdome now being on both ſides beſet by the Turks, ſent out his embaſſadours vnto the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt, to craue their aid for the defence of that kingdome which their fathers had won. And for the ſame purpoſe went himſelfe in perſon vnto the Emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE, of whom he was royally entertained, and afterwards ſent backe loaded with the promiſes of great matters, as were alſo his embaſſadours from the Princes of the Weſt. All which for all that ſorted vnto nothing, but vaniſhed into ſmoake. H

1171 The yeere following, viz. 1171, Saladin beſieged PETRRA, the metropoliticall citie of ARABIA: but hearing that Almericus with a great power was comming to the reliefe thereof, he raiſed his ſiege and retired. As he did alſo the next yeere after, hauing in vaine attempted the ſtrong caſtle of MONT-ROYALL, on the further ſide of IORDAN. In like manner alſo the third yeere he came againe into the Holy Land, and ſpoiled the countrey beyond IORDAN: but hearing of the Kings comming againſt him, he forthwith returned againe into ÆGYPT. All theſe light expeditions, this politike Prince made not ſo much for hope of victorie, or to proue his enemies ſtrength, as to traine his ſouldiers, eſpecially the effeminate Ægyptians, and to make them fitter to ſerue him in his greater deſignes. I

1173 Shortly after died Noradin Sultan of DAMASCO, and in his time a moſt notable champion of the Turks, after he had raigned nine and twentie yeeres. Vpon whoſe death Almericus forthwith beſieged the citie of PANEADE, in hope to haue againe recouered the ſame: but he was by the widow of the late dead Sultan, for a great ſumme of money and the deliuerie of certaine noble priſoners, intreated to raiſe his ſiege and depart. So hauing ſent away his armie, and trauelling with his ordinarie retinue to TIBERIAS, where hee had the Summer before beene ſicke of the flix, feeling himſelfe not well, he returned on horſebacke by NAZARETH and NEAPOLIS to HIERVSALEM, where his old diſeaſe increaſing vpon him, he was alſo taken with a feuer: wherewith after he had beene ſome few dayes grieuouſly tormented, hee requeſted his Phyſitians with ſome gentle potion to looſe his bellie, which was now ſomewhat ſtaied: which they refuſing to doe, he commanded the potion to be giuen him vpon his owne perill, hap thereon what hap ſhould: which being giuen him, and his bellie againe looſed, he ſeemed therewith to haue beene at the firſt well eaſed, but his wonted feuer with great vehemencie returning, before his weake and ſpent bodie could be with conuenient meats refreſhed, he ſuddenly died the tenth of Iuly, in the yeere 1173, when he had raigned about ten yeeres. His dead bodie was with the great lamentation of all his ſubiects, ſolemnly buried by his brothers. He was a moſt wiſe Prince, and withall right valiant, amongſt many moſt fit for the gouernment and defence of that troubleſome kingdome, ſo hardly beſet with the Infidels, if it had pleaſed God to haue giuen him longer life. K L

Baldwin the fourth of that name, ſeuenth King of Hieruſalem.

Foure dayes after the death of Almericus, was Baldwin his ſonne, then a youth about thirteene yeeres old, by the generall conſent of the nobilitie choſen King, and by Almericus the Patriarch in the Temple with great ſolemnitie crowned in the yeere 1173: vnto whom, as not yet by reaſon of his tender age, fit himſelfe to mannage the waightie affaires of the kingdome, Raymund Countie of TRIPOLIS, was by the whole conſent of the nobilitie appointed Tutor, to ſupplie what was wanting in the young King. M

Noradin, Sultan of DAMASCO (dead as is aforeſaid) left behinde him Melechſala his ſonne, yet but a youth, to ſucceed him in his kingdome. Whoſe gouernment the nobilitie diſdaining, ſent ſecretly for Saladin Sultan of ÆGYPT, vnto whom at his comming they betraied the citie of DAMASCO, the regall ſeat of the Turks in SYRIA. Whereof Saladin poſſeſſed, and entring into CELESIRIA without reſiſtance, tooke HELIOPOLIS, EMISSA, with the great citie of

A CESAREA; and in fine, all the whole kingdome of DAMASCO, the citie of ARETHVSA onely excepted. But thus to ſuffer Melechſala the young Prince to be wronged, and the kingdome of DAMASCO to be ioyned vnto the kingdome of ÆGYPT, was of the wiſer ſort thought not to ſtand with the ſafetie of the kingdome of HIERVSALEM, lying in the middle betwixt them both. Wherefore the Countie of TRIPOLIS, gouernor of that kingdome, made out certaine forces to haue hindred his proceedings. At which time alſo, Cotobed Prince of PARTHIA and Melechſalas vncle, ſent certaine troupes of Parthian horſemen to haue aided his diſtreſſed nephew, who were by Saladin ouerthrowne and almoſt all ſlaine, neere vnto ALEPPO where Melechſala lay. As for the Countie of TRIPOLIS and the other Chriſtian Princes, with
B whom Saladin in the newneſſe of his kingdome had no deſire to fall out; he appeaſed them with faire intreatie, and rewards: vnto the Countie he ſent freely the hoſtages, which yet lay for his ranſome at EMISSA: vnto the other Princes he ſent rich preſents; and therewith ſo contented them all, that they returned without any thing doing againſt him. After which time, three or foure yeeres paſſed in great quietneſſe, to the great ſtrengthning of him in thoſe new gotten kingdomes. At length vpon the comming ouer of Philip Earle of FLANDERS, the Chriſtian Princes in SYRIA encouraged, conſulted of an expedition to be made into ÆGYPT, whereof Saladin hauing intelligence, drew downe into that country the greateſt part of his ſtrength. But Philip diſliking of that expedition, and the rather for that he ſaw no great cheerefulneſſe in the Countie of TRIPOLIS and the reſt, thereunto; they with one conſent changed their purpoſe
C for ÆGYPT, and turning their forces a quite contrary way, miſerably and without reſiſtance waſted the countrey about EMISSA and CESAREA.

Saladin ouerthrown by king Baldwin.

Whileſt the Chriſtians were thus buſied in CÆLISIRIA, Saladin on the other ſide tooke occaſion out of ÆGYPT to inuade the kingdome of HIERVSALEM: of whoſe comming King Baldwin hauing intelligence, with ſuch ſmall forces as he had left, haſtened himſelfe to ASCALON. In the meane time Saladin with a great armie was entred into the Holy Land, where burning the country before him, and raging in the bloud of the poore Chriſtians, hee came and encamped not farre from ASCALON: and ſtrucke ſuch a feare vpon the whole country, that they which dwelt in HIERVSALEM, were about to haue forſaken the citie: As for the King himſelfe, he lay cloſe within the citie of ASCALON, not daring to aduenture vp-D on ſo ſtrong an enemie. Wherewith Saladin encouraged, and out of feare of his enemies, diſperſed his armie, ſome one way, ſome another, to forrage the country. Which the King perceiuing, ſecretly with all his power iſſued out of the citie, if happily ſo he might ouertake the Sultan vnawares. Neither was he deceiued in his expectation: for comming ſuddenly vpon him, and ſecretly charging him, he had with him for a good ſpace an hard and doubtfull battell, vntill that the victorie by the power of God, at length inclining to the Chriſtians, Saladin with his Turkes fled, ouerthrowne with a great ſlaughter, moſt part of his great armie being either there ſlaine, or loſt afterward with hunger and cold. This victorie fell vnto the Chriſtians the 25. day of Nouember, in the yeere 1177, not without the mightie hand of God, the Turke hauing in his armie 1177 aboue 26. thouſand horſemen, and the King not paſt foure hundred horſe, with ſome few foot-E men. After which victorie, Baldwin in great triumph returned to HIERVSALEM, and there ſhortly after with great care and diligence repaired the decaied wals of the citie.

The chriſtians diuiding the ſpoile, ouerthrowne by the Turkes.

Saladin in reuenge of this ouerthrow, made diuers incurſions into the frontiers of the Chriſtians, and did great harme, eſpecially in the countrey about SIDON. For the repreſſing whereof, the King put himſelfe in armes, and going againſt him, ouerthrew part of his armie, as they were carrying away a great bootie. Of which ouerthrow Saladin vnderſtanding, came in ſuch haſte with the reſt of his armie, as if it had been a ſudden tempeſt, vpon the Chriſtians, then in great ſecuritie diuiding the ſpoile; of whom they ſlew a great number, and put the reſt to flight: In which ſo ſudden a confuſion, Otto, grand maſter of the Templars, and Hugh the Earle of TRIPOLIS his ſon in law, were both taken priſoners. The Earle himſelfe with a few fled to TYRE: the F King alſo at the ſame time was glad to ſhift for himſelfe, & by flight to ſaue himſelfe as he might. After which victorie, Saladin beſieged a ſtrong caſtle which the King but the yeere before had built vpon the banke of the riuer of IORDAN, and giuen it to the Templars, with the countrey round about; which caſtle Saladin tooke by force, and put to ſword all that were therein, except ſome few whom he carried away priſoners. By this victorie Saladin became dreadfull vnto the Chriſtians in SYRIA, which cauſed them, eſpecially ſuch as had any charge, with more vigilancie cie to looke about them. Yet ſhortly after, a peace was for a time concluded betwixt the Sultan and the King; whereby their troubled eſtates breathed themſelues almoſt the ſpace of two yeeres. G

But this ſo welcome a calme was by domeſticall troubles againe by the Kings friends ſuddenly troubled. For the Countie of TRIPOLIS, to whom the gouernment of the kingdome was committed, comming towards HIERVSALEM, being by the ſuggeſtion of his enemies brought into ſuſpition with the King, as if he had affected the kingdome, was to his great diſgrace by the way commanded to ſtay. The chiefe authors of which diſcontentment, were the Kings mother, a woman of a turbulent nature, and her brother the Kings ſteward; who in the abſence of the Earle, had wrought the Kings ſicke minde according to their owne appetites. H But the reſt of the nobilitie wiſely foreſeeing vnto what great danger that diſcord might tend; in deſpight of them, with much labour, cauſed him to be ſent for againe, and ſo reconciled vnto the King: by which means, that dangerous fire of diſſention was for that time appeaſed, which afterwards brake out againe, to the vtter ruine of that kingdome.

Saladin goeth out of Aegypt to Damaſco.

Saladin now wearie of the league he had before made with King Baldwin, as no longer ſtanding with his haughtie deſignes, renounced the ſame, and raiſing a great power in ÆGYPT, ſet forward toward DAMASCO. Of whoſe comming King Baldwin hauing knowledge, with the whole power of his kingdome went to haue met him, not farre from the dead Sea, and there encamped at an old towne called PETRA. But Saladin turning out of the way, into the Kings territorie, came and encamped before MOVNT-ROIALL, a caſtle which Baldwin had giuen I vnto the Templars, about three dayes march from the place where the King lay.

Galiley ſpoiled, and the caſtle of Burie taken by the Turkes.

There Saladin with the ſpoile of the country refreſhing his armie, now weary of long trauell, ſet forward again, and ſo without reſiſtance arriued with his armie at DAMASCO. At the ſame time the Turks captaines about DAMASCO, BOSTRVM, and EMISSA, perceiuing the frontiers of the Chriſtians thereabout, to be kept but with ſmall ſtrength, paſſed ouer IORDAN, and ſpoiling a great part of GALILEY, beſieged the caſtle of BVRIE, at the foot of mount TABOR, not farre from the citie of NAIM; which caſtle they in few dayes tooke, and hauing there made a great ſlaughter, carried away with them about fiue hundred priſoners. Saladin being come to DAMASCO, called together all the garriſons of that kingdome, and ioyning them vnto the forces he brought out of ÆGYPT, entred into the Holy Land: at which time the Countie of K TRIPOLIS, gouernour of the kingdome, lay ſicke of a burning feauer. Neuertheleſſe the King encouraged by the Knights of the order, went out with his armie againſt him; and encountring with him neere vnto a village called FROBOLET, ouerthrew him in a great battell, wherein, and afterward in the flight, moſt part of the Sultans armie periſhed: Saladin himſelfe being glad by ſpeedie flight to eſcape the danger, and ſo by long marches to get him againe to DAMASCO.

Berytus in vaine beſieged by the Turkes.

In reuenge of this ouerthrow, Saladin hauing repaired his armie, and ſent for his fleet out of ÆGYPT, came and beſieged BERYTVS both by ſea and land: at which time alſo his brother, whom he had left gouernour in ÆGYPT, beſieged DARVM, a ſtrong towne in the vttermoſt bounds of the kingdome of HIERVSALEM towards ÆGYPT. Both whoſe forces Baldwin L being not able at once to repreſſe, by the counſell of his nobilitie, thought it beſt firſt to releeue BERYTVS, as the place of greater importance. And for that purpoſe ſet forward with his armie by land, hauing alſo rigged vp three and thirty gallies at TYRE, for the reliefe thereof by ſea. Of which preparation Saladin vnderſtanding, as alſo of the Kings comming (by letters intercepted by his ſcouts, directed to the beſieged, for the holding out of the ſiege, with promiſe of ſpeedie reliefe) he preſently roſe with his armie, and departed: whereof the King being aduertiſed, retired to SEPHOR.

Saladin inuading Meſopotamia, is himſelfe inuaded by the King of Hieruſalem.

Not long after, Saladin according to his ambitious nature, deſirous aboue meaſure to extend the bounds of his kingdome, and ſeeing the ſucceſſe of his attempts againſt the King of HIERVSALEM not anſwerable to his deſire, conuerted his forces vnto the countries more Eaſt- M ward: and paſſing the riuer EVPHRATES, and entring into MESOPOTAMIA, partly by force, partly by corruption, got into his hands the cities of EDESSA, CARRAS, and diuers others. In which time the king of HIERVSALEM tooke occaſion firſt to ſpoile the country about DAMASCO, & after that, diuers other places of the Sultans kingdome, making hauocke of whatſoeuer came in his way, and ſo laded with the ſpoile of the Turks, retired to HIERVSALEM.

Saladin

A Saladin with victorie returning out of MESOPOTAMIA, in reuenge of the iniuries done vnto him in his absence, marched directly to ALEPPO, the strongest citie of the Christians in that part of SYRIA, which aboue all other he longed after: where hee had not long lien, but that it was by the treason of the gouernour deliuered into his hands, with all the country thereabouts: wherewith the Christian Princes were so discouraged, that they euen then began to feare greater matters to ensue. The Prince of ANTIOCH sold TARSVS the metropoliticall citie of CILICIA, to Rupinus Prince of ARMENIA; for that he saw it was not without great charge and danger to be by him defended, being so farre from him, and Saladin as it were now stept in betwixt him and it. Aleppo betraied vnto the Turks.

B At the same time King Baldwin, at NAZARETH fell sicke of a feuer; the leprosie also his old disease growing daily more and more vpon him: insomuch that despairing of his life, he called vnto him Guy Lusignan, Countie of IOPPA and ASCALON, vnto whom he had before espoused Sybil his eldest sister, and in the presence of his mother, the Patriarch, and all the chiefe commanders of the souldiers of the sacred warre, appointed him gouernour of the kingdome, reseruing vnto himselfe only the title of a King, with the citie of HIERVSALEM, and a yeerely pension of ten thousand duckats: all which was done to the great disgrace and discontentment of the Countie of TRIPOLIS the old gouernour.

It was not long, but that Saladin hauing breathed himselfe a little, after so great labours, came againe into the Holy Land, where he tooke many castles, and did infinite harme; insomuch
C that the countrey people were glad for feare to forsake their houses and to flie into cities. The Christian armie in the meane time lying fast by at SEPHOR, not once mouing, although many a faire occasion were offered: for the chiefe commanders affectionated vnto the Countie of TRIPOLIS, and enuying at the preferment of Guy the new gouernour, were vnwilling to fight, but finding one excuse or other, suffered the enemie at his pleasure to spoile the countrey, and so in safetie to depart, which he had neuer before done in those quarters.

Within lesse then a moneth after, Saladin with a great armie well appointed with all the habiliments of war, needfull for the besieging of a citie or strong castle, came againe into the land of PALESTINE; and passing thorow the countrey beyond IORDAN, sat downe at last before PETRA, in hope by the taking thereof, to haue made his passage betweene ÆGYPT and DA-D MASCO more safe. Of which his purpose King Baldwin hauing knowledge, and taught by the euill successe of late, to what small purpose it was to commit the managing of his wars vnto a Generall so euill beloued, and lesse regarded, as was Guy his brother in law; sent against him with his armie Raymund the Countie of TRIPOLIS, the old gouernour, whom he had againe restored vnto the gouernment, and displaced Guy. Of whose comming Saladin hearing, raised his siege after he had lien there a moneth, and so departed. Petra in vaine besieged by the Turks.

A little before this expedition, the King still growing sicker and sicker, his foule disease still increasing, by the common consent of the nobilitie, appointed Baldwin his nephew by his sister Sybylla, a childe but of fiue yeeres old, to succeed him in the kingdome; and the Countie of TRIPOLIS to haue the gouernment of the state during the time of his minoritie. This Sybylla
E the Kings sister, was first married to William the younger, Marquesse of MOVNT-FERRAT, who dying within three moneths after, left her with childe with this his posthumus sonne Baldwin, now by his vncle deputed vnto the hope of the kingdome. After whose death she was married to Guy Lusignan, Countie of IOPPA and ASCALON, the late gouernour: who taking in euill part this the Kings designement, especially for the gouernment of the kingdome by the Countie of TRIPOLIS, departed from the Court as a man discontented, vnto his citie of ASCALON: whereof the Patriarch and the Princes of the sacred warre, fearing (and that not without cause) great danger to ensue, came to the King, then holding a Parlament at the citie of ACON, most humbly requesting him for auoiding of further danger, and the safetie of his kingdome, to receiue againe into his fauour the Countie Guy his brother in law, and to make F an attonement betwixt him and the Countie of TRIPOLIS. But this their request sorted to no purpose, so that the Parlament was dissolued without any thing for the good of the commonweale in that point concluded. Discord in the court of Hierusalem.

After that time the kingdome of HIERVSALEM began still more and more to decline. In the old King Baldwin (sicke both in body & mind) was almost no hope: in the young King (yet vnfit for so great a burthen) much lesse: and the dissention betwixt the two Counties Guy and Raymund with their fauorites, was like enough to bring great harme vnto the ſtate. Beſides that, G the Countie of TRIPOLIS fearing the power of Guy his enemy, was thought to haue ſecret intelligence with Saladin the Turke, inſomuch that the King was almoſt in purpoſe to haue proclaimed him traitor. Wherfore the King now reſted only vpon the counſell of William Archbiſhop of TYRE, and the maſters of the Knights of the ſacred warre: by whoſe aduice he ſent Heraclius Patriarch of HIERVSALEM, Roger Molins maſter of the Knights of S. IOHNS, and Arnold maſter of the Templars, embaſſadours vnto Lucius the third, then Pope, vnto Fredericke the Emperor, Philip the French King, and Henry the ſecond King of ENGLAND; to declare vnto them the dangerous ſtate of that Chriſtian kingdome, and to craue their aid againſt the Infidels. Theſe embaſſadours comming to the Councell then holden at VERONA, with great grauitie and dili- H gence in the preſence of the Pope and of the Emperour, declared the hard eſtate of the Chriſtians of the Eaſt, with their humble requeſt vnto them for aid: in ſuch ſort that they moued them, with all the Princes there preſent, to compaſſion. From thence they were by the Pope directed vnto Philip the French King, with whom hauing diſpatched their affaires, they from him paſſed ouer into ENGLAND, and afterward into GERMANIE: and had at length brought their negotiation to ſo good paſſe, that in euery place great preparation was made for a great expedition to be vndertaken againſt the Turks, for the reliefe of the Chriſtians in the Eaſt: with which good newes, the embaſſadours returning to HIERVSALEM, filled the ſicke King with the hope of great matters. But greater quarrels ſhortly after ariſing betwixt the Pope and the Emperour, and ſharpe warre likewiſe betwixt the French King and the King of ENGLAND, and I the other Chriſtian Princes alſo being at no better quiet, the notable expedition that had with the expectation thereof ſo filled the world, was againe laid aſide and quite daſhed. Whereof King Baldwin vnderſtanding both by meſſengers and letters from his friends, oppreſſed with griefe and heauineſſe, more than with the force of his diſeaſe (a man for his proweſſe and painefulneſſe not inferiour to any his predeceſſors) died without iſſue the 16 day of May, in the yeere 1185 1185, being but fiue and twentie yeeres old, whereof he had raigned twelue. His bodie was afterward with the generall mourning of his ſubiects, ſolemnly buried in the Temple neere vnto the mount CALVARIE, together with his predeceſſours the Kings of HIERVSALEM.

King Baldwin ſendeth embaſſadours vnto the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt for aid.

King Baldwin thus buried, Baldwin the fift of that name, yet but a boy, was crowned King. But then began the ſparks, which had of long lien raked vp and hidden in the aſhes, to breake K out into a great fire: for Raymund Countie of TRIPOLIS, contended the whole gouernment of the kingdome, and tuition of the King, to be due vnto him, by the appointment of the late King and conſent of the nobilitie; and did ſo much, that he had almoſt obtained it to haue beene confirmed vnto him in open Parlament. But Sybylla, a woman of a moſt haughtie ſpirit (ſiſter vnto the late King, and mother vnto the young King yet liuing) prickt forward her huſband Guy, in no caſe to giue place vnto his competitour Raymund; and ſo animated him, that by the helpe of his owne fauourites, and the countenance of Boniface Marqueſſe of MOVNT-FERRAT, who euen then was come with a great power into SYRIA, hee extorted from the nobilitie whatſoeuer hee deſired. But ſeuen moneths were ſcarce well paſſed, but that this young King Baldwin was dead and buried; poiſoned (as was reported) by his mother, for the deſire ſhe had of the king- L dome her ſelfe: whoſe death ſhe with all ſecrecie concealed, vntill ſhe had obtained of the Patriarch and other Princes of the kingdome, that Guy her huſband might be proclaimed King: So by her meanes it was ſo wrought, that vpon one and the ſelfe ſame day, the young King Baldwin was buried by his vncle, and Guy the Countie crowned. This young King Baldwin by reaſon of his tender yeeres & ſhort raigne, is of ſome not reckoned amongſt the Kings of HIERVSALEM: howbeit, ſeeing he was by his vncle and the Princes of that time, thought worthy of the kingdome, let him alſo haue his place amongſt the reſt, as the eight King of HIERVSALEM.

Guy the ninth and laſt King of Hieruſalem.

When Guy was thus poſſeſſed of the kingdome, the Countie of TRIPOLIS ſeeing himſelfe out of all hope of the gouernment, and highly therewith diſcontented, did what he might by all meanes to croſſe the doings of the King: whoſe ſicke and aſpiring minde Saladin prickt daily M more and more forward, promiſing him his helping hand whenſoeuer he ſhould need; which courteſie the Countie deſirouſly embraced. For now the fatall period of the kingdome of HIERVSALEM drew faſt on, and all things tended to deſtruction, diſcord raigning in euery place: which Saladin well perceiuing (after that he had cõpacted with the Countie) by meſſengers ſent of purpoſe, inuited the Turks, Saraſins, & Ægyptians, as men agreeing in one and the ſame religion,

A gion, generally to take vp armes in ſo fit an opportunitie of the diſcord of the Chriſtians, aſſuring them of great prey and ſpoile, beſides the honour of the conqueſt. The citie of PTOLEMAIS was the place by him appointed, where all this power ſhould meet: whither ſuch a multitude of the barbarous Mahometans (partly for the hatred of the Chriſtian religion, partly for the hope of the rich ſpoile which Saladin had promiſed them) came flocking out of al places, that in ſhort time there was met together about fiftie thouſand horſemen, beſides an infinit number of foot. And vnto ſuch as could not ſafely paſſe by the borders of HIERVSALEM, to them the falſe Countie gaue ſafe conduct, by the countries of TIBERIAS, NAZARETH, and GALILEY.

Saladin vpõ the diſcord of the Chriſtians, taketh occaſion to inuade the Holy Land.

All the power of the Infidels thus aſſembled, Saladin laid ſiege vnto the citie of PTOLEMAIS:

Ptolemais beſieged by Saladin.

B which the Templars and the Knights Hoſpitallers had notably fortified and ſtrongly manned, (as before vnto them giuen by the Kings of HIERVSALEM to defend againſt the Infidel) and therein now were both the maſters of both thoſe honourable orders, with the whole flower of the Knights of their profeſſion. Vnto this citie, Saladin gaue a moſt terrible aſſault vpon May day in the morning, in the yeere 1187; which was by the Chriſtians notably defended, and the enemy with great ſlaughter ſtill beaten downe. In the heat of this aſſault, the two great maſters ſallying out, with certaine troupes of their moſt ready horſemen, aſſailed the enemies campe, and bearing downe all before them, raiſed there a great tumult: and by and by turning vpon the backes of them, that were aſſaulting the citie, made there an exceeding great ſlaughter. Inſomuch, that Saladin diſmaied, firſt with the confuſion in his campe, and now with the ſudden

C danger behinde him, was glad to giue ouer the aſſault, and to turne his whole forces vpon them: where was fought a moſt bloudie and terrible battell. Amongſt others that there fought, the Countie of TRIPOLIS, now an enemie vnto God and his countrey, diſguiſed in the habit of a Turke, notably helped the Infidels, and meeting with the great maſter of the Knights Hoſpitalers, vnhorſed him, who ſurcharged with the waight of his armour, and oppreſſed with the multitude of his enemies, there died. Neuertheleſſe, ſuch was the valour of theſe worthy men, and new ſuccour ſtill comming out of the citie, that Saladin hauing in that battell, and at the aſſault, loſt fifteene thouſand of his Turks, was glad with the reſt to betake him ſelfe to flight. Neither was this ſo notable a victorie gained by the Chriſtians without bloud, moſt part of the worthy Knights Hoſpitalers being together with their grand maſter there ſlaine.

D Saladin by this ouerthrow perceiuing, that by open force he ſhould not be able to doe much againſt the Chriſtians, thought it good vnto his forces to ioyne alſo policie. Wherein the falſe Countie of TRIPOLIS was the man he thought beſt to make choice of, as his fitteſt inſtrument to worke by. Him hee compacted withall to ſeeke for grace at the King of HIERVSALEM his hands, as of his dread Soueraigne, and after ſo long diſcord, to ſue to be reconciled vnto him, as now wearie of the Turkes amitie, with whom he ſhould make ſhew to be vtterly fallen out. At which time alſo (to giue the matter the better grace) Saladin of purpoſe with a great armie came and beſieged TIBERIAS, a citie of the Counties iuriſdiction: for the reliefe whereof, the traiterous Countie craued aid of the King & the other Princes of the ſacred warre. Who with an armie, though not great, yet very well appointed, came according to his deſire,

E and encamped neere vnto the fountaine of SOPHOR: where they had not long ſtaied, but that they met with the huge armie of the Turkes, being in number one hundred and twenty thouſand horſe, and one hundred and ſixtie thouſand foot: with whom they ioyned a moſt ſharpe and terrible battell; which by reaſon of the extremitie of the heat of the weather (it then being the twelfth of Iuly) and the approach of the night, was againe giuen ouer; both armies (as if it had beene by conſent) retiring. The next day the battell was againe begun, wherein the Turks, by the treaſon and ſhamefull flight of the falſe Countie of TRIPOLIS, gained the victorie. In this battell Guy the King himſelfe, with Gerard maſter of the Templars, Boniface Marqueſſe of MONT-FERRAT, and diuers others, men of great marke, were taken priſoners. And to ſay the truth, in this battell was broken the whole ſtrength of the Chriſtians in the Eaſt.

Guy King of Hieruſalem taken priſoner.

F The Chriſtian cõmon-weale by the treaſon of the falſe Countie thus betraied vnto the Infidels, Saladin without any great reſiſtance had the cities of PTOLEMAIS, BIBLIS, & BERITHVS deliuered vnto him: in all which places, he vſed his victorie with great moderation, not enforcing any Chriſtian (more than the Latines) to depart thence, but ſuffering them there ſtill to remain, as before, yeelding vnto him their obedience, with ſuch tribute as he had impoſed vpon them. With like good fortune, he within the ſpace of one moneth tooke all the port townes betwixt SIDON and ASCALON, alongſt the ſea coaſt, excepting only the ancient citie of TYRE; vnto the citie of ASCALON alſo he laid ſiege by the ſpace of nine dayes: but loth to ſtay the courſe of his victorie, by the valour of the defendants reſolued there to ſpend their liues, he departed thence, and marched directly vnto HIERVSALEM, the chiefe citie of that kingdome. And approaching the ſame, gaue ſummons thereunto, perſwading the citizens yet whiles they had time, to yeeld themſelues, together with the citie, vnto his mercy. Which they refuſing to doe, he incloſed the ſame with his armie, and by the ſpace of foureteene dayes laid hard ſiege vnto it, leauing nothing vndone or vnattempted, that might helpe for the gaining thereof. At which time, the citizens conſidering the danger they were in, and that the ſtrength of the kingdome, with the flower of their chiualrie, were in the late battell loſt, and that they were not now to expect any forraine aid, agreed vpon certaine conditions to yeeld vp the citie: which were, That ſuch Chriſtians as would, might remaine ſtill, with their libertie and goods; and that ſuch as would not, might in ſafetie depart, with ſo much of their goods as they could carrie vpon their backes. Theſe conditions being by Saladin granted, the holy citie was vnto him deliuered the ſecond of October in the yeere 1187; after it had beene by the Chriſtians holden from the time that it was by Godfrey of BVILLON and other Chriſtians won, about 89. yeeres. Saladin entring into the citie, prophaned firſt the Temple of the Lord, conuerting it vnto the vſe of his Mahometane ſuperſtition, the other Churches hee vſed as ſtables for his horſes; only the Temple of the Sepulchre was by the Chriſtians for a great ſumme of money redeemed, and ſo kept vndefiled. The Latine Chriſtians he thruſt out of the citie, yet with leaue to carrie with them ſuch things as they were able themſelues to beare: who trauelling with heauie burdens, but much more heauie hearts, ſome to TRIPOLIS, ſome to TYRE, ſome to ANTIOCH, (for only theſe three cities were now left vnto the Chriſtians in SYRIA) were by the falſe Countie of TRIPOLIS by the way lightened of their burdens, to the increaſing of the heauineſſe of their hearts, moſt of them being by him and his followers ſpoiled of that little they had by the mercy of their enemies ſaued in the ruine of their ſtate.

Hierusalem beſieged.

Hierusalem taken by Saladin.

Vnto the other Chriſtians that were naturall Syrians, Greekes, Armenians, Georgians, and ſuch like, Saladin appointed certaine places of the citie for them to dwell in, where ſome of their poſteritie were long time after to be found. All the monuments of the Chriſtians were by the barbarous Mahometanes and Turkes defaced, only the Sepulchre of our bleſſed Sauiour Chriſt, with the monument of Godfrey of BVILLON, and his brother Baldwin, for the reuerence of the men, were by them ſpared. In theſe ſo great troubles, aboue twentie thouſand of the Chriſtians periſhed: amongſt the reſt, the Countie of TRIPOLIS was ſhortly after found dead in his bed, and (as ſome ſay) circumciſed; a manifeſt token of his reuolt, not from the King only, but from the Chriſtian faith alſo.

The death of Raymund, the traiterous Countie of Tripolis.

HIERVSALEM thus won, Saladin returned againe to the ſiege of ASCALON, which after he had by the ſpace of ten dayes moſt ſtraitly beſieged, was vnto him by compoſition deliuered: wherein amongſt other things agreed vpon for the ſafe departure of the citizens, was compriſed alſo, that he ſhould freely ſet at libertie Guy the king, and Gerard maſter of the Templars, both before taken priſoners, as is before declared; which he afterward performed.

Thus the victorious Turke ſtill vrging his good fortune, departing thence, attempted to haue taken TRIPOLIS; but hauing made ſome proofe of his owne forces, and the valour of the defendants, he was glad to giue ouer the ſiege, and to depart as he came. Marching thence with his armie, becauſe he would leaue no place vnattempted, he laid ſiege vnto the citie of TIRE, where Conrade Marqueſſe of MONT-FERRAT was a little before arriued with Iſaack Angelus the Greeke Emperours fleet, and a ſupplie of certaine companies of good ſouldiers. Vnto which place were come great numbers of the poore diſtreſſed Chriſtians, fled from HIERVSALEM, and other places, ſo that the citie was full of men.

This citie Saladin moſt furiouſly aſſaulted, but was by the Chriſtians notably repulſed, not without the great loſſe of his beſt ſouldiers. At which time alſo the Admirall of SICILIA diſcomfited his fleet at ſea, and landing his forces, came vnlooked for vpon the backe of him: ſo that hauing his hands full before by them of the towne, and charged behind by theſe newcome enemies, he was glad to retire in ſuch haſte, as that he left his tents with all that therein was, vnto the ſpoile of the Chriſtians.

Within a few dayes after, Saladin hauing againe repaired his armie, inuaded the countrey about

A about ANTIOCH: with fire and ſword deſtroying whatſoeuer was ſubiect to his furie, euen to the gates of the citie; but knowing that ſo ſtrong a citie was not without great charge and long ſiege to be won, he thought it good to make proofe if it might by policie or corruption be gained. Wherein he ſo cunningly dealt with the Patriarch, that hee had by his meanes, the caſtle (otherwiſe almoſt impregnable) for gold betraied vnto him. By meanes whereof, hee in ſhort time became Lord and maſter of that famous citie, (about ninetie yeeres before hardly gained by the whole power of the Chriſtians, after eleuen moneths ſiege) and with it fiue and twentie cities moe that depended of the fortune thereof, with all the prouinces belonging thereunto, alwayes deemed to haue beene the third part of the kingdome of HIERVSALEM.

The famous citie of Antioch betraied vnto the Turks.

B The loſſe of this ſo great a citie, together with the ruine of the whole kingdome, had in ſhort ſpace filled euery corner of Chriſtendome with the heauie report thereof. Wherewith the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt (namely Frederick the Germane Emperour, with Frederick his ſonne Duke of SVEVIA, Philip the French King, Henry the ſecond, King of ENGLAND, Otto Duke of BVRGVNDIE, Leopold Duke of AVSTRIA, with many other great Princes and Prelates of GERMANIE, ITALIE, and other places) not a little moued, as alſo with the pitifull complaints of the embaſſadours at the ſame time ſent from the diſtreſſed Chriſtians; and the effectuall perſwaſions of Clement the third then Pope: promiſed, and all, or moſt part, indeed made great preparations; which they afterwards, though not all at once (as letted by other occaſions) but at diuers times imployed for the moſt part, with the danger of their owne perſons, C againſt the Turks, for the reliefe of the poore oppreſſed Chriſtians, and recouerie of the Holy Land: but with what ſucceſſe, ſhall hereafter (God willing) be declared.

Of which ſo great preparations made againſt him, Saladin not ignorant, ſet at libertie Guy the King of HIERVSALEM, whom contrary to his promiſe made at ASCALON, he had now detained a yeere in priſon; yet before his enlargement exacting of him an oath, Neuer by force of armes afterwards to ſeeke to recouer his kingdome, or to reuenge the wrongs hee had ſuſtained: hoping thereby to ſtay the comming of the other Princes in his quarrell. Which oath for all that, the Pope diſpenſed withall, as extorted by conſtraint from him, at ſuch time as Saladin had longer detained him in priſon than of right he ſhould.

Guy now at libertie, & yet in minde a King, came to TYRE, but could not be there receiued, D the citizens hauing before ſworne their obedience vnto Conrade Marqueſſe of MONT-FERRAT, by whom they had beene notably defended againſt the furie of Saladin. Wherefore departing thence with ſuch power as he had, and the diſperſed Chriſtians daily repairing vnto him out of all parts of SYRIA, he came and beſieged PTOLEMAIS: where he had not long lien, but that firſt came vnto him the Venetian fleet, with them alſo of PISA, and after them the Flemings with a fleet of fiftie ſaile, who all ioyned their forces together for the winning of the citie. But whileſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the ſiege of PTOLEMAIS, came Saladin with a great armie to the reliefe of the beſieged: where betwixt him and the Chriſtians was fought a great battell, wherein the Chriſtians at the firſt had the better; but afterward fainting, and readie to flie, had there vndoubtedly receiued a notable ouerthrow, had not Geffrey Lyſignan, the Kings brother, (left for E the guarding of the campe) in good time come in with new ſupplies: and not onely ſtaied their flight, but alſo repreſſed the farther purſute of the fierce enemie, now almoſt in poſſeſſion of the deſired victorie. Neuertheleſſe, there were two thouſand Chriſtians there ſlaine, and amongſt them Gerard, maſter of the Templars. Saladin by that which was now done, perceiuing how hard a matter it would be for him by land to relieue his citie, ſent for the fleet which hee had ſtrongly rigged vp at ALEXANDRIA, and ſo by force put new ſupplies both of men and victuals into the beſieged citie. Wherewith the Turks encouraged, made often ſallies vpon the Chriſtians; & in deſpight of the Chriſtian religion, whipped the image of Chriſt crucified, which they had for that purpoſe, in the ſight of the Chriſtians ſet vp vpon the top of the wall. With the ſame fleet alſo he ſo ſcoured the ſeas, that no victuals or new ſupplies of men could that way without F great danger be brought vnto the campe; whereby ſuch ſcarcitie and want of all things began ſhortly after to ariſe among the Chriſtians, that ſome of them not able longer to endure the famine, fled vnto the Turks campe, then lying not farre off, crying out for bread. Of which diſtreſſe in the campe of the Chriſtians, Saladin knowing right well, both by ſuch fugitiues as daily came ouer vnto him, and by his owne eſpials, yet made ſhew as if he vnderſtood nothing thereof: but ſuddenly riſing with his armie (as doubtfull of his owne ſtrength) departed, leauing his campe full of all manner of victuals. Whereof the Christians vnderstanding, and supposing him to haue for feare beene gone indeed, in great numbers hasted vnto the forsaken campe, as vnto a most desired prey: where, whilest they were gorging themselues, Saladin suddenly returning, and getting betwixt them and home, made of them a great slaughter. Neuertheless, the Christians hauing now lien before the citie six moneths, continued the siege all the Winter, ouercomming with patience the hardest difficulties, in hope of aid from the other Christian Princes, whose comming they expected with the first of the next Spring: during which time, many an hot skirmish passed betwixt them and the Turks both by sea and land. G

Whilest the Christians thus lay at the siege of PTOLEMAIS, Frederick the Emperour with diuers of the great Germane Princes, and others, before resolued vpon an expedition for the recouerie of the Holy Land, and the relieue of the distressed Christians in SYRIA: hauing now raised a great armie, furnished with all things necessarie for so long a iourney, set forward from RATISBONE, and so comming to VIENNA, and passing thorow HVNGARIA, BVLGARIA, and THRACIA, arriued at length at CONSTANTINOPLE, where he was by Isaack Angelus the Emperour that then raigned, honourably entertained: but indeed more for feare and fashion sake, than for any loue or good will: for that he after the suspicious manner of the Greekes, hauing in distrust so great a power of the Latine Emperours, wished rather for his absence, than his presence. And therefore ceased not in what he might to hasten his passage ouer into ASIA, pretending for the colour thereof, the necessitie the Christians had of his present aid. So the Emperour with his armie passing ouer the strait, and without resistance marching thorow the greatest part of the lesser ASIA, entred into LYCAONIA, where meeting with a great power of the Turks, that were come from the Sultan of ICONIVM to stay his farther passage, he ouerthrew them in a great battell; and so marching directly on to ICONIVM, tooke it by force, and gaue the spoile thereof vnto his souldiers, in reuenge of the iniuries before done vnto his vncle the Emperour Conrade, by the Sultan of that citie. Departing thence, and marching thorow CILICIA, he in another battell ouerthrew the Turks, that hauing taken the straits of the mountaines, had thought to haue staied his farther passage into SYRIA. After that hee tooke the citie PHILOMELA, which the Sultan had strongly fortified, which hee rased to the ground, and put to sword all the people therein, for that they contrary to the law of nations, had slaine such messengers as he had sent vnto them for the summoning of the citie. In like manner he entred into the lesser ARMENIA, where he tooke the citie MELITENE, and subdued all the countrey thereabouts: vnto the reliefe whereof, the Turks comming with a most huge armie, were by him with an exceeding great slaughter ouerthrowne and put to flight. After that, entring into COMAGENA, and meeting with Saphadin, Saladin his sonne, with a great armie of the Turks, he ouerthrew him in the plaine field, and discomfited his whole armie. But whilest he too eagerly pursueth the enemie he had then in chace, his horse foundring vnder him, as he passed the riuer SALEPH, he was so ouerthrowne, and his foot hanging fast in his stirrop, drawne thorow the deepe riuer, and almost drowned; and at the farther side of the riuer was so plunged by his horse, at his landing, that he was taken vp for dead. Yet breathing a little, and casting his eyes vp to heauen, with much adoe he vttered these few words, Lord receiue my soule: and so in the hands of them that tooke him vp, gaue vp the ghost, vnto the great griefe and hindrance of the Christian common-weale: for Saladin hearing of his approch, was so afraid of him, as that he began to doubt, not how to keepe that he had before won in SYRIA, but how to defend himselfe in ÆGYPT. Thus miserably perished this worthy Emperour, the tenth of Iune, in the yeere of grace 1190, being then of the age of seuentie yeeres, whereof hee had with much trouble raigned eight and thirtie. His dead bodie was carried along with the armie, and afterward with all funerall pompe buried in the cathedrall church at TYRE. H I K L

Frederick the Emperor thus dead, Frederick his sonne Duke of SVEVIA, was by the generall consent of the Princes in the armie chosen Generall in his stead: vpon whom with the rest of the armie, yet mourning for the death of the Emperour, the Turks gaue a sudden and fierce charge, in hope so to haue ouerthrowne them: but finding greater resistance than they had before supposed, and hauing lost some of their men, they with like speed that they came, retired againe. Now began famine (one of the ordinarie attendants of great armies) to increase in the campe: for why, the Turks for that purpose had before destroied, or carried away all that was in the countrey, leauing nothing for the Christians more than the bare ground. Wherefore M

Frederick the Emperors sonne chosen generall of the Christian armie.

Frederick

A Frederick turning a little out of the way, came to ANTIOCH, which was eaſily deliuered vnto him, and his hungrie ſouldiers wel refreſhed by the citizens, being as yet for the moſt part Chriſtians. But he had not there ſtaied paſt fifteene dayes for the refreſhing of his armie, but that the plague (the handmaid of famine and another ſcourge of the greateſt multitudes) began to rage among his ſouldiers, in ſuch ſort, that he was glad with his armie to forſake the citie, and to get him abroad againe into the open field: where forthwith newes was brought vnto him, that Dodequin Generall of ſuch forces as Saladin had ſent for out of ÆGYPT (which were not ſmall) was by great iourneyes comming towards him: againſt whom hee in good order ſet forward, with his fathers corſe ſtill carried in the middeſt of his armie. Theſe two armies meeting toge-

B ther, and both willing to fight, ioyned a great and doubtfull battell, fortune inclining now to the one ſide, and by and by to the other; the Chriſtians exceeding their enemies in valour, and they them againe in number. At length the Chriſtians in the vauntguard began to retire, and they that ſeconded them were alſo hardly charged: when Frederick mindfull of his fathers valour, with a troupe of valiant horſemen brake into the enemies battell, with ſuch force, that the Turks were glad to giue ground: after whom Leopold Duke of AVSTRIA comming preſently on with his footmen, brought ſuch a feare vpon the whole armie of the Turks, that they betooke themſelues to ſpeedie flight. In this battell were foure thouſand of the enemies ſlaine, with ſmall loſſe of the Chriſtians; and about one thouſand moe taken priſoners, with fifteene of their enſignes. After which victorie, Frederick marching further in CÆLO-SYRIA, pacified

C LAODICEA then in mutinie, and like to haue beene deliuered vnto the Turks. He alſo with a little labour tooke BERYTHVS, with diuers other cities of SYRIA, which before belonging vnto the Kings of HIERVSALEM, were now reuolted vnto the Turks. So afterward comming to TYRE, he there ſolemnly buried his father, (dead, as is before ſaid:) and from thence certified Guy the King (ſtill lying with the other Chriſtian Princes at the ſiege of PTOLEMAIS) of his comming: who forthwith ſent the Marqueſſe of MONT-FERRAT, with part of the fleet to tranſport him with his people that were left, by ſea: for that by land hee could not ſo ſafely haue come, being now but weake, for meeting with Saladin; who with a great armie lay ſtill houering about his beſieged citie, intentiue to all opportunitie. So was Duke Frederick with his ſouldiers yet left, ſafely by ſea conducted from TYRE to the campe at PTOLEMAIS, & there ioyfully

D receiued by the King and the other Princes, with the generall applauſe of the whole campe.

A great battell betwixt the Turks and the Chriſtians.

In the meane time the Turks ſailing out of the citie of PTOLEMAIS, had done great harme among the Chriſtians, by whom they were not without ſome loſſe againe repulſed. But after the comming of Duke Frederick and his Germains, it was thought good by the generall conſent of all the great commanders in the armie, that the citie ſhould be aſſaulted round: and to that purpoſe was euery mans regiment appointed what place to aſſaile. The King himſelfe with the Templars and the Italians from PISA, vndertooke that part of the citie which was toward the ſea: vnto Duke Frederick and his Germains was allotted all betwixt the bridge ouer the riuer BELE, and the Biſhops palace: the Venetians, Genowaies, and Knights Hoſpitalers, were appointed vnto the reſt of the wall as farre as the court of Raymund: the Friſelanders, Flemings, E and Hollanders, tooke vp all the reſt of the wall vnto the ſea ſide. Thus was the citie at once in euery ſide aſſailed by the Chriſtians, with ſuch furie, as if they had thereon purpoſed to gage their whole forces; ſeeking by a thouſand wounds, and a thouſand kinds of death to haue by their ſcaling ladders, gained the top of the wals; the Turks with no leſſe courage ſtill beating them downe againe. But in the heat of this ſo dreadfull and deſperate an aſſault, Saladin ſtill houering aloofe, came now vpon the ſudden and aſſailed the campe of the Chriſtians, filling the ſame with feare and tumult: whoſe charge they that were left for the defence of the ſame, at the firſt notably receiued, but finding themſelues too weake, began to giue ground; by which meanes the Turks tooke certaine tents with ſome enſignes, and fired ſome other of the pauilions of the Chriſtians, hauing ſlaine ſomewhat moe than an hundred of the defendants.

Ptolemais aſſaulted by the Chriſtians.

F The Chriſtians in the meane time little preuailing in the aſſault, and troubled with the danger of their campe, retired to the reliefe thereof. But the Turke perceiuing himſelfe too weake for the whole power of the Chriſtians, retired alſo; yet not with ſuch haſte, but that he had there almoſt loſt himſelfe. This notable aſſault was giuen the fourteenth of October: after which many light skirmiſhes paſſed betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks, but more for bootie, than for any other great purpoſe.

In

In the meane time, diuers great Princes of the West that had vowed themselues vnto this sa- G cred warre, came thither, whose number rather increased the want of victuals, than furthered the seruice. At which time also the discord betwixt Guy the King (whose wife and children were now dead) and Conrade Marquesse of MONT-FERRAT (who had maried Isabel the late Queenes sister, by whom he pretended a claime vnto the title of the imaginarie kingdome) did much harme vnto the proceedings of the Christians: so pleasing a thing these haughtie stiles be vnto the loftie mindes of the ambitious. Shortly after the Christians yet lying at the siege, the contagion and famine still increasing, it fortuned that Duke Frederick fell sicke of the plague, whereof he died: and with the great mourning of the whole armie, was afterward solemnly buried fast by his father in the cathedrall church at TYRE. After whose death the Christians attempted no H great matter against the citie, although they were oftentimes by the Turks prouoked, but lay still strongly entrenched, expecting some greater aid from the Princes of the West.

Now all the hope of the Christian affaires in SYRIA, and in the land of PALESTINE, rested vpon the comming of the two mightie Princes, Philip the second of that name, King of FRANCE, and Richard the first, King of ENGLAND: who hauing agreed betwixt themselues, with their combined forces to relieue the distressed Christians of the East; and againe (if it were possible) to repaire the broken state of the kingdome of HIERVSALEM, were now met together at MARSEILLES in PROVENCE. From whence the French King first departing with his fleet for CICILIA, and with a prosperous gale for certaine dayes holding on his course, and now come nigh vnto the Island; was by force of a furious tempest suddenly arising, so tos- I sed and tumbled in the deepe, that many of his ships there perished, eaten vp of the sea; others by force of weather driuen vpon the sands and rocks, were there broken all to peeces; and the rest some with their masts broken, some with their tacklings and sailes rent, and all in generall sore weather-beaten, with much adoe arriued at MESSANA the desired port: at which place King Richard afterwards (but with better fortune) arriued with his fleet also. Both the Kings now met together, resolued there to winter: the French King enforced by necessitie so to doe, for the repairing of the late losses he had receiued, as well in his people and prouision, as in his shipping; all which was to be relieued by new supplies out of FRANCE: and the King of ENGLAND staying to take order for the dowrie of his sister Ioan (widow of William the late King of CICILIA) with Tancred the base sonne of Roger, that had now aspired vnto the kingdome K of that Island. About which matter great stirs arise betwixt King Richard the Queenes brother, and Tancred the new King, insomuch that it was like to haue broken out into open warre, had it not to the good contentment of King Richard beene otherwise taken vp, and so the controuersie ended. But whilst these two great Kings thus wintred in this fruitfull Island, and oftentimes as good friends met together, sometime for their disport, and sometime to conferre of their so waightie affaires; the way (as was thought) to haue appeased all former displeasure, and to haue increased loue: it fell out cleane contrary, iealousie and distrust, not only reuiuing the old, but also still raising new quarrels betwixt them, to the great hinderance of the common good by them intended: which may serue for a warning to all great Princes, willing to continue in amitie, and to hold a good opinion one of another, Neuer to see one the other; or com- L ming so to an interuiew, not to conuerse or stay long together: which as it is not often done without the danger of their persons, so can it not possibly be long continued, but that it will engender in themselues as well as in their followers, iealousie, enuie, hatred, and mistrust, as wee haue before said, and hereafter in the course of this historie may appeare.

There was an old quarrell betwixt these two great Kings, Richard and Philip, about Adela the French Kings sister; whom Richard hauing before (his father yet liuing) affianced, had now reiected, as her whom his aged father Henry the second had too familiarly vsed: and in stead of her, to the great disgrace of the French, espoused the Lady Berengaria, daughter to the King of NAVAR: which indignitie with diuers others, then arising betwixt the French and the English, as then with great heartburning smouldred vp in respect of the common cause then in hand, af- M terwards brake out againe, to the shamefull ouerthrow of this most honourable expedition, and lamentable disturbance of both realmes.

Winter past, & the Spring now come, the French King not altogether the best pleased: first loosed from MESSANA, and with his fleet in safetie arriued at PTOLEMAIS, where he was by the Christians, now the third yeere lying at the siege, so ioyfully receiued, as if he had beene

A to them ſent with ſuccours from heauen. After whom, ſhortly after followed alſo King Richard: of whoſe fleet (by force of weather ſore beaten and diſperſed) two ſhips by the rage of the tempeſt driuen a ground vpon the coaſt of CYPRVS, were by the Iſland people ſpoiled, and the men that in them had hardly eſcaped the danger of the ſea, with moſt barbarous inhumanitie, ſome ſlaine, and ſome taken priſoners: the reſt of the fleet arriuing there alſo, were with like inciuilitie forbidden to land; the Cipriots ready at hand in all places to keepe them off. With which ſo great an indignitie the King iuſtly moued, and by force landing his people, with incredible celeritie and ſucceſſe ouerran the whole Iſland, neuer ceaſing vntill hee had made a full conqueſt thereof, and taken Iſaack Comnenus, commonly called the King of that Iſland, and
B of ſome (for what reaſon I know not) Emperour of the Griffons, priſoner: yet was he indeed neither King nor Emperour, but being a man of great nobilitie and power, and of the honourable ſtocke of the Comneni, had in the troubleſome raigne of Andronicus Comnenus the Emperour, his couſin, laid hold vpon that fruitfull Iſland, and there tyrannized as a reputed King; vntill that now he was by King Richard taken priſoner, and for his vnfaithfull dealing ſent faſt bound in chaines of ſiluer into SIRIA. The King thus poſſeſſed of the whole Iſland, there at LIMOZIN married the Lady Berengaria the King of NAVARS daughter, brought thither by Ioan late Queene of CICILIA, the Kings ſiſter. And ſo diſpoſing as he thought beſt of all things for the ſafe keeping of the Iſland, ſet forward againe with his fleet towards SIRIA. Where by the way he light vpon a great ſhip of the Sultans, laded with victuals and other war-
C like prouiſions for the reliefe of the beſieged; all which became a prey vnto him. So holding on his courſe, he at length arriued at PTOLEMAIS, where he was by the French King, and the reſt of the Chriſtians there lying, moſt honourably receiued.

King Richard reuengeth the iniury done vnto his people by the Cipriots.

Now had the citie of PTOLEMAIS beene three yeeres beſieged by the Chriſtians, and notably defended by the Turks: during which time many an hot aſſault and bloudie skirmiſh had paſſed betwixt them. And now the eies of all men were fixed vpon the two Kings of ENGLAND and FRANCE, vnto whom all the reſt offred their obedience and ſeruice. The Chriſtian campe was great, compoſed eſpecially of Engliſhmen, Frenchmen, Italians, and Almaines; not them that were left of the Emperour Frederick his armie (for they were for the moſt part dead, or elſe returned home againe into their countries) but of ſuch as (moued with the zeale they bare vnto D this religious warre) came daily in great numbers thither: as did alſo many others of diuers nations, deſirous in ſome meaſure to be partakers of ſo honourable a warre.

Theſe religious and venterous Chriſtians thus lying at the ſiege, had with much painfull labour vndermined one of the greateſt towres of the citie, called the Accurſed Towre, with ſome part of the wall alſo, by meanes whereof they were in hope to find a way into the citie. Wherefore all things being now in a readineſſe for the fiering of the mine, it was thought good by generall conſent, that an aſſault ſhould alſo at the ſame time be giuen vnto the citie. And thereupon euery regiment was by lot appointed which part of the wall to aſſaile, which they all with great courage vndertooke. In the heat of which aſſault, the aforeſaid vndermined towre, with ſome part of the wall (the timber whereon it ſtaied, now burnt) fell downe with a great fall, laying E open a faire breach for the Chriſtians to enter. Wherewith the Turkes diſmaied, forthwith craued to come to parle: which granted, they for ſafegard of their liues yeelded forthwith to giue vp the citie, and to reſtore vnto the Chriſtians the Holy Croſſe, with two thouſand captiues, and two hundred horſemen, ſuch as they ſhould require of all them that were in the power of Saladin; beſides 200000 Conſtantinopolitane duckats, to be by him giuen vnto the two Kings, for the coſt by them beſtowed in the ſiege. For paiment whereof, the Turkes in the citie were to remaine as hoſtages vnder the ſafe keeping of the Chriſtians, ſo that if all the couenants aforeſaid were not within fortie daies performed by Saladin, they ſhould all for their liues be at the Kings mercy. So was this ſtrong citie, after it had beene almoſt three yeeres beſieged, deliuered vp vnto the Chriſtians the 12. of Iulie, in the yeere 1191. The firſt that entred were the Germanes of 1191
F AVSTRIA, who as if they had beene the only men by whoſe valour the citie had beene won, at their firſt entrie preſumptuouſly aduanced their enſignes vpon the top of the wals, to the great offence of all the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes, but eſpecially of King Richard, who not vnworthily for his princely courage was commonly called Richard Cueur de Lyon, not brooking ſo proud an indignitie, cauſed the enſignes of Leopold their Duke to be puld downe, and foiled vnder foot; which ſhortly after gaue him occaſion of repentance, as ſhall be hereafter ſeene.

The

The two Kings poſſeſſed of the citie, diuided the ſame, with all the people and ſpoile there- G of, betwixt them, without regard of the reſt of the other noble Chriſtians, that had ſuſtained the whole trauell of that long ſiege: for which cauſe moſt part of them, ſeeing themſelues ſo deluded, withdrew themſelues from them, and with one conſent ſent them word, That they would forſake them, except they were made partakers of the gaines, as they had beene of the paines. Which the two Kings to content them, promiſed they ſhould. Howbeit, they delaied ſo long their promiſes, that many worthy men, conſtrained by pouertie, departed diſcontented from them into their countries.

But long it was not, that this one citie, ſo lately gained, could containe theſe two great kings; whom two large kingdomes could not retaine in peace. For albeit that they were in body to- H gether preſent, and in one, and that a moſt honorable action, combined; yet were they in hearts farre aſunder, and their ſecret deſignes much different: enuie and diſtruſt ſtill reuiuing vnkindneſſe paſt, and miniſtring new matter of greater diſcontentments. King Richard, according to his noble nature, was of nothing more deſirous, than to haue the warre continued, vntill they had made a full conqueſt of SYRIA and the land of PALESTINE; and for that cauſe requeſted the French King to bind himſelfe together with him by ſolemne oath, there to ſtay yet three yeeres, for the regaining of thoſe countries. But he in minde long before eſtranged from King Richard, and in his deepe conceit plotting matters neerer home better fitting his purpoſe, would by no meanes be perſwaded ſo to doe; but ſtill found one occaſion or other for to colour his departure. And ſhortly after (as the French Chronicles report) falling extremely ſicke, I he requeſted King Richard and the other Chriſtian Princes to come vnto him: vnto whom being come, he in few words declared his purpoſe of returne, as followeth:

I cannot (my Lords) longer endure the inclemencie and intemperature of the aire in this extreame hot ſeaſon. If my death might profit the Chriſtian Religion, or any one of you, or the Chriſtian Commonweale; there ſhould be no diſtemperature whatſoeuer, that could ſeparate me from you, or withdraw me from hence. But more may the life of one abſent, ſerue and profit you, than the death of him preſent. I muſt of neceſsitie depart, yet at my departure I will leaue you fiue hundred men at armes, and ten thouſand footmen, the flower and choice of all the forces of FRANCE, vnder the conduct of my couſin Odo, Duke of BVRGVNDIE, vnto whom I will giue pay and entertainment, with a continuall ſupplie of all K things for them neceſſary.

The French king ſweareth vnto king Richard, in his abſence not to inuade his territories in France.

This excuſe of the French Kings, King Richard could not take in good part: but ſaid, That it was apparant to all men, that he abandoned the warres in SYRIA, to returne into FRANCE, for no other end or purpoſe, but the more eaſily to inuade the prouinces of GVIENN and NORMANDIE, now diſfurniſhed of their garriſons, and ſo ſubiect to his malice. Which point he ſo vrged, that the French King could haue no leaue with his honour to depart, vntill ſuch time as he had by ſolemne oath bound himſelfe vnto King Richard, not to attempt any thing either by force or fraud againſt him, or any thing of his, vntill fiftie daies were expired after King Richard his returne home. Which how well it was by the French King obſerued, I leaue it to the report L of the hiſtories of that time. And ſo the French King, not to be intreated longer to ſtay, leauing behinde him the aforeſaid number of men he had promiſed, embarking the reſt of his armie, and accompanied with three tall ſhips of the Genowaies his friends, and Ruffin Volta their admirall, departed from PTOLEMAIS to TYRE, the firſt of Auguſt; and two dayes after, looſing thence, ſailed alongſt the coaſt of ASIA, & cutting through the Mediterranean, arriued at length in the mouth of the riuer of TYBER, and from thence went to ROME: where after he had viſited Pope Celeſtine, and the famous places of that moſt renowned citie, he returned againe to his fleet, and ſo by ſea arriued in ſafetie in FRANCE; hauing in that great expedition, ſo honorably by him entertained, performed nothing anſwerable to that the world looked for.

After the French King, followed Leopold Duke of AVSTRIA, with his Germans: & not long M after him, the Venetians alſo, with them of PISA & GENVA. Of whoſe departure Saladin vnderſtanding, & that the Chriſtian forces were thereby much empaired, refuſed either to pay the money, or to reſtore the priſoners, as was promiſed at the giuing vp of PTOLEMAIS: threatning moreouer to chop off the heads of all ſuch Chriſtian captiues as he had in his power, if the King ſhould ſhew any extremitie vnto the pledges of the citie. Neuertheleſſe, ſhortly after he ſent his

A embaſſadours with great preſents vnto the King, requeſting a longer time for the ſparing of his pledges; which his requeſt, together with his gifts, the King refuſed to grant or accept. Whereupon Saladin forthwith cauſed ſuch Chriſtian captiues as were in his power, to be beheaded: which albeit King Richard vnderſtood, yet would hee not preuent the time before agreed vpon for the execution of his priſoners, being the 20 day of Auguſt: vpon which day he cauſed the Turks priſoners, to the number of 2500 (or as the French and Germans write, to the number of 7000) in the ſight of Saladines armie to be executed.

The loſſe of the ſtrong towne of PTOLEMAIS, much empaired the reputation of Saladin, euen among his owne people; as it commonly falleth out, that the euill ſucceſſe of a great com-B mander in his affaires, altereth the good will, affection, & opinion, eſpecially of the vulgar ſort, which iudge of all things by the euent. And albeit that his loſſes were great, and ſuch as much daunted him: yet he thought it beſt, as the caſe then ſtood, to make them greater, and with his owne hands (as it were) to ruinate and ouerthrow ſuch townes and cities as he ſaw he could not keepe, rather than to ſuffer them whole and vndefaced to fall into the enemies hand. So carried headlong with deſpaire, hee cauſed all the townes hee had alongſt the ſea coaſt in SYRIA and PALESTINE, to be ſacked and ruinated, and their wals ouerthrowne; eſpecially ſuch as were of moſt importance, and like to ſtand the Chriſtians in ſtead, namely PORPHIRIA, CESAREA, IOPPA, ASCALON, GAZA, and ELAM, with diuers other caſtles and citadels in the countries thereabouts; moſt part whereof were againe by King Richard and the Templars fortified and C repeopled, although Saladin in the meane time did what he might to haue letted the ſame.

Nothing more hindred the good proceeding of the Chriſtian Princes, in this & other their moſt honourable expeditions againſt the Infidels, than the diſcord among themſelues; one ſtill enuying at anothers honour, and euery one iealous of his owne. Great ſtrife and heart-burning there had beene betweene the two Kings of FRANCE and ENGLAND, during the time they were together in this ſacred expedition, to the great hindrance of the ſame. No leſſe contention had there beene betwixt Guy the late King of HIERVSALEM, and Conrade Marqueſſe of MONTFERRAT, about the title of that loſt kingdome: whereby the whole power of the Chriſtians in SYRIA was diuided into two factions. Richard King of ENGLAND, Baldwin Earle of FLANDERS, Henry Earle of CHAMPAINE, the Knights Hoſpitalers of S. Iohn, the Venetians and D Piſans, taking part with Guy: And Philip the French King, Odo Duke of BVRGVNDIE, Rodolph Earle of CLAREMONT, the Templars, the Genowayes, the Lantgraue of THVRIN, Leopold Duke of AVSTRIA, and Robert Countie of NASSAV, taking part with Conrade the Marqueſſe. But Conrade ſhortly after the taking of PTOLEMAIS being ſlaine, by two of the deſperate Aſſaſſins, or (as ſome others ſay) by two deſperate ruffians, (ſuborned thereunto by the Prince of TORONE, in reuenge of the deſpight done vnto him by the ſaid Marqueſſe, by taking from him Iſabel his eſpouſed wife) as he was walking in his citie of TYRE, and doubting no ſuch treaſon: King Richard ſeeing now a fit occaſion offered for the vtter extinguiſhing of that claime, and how to intitle himſelfe vnto that kingdome; perſwaded the aforeſaid Iſabel (the widow of the late Marqueſſe, and in whoſe right he had laid claime vnto the kingdome) to E relinquiſh that ſo troubleſome a title, and to take to her huſband Henry Earle of CHAMPAINE, his nephew, vnto whom he gaue the citie of TYRE: Guy the King exclaiming to the contrary, as of a wrong done vnto himſelfe. Shortly after he began alſo to temper with Guy, perſwading him to reſigne vnto him that little right and intereſt he had in the kingdome of HIERVSALEM, and in lieu thereof to receiue at his hands the kingdome of CYPRVS. Which his offer the poore King was glad to accept. By which exchange, Guy became King of CYPRVS; and Richard, King of HIERVSALEM; which honourable title he afterwards, as ſome report, vſed in his ſtile, as did ſome others his ſucceſſours the Kings of ENGLAND after him. So Guy with all his wealth paſſing ouer into CYPRVS, tooke poſſeſſion of the kingdome, where he long liued not. Neuertheleſſe, that pleaſant kingdome continued in his familie of the Luſignans, by the ſpace
F of about 283 yeeres afterwards: vntill that at length that familie failing in the poſthumus ſon of Iames the baſtard, laſt King of that Iſland, it fell into the hands of the Venetians: by whom it was holden as a part of their ſeignorie almoſt an hundred yeeres, vntill that it was in our freſh remembrance againe from them taken by Selymus the ſecond, great Emperour of the Turks, in the yeere 1571, as in the proceſſe of this hiſtorie ſhall in due place (God willing) be declared.

Now was K. Richard, for the increaſe of his honour, more deſirous than before of the citie of

of HIERVSALEM, as the moſt precious and honourable prize of all that religious warre. And thereupon with all the power of the Chriſtians then at his command, ſet forward from PTOLEMAIS, and was come on his way as farre as ARSVA, a towne ſituate betwixt CESAREA and IOPPE. In the vauward was King Richard himſelfe, with the Engliſhmen: after whom followed Odo, Duke of BVRGVNDIE, with his French: and in the rereward Iaques de Auenes, with the Flemings, Brabanders, and Wallons, who after the death of their Countie Philip at the ſiege of PTOLEMAIS, had put themſelues all vnder his regiment. Saladin with a great armie ſtill at hand, and as it were attending vpon them, firſt with certaine ambuſcadoes charged the rereward, and ſo afterward came on with his whole power: vpon whom Iaques turning himſelfe, with his Flemings, receiued the charge with great aſſurance, and ſo long themſelues endured the ſame, vntill the French came in to their ſuccours, and after them the Engliſh alſo. There was fought a notable battell, and great valour ſhewed both on the one ſide and the other, but eſpecially by them of the Turks part; who knew well the purpoſe of the Chriſtians for the beſieging of HIERVSALEM, and that thereon depended their only hope, and that he that could hold the ſame, might almoſt aſſure himſelfe to carrie away the glory of that warre. The French and Engliſh in that battell honourably ſtroue who might ſhew the greateſt valour: neither would the Low countrey men vnder Iaques their Generall, ſeeme to be any thing behind them. This ſharpe conflict began about noone, and continued vntill the going downe of the Sunne. King Richard (as ſome write) was there wounded with an arrow; and Iaques valiantly there fighting, was ſlaine, hauing ſold his life deere, to the great admiration of the Infidels, and dying left the victorie vnto the Chriſtians. It is reported, that in this battell were ſlaine moe Turks and Saraſins, than in any one battell within the memorie of man before: of the Chriſtians were not loſt any great number, either any man of name, more than the aforeſaid Iaques, the valiant Generall of the Flemings.

The next day the Chriſtians remoued to BETHLEM, a towne about the mid way betwixt IOPPE and HIERVSALEM. But Winter now comming faſt on, and want of victuals like enough to increaſe, the King changing his minde for the ſiege, returned with the greateſt part of the armie to ASCALON, which he that Winter new fortified, the wals thereof being before by Saladin in his deſpaire demoliſhed: the Duke of BVRGVNDIE, with his Frenchmen, all that while quietly wintring at TYRE. In the meane time, the power of the Chriſtians was that Winter greatly diminiſhed, ſome one way departing from the campe, and ſome another. The Italians for the moſt part, with them of PISA (who in theſe three yeeres warres had ſtriuen with the Venetians for the honour of their ſeruice) were now returned home, as were the Venetians themſelues alſo. Neuertheleſſe, Winter now paſt, and the Spring time come, King Richard tooke the field againe, and came to BETHLEM: where by the way he met with an exceeding great number of cammels, charged with great ſtore of victuals and munition, ſent by Saladin out of ÆGYPT to HIERVSALEM, all which he tooke. But purpoſing to haue gone on to the ſiege of HIERVSALEM, he was by the backwardneſſe of the French glad to change his purpoſe, and to returne to PTOLEMAIS: for the Frenchmen, perſwaded by the Duke their Generall (who well knew the French Kings minde) that if any thing worth remembrance were done, it was to be done by them, and that the glorie thereof ſhould wholly redound vnto the King of ENGLAND, as there in perſon preſent, and to his Engliſhmen; ſhewed themſelues ſo vnwilling to the ſiege, as that therein was nothing done, to the great griefe of that worthy Prince. At which time alſo newes was brought vnto K. Richard, how that Philip the French King (forgetfull of his ſolemne promiſe made before his departure out of SYRIA) had now inuaded the countrey of NORMANDIE, & excited Earle Iohn (the Kings brother, a man of an hautie & aſpiring nature) to take vpon him the kingdome of ENGLAND in his abſence: as had before in like caſe William the yonger brother ſerued Duke Robert his elder brother, then abſent at his father the Conquerors death, in the firſt ſacred expedition vnder Godfrey of BVILLON. Wherefore K. Richard, beſide the preſent difficulties, fearing leſt while he was ſo farre off in wars for defence of the Chriſtian common weale, he might loſe his kingdome at home; thought it beſt to grow to ſome good end with Saladin, & ſo to make his returne. But the politicke & warie Sultan, not ignorant of the diſcord of the Chriſtians, & that their forces daily decaied in SYRIA; either of the troubled eſtate of the Kings affaires at home in his kingdome, or of his deſire to return; would not hearken to any other conditions of peace, but ſuch as might both for the preſent, weaken the forces of the Chriſtians in SYRIA, & diſcourage

King Richard purpoſing to haue beſieged Hieruſalem, is by the backwardneſſe of the French enforced to retire.

A diſcourage others that had a minde to come thither afterward, when they ſhould ſee that for naught they ſhould trauel to cõquer that, which in the end they muſt of neceſſity reſtore againe. The conditions he offered, were, That the Chriſtians ſhould forthwith reſtore whatſoeuer they had woon in thoſe three yeares wars, PTOLEMAIS only excepted; and that from thenceforth for the ſpace of fiue yeares the Turks ſhould not in any thing moleſt the Chriſtians, but to ſuffer them in peace to liue by them: which hard conditions (for that no better could be had) the king was glad to accept, and ſo concluded a peace. Whereby the labour and trauell of the two great kings, and ſo many nations with them, were all become fruſtrat and vaine; hauing now to no purpoſe loſt their men, their money, their time, their hope, their blood, their long trauell, to
B gaine that they muſt now in one houre forgo; nothing more left vnto the poore Chriſtians in SYRIA, then the cities of ANTIOCH, TYRE, and PTOLEMAIS.

King Richard returning out of the Holy Land, taken priſoner by Leopold duke of Auſtria.

This done, king Richard leauing the affaires of ASIA vnto the charge of Henrie countie of C CHAMPAGNE his nephew, ſhipping the greateſt part of his people, with his wife Berengaria, firſt for SICILIA and from thence for ENGLAND, were they in ſafetie at length arriued, followed ſhortly after with ſome few himſelfe, where by the way by extremitie of weather, he was in the Adriatique driuen to land vpon the coaſt of HISTRIA: where trauelling with a ſmall retinue homewards in the habit of a Templar, he was diſcouered & taken priſoner by Leopold Duke of AVSTRIA, whom he had before diſgraced at the winning of PTOLEMAIS (as is before declared:) who now glad to haue him in his power, made prize of him, and ſold him to Henry the Emperor, for fortie thouſand pounds, by whom he was kept priſoner by the ſpace of a yeere & three months, and then ranſomed for the ſumme of an hundred and fiftie thouſand pounds.

About this time died the great Sultan Saladin, the greateſt terrour of the Chriſtians: who mindfull of mans fragilitie and the vanitie of worldly honours, commanded at the time of his death no ſolemnitie to be vſed at his buriall, but onely his ſhirt in manner of an enſigne, made faſt vnto the point of a launce, to be carried before his dead bodie as an enſigne, a plaine Prieſt going before, and crying aloud vnto the people in this ſort: Saladin Conquerour of the Eaſt, of all the greatneſſe and riches he had in his life, carrieth not with him after his death any thing more than his ſhirt. A ſight worthie ſo great a King, as wanted nothing to his eternall commendation, more than the true knowledge of his ſaluation in Chriſt Ieſus. Hee raigned about ſixteene yeeres
D with great honour, and dying, left nine ſonnes, which were all murthered by Saphradin their vncle, excepting one called alſo Saphradin Sultan of ALEPPO, who by the fauour and ſupport of his fathers good friends, ſaued himſelfe from the treacherous practiſes of his vncle. Of this Saphradin the vncle, deſcended Meledin Sultan of ÆGYPT, and Coradin Sultan of D'AMASCO and HIERVSALEM: Saladin his great kingdome being by them now againe rent in peeces.

The death of Saladin in ſhort time bruited abroad, with the diſcord amongſt the Turks and Saraſins, about his dominions, put Celeſtinus (then Pope) in good hope, that the citie of HIERVSALEM might in that change and hurle, be eaſily againe recouered, and that kingdome eſtabliſhed. But when he had in vaine dealt to that purpoſe with the Kings of FRANCE and
E ENGLAND (then altogether buſied in their wars the one againſt the other) he perſwaded Henrie the ſixt, then Emperour, to take the matter in hand: who (for that he well could not, or elſe would not himſelfe in perſon vndertake that long expedition) ſent Henrie Duke of SAXONIE his lieutenant with a great armie into ASIA: vnto whom were ioyned two Legates, Conradus Archbiſhop of MOGVNSIA another of the electours, and Conradus the Biſhop of HERBIPOLIS. At which time alſo many other great Princes tooke vpon them that holy warre, namely, Herman Lantgraue of THURIN, Henrie Palatine of RHENE, Henrie Duke of BRABANT, Conrade Marqueſſe of MORAVIA, Frederick Duke of AVSTRIA, and Albertus Hapſpurgenſis, with ſome others: vnto whom alſo ioyned themſelues the Biſhops of BREME, HALBERSTAT, and RATISBON, with diuers other great Prelates. Who hauing paſſed thorow HVNGARIE and F THRACIA, and by the Greeke Emperour Alexius Angelus relieued with all things neceſſarie, were by the Grecian ſhips tranſported vnto ANTIOCH, and ſo by land came to TYRE, and from thence to PTOLEMAIS, with purpoſe to haue gone to relieue the Germains beſieged in IOPPE; who before their comming were all by treaſon ſlaine and the citie raſed, wherefore being come to the ruines thereof, they departed thence to SIDON, which they found alſo abandoned by the Turks. After that they tooke BERITHVS, which citie they fortified, and ſo went to beſiege TORONE; which citie when they had brought vnto the extremitie, as that it muſt needs (as it was thought) either yeeld or be taken, the Turks came on ſo faſt to the reliefe thereof, that the Chriſtians were glad to raiſe their ſiege and to be gone: which they in garriſon at BERITHVS perceiuing, and ſeeing the enemie to approch them, they abandoned the citie, and ioyning themſelues vnto the reſt of the armie, marched all together to IOPPE, a little before ruinated, which they now againe fortified. But the enemie comming to BERITHVS, and finding it forſaken, raſed it downe to the ground, and ſo in few moneths ſpace was BERITHVS both repaired and raſed, in the yeere 1197. C

The Turks ouerthrowne by the Chriſtians.

But whileſt the Chriſtians were repairing the citie of IOPPE, the Turks proud of that they had done at BERITHVS, came now to diſturbe alſo the fortifying of that place. Of whoſe comming the Chriſtians vnderſtanding, remoued by night about fiue miles from the citie, of purpoſe to draw the Turks vnto a conuenient place for battell. The Turks thinking them to haue beene fled for feare, ſent part of their armie to aſſaile the citie: and with the other followed after them diſorderedly, as if it had beene after men they had had in chace. Vpon whom the Chriſtians turning, had with them at the firſt a ſharpe encounter, but afterwards put them to flight: in which conflict certaine thouſands of the Turks fell; of whom the Chriſtians taking the ſpoile, and hauing put the reſt to flight, returned againe vnto the fortifying of the citie. But the ioy of this victorie was by the ſudden death of two of the greateſt Princes in the armie, greatly diminiſhed: for the Duke of SAXONIE hauing in the battell taken great paines in performing the parts both of a worthy Generall and valiant ſouldier, had ouer-heated himſelfe, and thereupon without regard of his health taking cold, died of a feuer the fourth day after. The Duke of AVSTRIA mortally wounded in the battell, died alſo the night following. H

About this time, or not long after, died Celeſtinus the Pope, author of this expedition; and Henry alſo the Germaine Emperour: after whoſe death great troubles began to ariſe in GERMANIE about the chuſing of a new Emperour. Whereof the Biſhop of MOGVNSIA, then chiefe commander of the armie of the Chriſtians in SYRIA, one of the electors, and the other Germaine Princes with him hauing intelligence, could not by any perſwaſion or praiers of the poore Chriſtians (in whoſe quarrell they were come) be perſwaded longer to ſtay, but that needs home they would, and indeed home they went the ſame way that they came. After whoſe departure the Turks tooke IOPPE, hauing one of the ports betraied vnto them by one of the citie, at ſuch time as the Germaines there in garriſon, after the manner of their countrey, vpon S. Martins day were careleſly making merrie together in their pots: vpon whom ſo ſurcharged with wine, the Turks entring by the port giuen vnto them, put them all with the reſt of the Chriſtians to the ſword, and ſo afterward raſed the citie downe to the ground. Of which victorie they became ſo proud, that they had thought without ſtop to haue driuen the Chriſtians quite out of SYRIA: but by the comming of Simon Countie of MONT-FORT (a moſt valiant and expert captaine, ſent thither by Philip the French King with a regiment of tall ſouldiers, at the inſtance of Innocentius Tertius, that ſucceeded Celeſtinus in the papacie) and by ciuill diſcord then raigning among the Turks themſelues for ſoueraignte, their furie was repreſſed, and a peace betwixt them and the Chriſtians concluded for the ſpace of ten yeeres; during which time the Turks promiſed, not to moleſt the Chriſtians in TYRE or PTOLEMAIS: which hapned in the yeere 1199 (or as ſome others ſay, 1198.) After which peace ſo concluded, the worthie Countie returned againe with his ſouldiers into FRANCE: with whom wee alſo will repaire into the leſſer ASIA (whither the courſe both of the time and of the hiſtorie now calleth vs) to ſee the other greater affaires of the Turks in thoſe Eaſterne countries; leauing for a ſeaſon theſe poore remainders of ſo many Chriſtians in TYRE and PTOLEMAIS, now for a while in peace, but to be ere long deuoured of the Infidels their enemies, as in the proceſſe of this Hiſtorie ſhall in due time and place appeare. The ruine of the Turks firſt Empire in PERSIA: with the ſucceſſe of their ſecond kingdome in the leſſer ASIA vnder the Aladin Kings.

Kingdomes after the manner of other things haue but their time to flouriſh in, and ſo againe decay.

IS no kingdome or empire vpon earth (were it neuer ſo flouriſhing or great) was euer yet ſo aſſured, but that in the reuolution of time, after the manner of other worldly things, it hath as a ſicke bodie been ſubiect vnto many ſtrange innouations and changes, and at length come to nothing: ſo fared it now with the Turkiſh empire, which firſt planted by Tangrolipix in PERSIA and the other farre Eaſterne countries, increaſed by Axan his ſonne, and ſo by the Turkiſh Sultans their ſucceſſors (although their names and doings, as too farre off, be not vnto vs all knowne) for the ſpace of one hundred and ſeuentie yeeres continued, muſt now (I ſay) giue place vnto a greater power, and ſettle it ſelfe elſewhere, the ineuitable deſtinie thereof ſo requiring. It fortuned that about this time (when in the ſpace of a few yeeres, ſuch mutations as had not before of long beene ſeene, chanced in diuers great monarchies and ſtates) that the Tartars, or rather Tattars, inhabiting the large, cold, and bare countries in the North ſide of ASIA (of all others a moſt barbarous, fierce, and needie nation) ſtirred vp by their owne wants, and the perſwaſion of one Zingis (or as ſome call him, Cangis) holden amongſt them for a great Prophet, and now by them made their leader, and honoured with the name of Vlu-Chan, that is to ſay, the mightie King (commonly called the great Cham) flocking together in number like the ſand of the ſea; and conquering firſt their poore neighbours of condition and qualitie like themſelues, and eaſie enough to be intreated with them to ſeeke their better fortune, like ſwarmes of graſhoppers ſent out to deuoure the world: paſſed the high mountaine CAVCASVS, part of the mountaine TAVRVS, of all the mountaines in the world the greateſt, which beginning neere vnto the ARCHIPELAGO, and ending vpon the orientall OCEAN, and running thorow many great and famous kingdomes, diuideth ASIA into two parts: ouer which great mountaine, one of the moſt aſſured bounders of nature, that had ſo many worlds of yeeres ſhut vp this rough and ſauage people, they now paſſing without number, and comming downe (as it were) into another world, full of ſuch natures pleaſant delights, as neuer were to them before ſeene, bare downe all before them as they went, nothing being now able to ſtand in their way. Old Zingis their fortunate leader dead in this ſo great an expedition, Hoccata his ſonne, eldeſt of his twelue brethren, a man of great wiſdome and courage, tooke vpon him his fathers place: who ſending part of his great armie for the ſubduing of the countries Weſtward, turned himſelfe with a world of people towards the Eaſt: where hauing ſubdued the Bactrians and Sogdians with diuers others, he entred into INDIA, and ſubduing that rich countrey on both ſides the riuer INDVS, euen to the Eaſt OCEAN, there in the countrey of CATHAI built the famous citie of CAMBALV, in circuit eight and twentie miles about; for pleaſure and plentie of all things neceſſarie for the life of man, of all the cities of ASIA the chiefe: where the great Cham of TARTARIE ſtill reſiant as in his emperiall citie, commandeth ouer one of the greateſt and ſtrongeſt empires of the world. In whoſe kingdome alſo, in the prouince of MANGY more towards the Eaſt, hee hath another moſt famous citie called QVINSAY, of all the cities in the world the greateſt, in circuit an hundred miles about, as M. Paulus Venetus writeth, who himſelfe dwelt therein about the yeere 1260. It is ſituate in a lake of freſh water, and hath in it twelue thouſand bridges: of which, ſome are of ſuch an height, that tall ſhips with their ſailes vp may eaſily paſſe vnder them. In this populous citie the great Cham hath for the keeping thereof, alwayes thirtie thouſand men in garriſon. The Tartar kingdome thus planted in CAMBALV, Hoccata contenting ting himſelfe with the rich pleaſures of INDIA, afterward mannaged his wars by his liutenants, G being for the moſt part his brethren, or other his nigh kinſmen; of whom hee ſent out with his armies ſome Northward, ſome Weſtward, and ſome toward the South: by whom he ſubdued the Arachoſians, Margians, and diuers other great nations; & entring into PERSIA, ſubdued the countrey, with all PARTHIA, ASSYRIA, MESOPOTAMIA, & MEDIA. At this time in the citie BALCH or BELCH, in the countrey of CHORASAN in the fartheſt part of PERSIA, raigned ouer the Turks one Curſumes, of the Greekes called Corſantes; who finding himſelfe far too weake to ſtand before the Tartarians, fled with all his people, leauing vnto them both the citie and the countrey, which he and the Turks his predeceſſours had euer ſince the time of Tangrolipix poſſeſſed: which citie the Tartars raſed and tooke the countrey to themſelues. In this gene- H rall flight of the Turks, when as euery man was glad to make what ſhift he might for himſelfe, Curſumes their Sultan died, the laſt of the Kings of the Selzuccian family that raigned ouer the Turks in PERSIA: whoſe ſonne Vgnan Chan taking vpon him the leading of ſuch multitudes of Turks as followed his father, ceized vpon the great citie of BABYLON, now called BAGADAT, neere vnto the ruines of the old BABYLON: where hauing put to the ſword all the inhabitants therof, he there, and in the countrey thereabout ſeated himſelfe with the Turks his followers: but long he had not there reſted, but that the Tartars hearing thereof, purſued him, tooke him priſoner, and expulſed thence all his people. There was at the ſame time alſo another kingdome of the Turks at NACHAN a citie in PERSIA, giuing name vnto the countrey wherein it ſtood, not farre from CHORASAN: wherein then raigned one Solyman of the Oguzian family, I as had diuers other of his progenitors before him, who terrified with this dreadfull ſtorme ſo ſuddenly riſen out of the North, and warned by the ſudden fall of the Selzuccian Sultan and his kingdome, of farre greater fame and dower than himſelfe or his, fled alſo with ſuch his ſubjects as would follow him into the leſſer ASIA. But of him and his proceedings more ſhall be ſaid hereafter in the riſing of the victorious Othoman family, as lineally from him diſcended. After this the Tartars together with their good fortune ſtill extending the bounds of their empire, conquered ARMENIA the greater, with the countries of CHOLCHIS and IBERIA: ſo that now their empire was become of all others the greateſt and moſt flouriſhing. This great conquerour (the Tartar) had in his proud conceit purpoſed to haue ſubdued all ASIA, and to haue made the ſea the onely bounder of his empire: but ouercome with the delicacies of INDIA, ha- K uing diuided amongſt his people thoſe great prouinces and fruitfull countries, with the rich cities and pleaſant fields, he ſo reſted, embracing the maners and ſuperſtition of the people he had ouercome. Long it were and farre from our purpoſe to recount all the famous victories and conqueſt of this bare Northren people; ſufficeth it to the hiſtorie wee haue in hand, that the Turks were by them then driuen out of PERSIA, with the countries thereabouts, and their Togran kingdome (as they call it) firſt founded by Tangrolipix, there extinguiſhed, about the yeare of our Lord 1202. The Turkes thus driuen out of PERSIA and their kingdome ouerthrown, retired themſelues into the leſſer ASIA, poſſeſſed by the Turkes their countreymen, long before brought thither by Cutlu-Muſes and his ſonnes (as is before declared) and by them euer ſince in ſome part, though with diuers fortune, holden. Where theſe Turkes now arriuing out L of PERSIA vnder the leading of Aladin, the ſonne of Kei Huſreu, diſcended alſo of the Selzuccian family in PERSIA, and taking the opportunitie offred them by the mortall diſcord of the Latines with the Greekes, and the Greekes among themſelues, ceized vpon CILICIA with the countries thereabouts, and there firſt at SEBASTIA, and afterward at ICONIVM, erected their new kingdome; which of this Aladin is by the Turks called the kingdome of the Aladin Kings, although their names were not all ſo.

The beginning of the Aladinian kingdome in the leſſer Aſia, at Sabaſtia and Iconium.

Now about this time, and within the courſe of ſome few yeares after, ſuch great and ſtrange mutations happened in the Conſtantinopolitane empire, as had not therein at any time before beene ſeene: whereby the whole eſtate of that great empire which ſometime commanded ouer a great part of the world, was almoſt vtterly ſubuerted, and a fit opportunitie giuen vnto the M Turks & infidels for the ſure ſetling of themſelues, and eſtabliſhing of their kingdomes both in SYRIA and the leſſer ASIA: which briefly to run thorow ſhall not be from our purpoſe; their affaires proſpering by theſe troubles, and their proud and ſtately empire that now braueth all the reſt of the world, being raiſed out of the ruines of that Chriſtian empire; and at this preſent triumphing euen in the ſame imperiall citie wherein theſe ſo great innouations hapned through the

A the working of ambitious heads, to the lamentable ruine and deſtruction of a great part of the Chriſtian commonweale.

Alexius the vſurper, but now Emperour, not contented (as is before declared) traiterouſly to haue depriued Iſaack his elder brother of his empire and ſight together: ſought alſo after the life of the young Prince Alexius, his brothers ſonne, and heire apparent of the empire: who ſeeing the villanie committed in the perſon of his father, ſaued himſelfe by flight from the furie of his vncle, and ſo accompanied with certaine great Lords of the Greekes, his fathers friends, fled to craue aid of the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt, whom the Grecians commonly call the Latines. And firſt he tooke his way to Philip the Germane Emperour, who had married Irene his ſiſter, Alexius the young Prince craueth aid of Philip the Emperour and the Latine Princes againſt his vncle the vſurper.

B the Emperour Iſaack his daughter, by whom he was moſt honorably receiued and entertained. This great Lady, not a little moued with the miſerie of her father, and the flight of her brother, ceaſed not moſt inſtantly to ſolicite the Emperor her huſband, not to leaue vnreuenged ſo great a villanie, by the example thereof, dangerous vnto himſelfe & others of like maieſtie and ſtate. She declared vnto him, what an execrable indignitie it was, to ſee her father the Emperour vnworthily impriſoned, depriued of his empire, & ſight, and of the ſocietie of men, by his brother, that had by him receiued and recouered his life, his light, and his libertie: and to ſee the heire apparent of the empire baniſhed by the wickedneſſe of his vncle, to wander vp and downe here and there like a beggar: a great part of which diſgrace, as ſhe ſaid, redounded vnto her ſelfe, the daughter of Iſaack, and ſiſter to the young wandering Prince, and to himſelfe alſo the ſon in law

C vnto the vnfortunate Emperour her father. Moreouer ſhe ſaid, that the murderer Alexius durſt neuer haue beene ſo hardie as to commit ſo great and deteſtable a villanie, if he had not lightly regarded & contemned the maieſtie of the ſaid Philip; whom if he had had in any reuerence or honour, or at all feared, he durſt not haue attempted ſo villanous an act. This Greeke Lady, moued with iuſt griefe, with theſe and ſuch like complaints ſo preuailed with her huſband, that hee promiſed her to be in ſome part thereof reuenged, which he could not for the preſent performe, letted by the wars he then had with Otho his competitour of the empire. At the ſame time it fortuned, that great preparations were in making in France and Italie, and diuers other places of Chriſtendome, for an expedition to be made againſt the Turks into the Holy Land. The chiefe men wherein, were Theobald Countie of Champagne (a man of great fame, and Generall

Great preparation made by the Chriſtians for an expedition into the Holy Land.

D of the Chriſtian armie) Boniface Marqueſſe of Mont-Ferrat, Baldwin Earle of Flanders and Henavlt, and Henry his brother Earle of S. Paul, Henry Duke of Lovaine, Gualter Earle of Breame, with diuers other noble gentlemen, which to name were tedious; vnto whom reſorted alſo many valiant & deuout Chriſtians out of diuers parts of Chriſtendome, ready to haue ſpent their liues in that ſo religious a war: ſo that now the number of them was great, and the armie right populous. But being thus aſſembled together, they thought it not beſt to take their way to Constantinople, thorow Hvngarie and Thrace, and ſo to paſſe ouer into Bythinia; for that the Greekes had ſtill in all former times ſhewed great vncourteſie vnto the Latines, in paſſing with their armies that way: & therfore they thought it much better now, by the way of Italie to take their iourney by ſea into the Holy Land; & for their tranſportation, eſpecially

E to vſe the help of the Venetians, whō they found much the eaſier to be intreated, for that by the meanes of ſo great an armie, they were in hope to ſcoure the Adriaticke (then much infeſted by the Dalmatians) as alſo to recouer Iadera, with ſome other cities vpon the coaſt of Sclavonia before reuolted frō their ſtate to the Hungarians, as indeed they afterward did. But by the way as this armie was marching out of France, & come into Piemont, the noble Countie of Champagne, generall therof, there fell ſicke & died, to the exceeding griefe & ſorrow of the whole armie: in whoſe ſtead, the Marqueſſe of Mont-Ferrat, a man of great nobilitie, & wel acquainted with the wars of the Eaſt, was choſen generall. This great armie, tranſported by the Venetians into Sclavonia, took Iadera, with diuers other port towns along the ſea coaſt, & hauing there done what the Venetians moſt deſired, was about again to haue bin embarked for Syria, & ſo in-

F to the holy land. But the yong Prince Alexius in the mean time had by himſelf & the noble Grecians (fled with him for feare of the tyrant) ſo wrought the matter with the Latin Princes of the Weſt, eſpecially with Innocentius tertius the Pope, with Philip the Emperor his brother in law, & Philip the French King, that they pitying his eſtate, & induced alſo with ſome other conſiderations more proper vnto themſelues, tooke him as it were into their protection, commending by letters & meſſēgers for that purpoſe ſent vnto the armie (which they might cōmand) the defence both of himselfe & his cause: who with the commendation of three so great Princes, comming G to the armie yet lying at IADERA (expecting but a faire wind for to haue passed into SYRIA) was there of them all most honourably receiued, as the son of an Emperour, and as became one vnto them so highly commended. And he himselfe also, as one that knew his good, was not in any thing wanting vnto himselfe, but recõmended himselfe to their protection, as a poore exiled Prince in distresse, yet of a good and liuely spirit, gracious in speech, beautiful to behold, and very young; and withall, fully instructed by the noble Grecians that were with him, in all things that might serue to further his purpose. And forasmuch as this great armie was composed of di-uers nations, especially of the French, Italians, & Venetians, not all to be by one meane moued, he fitted euery one of them with such motiues as he thought might most preuaile with them: H Vnto the French he promised to pay the great sums of money they had borrowed of the Venetians, for the furnishing of themselues in this warre: Vnto the Venetians he promised to recompence thẽ for al the iniuries they had sustained by the late Constantinopolitan Emperors, especially by the Emperor Emanuel (who for that they had refused to aid him in his wars against William King of SICILIE, did in one day confiscat al the goods of the Venetian merchants within his empire, of a wonderful value: & afterwards contrary to the law of nations, shamefully intreated their embassadors sent vnto him, amongst whom was Henry Dandulus, now by fortune generall for the Venetians in the armie: who moued as well with the wrong in particular done vnto himselfe, as with the common, desired to be reuenged both of the one and of the other; which although he could not haue of Emanuel himselfe, being long before dead, yet was he still desirous I to haue it of some one of the Greeke Emperours, whosoeuer he were:) Vnto the Pope and the Italians, both he and the noblemen with him, had before promised, that the Greeke Church should for euer acknowledge the supremacie of the Church of ROME, and from thenceforth submit it selfe therunto, as vnto the soueraign Iudge of al the churches of Christendome: which caused the Pope Innocentius by letters, by legates, by embassadors, and by all other meanes possible, to further the cause of the young Prince Alexius, so combined with his owne: alleadging the diuersitie of opinions in matters of religion, betwixt the Greekes and the Latines, to haue been the chiefe cause that the Mahometanes had not been long agoe by their vnited forces subdued, or vtterly rooted out. In briefe, the young Prince spared not to promise most bountifull rewards in generall to all that should take his part against his vncle the vsurping Emperour. K

Alexius commeth vnto the armie.

By this meanes, the deuout warre, taken in hand for the relieue of the poore Christians in SY-RIA, was laid aside, and the same forces that should haue beene therein employed, now conuerted against the Greeke empire, to the great weakening of that side of the Christian common-weale, and aduantage of the common enemie; who might then easily haue been oppressed, had he with the vnited forces of the Christians been on this side charged home, as he was on the farther by the Tartars. The Grecian warre thus resolued vpon, it seemed best vntõ the great commanders of the armie, to march directly to CONSTANTINOPLE, as to the head of the Grecian state, and place where the tyrant whom they sought after, was resiant. In the meane time it was by them giuen out thorow all the Greeke cities which the Emperour had strongly manned and fortified for the staying of their passage, that their purpose was not to make warre against the L Grecians their friends, but only to restore their lawfull Emperour vnto his former state and honour: And that forasmuch as euery citie and towne in ancient GREECE had appointed rewards, & almost diuine honours vnto such as had deliuered them from tyrants, they should now more fauourably receiue and intreat them that came to restore vnto euery citie, and to euery man in generall, their former libertie & honour. And so vpon the resolution for CONSTANTINOPLE, embarking their armie, and passing thorow the Ionian sea into the Ægeum, and so without let thorow the straits of HELESPONTVS into PROPONTIS, and entring the straits of BOSPHORVS THRACIVS, which diuide EVROPE from ASIA, they came to an anker euen in the face of the
A great fleet of the Latines before Constantinople. citie. In this fleet were two hundred and fortie saile of tall ships, sixtie gallies, seuentie ships for burden, and one hundred and twentie saile of victuallers: which all together made a most braue M shew, couering that strait in such sort, as that it seemed rather a wood than a part of the sea. Thus for a space they lay facing the citie, attending if happily vpon the comming & sight of so great a fleet, & the report of so puissant an armie as the young Prince Alexius had brought with him, any tumult or sedition might arise in the citie. But the warie tyrant had so well prouided therefore beforehand, that the citizens although they in heart fauoured the young Prince, and wished him

A him well, yet durſt they not once moue or ſtirre in his quarrell. Whileſt the fleet thus lay, embaſſadours came from the iſle of CRETE, in two great gallies, with three banks of oares, yeelding vnto the yong prince that goodly iſland, with all the townes & cities therein: which he foorthwith gaue vnto the marqueſſe of MONT-FERRAT, generall of the armie, thereby to encourage the other great commanders of the armie to do the vttermoſt of their deuoire, in hope of recompence and rewards anſwerable to their deſerts and valour.

Before the arriuall of this fleet, Alexius the emperour had with a great chaine made faſt the entrance of the hauen betwixt CONSTANTINOPLE and PERA, and appointed twentie great gallies well manned for the keeping thereof: but a great gale of wind ariſing, the generall ſent B out the greateſt and ſtrongeſt ſhip in the fleet (of her greatneſſe and ſwiftneſſe called the Eagle) which with all her ſailes vp, carried with a full gale of wind, by maine force brake the chain, and made away for the reſt of the fleet to enter; which the Greekes in the gallies ſeeing, for feare fled, leauing the gallies for a ſpoile vnto the Venetians, by whom they were all taken, but not a man found in them. The hauen thus gained, Theodorus Laſcaris the Emperours ſonne in law, was preſently readie vpon the ſhore with a ſelect companie of the braueſt gallants of the citie and of the court, to haue hindered the Latines from landing; who running their ſhips a ground, landed with ſuch cheerefulneſſe and courage, and with ſuch haſt, that in one moment you might haue ſeene them leape out of their ſhips, take land, enter into the battell, and lay about them like mad men. This hote skirmiſh endured a great while, for that they were onely footmen that ſuſtained C this brunt, for the horſes could not ſo ſoone be landed, and the Greekes were brauely mounted. All this great fight the Conſtantinopolitanes beheld, with doubtfull hearts expecting what ſhould bee the euent thereof. There were in the citie ſixtie thouſand of the flower of Greece, which brauely ſallying out, made the battell much more doubtfull; yet ſuch was the valour and reſolution of the Latines, that in fine the Greekes diſcomfited, were glad to retire themſelues againe into the citie, but with what loſſe, was not certainely knowne: eaſie it were to gueſſe, that it was right great, for that the old tyrant Alexius diſcouraged therewith, and doubtfull of his owne ſtate, with Theodorus Laſcaris his ſonne in law, and ſome few others of his truſtie friends (hard to be found in ſo dangerous a caſe) the next night following ſecretly fled out of the citie, carrying away with him a wonderfull maſſe of treaſure (which hee againſt all ſuch euents had D cauſed to bee ſecretly hidden by his daughter Irene, in a monaſterie of Nuns within the citie, whereof ſhe was the abbeſſe) and ſo ſaued himſelfe.

The Latines by force enter the hauen of Conſtantinople.

A hot skirmiſh betwixt the Greekes & the Latines at their landing.

The flight of the tyrant once bruted, the next morning the Conſtantinopolitanes taking the old emperour Iſaack out of priſon, ſaluted him againe for their emperour, rejoycing greatly for his deliuerance, and the ſafegard of his life: and after that opened the gates of the citie vnto the Latines, calling and ſaluting them by the names of the reuengers and ſauiours of the libertie of the Greekes, as alſo of the life and majeſtie of their emperour; they requeſted them that they might ſee and ſalute Alexius their young prince, whom they had ſo long deſired: and ſo was the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, by the ſubmiſſion of the citizens, for that time ſaued from ſaccage and ſpoile. The old emperour thus deliuered, and together with his ſonne Alexius again E placed in the imperiall ſeat, gaue the moſt heartie thanks that poſsibly he could vnto the Latine princes, for that by their bountie, charitie, and valour, the Greeke empire had been deliuered out of a long and miſerable ſeruitude: and for his owne particular, that he had receiued of them ſo great good, that albeit his ſight could not be reſtored to him againe, neuertheleſſe, hee acknowledged his life, his libertie, his empire, his countrey, his ſonne, to haue been vnto him by them reſtored, and he likewiſe to them: for which their ſo great deſerts he could not (as he ſaid) render them condigne thanks, or deuiſe rewards or honours anſwerable to their demerits and valour: and that therefore he did ratefie and confirme whatſoeuer his ſonne had before promiſed vnto them for his deliuerance: and not onely that, but farther promiſed, That if they were not therewith contented, hee would of his owne bountie giue them better contentment, not meaning F they ſhould goe diſcontented, that had ſaued his life, and otherwiſe ſo highly pleaſured him. Hereupon this good old emperour began to conſult with his friends about the meanes wherby he might ſatisfie and content the Latines in ſuch things as the young prince his ſonne had vnto them promiſed. And to the intent that the citizens of CONSTANTINOPLE might the more willingly doe that he was to command them, and the more cheerefully pay ſuch impoſitions as hee was to lay vpon them, hee intreated all the Latines to retire themſelues out of the citie into their their campe or about their ſhips, which they accordingly did. But the impoſition being ſet G downe, and what euery man was to pay, ſeemed vnto the Greeks (as men of long accuſtomed to receiue tribute of others, and not to pay tribute to others) a matter moſt heauie and intollerable.

In this verie inſtant that this exaction was required, died the old Emperour Iſaack, who hauing of long been kept in a darke and ſtinking priſon in continuall feare of death, and now deliuered and reſtored to his Empire, could not endure ſo ſudden and vnexpected a change, both of the aire and of his manner of liuing, but ſo ſuddenly died.

At this exaction impoſed for the contentment of the Latines, the light Conſtantinopolitans grieuouſly murmured and exclaimed, ſaying, That it was a villanous thing to ſee the Greeke Empire engaged and bound (by a yong boy) vnto a couetous and proud nation, and ſo to bee H ſpoiled and bare of coyne: That the great and rich iſland of CRETE lying in the midſt of the ſea, was by him giuen as a gift vnto the Latines: That the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE and the Greeke church, had by him beene enforced and conſtrained to yeeld vnto the See of ROME, to receiue the opinions of the Latine church, to ſubmit it ſelfe vnto the obeiſance of old ROME, from whence it had once happily departed euer ſince the time that the empire was by Conſtantine the Great tranſlated thence to them. Thus euerie one ſaid for himſelfe in particular: thus all men ſaid in generall. And therof the noble men in their aſſemblies, and the vulgar people in their meetings, grieuouſly complained: whereupon a great ſedition and tumult was raiſed in the citie. Some preſently tooke vp armes, and the common people all enraged ran fu-riouſly diſordered vnto the palace, with a purpoſe to haue committed ſome great outrage vpon I the perſon of the yong Emperour Alexius: who in that ſo ſudden an inſurrection, as might well haue troubled a right conſtant man, without longer ſtay reſolued vpon a moſt wholeſome and neceſſarie point for the appeaſing of the peoples furie; vnto whom (aſſembled in a woonderful multitude) he ſhewed himſelfe from aboue in his palace, promiſing them to remaine in their power, and not from thencefoorth to doe any thing without their aduice and liking, but wholy to depend vpon them: with which good words the people held themſelues well content, and ſo was the tumult for that time appeaſed. But foorthwith the young Emperour conſidering the injurie done vnto him, began to burne with the deſire of reuenge and to change his purpoſe. He could not together ſatisfie the citizens and the Latines: for if he would keepe his promiſe with the Latines, he muſt of neceſſitie offend his owne people; neither was there any meanes to bee K found to ſatisfie both the one and the other. But thinking himſelfe more bound to keepe his promiſe with the Latines, whoſe forces he knew not how to withſtand, he ſent ſecretly to requeſt the marques of MONT-FERRAT, generall of the armie, to ſend him about midnight certaine companies of ſouldiers into the citie, aſſuring him to receiue them in by a gate neere vnto the palace, which ſhould bee opened vnto them by certaine of his truſtie ſeruants there left for that purpoſe. Of this plot Alexius Ducas (of his bittle browes ſurnamed Murzuſle, whom of a baſe fellow the emperour Iſaack had promoted vnto the greateſt honours of the court) was not ignorant, who being a man of an aſpiring mind, and in theſe troubleſome times hauing long thirſted after the Empire, tooke now this occaſion to worke vpon.

Alexius ſeeketh to bring the Latines againe into the citie.

The Conſtantinopolitans again in an vprore.

The night following, he by his agents, men inſtructed for the purpoſe, raiſed a tumult in the L citie, not inferiour vnto that which had happened the day before: and at the ſame inſtant, as if he had had nothing to do in the matter, came ſuddenly vnto the young emperour in the dead time of the night (which he might at all times do, by reaſon of the great confidence the emperour had in him) and with a ſad countenance told him, That the people were vp againe in an vprore, and eſpecially they of his guard, and that they were comming toward him to do him ſome violence for the loue hee bare vnto the Latines. With which vnexpected newes the young Emperour terrified, demaunded of him as of his moſt faithfull counſellor, what were beſt in that caſe for him to doe? Who preſently embracing him in his night gowne, lead him out by a ſecret doore into a tent he had of his owne in the court, as if hee would there haue kept him ſafe: but far was that from his traiteous thoughts; who departing from him, as if he had gone to appeaſe the tu- M mult, had before taken order, That he ſhould preſently after his departure, be caſt in bonds, & ſo be clapt vp into a cloſe ſtinking priſon. Which done, the falſe traitor openly ſhewing himſelfe, made an oration vnto the people, wherein he ſhewed himſelfe to haue great compaſſion of the Greeke empire, & of the Greeks his countrymen themſelues, eſpecially in that they were gouerned by a youth vnfit for the gouernment, who ſuffered himſelf to be miſſe-led according to the pleaſure

A pleasure of the Latines. And that it was high time for the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, the seat of the Greek empire, to looke about it, and to haue an eie vnto it selfe, sith it was betraied and sold by them which ought to preserue and keepe the same: that they had now need of a man that loued his countrey and countreymen, before that which yet remained of the Grecian name were vtterly extinguished by the Latines.

This his speech, fitted of purpose vnto the humour of the seditious, was receiued with the great outcrie and applause of the windie headed people. Some cried out that he, and none but he, was to be made chiefe of the common weale that was by them to be established: other some cried as loud to haue him made generall of the armies and forces of the state: but the greatest
B crie was to haue him chosen and created Emperour; whereunto the rest giuing place, hee was by the generall consent of the tumultuous people, without longer stay, chosen and proclaimed Emperour.

Alexius the traitour, by no lawfull election or rightfull succession, but onely by the furie of the tumultuous people, thus created Emperour; was of nothing more carefull than how to breake the forces of the Latines, of whom onely he now stood in dread. And therefore to begin withall, he first attempted by certaine gallies filled with pitch, flax, brimstone, and such like matter apt to take fire, to haue burnt the Venetian fleet: which gallies so set on fire & carried with a faire gale of wind amongst the fleet, had been like enough to haue done great harme, had it not by the warinesse of the Venetians been preuented: who being good sea men, & not vnacquainted with such deuises, easily & without danger auoided the same, by keeping themselues aloofe
C one from another in the sea. This finenes sorting to no purpose, he to colour the matter sent certaine messengers to the generall, and other commanders of the armie, to giue them to vnderstand that that which was done for the firing of the fleet, had been done without his priuitie, by the malice of the tumultuous people, and that for his part he would be glad of their fauour and friendship, assuring them likewise of his, and promising them to aid them both with men and money, and whatsoeuer else they should haue need of in their wars against the infidels. Whereunto an answer was giuen by Dandulus the Venetian generall, That he would beleeue it, when Alexis the sonne of the Emperor Isaack, whom the Latines had placed in the empire, should assure them thereof, and intreat for the people, vpon whom the fault of that outrage was laid:
D which answere the more mooued the traiterous tyrant, to rid himselfe cleane of the feare of the yong prince, by taking him out of the way; to the intent to hinder the people of the hope and great desire they had to grow to some peace with the Latines, by taking him out of prison, and receiuing him againe for their Emperour: For the people (by nature mutable, and not desirous of the good of themselues, but according to the occurrents present, without any great regard of that they haue alreadie done, or ought to haue done) began now to repent themselues of that they had done against the yong Emperor Alexis in the fauour of the tyrant, and commonly said, That they must find some meanes, whatsoeuer it were, to remedie their fault together with their troubles. Wherefore Murzufle fearing this sudden mutation of the people, with his owne hands most villanously strangled the yoong Prince Alexis in prison, hauing as yet not E raigned much aboue six months, and immediately after caused it to be bruited abroad, That the said yoong prince dispairing of his estate, had as a man desperate hanged himselfe.

Murzufle attempteth to burne the Venetian fleet.

The tyrant in vaine hauing thus attempted the burning of the fleet, & still fearing the reuenging sword of the Latines, resolued now by plaine force to meet them in the field, and there to dare them battell. So hauing made readie and armed the whole strength of the imperiall citie, he with cheerefull speech encouraged his souldiers, requesting them valiantly to maintaine and defend their countrey of Greece, the monuments of their fathers, the glorie of their ancestors, their present honour, and the future hope of their posteritie: that hauing before their eyes the wals of their citie, within which they were borne, nourished, and brought vp in hope of great matters, they would haue pitie and compassion of their temples, their wiues, their children, F and in no case to suffer them to fall again into so miserable and wretched a seruitude, but rather to die a thousand deaths. And the more to grace this his enterprise taken in hand for the defence of his countrey (as hee would haue the world to beleeue it) with the colour of a superstitious deuotion also, he caused the Priests in their ecclesiastike attire and ornaments, to march forth in the armie, with an ensigne, hauing in it displaied the picture of the Virgin Marie. So couragiously marching forward, he first charged that quarter of the campe where Baldwin the the Countie of FLANDERS lay, where at the firſt was fought a right fierce and doubtfull bat- G tell. But afterward the alarum running thorowout all the campe of the Latines, and new ſupplies comming in on euery ſide, the Greekes were put to the worſe, and enforced againe to retire into the citie, hauing loſt a great number of men, together with their ſuperſtitious enſigne. It was a wonderfull thing to ſee, with what rare agreement the Latines, being of diuers nations, continued this expedition vndertaken againſt the Greekes. Seuentie two dayes was the citie of Conſtantinople hardly beſieged. CONSTANTINOPLE ſtraightly beſieged by the Latines both by ſea and land, without gi-uing any time of reſt or repoſe day or night vnto the beſieged, freſh men comming ſtill on to the aſſault, as the other fell off, and in ſuch ſort troubled the Greekes in the citie, that they knew Conſtantinople ſet on fire. not well what to doe or which way to turne themſelues. The Venetians, vnto whom was com- H mitted the charge to aſſault that ſide of the citie which was toward the hauen, vpon two great gallies made faſt together, built a ſtrong tower of wood, higher than the wals and rampiers of the towne, out of which they both with ſhot and fire-workes much troubled the defendants, wherewith they in the time of the aſſault approching the wall, by their fine deuices fired that ſide of the citie: by the rage whereof, a great number of houſes were burnt, with many other ſtately buildings and ancient monuments of that famous citie: and had at that preſent gained a great tower neere vnto the port, deſtitute of defenders, had not the tyrant himſelfe in good time come with new ſupplies to the reſcue thereof. In like manner, the French, with the reſt, aſ-ſailed the other ſide of the citie by land, where they were to fight not againſt the defendants only, but againſt deepe ditches, high and ſtrong wals, and bulwarkes alſo: neuertheleſſe, ſuch was I the valour and furie of the Latines, with the deſire of victorie, as that they were not with any difficulties to be diſmaied; but preſſing ſtill on, by a thouſand dangers, at length after a moſt ſharpe aſſault they gained one of the greateſt baſtillions on that ſide of the citie, called the Angels tower, and ſo by plaine force opened a way both for themſelues and the reſt into the citie.

Whereof Alexius vnderſtanding, and ſtrucke with preſent deſpaire both of his ſtate and life, the night now comming on, fled with Euphroſina the Emperour Alexius his wife, and Eudocia her daughter, whom he had maried when he had raigned about a moneth and 16 dayes.

The tyrant, author of all this miſchiefe, and of the calamities enſuing, thus fled, and the Latines furiouſly entring; the Prieſts and religious men in their ſurplices, and other eccleſiaſtike ornaments, with their croſſes and banners (as in ſolemne proceſſion) met the Latines, & falling K downe at the ſouldiers feet, with flouds of teares abundantly running down their heauie countenances, beſought them, but eſpecially the captains and commanders, to remember the condition of worldly things, and contenting themſelues with the victorie, the glorie, the honour, the empire, the immortalitie of their name, to abſtaine from ſlaughter, from burning, from ſpoiling & ranſacking of ſo beautifull a citie: And that ſeeing they were themſelues men, they would alſo haue pitie of men: and being themſelues captaines and ſouldiers, they ſhould alſo haue com-paſſion vpon captaines and ſouldiers; who although they were not ſo valiant and fortunate as they were, yet neuertheleſſe were both captaines and ſouldiers: And that they would keepe and preſerue their citie, whereof (if they ruinated it not) they might haue much more pleaſure and commoditie, than if they ſhould deſtroy the ſame, which as it had been the principall ſeat of the L Greeke empire, ſo might it now be of the Latines: That ſeeing they had thereof had a careſull regard, as then belonging to another man, they ought now vpon better reaſon to haue more care thereof, being their owne: That the authors of all theſe troubles and miſchiefes, Alexius the elder, and Murzuſle, had already receiued a reward anſwerable to their follies, in that they were driuen into exile: That they would haue pitie and compaſſion of an innocent and vnfortunate multitude of poore people, oppreſſed & grieuouſly tormented with the often tyrannies of their murderous lords & gouernours: That in ſo doing, God the Lord of hoaſts, the giuer and guider of battels, the God of mercy, would therefore reward them: To conclude, they humbly be-ſought them to pardon their citizens, to put on the hearts of gracious & mercifull lords and fathers, not of enemies and rough maſters; of forgiuers, not of reuengers: and to vnderſtand by M their teares, their miſerable eſtate and woes paſſed. With this ſo humble a ſubmiſſion and complaint of the religious, ſome of the better ſort were happily moued: but with the common ſouldiers, breathing nothing but victorie, with their weapons in their hands, and the ſpoile of an empire in their power, what auailed praiers or teares? Euery man fell to the ſpoile, and in ſo great choice & libertie of all things, fitted his owne diſordered appetite, without reſpect of the wrong

A or iniurie done to others: only from the effuſion of innocent bloud they abſtained; they whoſe liues they ſought after, being alreadie fled, together with the tyrant. Other iniuries and outrages (ſo great, as that greater could none be) were in euery place ſo rife, that euery ſtreet, euery lane, euery corner of the citie was filled with mourning and heauineſſe. There might a man haue ſeene noble men earſt of great honour, and reuerend for their hoarie haires, with other citizens of great wealth, thruſt out of all they had, walking vp and downe the citie weeping and wringing their hands, as men forlorne, not knowing where to ſhroud their heads. Neither ſtaied the greedie rage of the inſolent ſouldiers within the wals of mens priuate houſes, but brake out into the ſtately palaces, temples, and churches of the Greekes alſo, where all was good prize, and no-
B thing dedicated to the ſeruice of God, left vnpolluted and defaced, no place vnſought, no corner vnrifled: right lamentable and almoſt incredible it were to report all the miſeries of that time. Some of the Greeke Hiſtoriographers, men of great marke and place, and themſelues eye-witneſſes and partakers of thoſe euils, haue by their writings complained to all poſteritie, of the inſolencie of the Latines at the winning of the citie, to their eternall diſhonour: but that diſordered ſouldiers in all ages in the libertie of their inſolent victorie, haue done ſuch outrages, as honeſt mindes abhorre to thinke vpon. Thus CONSTANTINOPLE, the moſt famous citie of the Eaſt, the ſeat and glorie of the Greeke empire, by the miſerable ambition and diſſention of the Greekes for ſoueraigntie, fell into the hands of the Latines the twelfth of Aprill, in the yeere 1204, or after the account of others, 1200. 1204

C CONSTANTINOPLE thus taken, and the tyrants put to flight, the Princes and great commanders of the armie held a counſell, to conſider what were beſt to be done concerning the citie and the new gained empire: for after ſo great a victorie, they thought it not good to raſe ſo ancient and important a citie, ſeated as it were a watch tower vpon the theatre of the world, ouerlooking both ASIA and EVROPE from the one to the other, as an eye of the vniuerſall; and ſo commodiouſly planted, as was no other citie of the world, for the keeping vnder of the enemies of the Chriſtian Religion: but that it were much better to place there a Latine gouernour, to eſtabliſh there the Latine lawes and cuſtomes, and to vnite the Greeke church as a member vnto the church of ROME. In which conſultation, ſome were of opinion, not to haue any moe Emperours in Chriſtendome but one, and therefore to make choice of Philip the D Germane Emperour, author of this warre, whoſe wife Irene was the only daughter and heire of the late Emperour Iſaack Angelus, vnto whom by all right the inheritance of her fathers empire belonged. But the greater part, conſidering that the troubled affaires of GREECE, in ſo great a change and newneſſe of the empire, had need of the perſonall preſence of a Prince, thought it better to make choice of one among themſelues, who there ſtill reſiant in that place, might at all times giue aid vnto the Latines in their ſacred wars, taken in hand againſt the Infidels: which opinion as the better, was approued of them all. The chiefe men in this election of the new Emperour, were Baldwin Countie of FLAVNDERS and HAINAVLT, Henry his brother, Lewis Countie of BLOYS, Symon de Montfort, Iohn de Dammartin, Gualter de Brienne, Hugh Countie of S. Paul, Iohn Countie of BRENNE, Boniface Marqueſſe of MONT-FERRAT, Ste-
E phen Countie of PERCH, and fiue gentlemen of VENICE: vnto whom alſo were ioyned two Biſhops of SYRIA, the one of BETHLEM, the other of PTOLEMAIS, who had oftentimes come to the campe of the Latines, to ſtirre them vp for the taking in hand of the ſacred warre in SYRIA; with two Biſhops of FRANCE alſo, namely of SOISSON and TROY in CHAMPAGNE, and the Abbot of LEMELY. Theſe great Lords and Prelates aſſembled into the church of the holy Apoſtles, after they had there with great deuotion craued of God to inſpire them with his ſpirit, for the choice of a good and iuſt Prince fit for ſo great a charge; with one conſent made choice of Baldwin Countie of FLAVNDERS and HAINAVLT, for Emperor of GREECE: a braue and valiant Prince, about two and thirtie yeeres old, who was afterward the ſixteenth day of May in the yeere 1204 (or after the computation of others, in the F yeere 1205) in the great Temple of S. Sophia ſolemnly crowned by Thomas Maurocenus a Venetian, firſt Patriarch of the Latines in CONSTANTINOPLE. From which time the Greeke church in CONSTANTINOPLE began to receiue the rites and ceremonies of the Latines, and to acknowledge the ſupremacie of the church of ROME.

The Greeke empire deuided amongſt the Latines.

It was not long after that CONSTANTINOPLE was thus taken by the Latines, but that they diuiding their forces without any reſiſtance, tooke in the moſt part of the great countries and and prouinces on EVROPE ſide, belonging to the Greeke empire in the time of Iſaack Angelus the late Emperour: the fortune of the whole empire, as it were following the fortune of the imperiall citie. Which large countries ſo gained from the Greekes, the Latines diuided amongſt themſelues, as good prize taken from their enemies. Vnto Baldwin the Emperor and his ſucceſſors in the empire, was aſſigned the imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, and the countrey of THRACIA, with a limited ſoueraignetie ouer all the reſt of the prouinces by the Latines alreadie or afterwards to be gained: Vnto the Venetians in this diuiſion of the empire, was allotted for their ſhare all the rich Iſlands of the ÆGEVM, and IONIAN, with the famous Iſland of CANDIE alſo; which although it were before by the young Emperour Alexis in the beginning of theſe warres, giuen vnto the Marqueſſe of MONT-FERRAT, yet in this diuiſion of the empire, it was taken from him (not without his good liking) and giuen to the Venetians, as for them more fit: in ſtead and lieu whereof, the Marqueſſe had the citie of THESSALONICA with all the kingdome of THESSALIE, and a great part of PELOPONESVS aſſigned vnto him, with the royall title of a King. Of the aforeſaid Iſlands (in number many and exceeding rich) the Venetians in the name of the ſtate fortified ſome few of the greateſt with conuenient garriſons, the reſt they left to be poſſeſſed and defended by the better ſort of the citizens at their priuate coſt and charges; who according to their abilitie, tooke into their poſſeſſion, ſome one Iſland, ſome another, and ſome two or three, one, as they were able to ſet out their gallies, one, two, or moe, for the keeping of the ſame: ouer all which, the ſeigniorie neuertheleſſe had a generall care, ſtill keeping a fleet with one of their admirals at ſea; by whom they not onely repreſſed the Genua pirats then buſie in thoſe ſeas, but alſo tooke in certaine ſtrong townes in the maine vpon the coaſt of PELOPONESVS, namely MODON and CORONE; all which they of long time after held as a part of their ſeigniorie. Some other particular places, yet parts alſo of the empire, were giuen vnto particular men; as the dukedome of ATHENS vnto one Geffrey of TROY in CHAMPAIGNE, a Frenchman, a valiant captaine, whom they alſo made Prince of ACHAIA: Another dukedome was alſo giuen to the Countie of BLOYS; as were diuers other countries and townes alſo vnto other more priuate men: who neuertheleſſe were bound to hold the ſame of the Emperour, as of their Lord, and to pay him yeerely a fourth part of the reuenue ariſing thereof towards the maintenance of his ſtate. Yea the Greekes themſelues in this ſhipwracke of their ſtate and empire, although they diſdained nothing more than the ſtrange gouernment of the Latines, yet could they not be perſwaded to ioyne together in ſo common a calamitie, but after their wonted manner ſought euery man how to ſhare out ſomething for himſelfe, without regard of the common good: one ſeized vpon one ſtrong towne or citie, and ſo likewiſe another; which for all that they held not long, driuen thence for the moſt part by a greater power, either of the Latines, or of their owne countreymen.

The man whom the diſcontented Greekes moſt looked after, was Theodorus Laſcaris, the Emperour Alexius Angelus his ſonne in law: who at the taking of the citie, fled to ADRIANOPLE, and afterward into BYTHINIA, where he was of the people, not of that countrey only, but of others alſo farther off, ioyfully receiued and honoured as their Emperour. So taking into his hands the countries of BYTHINIA, PHRYGIA, MISIA, IONIA, and LYDIA, euen from the windings of the famous riuer MÆANDER Southward, vnto the EVXINE ſea Northward; he with the generall good liking of the people, tooke vpon him the ſtate of an Emperour, and ſo in the renowmed citie of NICE made the ſeat of his empire. At the ſame time alſo Dauid, and Alexius Comneni, the nephewes of the tyrant Andronicus (ſometime Emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE) by his ſonne Manuel, poſſeſſing the more Eaſterne countries of PONTVS, GALATIA, and CAPADOCIA, erected vnto themſelues another empire in TRAPEZOND, where their poſteritie of the honourable houſe of the Comneni raigned in great glorie many yeeres after, vntill their empire, together with the empire of CONSTANTINOPLE, was by the great Emperour of the Turks, Mahomet the ſecond, ſubuerted and brought to nought, as ſhall be afterward in due time and place declared. Thus the Greeke empire expoſed (as it were) to the generall ſpoile, was no longer one, but many empires: Baldwin raigning in CONSTANTINOPLE, the Marqueſſe of MONT-FERRAT in THESSALIE, Theodorus Laſcaris at NICE, Alexius Comnenus in TRAPEZOND, and the Venetians in the Iſlands; all in royall dignitie. Beſides whom were many other leſſer Princes, which had here and there according to their abilitie ſeized vpon ſome one or other part of the empire, and there erected their Toparchies, raigning therein as

A pettie Kings: as did Aldebrandinus in ATTALIA, Michael Angelus in EPIRVS, with diuers others too long to rehearse.

Baldwin (as is aforesaid) created Emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE, by the helpe of the Venetian Admirall Dandulus, and other great commanders of the armie, in short time brought vnder his obeisance all the cities of THRACIA, excepting the citie of ADRIANOPLE, whereunto the better sort of the discontented Greekes, together with Theodorus Lascaris (disdaining the gouernment of the Latines) were fled, as vnto a most safe sanctuarie: which Baldwin knowing, and withall desiring whilest yet he had his friends about him, to set his new empire in some good stay, without farther delay came and laid hard siege to the same. Now the Greekes gene- Hadrianople besieged by the Emperour Baldwin.
B rally euill intreated by the Latines, and grieued to be gouerned by them, were some of them fled into other their neighbour Princes countries, but especially into BVLGARIA, otherwise called MISIA, a large kingdome, lying betwixt the great mountain ÆMVS and DANVBIVS: by whose perswasion, Iohn King of that countrey, aided by the Scythians (a fierce Northerne people, but lately come into those quarters) and by the fugitiue Greekes themselues, tooke vpon him to relieue the besieged citie: and so with a great armie approching the same, sent before certaine troupes of the Scythian archers on horsebacke, to fetch in such booties of horses or cattell as they should finde neere vnto the Emperours campe: and withall commanded them that being charged by the imperials, they should forthwith retire, so to draw them out of their trenches, into the place where the King with the greatest part of his armie lay couertly to entrap
C them. Which the Scythians (well acquainted with such seruice) so well performed vnder the leading of one Cozus their Generall, that hauing once or twice drawne their enemies vnto some light skirmishes, and so retiring, and ere long againe with a greater number returning, they at length cunningly drew the Emperour with all his armie, in hope to doe some great matter vpon them, euen as they wished, into the place whereas the King with his armie lay in wait among the woods and mountaines for them; where they wearied and out of breath in the former pursuit, and now on euery side beset with fresh enemies, were ouerthrowne with a great slaughter. In which conflict, to increase the losse, Baldwin the Emperour himselfe was taken and sent prisoner in bonds to TERNOVA: where afterwards by the commandement of the barbarous King he was most cruelly put to death, hauing his hands and feet cut off, and so dismembred
D was cast out into a deepe valley, where he yet lay miserably breathing three dayes after, and so died; leauing his body as fortunes scorne, for a prey vnto the wilde beasts and birds of the aire; no man vouchsafing to burie it. Thus perished this worthy Prince, for his vertues commended euen of the Greekes themselues, being about the age of three and thirtie yeeres, and not hauing raigned yet a full yeere, in the yeere of our Lord 1206. 1206

The victorie thus gained, and the citie relieued, the barbarous King with his sauage souldiers hauing tasted the wealth of the Latines, ouerthrowne in the late battell, and the pleasures of THRACIA, now subiect to their lust; greedily pursued their good fortune, without respect of all humanitie: the open countrey they ouerran, spoiling whatsoeuer came to hand, the rich and famous cities they rifled, and afterward rased them downe to the ground, namely SERRÆ, E PHILIPPOPOLIS, APRI, RHEDESTVM, PERINTHVS, DAONIVM, ARCADIOPOLIS, MESENA, ZVRVLVS, and ATHYRA: the citizens and countrey people fled into the cities for refuge, they put all to the sword, without respect of age, sex, or condition, except some few whom they carried away with them prisoners, so that of all the prouinces of that rent and ruinated empire, the countrey of THRACE was most miserable; as first spoiled by the Latines, and now laid desolate by the Bulgarians & Scythians. Only some few of the strongest cities, as DIDYMOTICHVM and ADRIANOPLE, valiantly defended by the Greekes and Latines, escaped this furie of the Barbarians, all the rest that fell into their hands being laid waste and desolate.

In this so troubled a State of the new erected Empire of the Latines in CONSTANTINO- Henry second Emperor of the Latines in Constantinople.
F PLE, the Latines made choise of Henry the late Emperour Baldwins brother, as of all others the fittest to succeed him in the Empire; who aided by the Marquesse, now King of THESSALIE, and the other Latine Princes, notably repulsed the Barbarians, and left them not vntill that at length he had recouered from them all such towns and cities as they had before taken, and driuen them quite out of the countrey, and so well established himselfe in his new empire.

But to leaue this dismembred empire, now in the hands of many, and to come neerer vnto our purpose: Alexius Angelus the vsurper, driuen out of the imperiall citie by the Latines, to saue himselfe, fled into THESSALIE, and from thence vnto Leo Scurus (then a man of great fame among the Greekes) who tyrannizing at NAVPLVS, as had his father before him, was in these troublesome times growne greater by surprising of the two famous cities of ARGOS and CORINTH: by whose meanes he cunningly entrapped Alexius Ducas, surnamed Murzufle the traitor, and for a secret grudge not commonly knowne, put out his eyes: himselfe an exiled man being a most heauie enemie vnto the other also exiled; and himselfe thrust out of the empire, a deadly foe vnto the other, oppressed with the like calamitie. Shortly after which losse of his sight he was by chance taken by the Latines, and so brought backe to CONSTANTINOPLE, where he was for murdering the young Emperour Alexius, worthily condemned vnto a strange & horrible kinde of death: for, cast off from an high tower, and tumbling heeles ouer head downeward, he was with the waight of himselfe, and violence of the fall, crushed all to pieces, and so miserably died: a death too good for such a traitor. Not long after it fortuned also, that Alexius himselfe wandering vp and downe in THRACIA, was by the Marquesse of MONT-FERRAT, going against Scurus, taken and stript of his great treasure, and whatsoeuer else he had; and so sent away naked, long time after in beggers estate wandered about in ACHAIA and PELOPONESVS, now farre vnlike that Alexius which sometime proudly raigned in CONSTANTINOPLE: but such is the assurance of euill gotten honour. He hearing that Theodorus Lascaris, his sonne in law, raigned in ASIA, and there held the state of an Emperour, reioyced not thereat as a kinde father in law, but inwardly grieued thereat as an enemie, sorrie that any other but himselfe should be honoured with the title of the Greeke Emperour: in which malicious humour he sailing out of GREECE into ASIA ouer the Ægeum, came secretly vnto the Turks Sultan Iathatines his old acquaintance, then lying at ATTALIA, (which famous citie he had not long before taken from the Christians) vnto whom he declared his heauie estate, and how his empire had beene rent from him, as well by the Greekes as the Latines; requesting, that by his meanes he might be restored againe into some part thereof, especially that in the lesser ASIA, which was by Theodorus Lascaris, together with the honour of the Greeke Emperour, vniustly (as he said) detained from him. This Iathatines, now Sultan of ICONIVM, was the younger sonne of Sultan Aladin; who not long suruiuing his father Cai-Chosroe, left his kingdome vnto his two sonnes, Azadin and Iassadin, of the Greekes called Azatines and Iathatines: where long it was not, but that these two brethren falling out for the soueraignetie (which admitteth no equalitie) Iathatines was by Azatines his elder brother driuen into exile, and for the safegard of his life glad to flie vnto this Alexius, then raigning at CONSTANTINOPLE, by whom he was honourably entertained, and as some write, conuerted and baptized. But Azatines the Sultan shortly after dying, this Iathatines returning home againe, and renouncing the Christian religion, was by the Turks receiued for their Sultan: of whom the Emperour Alexius in like extremitie now craueth aid. The Sultan not forgetfull of his owne troubles before passed, or of the kindnesse he had receiued, and moued with the pitifull complaint of his old friend, together with his large offers, beside that he was in hope to share out some good part of whatsoeuer he got for himselfe; tooke him into his protection, and forthwith sent embassadours to Lascaris, threatening vnto him all extremities, except he did forthwith giue place vnto Alexius his father in law, vnto whom as vnto the Greeke Emperor, those countries which were by him possessed, of right (as he said) appertained. With which vnexpected message, Theodorus was not a little troubled, as fearing both the Sultans power, and the inclination of the people to their old Emperour. Neuertheless, hauing propounded the matter in counsell, and finding the minds of his subiects well affected towards him, & a readinesse in them in his quarrell to aduenture their liues; he encouraged therewith, accompanied onely with two thousand choise horsemen, together with the Sultans embassadour, without farther stay set forward to PHILADELPHIA: the Sultan at the same time with Alexius (whom he carried with him as a bait to deceiue the people withall) and twentie thousand Turks, besieging the citie of ANTIOCH, situate vpon the winding banks of the riuer MEANDER. Which the Emperour Theodorus well vnderstanding, and that the Sultan by gaining that strong citie (standing vpon the passage of the great riuer, the bounder of his empire) should open a faire way for himselfe into the heart of ROMANIA ASIATICA, to the great hazard of his whole empire, resolued with those few he had, to doe what he might to relieue his citie. And so setting forward vpon the spurre, carrying nothing with him more than a little victuall: and now come neere vnto the citie, sent before the Sultans embassador, following him

A at the heeles. Who comming vnto the Sultan, and telling him of the Emperours approach with ſo ſmall a power, could hardly perſwade him that it was ſo, although he bound it with many oathes: yet at length perſwaded of the truth of the matter, and that indeed it was ſo, hee in all haſte put his armie in the beſt order he could vpon ſuch a ſudden, but not to his beſt aduantage, being hindred ſo to doe, by the ſtraitneſſe of the place wherein he lay. Of the two thouſand ſelect horſemen in the Emperours armie, were eight hundred Italians, all moſt reſolute men, who giuing the firſt charge, brake through the midſt of the Sultans armie, diſordering his whole battell as they went; after whom followed alſo the Greekes, though not with like courage: but thoſe Italian horſemen now diuided from the reſt, and in number but few, in comming backe
B againe, were by the diſordered Turkes, ſome on horſebacke, ſome on foot, ſo beſet on euery ſide, as that there was no way left for them to paſſe, but there valiantly fighting, were all together ſlaine, hauing both before & at the time of their death, made ſuch a ſlaughter of the Turks, as is hardly to be beleeued to haue beene poſſible for ſo few men to haue made. The Greekes alſo hardly laied to by the Turkes, and diſcouraged by the ſlaughter of the Latines, were euen vpon the point to haue fled: when as the Sultan, now almoſt in poſſeſſion of a certaine victorie, diſcrying the Greeke Emperour, and truſting to his owne great ſtrength, ſingled him out, being as ready as himſelfe to meet him; when as at the firſt encounter, the Sultan with his horſemans maſe gaue him ſuch a blow vpon the head, as might haue killed a bull, ſo that the Emperour therewith aſtonied, fell downe from his horſe: who yet euen in the fall comming
C ſomething againe vnto himſelfe, and although diſmounted, yet quickly recouering his feet, with his faulchion hoxed the hinder legs of the mare whereon the Sultan rid, being a moſt beautifull beaſt, and of a wonderfull height; which now ſuddenly faultring vnder him, and ſo the Sultan tumbling downe as from an high tower, before he could recouer himſelfe, had his head cut off by the Emperour: which by and by put vpon a launce, and ſo holden vp, with the ſight thereof ſo diſmaied the Turkes, that ſtrucken with a ſudden feare, they preſently fled, leauing the victorie vnto the Emperour, before more than halfe ouercome: who for all that conſidering his ſmall number, durſt no farther purſue them, but entring the citie, gaue thankes to God for ſo great a victorie. Vnto whom the Turkes ſhortly after ſent their embaſſadours, and ſo vpon ſuch reaſonable conditions as it pleaſed him to ſet downe, concluded with him a peace.

Iathanes the Sultan ſlaine by Theodorus Laſcaris the Greeke Emperour.

D Alexius himſelfe, author of theſe troubles, taken in this battell and carried to NICE, was by the Emperour his ſonne in law, notwithſtanding his euill deſerts, well intreated and vſed.

Whileſt the Latins thus ſpend thoſe forces in ſubuerting of the Greeke empire, which ſhould haue been imploied for the releeſe of the Chriſtians in SYRIA; and that the Greeke Emperour Laſcaris was thus troubled with the Turks; the affaires of the Chriſtians in SYRIA and the Holy Land, grew ſtill worſe and worſe. Whereof the Knights Hoſpitalers & Templars (the chiefe champions of the Chriſtian religion in thoſe countries) greatly blamed Almericus the King of CYPRVS, for that he being ſo neere at hand, & hauing married Iſabella the heire of that kingdome, & ſo in her right taken vpon him the title of the King of HIERVSALEM, gaue himſelfe wholy to pleaſure, doing nothing for the defence or releſe of the poore diſtreſſed Chriſtians, or E repreſſing of the Turkes: who although they were yet in league with the Chriſtians there, and at ſome diſcord alſo among themſelues, yet ſpared not, as occaſion ſerued, ſtill more & more to encroach vpon them, & by building of new caſtles & fortreſſes, to cut them ſhort. Of all which things, the aforeſaid Knights by their embaſſadors certified Innocentius the Pope, requeſting his fatherly care for the remedie thereof, certifying him withall, that there was yet liuing one Mary, the daughter of the Marqueſſe of MONT-FERRAT, a Ladie of rare beautie, whom they as her tutors, had brought vp in hope of the kingdome; & now were ready to beſtow her vpon ſome ſuch man as he ſhould think worthy of her, together with the right ſhe had vnto the kingdome. Hereupon Innocentius diſcharging Almericus of the title of the kingdome of HIERVSALEM, gaue it to Iohn Countie de Brenne of DAVLPHINE in FRANCE, a man of great fame and va-
F lour, then in armes with the other Latin Princes againſt the Greeks. Who now returning home, commended his earledome to his brother, and with ſuch power as he was able to make, ſetting forward, came firſt to VENICE, where he was royally entertained: and from thence ſailing to CONSTANTINOPLE, was with like honour receiued by the Emperor Henry, & ſo at length the fift of September arriued at PTOLEMAIS in SYRIA, where he was with the great reioycing and applauſe of the people, receiued as their King. And the laſt of the ſame moneth marrying

the aforesaid Lady Mary at TYRE, was there together with her with a great solemnitie crowned King in the yeere 1209: which Almericus the old King of CYPRVS hearing, shortly after died for griefe. Neither wanted this noble gentleman, thus honoured with the title of a kingdome, some that enuied at his promotion, and therefore commonly called him in derision, a King, but still with this addition, Sans Ville, that is to say, without a towne. G

Now was the ten yeeres peace, before taken betwixt the Turkes and the Christians in SYRIA, at the comming ouer of Simon Marquesse of MONT-FERRAT (as is before declared) almost expired: which had not so much giuen to those poore remnants of the Christians some time of rest and breathing, as had the discord of the Turkes among themselues; which hauing by the space of nine yeeres continued betwixt Noradin and Saphadin for the soueraignte, was now by the death of Saphadin ended. Noradin contenting himselfe with the gouernment of ALEPPO, and Corradin and Meledin, the two sonnes of Saphadin, diuiding their fathers kingdome betwixt them, the one taking vnto himselfe DAMASCO and SYRIA, and the other the great kingdome of ÆGYPT, but all enemies vnto the Christians. H

About this time also, or not long after, Innocentius tertius, yet Pope, summoned a generall Councell to LATERAN, whereunto besides a multitude of great Bishops and other reuerend Prelates, repaired also the honourable embassadours of most of the Princes of Christendome: vnto whom so assembled, among other things, was propounded the dangerous estate of the Christians in SYRIA, and how the same was by the helpe of the Christian Princes of the West to be relieued. Whereunto all the Fathers and Princes there assembled, easily gaue their consent: and thereupon were some appointed in euery countrey and prouince, to publish this decree of the Councell, for the relieue of the oppressed Christians, & to stirre vp the deuout people for the vndertaking of so religious a war. The chiefe furtherers of this sacred expedition (to be thus taken in hand against the Infidels) were the Bishops of GERMANIE, especially the three great Bishops of METS, CVLLEN, and TRIVERS, whose example mooued also many others, all which to rehearse were tedious. Out of FRANCE also were sent Henry the Countie of NIVERS, and one Gualter, the Kings great chamberlaine, with a great number of the gallant youths of FRANCE, and so out of diuers other places also: So that at length such a number of men were met together at diuers ports of the Adriaticke, as made vp a fleet of two hundred saile: which with a prosperous wind carried ouer into SYRIA, arriued in safetie at PTOLEMAIS, the chiefe citie of the Christians, now that HIERVSALEM was lost. After whom followed also Andrew, King of HVNGARIE, long before bound both by his fathers commandement and his owne promise, for the vndertaking of that sacred expedition: with whom came also Lewis Duke of BAVARIA, and Leopold Duke of AVSTRIA, with their forces all well appointed: vnto whom also, Iohn King of HIERVSALEM ioyned himselfe with his power. Great hope & expectation there was of some great matter to haue beene done, now that so great forces of the Christians were thus met together. Who setting forward from PTOLEMAIS, and the first day marching into GALILEE, by the way met with certaine companies of the Turks, whom they easily ouerthrew and put to flight. The next day they came to the riuer of IORDAN, where they also distressed certain of the Turks garrisons. There the King of HVNGARIE bathing himselfe in the riuer, forthwith (as one discharged of his vow & promise) returned with all his power vnto PTOLEMAIS, & so frõ thence backe again into his country, all the rest of the armie of the Christians crying out vnto him to the contrary: who after the Kings departure stil marching on, came to the mount THABOR. But shortly after, winter now comming on, and many of their cattell dying for cold and want of meat, they returned some to PTOLEMAIS, some to TYRE, and there wintred. King Iohn and the Duke of AVSTRIA in the meane time tooke a castle betwixt CESAREA & CAIPHA, called The castle of Pilgrims, from whence they much troubled the Barbarians thereabouts all that winter. Vpon the appearance of the Spring, and the armie againe met together, it was thought best by all the great commanders, that for so much as the kingdome of ÆGYPT was the chiefe maintenance of the Mahometan superstition against the Christians in those parts, and that so long as it stood vpright, they should not be able to doe any great matter in SYRIA, to attempt the conquest thereof, as an exploit best beseeming their valour, and so great preparations: for that that kingdome being once subdued, the citie of HIERVSALEM, with al the land of PALESTINE, would of themselues without more adoe yeeld vnto them. And for as much as the famous citie of DAMIATA, called in ancient time PELVSIVM, not much inferiour to ALEXANDRIA, I K L M

A ANDRIA, was the first and moſt commodious port for their purpoſe, as neereſt vnto SYRIA; and that by the taking thereof, they ſhould haue a faire entrance into the great riuer NILVS, with the command of a moſt rich and pleaſant countrey about it: they reſolued there to begin the warre: and thereupon embarking themſelues with all things neceſſary for ſo great an enterpriſe at PTOLEMAIS, and carried with a faire winde, they in ſhort time arriued at the deſired port. Now that rich and ancient citie, the key of that ſide of the kingdome, ſtood about a mile from the ſea, and ſomewhat diſtant alſo from the great riuer, enuironed with a nauigable ditch or cut, drawne out of the NILE, in manner of an Iſland as a man commeth from SYRIA by land; and compaſſed about with three ſtrong ſtone wals, the worke of the good Emperour B Ælius Pertinax, and of him (as ſome affirme) called alſo ÆLIOPOLIS. At the mouth of this cut, as you ſhould enter vnto the citie, ſtood a ſtrong watch-tower for the defence thereof, and round about it a number of faire houſes in manner of a prettie towne entrenched. Beſide that, for the more ſafetie thereof, the ſame cut was barred with a great ſtrong iron chaine, in ſuch ſort as that it was not poſſible for any ſhip, without breaking of the ſame, to enter. The Chriſtians with their fleet entring the mouth of the riuer, and comming to this cut, by great ſtrength brake the chaine: but thinking ſo to haue made their paſſage vnto the citie, they found a greater ſtay at the watch-tower, which ſtrongly built of ſquare ſtone, & well ſtored with warlike engines of all ſorts, & a good garriſon of valiant ſouldiers, ſtaied their further paſſage, ouerwhelming them as they approched, with ſhot, fire, ſtones, timber, & ſuch like, before prouided for that purpoſe.

C The Chriſtians (after the manner of the fight of that time) had vpon certaine flat veſſels built certaine high towers of wood for the aſſailing of the watch-tower; in the approching whereof, they were not only troubled with the enemie, but with the tumult and ſtir of their owne people alſo; ſome crying that they ſhould yet draw neerer vnto the tower; otherſome crying out as faſt, to haue the bridges caſt out, thereby to enter: and the enemie likewiſe with much clamour encouraging one another for the repulſing of the Chriſtians. So the ſouldiers hindred the mariners to doe their buſineſſe, and the mariners the ſouldiers. In the midſt of this hurly burly and tumult, one of the woodden towers ſurmounting the reſt in height, ouercharged with the preſſe of men, fell, and in falling made ſuch a noiſe, as if heauen it ſelfe had fallen, where in a moment (as it were) was preſently to be ſeene a moſt heauie ſpectacle: many ouerwhelmed with the fal-
D ling of the tower, lay there cruſhed to death; ſome grieuouſly hurt, and yet not dead, lay oppreſſed with the timber, crying out for helpe; others bruiſed or hurt, but not ouerwhelmed, for feare of further harme, leapt ſome into the NILE, ſome aboord the other ſhips neere by, ſome crying out of his arme, ſome of his leg, ſome of his head or other part of his bodie, to the great diſcomfiture of the reſt, in ſo much that the aſſault was for that time giuen ouer.

King Iohn (as well for his valour, as for the title of the King of HIERVSALEM, choſen Generall of the armie) after he had appeaſed this tumult, and giuen the charge of them that were maimed or hurt, vnto skilfull ſurgeons, & buried the bodies of ſuch as were found drowned or ouerwhelmed; with cheerefull ſpeech encouraged the reſt of his ſouldiers, perſwading them not to be diſcouraged with the accident of the fall of a tower, which was neither to be im-
E puted to their cowardiſe, or the valour of the enemie, but only to the chance of warre.

In the meane time Meledin the Ægyptian Sultan, had with a great armie encamped himſelfe within the ſight of DAMIATA, thereby to encourage the beſieged, and to fill them with hope of reliefe; ſending them oftentimes by the riuer, newes, meſſages, victuals, ſouldiers, armour, and whatſoeuer elſe they wanted. The chiefe cauſe of his ſtaying there, was to take occaſion for the ſurpriſing of the Chriſtians, if any ſhould be offered, either by chance or their owne negligence. Euery day ſome skirmiſh or other paſſed betwixt our men & the Barbarians, our men ſtill carrying away the victorie: yet could theſe Barbarians neither be drawne forth vnto battell, neither could our men keepe them from victuals; for as much as they had the riuer of NILE at command, whereby victuals were out of the vpper part of ÆGYPT in great abundance con-F ueighed into the Sultans campe: whereas on the contrary part, the ſame riuer diuiding it ſelfe into many armes, in ſome places here and there ouerflowing, in another cut into many ditches and channels, and in ſome other pent vp by wals & cauſies, gaue vnto our men a thouſand diſpleaſures. And therefore ſeeing that the Sultan would neither giue nor accept of battell, they reſolued againe to lay ſiege to the tower. Wherefore hauing with great cunning vpon two ſhips made faſt together, framed a tower of moſt ſtrong timber, equall in height vnto the watch-

to, after which followed alſo all the reſt of the fleet well appointed for the aſſault. At which time all the reſt of the armie at land, ſtood in battell ready ranged, as well to diſcourage them of the towne, as that the Sultan ſhould not be able to helpe them without the hazarding of battell. There began a fierce and cruell aſſault; they of the ſuburbs right valiantly defending themſelues againſt their enemies. Within theſe ſuburbs, the tower, and the trenches, dwelt not only Ægyptians, (the naturall inhabitants of the countrey) but alſo Arabians, Perſians, Syrians, Indians, Moores, and Æthiopians, who were there reſiant, for that, that citie was a publike mart whereunto all kinde of merchandize were brought from farre out of the remoteſt parts of the world, and ſo from thence in like manner tranſported alſo: which encouraged them the more to fight H for the defence of their liues and goods, the two things which men hold moſt deare: and in like ſort animated our men vnto the aſſault, as well in the quarrell of the Chriſtian religion, as to enrich themſelues with the ſpoile of thoſe rich nations. The Chriſtians with their ſhips drew as neere as poſſibly they could vnto the land, to the intent that vpon the banke of the riuer, they might come to fight hand to hand, and man to man, and ſo come cloſe vnto their enemies. But the Barbarians on the other ſide, ſought by ſhot and all other meanes they could to keepe them farther off, and ſo from landing.

That which moſt feared the Ægyptians, was that as one of our ſhips by chance ran a ground vpon that ſide of the riuer where the enemie lay, and being boorded by the enemie, thronging in as faſt as he could, and there making a cruell ſlaughter, one of the Chriſtian ſouldiers going I downe vnder the hatches, made there a great hole, whereby the water abundantly comming in, ſunke the ſhip before the enemie was aware, and ſo drowned a great number of the Ægyptians, together with the Chriſtians. At which time alſo the high tower built vpon the two ſhips, ioyning now cloſe vnto the watch-tower, and mating the ſame, diſmaied the defendants with the ſtrangeneſſe thereof, as with a miracle, in ſuch ſort, that they ſtrucken with a great feare, as now being to fight with a ſtrange, hardie, and cruell kinde of men, without any great reſiſtance forſooke the tower and fled. The watch-tower thus taken, and they that ſhould haue defended the ſame, ſome ſlaine, and ſome fled: they in the ſuburbs diſcouraged, and flying away, were many of them wounded from aboue out of the watch-tower, but now gained by the Chriſtians. At which time alſo the other ſhips landed the ſouldiers, who entring the ſuburbs, put all they found K there to the ſword, euen vnto the laſt man. There was found great abundance of victuals, but farre greater ſtore of riches, in ſo much that it ſeemed to haue beene the ſpoile of ARABIA, PERSIA, and the rich INDIES.

Damiata in vain aſſaulted.

Now yet remained the ſtrong towne of DAMIATA, which was forthwith aſſaulted by the Chriſtians, more to proue if in that heat and ſudden feare it would be yeelded, than for any hope they had by force to win it. But hauing done what they could both by ſcaling & by other engines, they gained nothing but hard blowes and wounds, and ſo retired. Neuertheleſſe, they lodged themſelues in the ſuburbs, and laied a great part of the armie betwixt the Sultan and the beſieged citie, to the intent that no ſupplie or victuals ſhould be brought vnto it; yet both the enemie oftentimes attempted to haue entred the citie, and the beſieged to haue ſallied out, but L both the one and the other were letted to doe what they would haue done, and that not without the great loſſe of their men: for why, the towne was now on euery ſide ſo incloſed by the Chriſtians, as that no man could enter in or out thereof. Whileſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the ſiege, it fortuned that the riuer of NILE ſwelling with a great Eaſterne winde, riſe aboue the banks, and ſo ouerflowed the places wherein the Chriſtians lay, that they could keepe nothing drie, and that moſt part of their victuals were therewith ſpoiled. With which vnſeaſonable riſing of the riuer the Chriſtians not a little troubled, by commandement of Pelagius the Popes Legate, gaue themſelues to faſting and praier, by the ſpace of three dayes. But the winde falling the fourth day, and the riuer againe decreaſing, they gaue themſelues more earneſtly to praier than before, thanking the Almightie, that as he had put them in a great feare, ſo he had in mer- M cie againe comforted them.

Now with long lying began victuals to grow ſcant in the Sultans campe, ſo that he was glad to ſend away halfe of his armie vp againe into the countrey of CAIRE. At which time alſo it chanced (as if it had beene in an extreme and common danger of the Mahometan ſuperſtition) that embaſſadors ſent from Corradin Sultan of DAMASCO and HIERVSALEM, vnto the

A Princes of the Christian armie, came to sue for peace, both for himselfe and his brother the Ægyptian Sultan; promising in regard thereof againe to restore vnto them the Holy Crosse, and whatsoeuer else himselfe, his father, or Sultan Saladin had before taken from them: of which their offer, most part of the armie liked well, saying, That they had therefore taken vp armes for the recouerie of that which had beene before gotten, and gained by the valour of the worthie Christian captaines, and had of late beene taken from them; and to blot out the ignominie of the losse thereof, to the end it should not be said, that they could not leaue whole and entire vnto their children, what their fathers had got, when they had the keeping thereof; neither hauing lost it, be able againe to recouer it: that all these things being restored, there rested not any B further occasion of warre, or let to stay them as most victorious conquerours to returne home. Neuertheless Pelagius, Pope Honorius his Legate (for Innocentius in the preparation of the wars was before dead at PELVSIVM) with King Iohn, the masters of the Knights Hospitallers and Templars, the Duke of AVSTRIA, and the Germaines, were of opinion to the contrary: alleaging, That this sacred warre was vndertaken generally against the Infidels, and for religions sake against the Mahometan superstition, whereof the kingdome of ÆGYPT was the chiefe seat and stay; and that therefore they ought especially to impugne that. Which perswasion, together with the authoritie of the perswaders, so preuailed, that the Sultans large offers were reiected, and so the embassadours dispatched without any thing obtained of that they came for. Whereupon Corradin fearing that the Christians would at length come to HIERVSALEM, as C the place they most desired; and doubting how he should be able to defend the same, forthwith rased the wals thereof, and the more to deface it, ouerthrew and pluckt downe most of the goodly houses, and other stately buildings therein, sparing yet the Tower of Dauid, and the Holy Sepulchre; which he is said to haue done at the humble request and intercession of the Christians of diuers countries, which yet dwelt there mixt with the Turks and Sarasins.

A faire offer euill refused.

Whilest the Christians thus lay at the siege of DAMIATA, the plague began to arise in the campe, whereof so many died, that it began to repent the great commanders of the armie that they had so much hearkened to the perswasion of the Legate (a man making no profession of armes) rather than to the sound aduice of others, who by long experience taught the sudden alteration of matters of warre, would willingly haue accepted of the Sultans large offers: so be-D gan Pelagius the Legate to be generally euill spoken of. There were now alreadie six moneths past since the beginning of the siege, and the Sultan lying in sight had not with him so great an armie as before, but only the flower & choice of his people, hauing (as we haue before said) for want of victuals sent away the rest vp againe into the country. Now it fortuned that the Christians, as men weary of the long siege, stood not so carefully vpon their guard, with watch & ward, as before, but gaue themselues more to ease: which the Sultan perceiuing, drew neerer vnto the town, in hope vnder the couert of the silent night, to send new supplies vnto the besieged; which companies by him appointed for that seruice, couragiously set forward, in hope to haue deceiued the Christian sentinels, & so indeed came neere vnto the towne vnseene or discouered. And now the foremost of those companies were alreadie entred the towne; when the Christians per-
E ceiuing them, and raising an alarme, put themselues in armes, & so furiously assailed the hindermost of them, and in such sort, that they which were before within, and those that were but now entred, fearing lest the enemie in that hurly burly should pell mell enter in with the rest, shut them out of the gates, exposed to the butcherie, where they were all presently cut in peeces.

The Christians encouraged with this victorie, the next day leauing a great part of the armie before the towne to continue the siege, presented themselues before the Sultans campe to giue him battell: who for all that well considering that the losse of a battell might endanger the whole state of his kingdome, would by no meanes be drawne out of his trenches, but lay still; wherewith the Christians, especially the Frenchmen (in their first charge naturally furious) greatly encouraged, attempted to haue forcibly entred their rampiers, but not with successe F answerable to their courage. For the Ægyptians perceiuing the small number of their enemies, notably repulsed them, & in fine enforced them to retire, hauing lost Gualter one of their chiefe commanders, with diuers others: yea King Iohn in assailing the campe, lost many of his men, and grieuously burnt in his face, hardly escaped himselfe with life. After which discomfiture, they resolued, not to thinke of any thing else but of the siege, and aboue all things to prouide that no succours should be brought vnto the towne. They in the citie more straitly beset and

beſieged than before, and now brought vnto extreme neceſſitie and famine, and out of all hope of reliefe, aſſembled themſelues to conſult of their affaires, and what were beſt for them to doe in ſo dangerous a ſtate: ſome one or other of them by night or otherwiſe ſecretly flying into the campe. And that more was, the citie had vndoubtedly beene yeelded by the greater part, had not the chiefe commanders within mured vp the gates, and commanded that none of the inhabitants vpon paine of death ſhould come vpon the wals, or rampiers, to the intent they ſhould not get out, or caſt themſelues from aboue ouer the wals into the ditches. The chiefe commanders and captaines went here and there vp and downe the citie, to ſearch and view all things, eſpecially the ſhops and ſtorehouſes, where finding ſmall ſtore of wheat, they diuided it in ſmall portions among themſelues: the common people inforced with want, eat whatſoeuer came to hand, were it lawfull or vnlawfull, or forbidden by their ſuperſtition, wholſome or vnwholſome, good or bad, ſalt or freſh, roſted or raw; and ſo prolonged their liues with ſuch things as they could finde. Now the beſieged, not able to endure theſe extremities of the famine (being the paſſion that moſt grieuouſly and often troubleth mankinde) they were alſo attached with the wrath of God: for the plague (the furie whereof had before attainted the campe of the Chriſtians, and afterward quite ceaſed) was now got into the citie, where it made a great ſlaughter: which mortalitie day by day in ſuch ſort increaſed, that men were not onely now no more to be found, to viſit, comfort, ſuccour, ſerue, and helpe the ſicke; but were wanting alſo to burie them, to draw them out of their beds and houſes, and to ſeparate the liuing from the dead: the ſtreets and houſes full of dead bodies, gaue forth a moſt horrible ſtinke, with a moſt grieuous and infectious aire: there was not any place cleare from the plague, or any man that could boaſt that he had not beene attainted therewith, or the feare thereof; and remedie was there none. The rage and furie of theſe two deuourers, the famine, and plague, deuoured them without number, chuſing rather ſo to die, than to ſubmit themſelues vnto their enemies; or to humble themſelues ſo low, as to craue their fauour. That they within were thus pinched with famine, the Chriſtians knew: but that the plague ſo raged among them, they knew not. Now the Chriſtians had of purpoſe caſt vp certaine trenches and baricadoes, for the keeping in of ſuch as the famine ſhould enforce to come out of the towne; thinking that the beſieged, to eaſe their wants, would thruſt the baſer ſort of the people and vnprofitable mouthes out of the citie, vnto whom the Chriſtians meant not to giue any paſſage: for they hauing long before ſo ſtraitly enuironed the citie, as that no reliefe could be brought vnto it, lay now ſtill expecting when the beſieged, enforced by neceſſitie, ſhould yeeld themſelues; and ſo without loſſe of any man, to become maſters of ſo ſtrong and rich a towne. It was now more than a yeere that the Chriſtians had thus lien at the ſiege of DAMIATA, when as certaine of the ſouldiers vpon a brauerie aduentured with a few ſcaling ladders to mount the wall: in which doing, finding no reſiſtance, and withall hearing ſo great ſilence, as if there had beene no bodie within the citie, they ſtood ſtill a great while hearkening, but ſeeing that dumbe ſilence ſtill to continue, they returned vnto the campe, giuing the captaines to vnderſtand how the matter ſtood; who at the firſt thought it to be ſome policie and fineneſſe of the deceitfull enemie: yet afterward they thought it good to aduenture certaine men, to proue their fortune, and to cauſe certaine companies well appointed to ſcale one of the bulwarks of the citie, in ſuch ſort, as if they ſhould haue gone againſt a puiſſant enemie, that had had the power to reſiſt them. And hereupon were ſcaling ladders brought forth, and all things made readie, as for a great aſſault. So the Chriſtians couragiouſly mounting the ladders, without reſiſtance tooke the bulwarke. But as they were entring farther into the towne, a ſmall companie of the Turks and Barbarians (all the ſouldiers that the furie of the plague had left, and they alſo with the famine and infection of the aire very weake and feeble) met them, and began to make ſome ſmall reſiſtance, but to no purpoſe, being forthwith all cut in pieces. Which done, the matter wherewith the gates of the citie were mured, was preſently remoued, the gates ſet open, and the Chriſtians with enſignes diſplaied let in. But euen at the very entring in at the gates, they were attainted with a moſt grieuous and horrible ſtinke, they ſaw a faire citie diſpeopled, and that which was moſt fearefull to behold, the ſtreets couered with bodies of the dead, and ſuch a dreadfull deſolation, as might moue euen the enemie himſelfe to compaſſion. The Chriſtians were entred, as men appointed to haue done a great execution, and to haue made the channels run with bloud, as men iuſtly prouoked with the long ſiege and the paines they had endured; they had their ſwords and weapons in their hands, Damiata without reſiſtance taken by the Chriſtians.

Damiata vnpeopled by the plague.

A hands, but found none againſt whom to vſe them: for a man could not enter into any houſe, or goe into any ſtreet, but he muſt paſſe ouer the dead, or others which being not yet altogether dead, were miſerably drawing toward their end. Of ſeuentie thouſand perſons in the citie, were not found aboue three thouſand aliue, and thoſe for the moſt part yet young children: for all the reſt were dead, taken away either with the ſword, famine, or the plague; the greateſt part whereof lay yet ſtinking aboue the ground vnburied. Theſe three thouſand that were left, were ſo maigre and poore, that pitie it was to behold them: vnto whom their liues were granted, vpon condition that they ſhould make cleane the citie, and burie the dead, which they were three moneths in doing.

B Thus was DAMIATA taken by the Chriſtians the fift day of Nouember, in the yeere 1221, after it had beene more than a yeere by them beſieged. The ſpoile there taken was great, for beſides the rich marchandiſe brought thither from farre, was found great ſtore of gold, ſiluer, and precious ſtones. The Chriſtians thus enriched, and the citie made cleane, ſtaied there more than a yeere after, as in a Colonie wherein they had beene willing to dwell, forgetfull of their owne countrey. In the beginning of theſe warres, the Princes of the armie had with one conſent agreed, That whatſoeuer citie or territorie ſhould by them be taken from the Turkes or Infidels, ſhould be giuen vnto the King of HIERVSALEM, whom after the departure of the King of HVNGARIE, they had made Generall of the whole armie. But now that the citie was taken, Pelagius the legat, pretending, That by the vertue of his legation, it belonged vnto him to diſ- 1221

C poſe of all things taken in that ſacred warre, (as a man not vnmindfull of his maſter) adiudged the citie from thenceforth to belong vnto the See of ROME. With which indignitie & wrong, the King inwardly diſcontented, (and yet for the authoritie of the legat, diſſembling the matter) withdrew himſelfe, and ſo retired to PTOLEMAIS.

The yeere following, Pelagius wearie to ſee the armes of the Chriſtians to corrupt with ruſt, & nothing doing: conſidering the deſire and hope he had vtterly to haue ruinated the Infidels, together with their ſuperſtition, commanded, That euery man ſhould againe take vp armes for the proſecuting of this warre againſt the Sultan, and the beſieging of CAIRE. But for all that, when he had commanded what he would, or could, the ſouldiers little regarding his command, with one voice cried out, that they would not be commanded by any, but by the King of HIE- 1222

D RVSALEM only. So that the legat, enforced by the ſouldiers, was glad to ſend vnto the King, to requeſt him to returne againe vnto DAMIATA, and to take vpon him the charge for the managing of that warre, taken in hand for the defence of the Chriſtian Religion: who for all that excuſed himſelfe from ſo doing, one while by his owne particular affaires, another while by his owne indiſpoſition: yet in fine, preſſed and ouercome with the praiers and requeſts of the other Latine Princes, hee returned to DAMIATA, at the ſelfe ſame time that the Duke of BAVARIA arriued there with a goodly companie of braue men, brought thither out of his owne countrey, after he had beene now from thence ten moneths abſent.

Pelagius the Legat perſwadeth the Princes of the Chriſtian armie to proceed for the conqueſt of Aegypt.

The legat deſirous of the proſecution of this warre, requeſted and vrged the King, with the reſt of the Princes and great commanders, without delay to take the field, telling them, That the

E enterpriſe of the holy warre was growne old, and cold, by thoſe long delaies and protracting of the time: & that they which kept wars ſo farre from home, ought to make haſt to force the enemie, to take all occaſions, to loſe no time, but euer to be doing, and to proue all things for the annoying of the enemie: and that that was the way, whereby the Worthies of ancient times, both Kings and Emperours, had gained vnto themſelues empires, glorie, greatneſſe, & wealth: That it was for them that were inuaded and aſſailed, vpon whoſe liues depended the ſafetie of their country, their wiues, their children, and goods, to delay & prolong the time as they might, to delude the enemie, to fruſtrate his deſignes, to defeat his attempts, and with delaies to dallie him off, vntill that hauing thereby weakned his forces, he ſhould together with his courage loſe alſo his hope: CAIRE (he ſaid) to be indeed a great citie, but yet that the greateſt cities that euer

F were, had by the wars become great deſarts, forced by the power of their puiſſant and ſpeedie enemies: & that great empires, as were thoſe of the Sultans, ought not to be inuaded or aſſailed by any forrain force, if they were not at the firſt onſet ouerthrown or at leaſtwiſe ſo weakned, as that they could not afterwards lift vp their heads or recouer themſelues; for otherwiſe, that they which had prepared a deſtruction for others, ſhould fall into the ſame themſelues: That it behooued either not to haue attempted or aſſailed ÆGYPT at all; or elſe now, after it had beene

once aſſailed, not ſo to giue it ouer before it were conquered. The King of HIERVSALEM, G whether it were that he were pricked with the griefe, that being called the King of the holy land, he could not haue the citie of DAMIATA (vnder the leading and conduct won by the Chriſtians come to the ſacred warre) giuen vnto him by the Legate, or that he had before proued that the higher countrey of ÆGYPT was not without great and manifeſt danger to be attempted; ſaid, that he would not in any caſe goe: alleaging that honorable and ſacred warre to haue been taken in hand, only for the recouerie of the Holy Land, and not for the winning of MEMPHIS, BABYLON, or THEBES in ÆGYPT; which after they were taken, would not for any long time continue in their fidelitie or allegeance, and could not poſſibly be kept by force: whereas SYRIA, by Godfrey of BVILLON and the other great Princes his aſſociats, entred into, con- H quered & poſſeſſed; and ſince his time, by diuers other Chriſtian Kings & Princes holden, was in right their owne: And that therfore he greatly commended the forwardneſſe, the diligence, the courage, the deſire, and whatſoeuer thing elſe Pelagius commended: but that he ought to employ the ſame in SYRIA, and not there where no need was, or from whence no profit was to be drawne or expected. Neuertheleſſe the Legat wedded to his owne opinion, by the power of his authoritie, commanded the King of HIERVSALEM, the Duke of BAVARIA, with the reſt of the great commanders & captaines, to take vp their armes, and to get them into the field vpon the expedition by him appointed againſt the Sultan; threatning the pain of the high ſentence of excommunication againſt him or them, that would ſhew themſelues backward or vnwilling to doe what he had commanded. So as it were enforced by the Legat, they began with I euill will and worſe ſpeed, to ſet forward in Auguſt, in the very hotteſt time of the yeere. At which time the Sultan beholding the great armie of the Chriſtians, in number about ſeuentie thouſand, retired as a man afraid, into ſuch places as he thought beſt, farther off: which the Legat ſeeing (as one not acquainted with the feats of war) reioyced greatly, as if the victorie had been already more than halfe gained; commending vnto the heauens them that he ſaw couragiouſly marching forward, ſaying, That fortune alwayes fauoured the valiant, and that vnto cowards all things fell ſtill out to the worſt. By the way the Chriſtians ſeized vpon a bridge, which the enemie had made ouer the NILE, and cut in pieces ſuch companies as were left for the keeping thereof. So marching on, they drew neere vnto CAIRE, and there, in the ſight of that great and rich citie, encamped: where running vp & downe, the more to terrifie them of the citie, prouo- K ked them to battell, vpbraiding vnto them their lazines, their cowardiſe, & ſloth, brauing them (if they were men) to come out: Yet for all that, they would not ſo do, but keeping themſelues cloſe and couert within the citie, let them alone to bragge & boaſt at their owne pleaſure. This ſiege continued long, of purpoſe protracted ſtill from day to day by them of the citie: and the great opinion of the Chriſtians had of their owne valour, with the ſmall regard they had of their enemies, made them ſo proud and careleſſe, that they remembred no more to take good care of the warre, of their dutie, their watch, or their ſentinels: their confidence was in their owne valour and good fortune, not conſidering or remembring that they were come into ÆGYPT, and that they had put themſelues within the trenches, ſallies, channels and cuts, of a deceitfull riuer, which not only brought victuals vnto their enemies, but alſo fortified them; who by how much L they were the leſſe valiant, and leſſe vnderſtood of the art of war, the more they vſed of craft and ſubtiltie for the preſeruing of themſelues. So the craftie enemies drew the Chriſtians out at length, abuſing them with many delaies & deceits; making ſemblance of great feare, to make themſelues the leſſe to be feared; and more contemptible in their doings, to the end that they knowing the paſſages & ſtraights of the country, and reſeruing themſelues vnto the occaſions & aduantages both of the time, and of their enemies, might circumuent them and entrap them at ſuch time as they leaſt feared any ſuch matter. The Chriſtians, at all aduenture had encamped themſelues in a low ground, within the banks and cauſies of that fennie countrey, vnder the couert therof, thinking themſelues ſafe as in their trenches, againſt all ſudden ſallies or attempts of their enemies. But theſe places wherein they lay, were ſoft and durtie, for ſo much as the coun- M try people vſed at their pleaſure to water them by channels & ſluces out of the riuer of NILE: which now pluckt vp and opened, the riuer began to riſe and ouerflow all. Then too late they perceiued themſelues take as in a grin, without power to defend themſelues, or to make any reſiſtance, or by any other meanes to ſhew their valour. So the riuer ſtill ariſing and ouerflowing, gaue vnto the Turkes and Ægyptians good hope of their wars, and of a victorie more deſired

A than hoped for ouer a warlike and victorious people. All the ground where the Christians lay encamped, was couered with water, so high that the victuals were corrupted, and no place left for a man to stand or lie drie in.

Now at the same time the Ægyptians had taken the high places, with the passages vpon the wals and banks in that drowned countrey, to the intent that the Christians should not be able to retire or to saue themselues out of the bogs and marishes couered ouer with water. So was their rash valour & presumptuous confidence in themselues, exposed vnto the enemies shot and furie; and when they would by force haue defended themselues, their hardinesse was ouercome by the craftie subtiltie of the weake enemie. Then began euery man to crie out against Pelagius
B the Legat, accusing, condemning, and railing at him: the King himselfe they blamed not, for that he had done his dutie, in dissuading of this expedition, and was contrary to his good liking himselfe drawne into this warre, the charge whereof he had not without great intreatie taken vpon him: neither might he with his credit well complaine of this misfortune, lest in so doing, he might seeme to haue had no comfort in himselfe. But as for the Legate, what counsell could he then giue, what counsell could he then take for himselfe? They of Venice, Pisa, and Genva, left at Damiata, were indeed strong at sea, but how could they come to relieue him at Caire? And how, or by what forces could the Christians breake out of the banks & sluces of the cuts and channels; which winding in and out with a thousand inextricable turnings, inclosed them, beset also on euery side with the victorious enemie? After they had been thus coupt
C vp, & enuironed with the waters three dayes, you might haue seene the poore souldiers in euery place fall downe dead for want of food and sleepe, and so perish in the water; the like miserable kinde of death, the rest were also in short time after to expect: other helpe was there none but to yeeld vnto necessitie, and to accept of such conditions as it should please the proud enemie to propound. Now the Sultan desired not so much their liues, as the libertie of his country: and therefore required to haue the citie of Damiata againe restored vnto him, and all things else in such sort as was before the besieging thereof: and so the Christians without more adoe to depart his countrey. Hard conditions, if a man respect the hope whereupon the Christians had vndertaken this war, and were so come into Ægypt, with the toile by them there endured: but vnto him that will but enter into the consideration of mens affaires, and especially in martiall
D matters, it will seeme but an accident to be yeelded vnto, the like whereof hath oftentimes happned vnto the greatest men of the world. These conditions (such as they were) were by the distressed Christians accepted of. But when they were brought to Damiata, and there propounded vnto the Christians there left, a great contention began to arise among them: some said that they would not accept of them, or surrender the towne, which being kept would be a stay for all the affaires of the Christians in the East, and a most commodious place for them to haue recourse vnto; but being restored and lost, carried away with it all the hope of the Christians, and that therefore it were better to endure all extremities, than to receiue such dishonourable and hurtfull a peace. Others of the contrary opinion said, That they ought not to forsake them that were in danger before Caire, nor to expose them vnto the butcherie, but to haue a Christian E compassion of so many thousands of soules as there lay distressed, seeing they might be saued by the surrendrie of that one towne: Townes (they said) consisted of the number of men, and not men of the enclosures of wals and ditches. They that were of this opinion, for the deliuering vp of the towne, seeing the other obstinatly set downe to the contrary, withdrawing themselues from the counsell, presently tooke vp armes, & by force entred the houses of them that were of contrary opinion, and tooke from them their weapons, by that means & perforce to constraine them to yeeld to their desire. As soone as they that lay before Caire (almost drowned in the waters) vnderstood of this diffention at Damiata about the deliuerie of the towne, they sent them word, that if they would not yeeld the towne vnto the Sultan, they would forthwith send to Ptolemais, which would not faile to doe what should be commanded, to haue it in stead of F Damiata surrendred vnto the Ægyptians. So was Damiata againe yeelded vnto the Infidels, and so great labours of the Christians taken at the siege & winning thereof, all lost. That which made the indignitie thereof more tolerable, was that Meledin the Sultan, hauing without bloudshed gained so great a victorie, did neither by word or deed any thing in despight or reproch of the Christians, but vsed them with all courtesie, relieuing them also with victuals and such other things as they wanted, and by faithfull guides conducting them in safetie out of the countrey.

The miserie of the Christians in the drowned land.

Henry the ſecond Emperour of the Latines at CONSTANTINOPLE, after he had (as is afore-ſaid) with much adoe repreſſed the furie of the Bulgarians and Scythes, his barbarous enemies, and ſo giuen peace vnto the miſerable countrey of THRACIA, died, hauing raigned a moſt trou-bleſome raigne, about the ſpace of eleuen yeeres. After whom ſucceeded Peter, Countie of AVSSERRE, his ſonne in law, third Emperour of the Latines in CONSTANTINOPLE: who in the beginning of his empire willing to gratifie the Venetians, and to reuenge himſelfe of Theodorus Angelus, a great Prince of EPIRVS, competitor of his empire, beſieged him in DIRRACHIVM; K which ſtrong citie, the ſaid Theodorus had but a little before ſurpriſed, belonging to the Venetian ſeignorie. At which ſiege Peter the Emperour lying, was ſo cunningly by the wilie Greeke vſed, that a peace was vpon moſt honorable conditions betwixt them concluded, and a familiar kinde of friendſhip ioyned. Inſomuch, that the Emperour at his requeſt, not well aduiſed, came vnto him as his gueſt: who now of his enemie become his hoſt, entertained him with all the formalities that faigned friendſhip could deuiſe. But hauing him now in his power, and fearing no harme, regarding neither the lawes of fidelitie or hoſpitalitie, he moſt traiterouſly ſlew him, as he was yet in the middeſt of his banquet. Of whoſe end, ſome others yet otherwiſe report, as that he ſhould by the ſame Theodorus haue bin intercepted about the pleaſant woods of TEMPE in THESSALIA, as he was trauelling from ROME to CONSTANTINOPLE, and ſo afterwards to L haue beene by him cruelly put to death. Of whoſe misfortune, Tepulus gouernour of CON-STANTINOPLE vnderſtanding, for the more ſafetie of the ſtate in that vacancie of the Greek empire, made peace with Theodorus for fiue yeeres, and the Turks for two. Shortly after came Robert Emperour of Conſtantinople.

Robert (the ſonne of the aforeſaid vnfortunate Emperour Peter) with his mother to CONSTAN-TINOBLE, and there in his fathers ſtead was ſolemnly ſaluted Emperor; but not with much better lucke than was his father before him: for ſhortly after his comming he tooke to wife a faire young Lady, the daughter of a great rich and noble Matrone of the citie, but before betrothed vnto a gallant gentleman, a Burgundian borne: with whom the old Lady broke her promiſe, & more careful of her daughters preferment, than fidelitie, gaue her in mariage vnto the new Emperor. The ioy of which ſo great an honour was in ſhort time conuerted not into a deadly hea- M uineſſe, but euen into death it ſelfe: for the young Burgundian, more enraged with the wrong done him, than diſcouraged with the greatneſſe & power of the Emperour, conſorted himſelfe with a companie of luſtie tall ſouldiers, acquainted with his purpoſe, & awaiting his time when the Emperor was abſent, by night entred the court with his deſperate followers, & firſt meeting

A mother into the ſea: and ſo fled out of the citie into the woods and mountaines, with thoſe deſperate cut-throats, the miniſters of his barbarous crueltie. The Emperour pierced to the heart with this ſo great a diſgrace, ſhortly after went to ROME, to what purpoſe was not certainly knowne; but in returning backe againe thorow ACHAIA, he there died, leauing behinde him his young ſonne Baldwin, yet but a childe, begotten by his firſt wife, to ſucceed him in the empire: who by the name of Baldwin the ſecond was crowned the fift and laſt Emperour of the Latines in CONSTANTINOPLE. And for becauſe he was as yet but young and vnfit for the gouernment, he was by the conſent of the nobilitie affianced, and afterward maried vnto Martha the younger daughter of Iohn Brenne King of HIERVSALEM, a worthy old captaine (but B as then gouernour of RAVENNA, which citie, he being certaine yeeres before ſent for out of FRANCE for that purpoſe, by Honorius the Pope, he notably defended againſt the Emperour Frederick his ſonne in law, but that affinitie was before broken off by the death of the ſaid Emperours wife) who now ſent for out of ITALIE vnto CONSTANTINOPLE, had committed to his charge and protection both the perſon and empire of the young Emperour Baldwin, now his ſonne in law. Which great and heauie charge he for certaine yeeres after worthily & faithfully diſcharged, vntill ſuch time as that Baldwin was himſelfe growne able to take vpon him the gouernment. Now although the imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, with the countries of THRACIA, THESSALIA, MACEDONIA, ACHAIA, PELOPONESVS, and the reſt of the prouinces of GREECE, were all or for the moſt part vnder the gouernment of Baldwin the C Emperour, the Venetians, or other the inferiour Latine Princes: yet were the oppreſſed Greeks, the naturall inhabitants thereof, in heart not theirs, as abhorring nothing more than that their forraine gouernment; but wholly deuoted to their owne naturall Princes, Theodorus Laſcaris, and Alexius Comnenus, the one raigning at NICE in BITHYNIA, and the other at TRAPEZOND in PONTVS, both called by the Greekes, Emperors, and ſo of them generally reputed. Laſcaris of the two the better beloued, and by farre of greateſt power, had during the time of his raigne fought many an hard battell (as is in part before declared) and ſtrongly fortified his chiefe cities againſt the inuaſion of his enemies, as well the Turks as the Latines: and ſo hauing as it were erected a new empire in ASIA, and there raigned eighteene yeeres, died, leauing behinde him one Iohn Ducas Batazes, that had maried the faire Lady Irene his daughter and heire, D to ſucceed him in the Greeke empire in ASIA. This Iohn was a man of a great wit and ſpirit, and of more grauitie for his yeares, than was Theodorus his father in law; neuer vndertaking any thing before he had thereof well conſidered; and once reſolued, not omitting or neglecting any thing for the performance therof. So that it was not vnfitly ſaid of the Greeks, The planting of this new empire to haue required the celeritie of Laſcaris, but the ſtay thereof to haue been the grauitie of Ducas. He in the beginning of his raigne, in very ſhort time hauing ſet all things in good order, greatly augmented his legions, and ſhooting at a fairer marke than the empire he yet held, euen the imperiall citie it ſelfe, and the recouerie of all THRACIA and GRECIA out of the hands of the Latines, which could not be done without a fleet at ſea, built a great number of gallies in the ports of the leſſer ASIA. And ſo hauing rigged vp and manned a ſtrong fleet, E and ſcouring the ſeas, in one Summer tooke in moſt of the Iſlands of the ÆGEVM, namely, LESBOS, CHIOS, SAMOS, ICARIA, COOS, with the famous Iſland of the RHODES, and many others alſo. And not ſo contented to haue encreaſed his empire, the next ſpring croſſing the HELLESPONT and landing his forces, firſt inuaded CHERSONESVS; and afterward to terrifie the Latines, forraged the countrey far and neere, euen to the gates of CONSTANTINOPLE, no man daring to oppoſe himſelfe againſt him. At which time alſo he took many cities and ſtrong townes alongſt the ſea coaſt, as CALLIOPOLIS, SESTVS, & CARDIA, with diuers others thereabout, ſome by force, ſome by compoſition, the Greeks almoſt in euery place yeelding themſelues, where they were not ſo oppreſſed by the Latines as that they could not helpe him. Now by theſe proceedings of the Greek emperour in EUROPE, was plainly to be

For being buſied in his great affaires, he was loth to haue ſo great a king as was Aſſan, his enemie, able at his pleaſure to call in the Scythes; who with their multitude, as a great flood breaking ouer the bankes, had oftentimes caried away whole countries before them. G Wherfore the match agreed vpon, the two great Princes by appointment met together about CHERSONESUS, where Helena, king Assans daughter, being then about ten yeares old, was with great joy and triumph ſolemnly maried vnto yong Theodor the emperours ſonne, much of the ſame age. Not long after embaſſadours were alſo ſent vnto the emperour from the Sultan of ICONIUM, to confirme and prolong the league betwixt them; for the Tartars not contented to haue driuen the Turks out of PERSIA and the farre Eaſterne countries, began now alſo to cut them ſhort in their prouinces in the leſſer ASIA: wherefore the Sultan of ICONIUM, fearing leaſt whiles he had his hands full of thoſe his moſt dreadfull enemies, of themſelues too ſtrong for him, he ſhould behind be ſet vpon by the Greeke emperour, and ſo thruſt out of all, H ſent theſe embaſſadours vnto him for peace; which he for many cauſes eaſily graunted. Firſt, for that he foreſaw what an hard matter it would be for him to maintaine warre at once both in ASIA againſt the Turks, and in EUROPE againſt the Latines: then by this warlike nation, as by a moſt ſure bulwarke, to keepe his owne countries ſafe from the inuaſion of the barbarous Tartars, vnto whoſe furie he ſhould himſelfe lie open, if the Turks were once taken out of their way. Both ſufficient reaſons for the emperour to yeeld vnto the Sultan, which he did: ſo was the peace concluded, and the embaſſadors diſpatched. This peace exceedingly comforted and much land to be plowed vp for corne, and ſo many vineyards to be planted, as might plentifully ſuffice his own houſe, and ſuch poore as he daily relieued; with a great ouerplus, which he cauſed to be carefully laid vp in ſtore. He kept alſo great heards of cattell, flocks of ſheepe, and foules of all ſorts without number. The like he cauſed his kinſmen and other of the nobilitie to doe, to the intent that euery great man hauing ſufficient for his own ſpending at home, ſhould not take any thing from the poore countreyman, that ſo euery man contenting himſelfe with his owne, might liue in peace without the grieuance of others. By which means in a few yeares euery barne and garnarie was full of corne, euery ſellar full of wines, euery ſtable full of cattell, euery ſtorehouſe full of victuals: the fields were couered with corne and cattell, and in euery mans yard were to be ſeene all kinds of tame foules, without number. At which time alſo there K fortuned a great famine among the Turks: inſomuch, as that they were inforced to fetch their greateſt reliefe from out of the Chriſtian countries. Then might you haue ſeene euery way full of Turks, men, women & children, trauelling to and fro into the emperours prouinces for victuals: their gold, their ſiluer, their other rich commodities, they gaue vnto the Chriſtians for food; a little corne was woorth a good commoditie, euery bird, ſheep, & kid, was ſold at a great rate: by which meanes the countrey mens houſes were full of the Turks wealth, and the emperours cofers ſtored with their treaſure. The greatneſſe of the profit ariſing of this plentie of the

Chriſtians, & penurie of the Turks, may hereby eaſily be gathered, for that of egges daily ſold, ſo much money was in ſhort time gathered, as made the empreſſe an imperiall crowne of gold, richly ſet with moſt orient pearle and pretious ſtones of great price; which the emperour called L Ouata, for that it was bought with egge money. Thus flouriſhed the Greeke empire in the leſſer ASIA, vnder the good emperour Iohn Ducas. The Turks at the ſame time declining as faſt, daily pilled in one corner or another by the Tartars, and conſumed with famine at home.

1227 Fredericke the Germane emperour, had of long time vowed to take vpon him an expedition into the Holy land: for performance wherof, he was hardly called vpon, firſt by Honorius quartus the Pope; and afterward for his long delay, excommunicated by Gregorie the ninth: not ſo much for the zeale they had vnto the ſacred warre, as to buſie the emperour a farre off in warres abroad, whileſt they in the meane time, to increaſe their owne power, drew from him ſome one part or other of his empire: which he not without cauſe fearing, from day to day, and yeare to yeare, delayed the performance of his vow, ſo much vrged by the Pope; by his preſence & po- M wer, ſtil diſappointing all the ſlie deſigns of the Popes, conceiued or put in practiſe againſt him. But now at length mooued, or more truly to ſay, enforced with the thundering and lightning of Pope Gregorie, he reſolued to ſet forward in the yeare 1227. About which time Iolenta or Yoland his wife, the king of HIERVSALEM his daughter, died in childbed, being before deliuered of a faire ſonne. Now were met together at BRVNDVSIVM an exceeding great number of courageous

A gious and deuout ſouldiers out of all parts of Chriſtendome, eſpecially out of GERMANIE, vnder the leading of Lodwicke Lantgraue of THVRINGE, and Sigefride Biſhop of ANGVSTA; all ſtirred vp with the fame of ſo notable an expedition. But whileſt they there ſtaied ſomewhat long, the plague arоſe among the Germans, whereof in ſhort time after, both the Lantgraue and the Biſhop died, with many of the other beſt ſouldiers. The Emperour himſelfe was vpon his way as farre as MALEA, vpon the farther ſide of PELOPONESVS, where falling deſperately ſicke of a burning feauer, and put backe with contrary windes, hee returned againe to BRVNDVSIVM, and there ſtaied a great while after. Then began the Pope againe to fret and fume, and to caſt out his excommunications againſt the Emperour, as if it had been
B thunder and lightning, accuſing him of periurie, infidelitie, and many other grieuous crimes; of all which the Emperour was ready to haue cleared himſelfe in an open aſſemblie of the Princes of GERMANIE, to haue beene holden at RAVENNA, had it not beene by the Pope and the troubles of LOMBARDIE diſturbed. Neuertheleſſe, he by open proteſtations & writings, fully anſwered all the Popes vniuſt accuſations, wherewith he had beene ſo hardly charged: And yet deſirous to performe the expedition by him taken in hand, hauing ſet al things in good order, and put himſelfe againe in readineſſe, he ſet forward from BRVNDVSIVM in Auguſt, in the yeere 1228, leauing the charge of his territories in ITALIE, vnder the care of Reynold 1228
Duke of SPALETO. The Pope diſpleaſed, for that the Emperour at his departure had neither reconciled himſelfe, nor taken his leaue of him, and deeming therein his excommunications &
C fulminations to be contemned & ſet at nought; fell into ſuch a rage and choller, that he forbad all the Chriſtian forces that were in SYRIA to follow him, or to yeeld to him their obedience; and writ letters alſo vnto the Sultan, not to come to any agreement with the Emperour, or to yeeld vnto him any part of the Holy Land: which very letters the Sultan afterwards ſent vnto the Emperor. Neither yet ſo contented, immediatly after his departure, ran vpon his kingdome of NAPLES, and ſo filled all ITALIE with troubles. Neuertheleſſe the Emperor happily arriuing at PTOLEMAIS, was there honourably receiued of the Chriſtian forces, notwithſtanding the Popes threats and curſings. Of whoſe arriuall, Sultan Meledin hauing intelligence, and loth to draw ſo mightie an enemie as was the Emperour, vpon him, by his embaſſadours offered him moſt honourable conditions of peace: which before he would accept of, he by conuenient meſ-
D ſengers ſent vnto the Pope, to haue his conſent and approbation. But ſuch was his rage, as that he would not ſuffer the meſſengers to come into his preſence, or vouchſafe to reade the Emperours letters, being brought vnto him; but like a mad man, preſently rent them in peeces. All which indignities the Emperour neuertheleſſe tooke in good part, and concluded a peace with the Turkes for ten yeeres, vpon theſe conditions: firſt, That he ſhould be annointed & accounted King of HIERVSALEM: then, That the holy citie, with all the land of PALESTINE, ſhould be deliuered vnto him: thirdly, That he might at his pleaſure fortifie the cities of NAZARETH & IOPPE: fourthly, That all ſuch places as were ſometime in the power of Baldwin the fourth king of HIERVSALEM, and taken from him by Sultan Saladin, ſhould be reſtored: and laſt of all, That all priſoners on both ſides ſhould be ſet at libertie without ranſome. So the peace con-E cluded, the Emperour with his armie came to the deſolate citie of HIERVSALEM, and there vpon Eaſter day was with great ſolemnitie crowned king therof, in the yeere 1229. And ſo hauing 1229 repaired the wals of the citie, with certain Churches, fortified NAZARETH & IOPPE, & furniſhed Fredericke the Emperor crowned King of Hieruſalem.
them with ſtrong garriſons, & appointed Raynold Duke of BAVARIA his lieutenant in SYRIA, he with two gallies only returned into ITALIE: Euer ſince which time the Kings of SICILIA haue been alſo called Kings of HIERVSALEM, & haue oftentimes born the armes of both kingdomes.

The next yeere Pope Gregorie iu deſpight of the Emperor Frederick, more than for any zeale 1230 lately erected) as by his trumpeters, ſtirre vp a wonderfull number of zealous and deuout Chri-F ſtians, almoſt in euery part of Chriſtendome, to take vpon them the croſſe (as they termed it) the cogniſance of ſuch, as had by vow bound themſelues to take vp armes againſt the Turks & Saraſins, for the recouerie or defence of the Holy Land. Theſe deuout men met together in great number, vnder the leading of Theobald King of NAVAR, Americus Countie of MONTFORT, Henrie Countie of CHAMPAIGNE, and others too long to rehearſe (of purpoſe ſtirred vp to trouble the ten yeeres peace before concluded betwixt the Emperour and the Turkes in SYRIA) ſet forward, & after long trauell paſſing the ſtrait of BOSPHORVS, not farre from CONSTANTI-

NOPLE, into BYTHINIA, came to the riuer of SANGARIVS, and there ſtaied a while to refreſh themſelues. Afterwards paſſing through GALATIA, and ſo from countrey to countrey through the leſſer ASIA, they came at length vnto the ſtraits of the mountaine AMANVS (a part of the mountaine TAVRVS) which they found before taken by the Turks, and the Sultan of ICONIVM himſelfe not farre off encamped with a ſtrong armie. Neuertheleſſe the valiant Countie of MONT-FORT, which had the leading of the vantguard, couragiouſly marching forward, by plaine force opened the paſſage of the mountaine, hauing ſlaine or put to flight the Turkes appointed for the keeping thereof: the King of NAVARRE in the meane time (though in vaine) aſſailing the Sultan in his campe; who fearing the great power of the Chriſtians, kept himſelfe within his owne ſtrength, and would not ſtirre. Wherefore the King ſeeing it to no purpoſe there longer to ſtay, diuiding his armie into three parts, left the Sultan, and followed after the Countie, placing his baggage in the midſt, and the beſt of his ſouldiers in the rereward. But whileſt they thus march vp the great mountaine, the Turkes better acquainted with thoſe paſſages, were ſtill at hand, aſſailing them ſometime behinde, ſometime on the one ſide, ſometime on the other, as they ſaw occaſion: and at length taking them at an aduantage in a great plaine, ſet vpon them (now before almoſt ſpent with hunger and trauell) and there ſlew of them an exceeding great number. But by the comming on of the night, the battell was broken off, and the Chriſtians repairing vnto their enſignes, paſſed the ſtraits, and ſo at length arriued at ANTIOCH, hauing loſt by the way the greateſt part of the armie, with all their wealth, their victuals, and moſt part of their horſes: the remnant yet left, hauing a little refreſhed themſelues, were by ſea tranſported to PTOLEMAIS; from whence they were afterward by the Templars conducted to GAZA, where they lay, and of the ſpoile of the countrey greatly inriched themſelues. As for any other great matters, they were not able of themſelues to take in hand; and helpe of ſuch forces as the Emperour had before left at HIERVSALEM, and other places, they could haue none; hauing expreſſe charge from the Emperour himſelfe, not to doe any thing againſt the enemie, tending to the breach of the ten yeeres league: which the Turkes well perceiuing, and that they had to doe but with theſe new come gueſts, and ſome few others their partakers; hauing gathered together their forces, lay in ambuſh for them in euery corner to cut them off. Neither was it long, but that theſe of GAZA going farre into the countrey, and returning laded with ſpoile, were ſet vpon by the Turkes; whom they (caſting away the ſpoile they had before taken) notably repulſed and put to flight, the day now drawing to an end. But early the next morning appeared a farre greater number of Turkes than before; which now comming on, charged the Chriſtians, who all that night had ſtood watching in their armour, & ſo ioyned with them a moſt cruell battell: wherin the Chriſtians ſhewed ſo much valour as was poſſible for men to doe; but wearied with long fight, and oppreſſed with the multitude of their enemies, they were ouercome and ſlaine almoſt euery mothers ſonne. Among the reſt, the two Counties, Americus and Henry, fell: the King of NAVARRE himſelfe hardly eſcaped by the exceeding ſwiftnes of his horſe, & by vncertaine wayes wandring vp and downe the countrey, not knowing well which way to take, after two daies came by good fortune to IOPPE: ſome few others eſcaped by flight to PTOLEMAIS, the heauie meſſengers of the misfortune of their fellowes. The King afterwards viſiting the holy places at HIERVSALEM, returned home into his country, with ſome few of his followers, hauing performed nothing of that the world expected.

The Chriſtians by perſwaſion of the Templars breake their league with the Turkes.

About foure yeeres after, Raynold Duke of BAVARIA, whom Frederick the Emperor had left his lieutenant in HIERVSALEM, died; hauing by the ſpace of fiue yeeres peaceably gouerned that bruiſed kingdome. After whoſe death, the Templars (who, he yet liuing, would oftentimes haue broken the league, but that they were by his authoritie and wiſedome reſtrained) now tooke occaſion to ſtir vp the people to take vp armes againſt the Turks, without reſpect vnto the league yet in force, or of the dangers like thereof to enſue. Whereof the Ægyptian Sultan hearing, raiſed a great army, ſending alſo for the Choraſines, a warlike nation then lying neere vnto BABYLON, to come vnto his aid. Thus become very ſtrong, he firſt laid ſiege to GAZA, but a little before repaired & fortified by the king of NAVARRE and the Templars, which he at length tooke by force, and put to ſword all that were therein, as well the citizens as the garriſon ſouldiers: In like manner he dealt alſo with them of ASCALON, and other places as he went. To repreſſe this his furie, the Templars and Hoſpitalers had aſſembled the whole ſtrength of that weake kingdome, and neere vnto TYBERIAS came to haue giuen him battell. Who vpon

A their approach haſtily retired,as if he had for feare ſhunned battell. But whiles the Chriſtians as victors the night following lay negligently encamped along the riuer ſide, he returning backe again with his armie,came vpon them before they were well aware,halfe ſleeping halfe waking, but altogether vnarmed,with a moſt horrible outcrie. The Chriſtians now altogether awaked, and not a little troubled with the ſuddennes of the matter,haſtily and diſorderly(as muſt needs in ſo great a confuſion) tooke vp their weapons,ſuch as came firſt to hand,and ſo couragiouſly oppoſed themſelues againſt their enemies. There was fought a moſt terrible and doubtfull battell, and that alſo for a long ſpace; the Chriſtians ſtill encouraging one another to doe their laſt deuoir. But the Turks ſtill keeping their order,againſt the diſordered Chriſtians,and farre moe
B alſo than they in number, preuailed, and there ouerthrew them with a great ſlaughter, but not without the loſſe of many thouſands alſo of their owne men, which there lay dead vpon the ground. Moſt part of the beſt commanders both of the Templars and Hoſpitalers were there ſlaine, ſuch as eſcaped fled to TYRE.

The Sultan encouraged with ſo great a victorie, marched forthwith to HIERVSALEM, 1234 which he tooke without reſiſtance; and there put to ſword all that he found therein, men, wo- Hieruſalem taken and raſed by the Turkes.
men and children, without reſpect of ſex or age: and afterwards hauing rifled the ſame,raſed it downe to the ground,burning the buildings,and ouerthrowing the wals,not long before repaired by the Emperor Frederick,and much beautified by his lieutenant Raynold. And carried with an infernall furie, defaced, and moſt ſhamefully polluted the ſepulchre of our bleſſed Sauiour, C neuer before then violated or defiled, but of all nations vntouched and reuerenced; which for all that,may ſeeme to haue been done,not ſo much for the hatred vnto the Chriſtian religion,as for that it was the place of all others moſt deſired of the Chriſtians;and for the gaining whereof they had vndertaken ſo many hard aduentures,and ſo much troubled the Saraſins and Turkes.

Thus by the vnfaithfull breaking of the league, the moſt ancient and famous citie of HIERVSALEM, ſometime the terreſtriall ſeat of the moſt Higheſt, and glorie of the world, fell againe into the power of the Turkes and Infidels,in the yeere 1234,in whoſe hands it hath euer ſince remained euen vntill this day: now a poore ruinous citie, gouerned by one of the Turkes Sanzacks, and for nothing now more famous than for the ſepulchre of our bleſſed Sauiour; againe repaired and much viſited by the deuout Chriſtians, and not vnreuerenced by the D Turkes themſelues.

The loſſe of this ſo famous a citie, together with the dangerous ſtate of the Chriſtians in SYRIA,much grieued the other Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt;eſpecially Frederick the Emperour, by whom it had beene but a few yeeres before gained. Howbeit he could not now remedie the matter according to his deſire, being himſelfe grieuouſly entangled with the endleſſe troubles which Pope Gregorie had (as it were by tradition) left vnto the other Popes his ſucceſſors, for the troubling of his ſtate,vntil at length they had depriued him of his empire,& not long after of his life alſo. Among other the great Princes, carefull for the poore Chriſtians in SYRIA, was Lewis the French king the ninth of that name,a Prince of great power,but of al others of that time moſt famous for his zeale vnto the Chriſtian religion, and for his deuout manner of life: who E abounding in wealth and all things elſe of a great Prince to be deſired, and withall oftentimes conſidering the notable expeditions many Chriſtian Princes had (to their immortall glorie) made, ſome into SYRIA, ſome into ÆGYPT, againſt the enemies of Chriſt,and for the reliefe of the oppreſſed Chriſtians;was many times about to haue taken vpon himſelfe the like. But in theſe his deuout motions, before he could reſolue vpon ſo great an enterpriſe, hee fell dangerouſly ſicke, in ſo much that for certaine daies he lay ſpeechleſſe, deuoid of ſenſe and motion, without any ſigne of life, but that he did a little faintly breathe: when comming a little vnto himſelfe, (whether moued with deuotion, or troubled with his former conceits then running in his weake braine, is vncertaine) the firſt thing he asked for, was the croſſe (the cogniſance of ſuch as vowed themſelues vnto the ſacred war) which he ſolemnly receiued at the hands of the F Biſhop of PARIS. At which time alſo his three brethren, Alphonſus Countie of POITIERS, Charles Countie of ANIOV,& Robert Countie of ARTHOIS,with Hugh Duke of BVRGVNDIE,William Earle of FLANDERS,Hugh Countie of S. Paul, and afterwards moſt of the nobilitie of FRANCE,to accompanie the King,tooke vpon them the ſame charge. Neuertheleſſe,it was not by and by taken in hand,but ſome few yeeres let paſſe in the conſultation and preparation for ſo great an enterpriſe: many in the meane time diſcharging their vow,by dying before 1248 at home in peace in their owne countries. At length the deuout King ſtill reſolute in his former G determination, hauing taken order with Blanch his mother for his affaires at home, and put all things in readineſſe for his iourney, came to LYONS to take his leaue of Pope Innocentius the King Lewis ſetteth forward toward the Holy Land. fourth (who for feare of the Emperour Frederick then lay there for his more ſafetie) and from thence to MARCEILLES, where embarking himſelfe with his armie the fiue and twentieth day of Auguſt, in the yeere 1248, he the twentieth day of September following arriued in ſafetie in the Iſland of CYPRVS, and was there royally entertained by Guy Luſignan then King of that countrey.

Now was the French King deſirous to haue gone directly for ÆGYPT, without longer ſtay in CYPRVS, had he not beene otherwiſe perſwaded, both for that his whole fleet was not yet H come, and the time of the yeere began to grow vnſeaſonable, and the weather tempeſtuous.
But whileſt he there ſtaied, paſſing the winter, the plague (one of the readie attendants of great armies) began to ariſe in the campe, which daily increaſing, had in ſhort time taken away a great number of men, and thoſe not of the meaneſt ſort. Amongſt whom were Robert Biſhop of BEAUVAIS, Iohn Countie MONT-FORT, the Counties of VENDOSME and DREVX, Archambaut Lord of BVRBON, with diuers other Knights and Gentlemen, to the number of 240:
ſo that by force of the infectious contagion, the King was conſtrained to diuide his armie into diuers places of the Iſland, attending vntill the infection ſhould ceaſe. In the meane time the Templars hauing in ſuſpect both the French and the Turks: the Turks, for feare they ſhould ouerrun all; and the French, leſt hauing gotten the victorie, they ſhould take all into their owne I hands, and ſo diminiſh their power and authoritie, wherewith they tyrannized ouer the other poore Chriſtians; ſent embaſſadours ſecretly vnto Meledin Sultan of ÆGYPT, to perſwade him betimes to come to ſome good agreement for peace, ſo to auert the power of the French King from doing him further harme, or proceeding further in that warre. Of which motion the Sultan well liking, ſent one of his noble men to intreat with the maſter of the Templars concerning a peace, ſo that it might be by conſent of the French. The Templars glad of ſo honourable a meſſage, writ vnto the French King out of SYRIA, how the matter ſtood; perſwa-ding him to accept of the peace offered, ſetting out in great words the Sultans great preparations and power. And ſo indeed had abuſed the King, had not the King of CYPRVS acquainted with his doings, perſwaded him that it was but a fineneſſe of the great maſter, and that hee K had firſt ſent vnto the Sultan, and procured that noble man to be ſent: which the King vpon conſideration perceiuing to be true, fed the Turkes embaſſadour with hope of peace, but writ vnto the maſter of the Templars, vpon the price of his head from thenceforth not to receiue any embaſſage from the enemie, or to haue any further intelligence with him.

Winter now paſt, and the plague well ceaſed, diuers noble gentlemen and great commanders which following the King, and ſetting forth ſomewhat late, or for feare of the plague had ſtaied by the way and wintred ſome in one place, ſome in another, began to repaire vnto CY-PRVS: as Robert Duke of BVRGVNDIE, who hauing wintred in ACHAIA, came now in the beginning of the Spring vnto the King, with a number of good horſemen; and with him William Prince of ACHAIA, with a great fleet out of PELOPONESVS, which country, with moſt part L of GRECIA, was then vnder the command of the Latines; amongſt others came alſo William, ſurnamed Long-eſpie, Earle of SARISBVRIE, with a band of luſtie tall ſouldiers. So the armie being met together, and all things againe in readineſſe, King Lewis departing from CYPRVS, and toſſed at ſea with contrary winds, about 5 daies after fell with the coaſt of ÆGYPT, & there with all his fleet came before the ſtrong towne of DAMIATA, being (as we haue ſaid) the key of that kingdome. The Sultan long before vnderſtanding of the French Kings purpoſe for the inuaſion of his countrey, had ſtrongly fortified his frontier townes, and put into them ſtrong garriſons, beſide the great power he kept with himſelfe in readineſſe at all aſſaies, as occaſion ſhould require. Vpon the approch of the Chriſtians, the gouernour of DAMIATA was ready vpon the ſhore, with a number of braue ſouldiers to keepe them from landing; who neuertheleſſe reſo- M lutely before ſet downe for the performing of that they came for, manning forth their long boats with their archers and croſſebowes to beat the enemie from the ſhore, ran a ground with their other ſmall boats, made of purpoſe for the landing of men; and ſo without longer ſtay came to handie blowes, where for a while was fought a moſt ſharpe and cruell battell, the Chriſtians ſtriuing to land, and the Turkes to keepe them off, many falling on both ſides. But what ſhould

A ſhould an handfull doe againſt ſo many? The Turks oppreſſed with the multitude ſtill landing more and more, and hauing done what was poſſible for them to doe, fled into the towne, leauing behind them their gouernor, with fiue hundred of their beſt ſouldiers dead vpon the ſhore.

This citie of DAMIATA was exceeding rich and populous, and had in the former warres 1249 not been taken but by more than a yeeres ſiege, (as is before declared) and that not ſo much by the valour of the Chriſtians, as by the extremitie of the plague and famine: ſince which time it had been ſtrongly fortified by the Turks, with deepe ditches, high wals, and ſtrong bulwarkes, and was at that time well ſtored with victuals alſo, and all things elſe for the enduring of a long ſiege. Neuertheleſſe, the ſouldiers that were left, and the citizens (diſcouraged with the loſſe of B their gouernour, and remembrance of the miſeries before endured in the former ſiege, and ſeeing the Chriſtians now readie againe to beſiege the ſame) the night following, a little before the breake of day, ſet fire euery man vpon his owne houſe, and ſo by a bridge which they had made of boats, fled ouer the great riuer, breaking the bridge when they were ouer, for feare their enemies ſhould thereby haue followed after them. The Chriſtians perceiuing their flight, without reſiſtance entred the citie, and being ſtrangers, did what they could to quench the fire, and to ſaue that which the inhabitants themſelues would faine haue with fire deſtroied; and ſo afterwards found great abundance of riches, with plentifull ſtore of all manner of victuals, wherewith the ſouldiers both enriched and refreſhed themſelues. This ſo happie and vnexpected a victorie happened vnto the Chriſtians about the beginning of October, in the yeere 1249. Sul-
C tan Meledin himſelfe, diſcouraged with the loſſe of ſo ſtrong a citie, offered vnto the French king for the redeeming thereof, and to haue peace at his hands, more territorie in SYRIA and the land of PALESTINE, than the Chriſtians had of long time before: which large offer was by the French, eſpecially by the Earle of ARTHOIS the Kings brother, proudly reiected, and ALEXANDRIA the moſt famous port & metropolitical citie of ÆGYPT, further demanded, to the great diſcontentment of the Turks and Saraſins. In theſe troubles died Meledin the old Sultan, a man not much beloued of his people: in whoſe ſtead Melechſala (or Melexala, as ſome call him) a valiant and couragious Prince, well beloued of his ſubiects, and but euen then returned out of SYRIA and ARABIA, where he had beene to craue aid of the other Mahometane Princes, was choſen Sultan. Which Princes, eſpecially the Sultan of DAMASCO, al-D though they had not of long beene at any good accord among themſelues, or with the Ægyptian; yet in this common danger of their ſuperſtition, which by the loſſe of ÆGYPT was like to be greatly weakned, they ioyned hands together, and ſo ſent him great aid.

The citizens of Damiata ſet fire vpon the citie, and ran away by the light.

The new Sultan thus ſtrengthened, drew neerer vnto the Chriſtians, which then lay encamped not farre from DAMIATA, and had with them a hot skirmiſh, wherein hee was put to the worſe, and ſo with ſome loſſe glad to retire. But the Chriſtians the next day, in hope of like ſucceſſe ſallying out againe, were ouerthrowne, with ten times more loſſe than was he the day before, and ſo faine to flie vnto the campe. By which victorie the Sultan encouraged, began now to conceiue better hope of the ſucceſſe of his wars; and by ſtopping the paſſages both by water and land, to prouide, that no victuals could without great perill be brought either vnto the E citie or the campe, inſomuch that at length victuals began to grow ſcarce in both: whereof the Sultan was not ignorant, as being thereof throughly informed by ſuch fugitiues, as for want, or other cauſes, often times fled out of the French campe into his.

Winter thus paſſing, and wants ſtill increaſing, it fortuned that the gouernour of the great citie of CAIRE (vpon the fortune whereof depended the ſtate of the whole kingdome) a man not euill affected vnto the Chriſtian religion, and in his heart highly offended with the Sultan, for the death of his brother by him wrongfully executed; by ſecret meſſengers perſwaded the French King to come on with his armie to the citie, the regall ſeat of the Sultan, promiſing him to deliuer it into his power, with full inſtructions what he had in all points to do for the gaining thereof. Whereupon the King, who had before of himſelfe purpoſed the ſame exploit, but now
F filled with a greater hope, aſſembled together the greateſt forces he was able to make. At which time alſo he ſent for the Earle of SALISBVRIE, with the reſt of the Engliſh men, who for many proud indignities offered them by the French (eſpecially by the Earle of ARTOIS the Kings brother) whereof they could haue no redreſſe, were gone to PTOLEMAIS, without purpoſe to haue any more ſerued in thoſe wars: But now being ſent for by the King, with promiſe of better vſage and honorable recompence for the wrongs paſt, returned againe into ÆGYPT, there

there to doe their laſt endeuour. With whoſe comming the King ſtrengthened, but more by the new ſupplies brought vnto him by his brother Alphonſus out of FRANCE, leauing the Duke of BVRGVNDIE with a conuenient garriſon, with the Queene his wife, Odo the Popes Legat, and diuers other great Ladies in DAMIATA, he himſelfe ſet forward with his armie towards CAIRE. Of whoſe comming the Sultan hearing, and loth vpon the fortune of one battell to aduenture his whole eſtate, offered by his embaſſadours to reſtore vnto him all the land of PALESTINE, with a great ſumme of money for the defraying of the charges of thoſe wars, and all the priſoners he had taken, ſo that he would redeliuer vnto him the citie of DAMIATA, and ioine with him in league and amitie. Which faire offer for all that, the French King, by the perſwaſion of the Legat and others, refuſed. So the King marching ſtill on, was to paſſe an arme of the great riuer NILVS (the Sultan on the other ſide ſtill readie with his armie to ſtay his paſſage) which he had thought to haue made by a bridge of boats, prepared for the ſame purpoſe: but better conducted by a fugitiue Saraſin vnto a foord, before to him vnknowne, ſent his brother Robert, Earle of ARTOIS, with the third part of the armie before him, accompanied with the maſter of the Templars and the Earle of SALISBVRIE, with their followers. Who paſſing the riuer at the aforeſaid foord, ſuddenly aſſailed the Turks in their tents (the Sultan being then abſent in ſolemniſing one of their prophane feaſts) & put them to flight. With which victorie the French Earle aboue meaſure encouraged, would needs on forwards, as if he would himſelfe alone haue carried away the glorie of the whole conqueſt. Whom for all that certaine of the ancient Templars, better acquainted with the manners of that deceitfull nation than he, and better conſidering alſo of their owne abilitie and ſtrength, perſwaded him to content himſelfe with the honour he had alreadie got, and not to proceed any further in proſecuting of the enemie, vntill the comming of the reſt of the armie, eſpecially in that deſperate eſtate of the enemie, wherein he was to win or loſe all. Vnto whom the proud Earle in great deſpight replied, that he would proſecute his victorie, and follow his good fortune; calling them daſtards and cowards, opprobriouſly obiecting vnto them the common fame, whereby it was commonly reported, That the Holy land might long ſince haue beene againe vnited vnto the bodie of the Chriſtian commonweale, but for the foule colluſion of the falſe Templars & Hoſpitalers with the Turks and Infidels. With which reprochfull ſpeech, the maſter of the Templars not without cauſe mooued, anſwered for himſelfe and his fellowes, that he ſhould, when he would, and where he durſt, diſplay his enſignes, and he ſhould finde them as readie to follow as he was to goe before them. The Earle of SALISBVRIE alſo willing to ſtint this ſtrife, perſwaded Earle Robert not to be ſo wedded to his owne opinion, but to liſten vnto the graue and wholeſome counſell of the Templars, being men of great experience: and ſo turning vnto the maſter of the Templars, began likewiſe with gentle words to pacifie him alſo. But whileſt he was yet ſpeaking, the Earle interrupting him with many opprobrious words, called him daſtard and coward, and wiſhed that the armie were rid of him, and the fearfull cowards his countrymen. Whereunto the Earle of SALISBVRIE anſwered: Well Generall, on in Gods name, and whereſoeuer you dare ſet your foot, mine ſhall be as farre as yours; and I beleeue wee goe this day, where you ſhall not dare to come nigh my horſes taile: as afterward indeed it proued. Howbeit, the Earle ſo ſaid, for that Earle Robert and the Frenchmen had many times in reproch and diſdaine, after their manner, called him and his followers Engliſh tailes.

The proud Earle conſtant in his former purpoſe, and not to be otherwiſe perſwaded, ſet forward: and firſt aſſaulted a little towne or caſtle, not farre off, called MANSOR, whereunto he inconſideratly approching, was notably repulſed; and hauing loſt a number of his men, was as a man diſcouraged, about to haue retired. When ſuddenly the Sultan, neerer at hand than the Earle had thought, ſtirred vp with the noiſe of the alarum, came on with his whole power; and finding the armie of the Chriſtians now diuided (as he had long wiſhed) with the multitude of his people encloſed them round, and had with them a great and mortall fight: wherein though the Chriſtians right worthily behaued themſelues, for the ſmall number they were, yet oppreſſed with the multitude, and on euery ſide beſet, they were ſlaine downeright. Then, but all too late, it repented the Earle of his fooliſh raſhneſſe, & that he had not hearkened vnto better counſell; and ſeeing the Earle of SALISBVRIE valiantly fighting, cried out vnto him to flie, ſeeing God (as he ſaid) fought againſt them. Whereunto the noble Earle anſwered no more, but God forbid that my fathers ſonne ſhould runne away from the face of a Saraſin. The French Earle thinking

A king by the ſwiftneſſe of his horſe to haue ſaued his life, flying out of the battell, and taking the riuer of THAFNES, ouerladed with his armour, was there drowned. The Earle of SALISBVRIE couragiouſly enduring the enemies charge, with his owne hand manfully ſlew many a Turke and Saraſin that day, vntill that at length hauing his horſe ſlain vnder him, and himſelfe ſo wounded in the legs, as that he was not able longer to ſtand, yet vpon his knees laying about him like a deſperate man, and ſelling his life as deare as he could, was there ſlaine, but not vanquiſhed. With him periſhed the whole armie, ſo encloſed by the Sultan, that ſcarce any one eſcaped aliue, more than two Templars, one Hoſpitaler, and one common ſouldier, the meſſengers of this heauie newes.

Earle Robert in flying, drowned

The Earle of Salisburie valiantly fighting, ſlaine.

B About the ſame time alſo ſickneſſe daily increaſing in the French campe, the King purpoſing to march forward to CAIRE, ſent a great number of ſicke and weake people downe the riuer of NILVS to DAMIATA: of whoſe going the Sultan vnderſtanding, cauſed a great number of ſmall boats to be carried in carts by land vnto the riuers ſide, which well manned, and meeting them by the way, ſet vpon them, and burnt or drowned them euery mothers ſonne, ſauing one only Engliſhman, called Alexander Giffard, who wounded in fiue places of his body, eſcaped yet into the French campe, reporting there what had happened vnto the reſt.

Now had the Sultan alſo got intelligence of the compact betwixt the gouernour of CAIRE and the King, for the betraying of the citie: and thereupon had cauſed him to be ſuddenly apprehended and put in ſafe keeping, vntill hee were at better leiſure to vnderſtand farther of the

The gouernour of Caire apprehended.

C matter: which no leſſe troubled the French King, than did the former misfortune; all his hope for the yeelding vp of the citie, being thereby cut off. Thus his hopes, together with his ſtrength, daily decreaſing, hee would haue gladly accepted of the conditions which hee before refuſed, which the Sultan, now growne very ſtrong, would by no meanes heare of; but in ſtead thereof, by way of deriſion, ſent to know of him, what was become of all his mattockes, forkes, rakes, ſythes, plowes, & harrowes, which he had brought ouer with him? and why he ſet them not to worke, but ſuffered them like an euill huſband to rot and ruſt beſide him? All which, with much more, the good king was glad to put vp. For now his forces greatly diminiſhed, as well by ſickneſſe, as by the former loſſes, finding himſelfe farre too weake, he would faine haue retired back againe to DAMIATA: which the Sultan foreſeeing, got ſo betwixt him & home, that now there

D was no remedie, but either to fight it out, or yeeld. The King himſelfe had been often before intreated by his nobilitie, whileſt the riuer was yet vnpoſſeſſed by the enemie, to haue conueyed himſelfe by water to DAMIATA, for that in the ſafetie of his perſon conſiſted (as they ſaid) the ſafetie of his kingdome, whatſoeuer became of them: whereunto he could neuer be perſwaded, ſaying, that he would neuer forſake his people, becauſe he would not be forſaken of them, but was reſolued to endure with them whatſoeuer it ſhould pleaſe God to lay vpon him. So paſſing the riuer by the ſame foord whereby his brother had not long before vnfortunately paſſed, and comming to the place where the battell was fought, he might ſee the dead bodies of the Chriſtians pitifully mangled, with their heads & hands cut off: For the Sultan, the more to encourage his ſouldiers, had before the battell proclaimed, that whoſoeuer ſhould bring him the head or

E hand of a Chriſtian, ſhould haue a great reward for his labour; in hope whereof, they had ſo diſmembred them. But long he had not there ſtaied, but that the Sultan began ſuddenly to appeare, with a moſt huge great armie, as if he would euen with the ſight thereof haue diſcouraged the Chriſtians: againſt whom for all that, the Frenchmen in good order oppoſed themſelues, and for the ſpace of three houres made great reſiſtance: But what could one doe againſt ten, and he alſo fainting for ſickneſſe and food? the hard plight wherein the greateſt part of the French armie then was. In concluſion, oppreſſed with the multitude of their enemies, and no way left to flie, they were all ouerthrowne and ſlaine, except ſome few, ſaued in hope of great ranſome. The King himſelfe, with his two brethren, Alphonſus and Charles, and ſome few others, were taken priſoners, and brought vnto the Sultan: who demanding of him, what had moued him ſo

F to make warre againſt him? was anſwered by the King, that it was for religion, and the defence of the name of his God. In this vnfortunate battell, fought the 5. of Aprill, in the yeere 1250, beſides the common ſouldiers, were ſlain moſt of the nobilitie of FRANCE, and all their tents taken.

The Sultan preſently vpon this ouerthrow, ſent of his owne ſouldiers the like number that the French were of, with French enſignes, and diſguiſed in the attire of the ſlaine Frenchmen, to DAMIATA, where the Duke of BVRGVNDIE, the French Queene, & the Popes Legat lay; in

hope to haue been ſo let in for Frenchmen: but they were not ſo well masked, but that they were G by them of the citie diſcouered for enemies, and ſo kept out and deceiued of their purpoſe.

The Chriſtians thus ouerthrowne, and the French king taken priſoner, Melech-ſala the Sultan taking compaſſion vpon him, and yet minding of his life to make his owne againe; cheering him vp with comfortable ſpeeches, began to talke with him of his deliuerance, & of a good attonement to be made betwixt them. The conditions whereof propounded by the Sultan were, That the king ſhould forthwith deliuer againe vnto him the citie of DAMIATA, & moreouer pay vnto him for the ranſome of himſelfe and his, and for the charges of the war, eight thouſād pound of gold; That all priſoners ſhould on both ſides be frankly ſet at libertie, and ſo a peace to be taken for ten yeares. For the more aſſurance whereof, the Sultan offered to ſweare, That H if he failed in the performance thereof, to renounce his Mahomet: requiring likewiſe of the king to ſweare, If he failed in any thing that he had promiſed, to deny his Chriſt to be God: Which prophane oath the king deteſting, and wiſhing rather to die than to giue the ſame; the Sultan wondring at his conſtancie, tooke his word without any oath at all, & ſo publiſhed the league. But whilſt they were comming together to DAMIATA, Melech-ſala now in the pride of this victorie, fearing nothing leſſe than the ſudden change of fortune, or the miſchiefe hanging ouer his head, was in the preſence of a number of his noblemen ſuddenly ſlaine by two deſperat Mamalukes; and one Turqueminus a ſturdie ſlaue of their owne order and vocation (by whoſe procurement it was ſuppoſed to haue beene done) by the conſent of the whole armie created Sultan in his ſtead: who reuoking the league before concluded by Melech-ſala, made another in his I owne name with the king, much vpon the ſame conditions that the other was; which, after hee had receiued DAMIATA, he cauſed to be openly proclaimed. Neuertheleſſe after that king Lewis had paied his ranſome, and was with the remnant of his armie by the Genowaies tranſported from DAMIATA to PTOLEMAIS, the falſe miſcreant performed not the halfe of that he had promiſed, of twelue thouſand Chriſtian captiues that ſhould haue beene ſet free, ſcarce enlarging foure thouſand; and killing all the ſicke ſouldiers whome by his promiſe hee ought to haue relieued; neither ſuffering any Chriſtian to carrie any of his goods with him out of ÆGYPT, which by the league he ought to haue done alſo.

The French king comming to PTOLEMAIS, and purpoſing to haue returned home, was intreated by the maſter of the Templars and hoſpitalars, and other the nobilitie of the Chriſti- K ans, to ſtay, which hee did almoſt by the ſpace of foure yeares: in which time hee repaired the cities of CESAREA and IOPPE, and fortified many ſtrong places for the defence of the Chriſtians againſt the infidels: And ſo commending the protection thereof vnto the knights of the ſacred war, & ſending his brethren away before him, followed after himſelfe, greatly lamented for by all the Chriſtians in SYRIA, and ſo arriued in France the ſixt yeare from the time of his departing thence. This was the end of this long and vnfortunat expedition of Lewis the French king, wherein as ſome write, were eightie thouſand Chriſtians loſt: howbeit the French Chronicles extenuating their loſſe, report, of two and thirtie thouſand French, ſix thouſand to haue returned againe into FRANCE. The citie of DAMIATA in the ſpace of a few yeares twice woon, and twice loſt by the Chriſtians, was ſhortly after the deliuering vp thereof, by the Sultan L raſed downe to the ground, becauſe it ſhould no more ſerue the Chriſtians for an entrance into his kingdome.

The beginning of the Mamalukes and their kingdome.

The late Ægyptian Sultans thus often times inuaded by the Chriſtian princes, and repoſing no great aſſurance in the proweſſe of the effeminate Ægyptians, a people fitter for merchandize and other baſe occupations than for chiualrie and war, had for the ſtrengthening of their kingdome, bought a infinite number of ſlaues, eſpecially of the poore and hardie Circaſſians, called in antient time Getæ and Zinchi, neere vnto COLCHIS and the EVXINE ſea, brought vnto ALEXANDRIA and other ports of ÆGIPT out of thoſe bare cold countries, by merchants, and from thence tranſported to CAIRE and other cities of ÆGYPT: of which poore ſlaues, the late Ægytian Sultans taking their choice, & culling out from the reſt ſuch as were like to be of M greateſt ſpirit and abilitie of bodie, deliuered them vnto moſt skilful and expert teachers; by whom they were carefully taught to run, to leape, to vaut, to ſhoot, to ride, with all other feats of actiuitie, and withall cunningly to handle all manner of weapons, as well on horſebacke as on foot, and ſo inſtructed, and become cunning, were taken out of their ſchooles into pay, and enrolled together as the Sultās choice horſemen, were commōly called by the name of Mamalukes.

A lukes. In whose good seruice the late Sultans finding great vse, spared for no cost, both for their maintenance and increasing of their number; daily erecting new nurseries stored with young frie, which growing vp and readie, was still ioyned to the other. It is wonderfull to tell, vnto what a strength and glorie this order of the Mamalukes was in short time growne, by the care of the Ægyptian Kings: By them they managed their greatest affaires, especially in time of wars; and by their valour, not only defended their countrey, but gained many a faire victorie against their enemies, as they did now against the French. But as too much power in such mens hands, seldome or neuer wanteth danger, so fell it out now betwixt the late Sultan Melech-sala, and those masterfull Mamaluke slaues: who proud of their preferment, and forgetfull of their dutie,
B and seeing the greatest strength of the kingdome in their hands, traiterously slew Melech-sala their chiefe founder, setting vp in his place (as aforesaid) one Turquiminus, a base slaue, one of their owne order and seruile vocation, but indeed otherwise a man of a great spirit and valour. This Melech-sala murthered by the Mamalukes, was the last of the free borne Kings of Æ-GYPT; in whom the Turks kingdome in ÆGYPT, erected by Sarracon and the great Sultan Saladin (as is before said) and in his stocke and familie euer since continued, tooke end, as did also all the power of the Turks in that great and rich kingdome. For the proud Mamalukes hauing now got the soueraignty into their hands, and exalted a Sultan out of themselues, imperiously commanded as great Lords ouer the rest of the people, not suffering them to haue the vse either of horse or armour, or to beare any sway in the common-weale: but keeping them
C vnder with most heauie impositions, and still preferring their owne slaues (wherewith the countrey of ÆGYPT now swarmed) made the naturall countrey people, of all others most miserable, not daring to meddle with any thing more than merchandize, their husbandrie, or other their base mechanicall occupations: whereof the greatest profit still came vnto the Mamalukes, who as Lords of all, with great insolencie, at their pleasure tooke it from them as their owne. As for the great Sultan, they still chose him from among themselues, not suffering any the Sultans children to succeed their fathers in the kingdome; for feare left they in processe of time, proud of their ancestors and parentage, should reckon of them as of his slaues (as indeed they were) and so at length bring in another more free kinde of gouernment.

Against which they prouided also, not only by this restraint of their Sultans children, but of D their owne also: taking order and establishing it as an immutable law, that though the sonnes of the Mamalukes might enioy their fathers lands and wealth after their death, yet that it should not be lawfull for them in any case to take vpon them the name or honour of a Mamaluke: so embarring them from all gouernment in the common wealth, to the intent it might still rest with the Mamalukes. Neither was it lawfull for any borne of Mahometane parents (which could not be slaues) or of the race of the Iewes, to be admitted into that order; but onely such as being borne Christians and become slaues, had from the time of their captiuitie beene instructed in the Mahometan superstition; or else being men growne, and comming thither, had abiured the Christian religion (as many reprobates did in hope of preferment.) Right strange it is to consider, vnto what honour and glorie this slauish empire in short time grew: many of E those poore slaues by rare fortune or secret diuine power, exalted out of the dust vnto the highest degree of honour, prouing most excellent and renowned Princes, of such strength and power, as was dreadfull euen vnto the greatest Princes of the world. In which great glorie, this seruile empire (to the worlds wonder) flourished from this time amongst the greatest by the space of 267 yeeres; vntill that hauing run the appointed race, it was with a great destruction by Selymus the victorious Emperour of the Turks, ouerthrowne in the yeere 1517, and the kingdome of ÆGYPT, with all SYRIA and the land of PALESTINE, brought into the forme of Prouinces, vnited vnto the Turks empire, as they are at this day, and as in the course of this historie shall in due time and place (God willing) at large appeare.

But leauing the kingdome of the Turks thus ouerthrowne in ÆGYPT, and the Mamalukes
F there triumphing; the French King returned into FRANCE, and the Christians in peace in SYRIA: let vs againe returne into the lesser ASIA, and vnto the imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, whither the affaires both of the Turks and of the Christians now call vs. All this while the Greeke empire (for so the Greekes will haue it called) flourished both in peace and plentie in the lesser ASIA, vnder their Emperour Iohn Batazes: the power of the Latines in the meane time declining as fast at CONSTANTINOPLE, vnder the rule of the Latine Emperour

Baldwin

Baldwin the ſecond. As for the Turks whom we left grieuouſly troubled both with famine and C the often incurſions of the Tartars, they had all this while, and yet alſo, enough and more than enough to doe to withſtand the ſame enemie. At length it fortuned that Iohn Ducas the Greeke Emperour died, being at the time of his death about threeſcore yeeres old, whereof he had happily raigned three and thirtie: by whoſe good and diſcreet gouernment, the Greeke empire before brought low and almoſt to nought by the Latines, began againe to gather ſtrength and to flouriſh both in ASIA and ſome little part of EVROPE alſo. Of him are reported many notable matters, which as impertinent to our purpoſe I could willingly paſſe ouer, were I not by the worthy remembrance of one of them ſtaied a while by the way.

This noble and famous Emperour hauing long lamented the death of the faire Empreſſe H Irene his firſt wife, at laſt maried another young Lady, the ſiſter of Manfred King of SICILIE, called Anne, with whom amongſt other honourable and beautifull Dames, ſent by the King her brother for the accompanying of her to CONSTANTINOPLE, was one Marceſina, a rare
The Emperour in loue with Marceſina. paragon, of ſuch a feature as if nature had in her meant to beſtow her greateſt skill. From whoſe mouth alwayes flowed a fountaine of moſt ſugred words, and out of her eyes iſſued (as it were) nets to intangle the amorous in: vpon this ſo faire an obiect, the Emperour not fearing further harme, tooke pleaſure oftentimes to feed his eyes, vntill that at length caught with her lookes, he had loſt his libertie, and was of a great Emperour become her thrall, in ſuch ſort, as that in compariſon of her he ſeemed little or nothing to regard the young Empreſſe his wife; but ſo farre doated vpon her, that he ſuffered her to be attired and honoured with the ſame attire and ho- I nour that the Empreſſe was her ſelfe; whom ſhe now ſo farre exceeded both in grace and fauour with the Emperour, and honour of the people, as that ſhe almoſt alone enioyed the ſame, without regard of her vnto whom it was of more right due. Whileſt ſhe thus alone triumpheth, at length it fortuned that ſhe in all her glorie, attended vpon with moſt of the gallants of the court, and ſome of the Emperours guard, would needs goe (whether for deuotion or for her recreation, I know not) to viſit the monaſterie and faire church, which Blemmydes (a noble man of great renowne, both for his integritie of life, and learning) had of his owne coſt and charges but lately built in the countrey, where he together with his monkes, as men wearie of the world, liued a deuout and ſolitarie contemplatiue life, after the manner of that time, with the great good opinion of the people in generall. This Blemmydes was afterward for his vpright life and K profound learning, choſen Patriarch of CONSTANTINOPLE: which great honour, next vnto the Emperour himſelfe, he refuſed, contenting himſelfe with his cell. Marceſina comming Marceſina the Emperours concubine ſhut out of the church. thither in great pompe, and thinking to haue entred the church, had the doores ſhut againſt her by the monkes, before commanded ſo to doe by Blemmydes their founder: and ſo was to her great diſgrace kept out. For that deuout man deemed it a great impietie, to ſuffer that ſo wicked and ſhameleſſe a woman, againſt whom he had moſt ſharply both ſpoken and written, with her prophane and wicked feet to tread vpon the ſacred pauement of his church. She enraged with this indignitie, hardly by ſo proud a woman to be with patience diſgeſted, and prickt forward by her flattering followers alſo; returning to the court, grieuouſly complained thereof vnto the Emperour, ſtirring him vp by all meanes ſhe could to reuenge the ſame, perſwading L him to haue beene therein himſelfe diſgraced. Whereunto were ioyned alſo the hard ſpeeches of her pickthanke fauourites, who to currie fauor, ſpared not to put oyle as it were vnto the fire, for the ſtirring vp of the Emperour vnto reuenge. Who with ſo great a complaint nothing moued vnto wrath, but ſtrucke as it were to the heart with a remorſe of conſcience, and oppreſſed with heauineſſe, with teares running downe his cheekes, and fetching a deepe ſigh, ſaid:
Why prouoke you me to puniſh ſo deuout and iuſt a man? whereas if I would my ſelfe haue liued without reproach and infamie, I ſhould haue kept my imperiall maieſtie vnpolluted or ſtained. But now ſith I my ſelfe haue beene the cauſe both of mine owne diſgrace, and of the empires; I may thanke mine owne deſerts, if of ſuch euill ſeed as I haue ſowne, I now reape alſo an euill harueſt.

Theodorus Laſcaris choſen Emperour. After the death of this good Emperor, Theodorus his ſonne, borne the firſt yeere of his fathers M raigne, being then about three and thirtie yeeres old, was by the generall conſent of the people ſaluted Emperor in his ſtead: who in the beginning of his empire renewed the league which his father had made with Iathatines the Turkiſh Sultan. And ſo hauing prouided for the ſecuritie of his affaires in ASIA, he with a puiſſant armie paſſed ouer the ſtrait of HELLESPONTVS into EVROPE, to appeaſe the troubles there raiſed in MACEDONIA & THRACIA, by the King

A of BVLGARIA his brother in law, and Michael Angelus Deſpot of THESSALIA; who vpon the death of the old Emperour began to ſpoile thoſe countries, not without hope at length to haue ioyned them vnto their owne: by whoſe comming they were for all that diſappointed of their purpoſe, and glad to ſue to him for peace. But whileſt he was there buſied, he was aduertiſed by letters from NICE, that Michael Paleologus, whom he had left there gouernour in his abſence, was ſecretly fled vnto the Turks: with which newes he was not a little troubled. The cauſe of whoſe flight, as Paleologus himſelfe gaue it out, was, for that he perceiued himſelfe diuers wayes by many his enemies brought into diſgrace, and the Emperours eares ſo filled with their odious complaints, ſo cunningly framed againſt him, as that they were not eaſily or in
B ſhort time to be refelled: and therefore fearing in the Emperours heauie diſpleaſure to be ſuddenly taken away, to haue willingly gone into exile, if ſo happily he might ſaue his life from the malice of them that ſought after it.

At his comming to ICONIVM, he found Iathatines the Sultan making great preparation againſt the Tartars; who hauing driuen the Turks out of PERSIA and the other farre Eaſterne countries (as is before declared) and running ſtill on, did with their continuall incurſions ſpoile a great part of their territories in the leſſer ASIA alſo; and now lay at AXARA, a towne not farre off from ICONIVM: againſt whom the Sultan now making the greateſt preparation he could, gladly welcommed Paleologus, whom he knew to be a right valiant and worthy captaine, commending to his charge the leading of certaine bands of Greekes, whom he had retai-
C ned to ſerue him in thoſe warres, as he had others alſo of the Latines, vnder the conduct of Boniface Moline, a nobleman of VENICE: and ſo hauing put all things in readineſſe, and ſtrengthened with theſe forraine ſupplies of the Greekes and Latines, ſet forward againſt his enemies the Tartars: who at the firſt ſight of the ſtrange enſignes and ſouldiers, were much diſmaied, fearing ſome greater force had beene come to the aid of the Turks. Neuertheleſſe, ioyning with them in battell, had with them at the firſt a moſt terrible and bloudie conflict, wherein that part of the armie that ſtood againſt Paleologus, and his Greekes was put to the worſe, to the great diſcomfiture of the Tartars, being euen vpon the point to haue fled, had not one of the greateſt commaunders in the Turks armie, and a nigh kinſman of the Sultans, for an old grudge that he bare vnto the Sultan, with all his regiment in the heat of the battell reuolted vnto the Tartars:
D whereby the fortune of the battell was in a moment as it were quite altered, they which but now were about to haue fled, fighting like lyons; and they that were victors, now glad to turne their backs and flie: in which flight a great number of the Turks fell, the fierce Tartars moſt eagerly purſuing them. Paleologus with the Generall of the Turks hardly chaſed by the Tartars, and glad euery houre to make a ſtand, and to fight for their liues, with much adoe after many daies flight recouered a Caſtle of the Generals, neere vnto CASTAMONA, and ſo ſaued themſelues. The Tartars after this ſo great a victorie (wherein they had broken the whole ſtrength of the Turks, and brought in hazard the whole ſtate of their kingdome) without reſiſtance forraged all the countries and prouinces ſubiect vnto the Turkiſh Sultan, making ſpoile of whatſoeuer they light vpon: inſomuch, that the Sultan diſcouraged, and hauing now no ſtrength E left to oppoſe againſt them, fled vnto the Greeke Emperour Theodorus for aid; who moſt honourably entertained him with all his traine, and comforted him with ſuch ſmall aid as he thought good then to ſpare him: Which for his more ſafetie he ſent home with him, vnder the leading of Iſaacius Ducas, ſurnamed Murtzuſle, a man in great credit with him. In recompence of which kindneſſe, the Sultan gaue vnto the Emperour the citie of LAODICEA, whereinto he preſently put a ſtrong garriſon: neuertheleſſe, it was not long before it fell againe into the hands of the Turks, being a place not to be holden by the Greekes. Yet for all this, the Sultan finding himſelfe ſtill too weake to withſtand the continuall inuaſions of the Tartars, and wearie of the harmes he dayly ſuſtained; by the aduiſe of his cheefe counſellors made a league with them, yeelding to pay them a certain yearely tribute, therby to redeeme his peace. From which F time the Tartars accounted of the Turks, as of their tributaries and vaſſals.

Not long after this, Michaell Paleologus was by the Emperours kind and gracious letters called home; with his faithfull promiſe alſo before giuen for his ſecuritie: who before his returne bound himſelfe alſo by ſolemne oath, to be vnto the Emperour and his ſonne alwayes loyall, and from thencefoorth neuer to ſeeke after the Empire, or giue cauſe of new ſuſpect for ſuch matters as he had been before charged with: but for euer to yeeld vnto the Emperour, his ſonne, or other his ſucceſſors in the Empire, his dutifull obedience and fidelitie. Vpon which G conditions he was againe made Great Conſtable, and ſo receiued into the Emperours fauour, and liued the reſt of his raigne in great honour and credit with him.

The death of Theodorus the Greeke emperor.

Now Theodorus the Emperour hauing raigned three yeares, fell ſicke and died, leauing behind him his ſonne Iohn, then but a child of ſix yeares old, to ſucceed him in the Empire: whom hee vpon his death bed, together with the Empire, commended to Arſenius the Patriarch, and one George Muzalo his faithfull counſellor, as to his truſtie tutors, to ſee him ſafely brought vp, & the Empire well & peaceably gouerned. This Muzalo was a man of meane parentage, but for his familiar acquaintance and ciuile behauior, of a child brought vp in the Court with the Emperour as his play fellow: with whom he growing vp, ſo framed himſelfe vnto his manners & diſpoſition, that he alone was vnto him in ſtead of all, ſtill at hand, ready to ſay or doe whatſoeuer might be vnto the Emperour gracious or pleaſing. And the elder they grew, ſo increaſed this their mutuall affection and loue alſo: in ſuch ſort, that with him now Emperour, he was of all others in greateſt fauour & authoritie; a warie obſeruer of his delights, a readie miniſter of his affaires, and faithfull partaker of his ſecrets: for which he was in ſhort time promoted vnto the greateſt honors of the Court, and honorably married vnto one of the Emperors nigh kinſwomen; and now at his death, by his laſt will, with the reuerend Patriarch appointed tutor to the yong Emperor and his two yong ſiſters. And for the more aſſurance therof, a ſolemne oath of obedience vnto the yong prince as Emperor, & vnto them as his tutors, was exacted of all ſort of mē both high and low, of what vocation ſoeuer; and that not once, but firſt a little before the Emperours I death, and again after he was now dead: for many of the nobilitie honourably deſcended, ſeeing the ſuddain change of Muzalo his fortune, among themſelues murmured therat, as greeued

with his preferment, ſeeing there were many among them, vnto whom both the tuition of the yong emperour & adminiſtration of the empire of better right appertained; inſomuch as they were both neerer of kin vnto the emperor, and fitter (as they thought) for ſo great a charge than was Muzalo; whom (as they ſaid) they had many cauſes both to contemne and hate: For, beſide that he was not honourably borne, and had ſerued the late emperour Theodore, as the miniſter of his wrath againſt ſome of the nobilitie, cauſes ſufficient of the peoples hatred; if he ſhould now alſo in ſo great authoritie affect the Empire, it was by his malicious enemies vainly doubted, that he would not ſpare to commit any manner of villanie, for the effecting of his inordinat de- K ſire. Of all which Muzalo was not ignorāt, a man at all other times of a moſt quick apprehenſion for ſuch matters, but as then eſpecially, his wits being awaked with theſe ſo great motiues and dangers. Wherfore ſpeedily calling together all the nobilitie into the court, he welcommed thē one by one, and courteouſly diſcourſing with them, offered to diſcharge himſelfe both of the adminiſtration of the empire, and tuition of the yong emperour, and willingly to yeeld the ſame vnto any one of them, whom the reſt ſhould thinke fitteſt for ſo great a charge: which though they all with one conſent as it were refuſed, ſaying, That he was of all others to be preferred, vnto whom the emperour, lord both of the empire and the child, had committed the ſame: yet Muzalo earneſtly requeſted them to the contrarie, and ſtiffely withſtood their deſire, wiſhing indeed rather to haue led a quiet priuat life in ſecuritie, than to haue been ſo ouercharged; not ſo L much for doubt of the enuie then ariſing, as for feare of ſome great danger therof to enſue. But would he, would he not, remedie there was none, but that as the late emperour had appointed, ſo he muſt take the charge vpon him. And now was euery one, as well of the nobilitie, as of the inferior ſort, again with greater ſolemnitie than before the third time ſworn, to the vttermoſt of their power to defend the yong emperour in his empire, and Muzalo in the tuition of him, and adminiſtration of the affaires of the ſtate, and faithfully to yeeld vnto them both all due honour and obedience: which if they ſhould faile religiouſly to performe, they wiſhed vnto themſelues euery man, & to all theirs, a ſhamefull end & deſtruction. Yet notwithſtanding all this ſolemne ſwearing, mixt moſt times with much forſwearing, there were not fully nine daies paſt, but that certaine of the chiefe nobilitie forgetfull or elſe careleſſe of their oath, and full of enuie, ſeldome M ſatisfied but with blood, conſpired the vnworthie death of Muzalo the protectour both of the Emperour & the Empire. The ninth day appointed for the funerall of the Emperour, was now come, at which time were met together at SOSANDRA (an abbey by himſelf built in the honor of the virgin Marie at MAGNESIA) many great Ladies & graue matrons, to mourne as the maner was; all the great princes of the nobilitie, and among them the conſpirators alſo: thither repaired

A paired alſo a number of ſouldiers, prepared for the ſlaughter, with an infinite multitude of the common people, as at ſuch ſolemnities is vſual. But what needs many words, whileſt the hymns were yet in ſinging, & the obſequies in performing, the ſouldiers as they were before inſtructed, ſuddainly breaking into the Church, with their drawn ſwords in their hands, ſlew Muzalo (then Muzalo traiterouſly murdered in the Church. fled vnto the altar for refuge) with his two brethren Andronicus & Theodorus, both men of great account, and diuers others appointed to the maſſacre. So the matrons and the reſt of the multitude breaking off their mourning, and for feare thronging out one in anothers necke, fled as faſt as they could, ſome one way, ſome another, as they thought for their moſt ſafetie: but the Prieſts & Monks thinking to haue done the like, were by the imperious ſouldiers, whether they would B or not, againe inforced into the church; where tumbling one ouer another, as thronging in with great force & violence, and ſcarce able to ſtand, by reaſon of the ſlipperineſſe of the bloud there ſhed vpon the pauement, they in great feare made an end of thoſe bloudie obſequies. This outrage appeaſed, Arſenius the Patriarch, & only tutor of the young Emperour now left, was therewith yet much troubled, as with a thing dangerous both to the perſon of the young Prince, and quietneſſe of the ſtate; but what good courſe to take therein, he could not tell: for as he was a man for his learning & integritie of life, not inferiour to the beſt, ſo in matters of ſtate he was as farre to ſeeke; as it commonly happeneth the contemplatiue man, buried in his meditations, to be vnfit for temporall gouernment; whereas he that ſhould performe both, muſt vnto his rare vertues and great learning ioyne a ciuill conuerſation, with great experience in worldly af-C faires, not to be learned but by great & long practiſe. This reuerend father (of no great reach, yet wiſhing all well) calling together the nobilitie, conſulted with them what were beſt to be done for the gouernment both of the young Emperor & the empire, now that Muzalo was dead; not conſidering in the meane time who they were with whom he conſulted, or that counſel grounded vpon no wiſe foreſight or approued experience, was more dangerous vnto him whom he would haue prouided for, than all the enemies murthering ſwords, as ſhortly after appeared.

Amongſt others of the nobilitie called to counſell, was Michael Paleologus (of whom we haue Michael Paleologus aſpireth. before ſpoken) much ſuperiour to the reſt, as deſcended of the imperiall houſe of the Comneni, a man of a cheerefull countenance, gracious, and courteous, and withall exceeding bountifull and liberall, whereby he eaſily won the hearts of all men in generall, but eſpecially of the colo-D nels, captaines, and other martiall men, commanders in the armie; of whoſe aſpiring to the empire, many preſages and common rumors (not alwayes vaine) had in former time paſſed alſo, to the mouing of many: yea the Patriarch himſelfe not conſidering his haughtie and aſpiring nature, made no leſſe account of him than did the reſt, but vpon an eſpeciall fauour, committed to his only truſt the keyes of the common treaſure, at ſuch time as money was to be deli-uered out for paiment of the armies or other like great occaſions of the ſtate; the moſt effectuall meanes for the furtherance of his ſecret practiſes, and the readieſt way for the effecting of that he had ſo long before plotted: for hauing in his fingring ſuch a maſſe of treaſure, as hee might wel haue wiſhed but neuer reaſonably hoped for, he poured it out as in were by buſhels amõgſt the nobility & martiall men, & ſuch others as he thought were able to do moſt with the people, E amongſt whom were many of the cleargie alſo: of which his fauourits were made many meetings, & by them was the Patriarch continually ſollicited, but yet in generall tearmes, without delay (according to the neceſsitie of the time) to take order for the good gouernement of the ſtate, which now as a great ſhip in the midſt of the ſea without a maſter, was (as they ſaid) in danger to periſh; and being once loſt, was not to be againe recouered. At which time alſo, the name of Paleologus was in euery mans mouth, as the only man for his wiſdome and experience, fit to take vpon him the charge & gouernment of the empire, vntill the yong Emperor were come to age. Vnto which common good liking, the Patriarch alſo (ſeeing no more, or peraduenture not ſo much as the reſt) gaue his conſent. And ſo without longer ſtay, to the great cõtentment both of the nobilitie and people in generall, made him gouernour of the empire, & tutor to the yong F Emperour, wanting now nothing of an Emperour himſelfe, more than the title and imperiall ornaments. This was the firſt ſtep whereby the aſpiring man (twice before in diſgrace with the two late Emperours, Iohn Ducas, and his ſonne Theodorus) mounted at laſt vnto the empire.

It was not many daies after, but that his fauourits held another counſell, wherein it was alledged, That it was not ſeemely for him that was tutor vnto the Emperour, gouernour of the ſtate and empire, & to giue audience vnto the Embaſſadours of forraine nations, to want the honour next vnto the Emperour, as well for the magnificence of the ſtate, as for the credit of his place: G whereupon he was both by the Patriarch and the young Emperour honoured with the title of the Deſpot, another ſtep vnto the empire. But what contentment finde the ambitious euen in the greateſt honours, ſo long as there is one aboue them? Little ſure, or none at all, more than that it ſerueth them to ſtep at next, vp to the higheſt: as did this new made Deſpot, who ſhortly after was by certaine of the nobilitie, his great fauourites, neere vnto MAGNESIA, with the great applauſe of the people, hoiſed vp and ſaluted Emperour. Whereof Arſenius the Patriarch hearing, was therewith much troubled, as fearing what would become of the young childe, the right heire of the empire. And firſt he was about to haue excommunicated, as well him that was made Emperour, as them that had ſo made him: but afterward changing his H purpoſe, for feare of greater troubles, he thought it better by ſolemne oath to binde both him and the reſt, that they ſhould not ſeeke after the life of the childe, or by any force or colour goe about to depriue him of the empire; which was ſo done. Yet it was not full a moneth after, but that euen he that had ſo great a care of the young childe, and ſo prouided for his ſafetie (perſwaded by them of the nobilitie and the clergie) with his owne hands, and all the accuſtomed ceremonies, ſet the imperiall crowne vpon this vſurpers head; yet not as vpon him that ſhould ſtill enioy the empire, but as vpon a man according to the preſent neceſſitie of the time and ſtate, thought fitteſt for ſo great a charge, vntill the young childe came to age; vnto whom then he was to giue place, and to reſigne to him the empire. All which being by more ſolemne oath than before confirmed, good newes (as the certaine ſignes of his fortunate I gouernment) were brought vnto him of a great victorie obtained by his captaines, againſt Michael Angelus Deſpot of ÆTOLIA and EPIRVS: who hauing maried the late Emperours daughter, and hearing of his death, with the great troubles in ASIA; aided by the King of SICILIA, and the Prince of PELOPONESVS and ACHAIA, his ſonnes in law, had thought in that hurle and perturbation of the ſtate, to haue taken vnto himſelfe the greateſt part of the Emperours territories in MACEDONIA and THRACIA: and for the ſame purpoſe was with a great armie entred into them, burning and ſpoiling the countrey before him; whereof Michael Paleologus (then but newly made Deſpot) hauing intelligence, ſent his brother Iohn, and ſome other his beſt captaines, with a great armie againſt him; by whom he with his complices were put to the worſe, and not without great loſſe enforced to retire: the ioyfull newes whereof he K receiued, euen as he was crowned. Which was ſhortly after confirmed by the comming of the great commanders themſelues, bringing with them the Prince of PELOPONESVS and ACHAIA, by them taken priſoner. Who for his ranſome was afterward glad to giue vnto the Emperour Paleologus, MONEMBASIA, MAINE, and SPARTA, three of the beſt cities of PELOPONESVS: whereinto he put ſtrong garriſons, vnder the command of Conſtantinus his brother by the mothers ſide, a right valiant captaine. By whoſe good ſeruice, and the commodious ſituation of the places, he gained diuers other townes and cities, and at length the greateſt part of PELOPONESVS, out of the hands of the Latines: for the vtter rooting out of whom, he ſhortly after with a great armie paſſed ouer into THRACIA, with purpoſe (as was thought) to haue beſieged CONSTANTINOPLE: but finding it to be a matter of more diffi- L culties than was before ſuppoſed, he left that, and laid ſiege to the caſtle of PERA, ouer againſt it on the other ſide of the hauen, in hope by winning of that caſtle to haue become maſter alſo of the towne: where he was notably repulſed, and enforced with loſſe to retire. So riſing with his armie, he fortified diuers caſtles and ſtrong holds in the countrey about CONSTANTINOPLE, and put into them ſtrong garriſons, charging them, with continuall incurſions to trouble the Conſtantinopolitanes, and to cut them ſo ſhort, if it were poſſible, as that they ſhould not dare to looke out at the gates of the citie. Which they ſo well performed, that in ſhort time the Latines in the citie were driuen to ſuch extremitie, that for want of wood they were faine to burne many of the faireſt houſes in the citie in ſtead of fewell; which done, he returned againe to NICE, the chiefe ſeat of the Greeke Emperours, euer ſince that CONSTANTINOPLE was M taken by the Latines.

Michael Paleologus crowned Emperour by Arſenius the Patriarch.

Now raigned in CONSTANTINOPLE the Latine Emperour Baldwin the ſecond (as is before declared) a man of ſmall courage, and leſſe power, and therfore not much regarded either of the Greekes or Latines: who for the maintenance of his ſtate was glad to ſell away the publike ornaments of the citie, and to pawne his ſonne vnto the Bruges merchants for money; by whom he was

A was left at VENICE to be brought vp: which gaue occasion for some writers to report, That he was pawned vnto the Venetians.

About this time Mango, the great Chan of TARTARIE, stirred vp by Aitonus the Armenian king, by whose perswasion he had also receiued the Christian religion, sent his brother Haalon with an exceeding great armie against the Turks and Sarasins in SYRIA and the land of PALESTINE. This Haalon conuerted also vnto the Christian faith by his wife, setting forward with a world of people following him, in the space of six moneths ouerran all PERSIA, with the countries adioyning, excepting one strong place in the mountains (which some say was SAMARCHAND, afterward the royall seat of the great terrour of the world, the mightie Tamerlaine) which besieged by ten thousand horsemen, by him there left for that purpose, and so continued by the space of seuen and twentie yeares after, was then at length (as Aiton himselfe writeth) yeelded by the defendants, onely for want of clothes to couer their nakednesse. Haalon in whose armie those ten thousand (left behind) were not missed, marching on, and as a violent tempest bearing all downe before him, entered at length into ASSYRIA, and there laied siege vnto the great citie of BABYLON, then the seat of the great Caliph; whom all the Mahometan princes honoured aboue all others, as the true successour of their great prophet Mahomet, and receiued from his mouth the interpretation of their law, as most diuine oracles. Which great citie Haalon woon, and putting to sword all he found therein, men, women, and children, with the spoile therof and the rich treasures of the Caliph, enriched his souldiers. The Caliph himselfe (reserued for that purpose) he commaunded to be set in the middest of the infinit treasure which he and his predecessours had most couetously heaped vp together, and that he should of that gold siluer and precious stones take what it pleased him to eat, saying (by way of derision) That so gainefull a guest should by good reason be fed with nothing but things of greatest price, whereof he willed him to make no spare: In which order the couetous wretch kept for certaine daies, miserably died for hunger, in the middest of those things whereof he thought he should neuer haue had ynough; which though they were in valour great, and with great care laied together, yet serued they him not now to suffice nature, best contented with a little. BABYLON thus sacked, and almost rased, the Tartar marching on through MESOPOTAMIA, by the way tooke the citie of RHOAIS, where Aiton the Armenian king and author of this the Tartars expedition, came vnto him with twelue thousand horsemen, and fortie thousand foot, as reporteth Aiton the Armenian kings nephew, then there present. So entering into SYRIA, in a few daies tooke ALEPPO, which he sacked and rased in the yeare of our Lord 1260, with diuers other strong townes sometime belonging vnto the kingdome of ANTIOCH. Then was one Malacnesar Sultan of DAMASCO, commaunding ouer all SYRIA and the land of PALESTINE: who terrified with the losse of his cities, and the feare of farther danger, with his wife and children came and humbled himselfe before the Tartar prince, in hope so to haue saued vnto himselfe some good part of his kingdome. Wherein he was much deceiued, being (as some say) carried away a farre off into exile, because he should not hinder the Tartars proceedings: or as others report (and happely with more probabilitie) being by him detained as his prisoner, and afterwards to the terror of his sonne, cut in peeces in his sight vnder the walls of DAMASCO, after that it had in vaine beene twice assaulted by the Tartars: which strong citie for all that he afterwards tooke by strong hand, and sacked it, and by the perswasion of his wife ouerthrew all the Mahometane temples, as he had before in euery place where he came. But purposing to haue gone on forward to HIERVSALEM, and to haue conquered the whole land of PALESTINE, newes was brought him of the death of his brother Mango, the great Chan: whereupon he staied his iourney and returned backe againe, in hope of that great Empire, hauing in this expedition spent almost six yeares.

Aleppo rased by the Tartars.

Damasco woon.

Thus by the Tartars was the kingdome of the Turks at DAMASCO ouerthrowne. At which time, the broken affaires of the Christians in SYRIA and the land of PALESTINE, might easily haue beene repaired, and those two goodly kingdomes againe restored to the Christian commonweale, had the Christian princes of the West then in time put to their helping hands on the one side, as did the Tartars on the other: But they then at fatall discord among themselues, and busied with their warres at home, let slip that so faire an opportunitie, the like whereof they seldome or neuer had since. Haalon the Tartar prince, in token of his good will toward the Christians and their affaires, at his departure from DAMASCO left his sonne Abaga there with twentie thouſand horſemen to aid them in their warres, if they ſhould come (as was expected) G for the recouerie of the Holy land: who hauing there ſtayed ſome while, and hearing of his fathers troubles at home, followed himſelfe after him, but yet left behind him Guirboca, a valiant Captaine, with ten thouſand of his horſemen, to like purpoſe that his father had him: who by the inſolencie of certaine Chriſtian ſouldiers in garriſon about SIDON, was of a friend together with his Tartars made a foe. Theſe garriſon ſouldiers hauing by chance fet in ſome bootie out of the Tartars territorie, not onely refuſed to reſtore the ſame againe, but alſo foulely intreated ſuch as the Tartar had ſent for the demaunding thereof. Whereupon further quarrels ariſing, it fortuned a nephew of Guirbocas, a valiant yoong gentleman, to be ſlaine: in reuenge whereof he beſieged SIDON, and hauing taken it, ſacked it, and burnt it downe to the ground. H

After which time, he and his Tartars became vtter enemies vnto the Chriſtians, doing them all the harme they could deuiſe.

The Ægyptian Sultan inuadeth Siria.

This diſcord betwixt the Tartars & the Chriſtians, gaue occaſion vnto Melech the Ægyptian Sultan, now iealous of the Tartars neereneſſe, with a great armie of his Mamalukes & others to enter into SYRIA, and to ſpoile the countrey about DAMASCO; againſt whom Guirboca with his Tartars, although both in ſtrength and number far inferiour, went out. But ioyning battell with him at too much ods, and the victorie inclining vnto that ſide where moſt ſtrength was, he there valiantly fighting was ſlaine, with moſt part of his Tartars: ſuch as eſcaped fled into ARMENIA vnto the friendly king. By this victorie all SYRIA, with the land of PALESTINE, excepting ſome few places yet holdē by the Chriſtians, fell again into the hāds of the Ægyptian I Sultans; as did ſome of them ſhortly after alſo: for Bandocader ſucceeding Melech in the Mamaluke kingdome, comming into SYRIA with a great armie, tooke ANTIOCH from the Chriſtians, and with it moſt of the other places before by them defended. The citie he burnt, and raſed the Caſtle down to the ground, and afterward entring into ARMENIA, did there great harme alſo.

Antioch taken from the Chriſtians.

Whileſt the Turks kingdome thus goeth to wracke in SYRIA, ruinated by the Tartars, but poſſeſſed by the Mamalukes; their affairs in the leſſer ASIA, now the whole hope of that nation, went not at that time much better: for Iathatines the Turkes Sultan, there alſo inuaded by the Tartars, and hauing loſt ICONIVM his regall citie, fled with his brother Melech to the Greeke Emperour Michael Paleologus, in hope to be of him relieued, for the kindneſſe he had not long before ſhewed him in like caſe, when as he fled from the late emperour Theodore; whereof now K putting him in remembrance, he requeſted him either with ſome conuenient force to aid him, or els to aſſigne vnto him ſome corner in his large Empire where he might in ſafetie reſt with his wife and children, and other followers, whom with much wealth he had brought with him in great number. The Emperour on euery ſide himſelfe incombred with warres, thought it not good in ſo great newneſſe of his Empire, to deminiſh his owne forces: and to aſſigne vnto him any place to inhabit, ſeemed no leſſe dangerous; for that he hauing been a great Prince, and commanding ouer many great countries, and brought vp in all princely royaltie, was not like to content himſelfe with a little: beſide that, his Nobilitie, then diſperſed by the Tartars, were like ynough in great numbers to reſort vnto him, as vnto their Head, ſo ſoone as they ſhould once heare that he were ſeated in any place: and yet vnkindly to caſt him off that had ſo hono- L rably vſed him in like extremitie, the Emperour was loath. And therefore feeding him vp with faire words, and foording him on from time to time with delaies, he held him a great while as a man in ſuſpence, betwixt hope and deſpaire. At length in the abſence of the Emperour (though happily not without his priuitie) he was commaunded with all his traine, in number about twelue hundred, to get him to ÆNVS, a citie of THRACIA, ſtanding vpon the ſea coaſt: where he much diſcontented, liued like an honourable priſoner at large, but with the watchfull eyes of ſo many vpon him, as that he could by no meanes (as he deſired) eſcape. In which caſe we will for a while leaue him, to feed vpon his owne melancholy thoughts.

1261 Now had Michaell Paleologus the Emperour raigned at NICE two yeares, when new troubles began againe to ariſe in the Weſt part of his empire in EVROPE ſide, by the trecherie of M Michaell Angelus, Deſpot of EPIRVS. For the ſpeedie repreſſing whereof, he ſent one Alexius Strategopulus, a worthie captaine & a man of great nobilitie (whom for his good ſeruice againſt the ſaid Deſpot, he had in the beginning of his raigne made Cæſar) with little aboue 800. Bythinian ſouldiers, and commiſſion for the taking vp of ſo many mo as he ſhould for that ſeruice need, in MACEDONIA and THRACIA: commaunding him when he had paſſed the ſtrait, with

A thoſe ſouldiers to take his way thorow the ſuburbs of CONSTANTINOPLE, to terrifie the Latines, whom he was loth to ſuffer too long to liue in reſt and quiet, or to ſtirre too farre out of the gates, but to keepe them as priſoners coupt vp within the wals of the citie. This warlike captaine with this handfull of men, paſſing ouer PROPONTIS, encamped at REGIVM, not farre from CONSTANTINOPLE; where by chance lighting vpon certaine poore labouring men, Greekes borne in the citie, and there dwelling, he diligently inquired of them the ſtate thereof, and of what ſtrength the Latines were, with many other things, ſuch as he was deſirous to know: who not onely told him that the ſtrength of the Latines was but ſmall, but alſo that the greateſt part thereof was gone to the ſiege of DAPHNVSIA, a towne not farre off vpon the B ſide of the EVXINE ſea: and withall (as Greekes euill affected to the gouernment of the Latines, and deſirous of the libertie of their countrey) offered of themſelues to ſhew him a means how to giue him entrance into the citie. Theſe poore men dwelt within the citie, cloſe by one of the gates, neere whereunto by an old ruinous mine almoſt ſwarued vp, was a ſecret vnſuſpected way into the citie, not knowne to any but to themſelues: By this blinde hole they promiſed him by night to receiue in fiftie of his beſt ſouldiers; which ſuddenly ſetting vpon the watch faſt by, and diſpatching them out of the way, might preſently breake open the gate, and ſo let in the reſt of the armie: whereunto they promiſed themſelues with their friends to put to their helping hands, aſſuring him of the good ſucceſſe thereof. This plot for the betraying of the citie thus laid and agreed vpon, Alexius the Cæſar well rewarding the men, and filling them with
C greater promiſes, ſent them away: who as if they had beene about their countrey worke, were after their wonted manner receiued into the citie, without ſuſpition at all. And within a few dayes after according to their promiſe, at an appointed houre receiued in by night the aforeſaid fiftie ſouldiers; who aided by them, preſently ſlew the watch, and brake open the gate: whereby Alexius entring a little before day, in conuenient place put his men in order of battell; and afterward to the greater terrour of the Latines, cauſed the citie to be ſet on fire in foure places, which increaſed with the winde, burnt in moſt terrible manner, and was in ſhort time come almoſt to the Emperours palace. Who ſcarce well awaked, and ſeeing the citie all on a fire about his eares, and the enemie comming on; was about at the firſt with thoſe few Latines that hee had (for Greekes he had none) to haue made head againſt them. But better aduiſed, and perceiuing it to be now to no purpoſe, he (the laſt of the Latine Emperors that euer raigned in CON-D STANTINOPLE) with Iuſtinian the Latine Patriarch, and ſome other of his friends, fled by ſea into EVBOCA, and ſo from thence afterwards vnto VENICE, and afterwards to Lewis the French King, in hope to haue beene by him and the Venetians relieued. After whom fled alſo all the reſt of the Latines. Thus the imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE by great fortune fell againe into the hands of the Greekes, in the yeere 1261, after it had beene in poſſeſſion of the Latines about 58 yeeres.

The ioyfull newes of the recouerie of the imperiall citie, was in ſhort time carried vnto Michael Paleologus the Greeke Emperour at NICE; who at the firſt beleeued it not, as thinking it ſcarce poſſible ſo ſtrong a citie to haue beene by ſo weake a power ſurpriſed, whereas he him-
E ſelfe not long before was not able with a right puiſſant armie, and much other warlike prouiſion, to win the little caſtle of GALATA ouer againſt it. But afterwards aſſured of the truth thereof, with his hands and eyes caſt vp towards heauen, gaue moſt heartie thankes to God therefore; cauſing hymnes and pſalmes of thankſgiuing to be ſolemnly ſung in euery church, with all the other ſignes of ioy and triumph that could be deuiſed. So ſetting all other things apart, he wholly buſied himſelfe in making preparation for his going to CONSTANTINOPLE, now once againe the ſeat of the Greeke empire: wherein, and in trauelling hauing ſpent many dayes, he at length with the Empreſſe his wife and Andronicus his ſonne, then but two yeeres old, as if it had beene in ſolemne proceſſion, on foot entred into the citie, by the gate called the Golden Gate; and ſo after praiers and thankes giuen, went to the palace prepared for him F neere vnto the Tilt-yard: for the other imperiall palaces of greater beautie (ſometime the ſtately dwellings of the greateſt Emperours of the Greekes) had now of long during the raigne of the Latines, lien ruinous, or altogether defaced. And ſhortly after, becauſe vertue and true deſert ſhould not want their due honour, he cauſed Alexius Cæſar (by whoſe meanes the citie was recouered) in ſolemne triumph in his roabs of honour, with a crowne vpon his head, not much inferiour vnto the imperiall crowne, with great pompe to be carried thorow all the citie;

citie : and farther commanded, that his name for one yeere next following, in all ſolemne G praiers and hymnes of thankſgiuing, ſhould be ioyned with the name of the Emperor himſelfe.
And yet not thinking to haue done him honour enough, cauſed his liuely image afterward to be moſt curiouſly made, and as a trophie to be ſet vpon a faire marble pillar, before the great church of the holy Apoſtles, in perpetuall remembrance of him, and that he had done for the deliuerie of his countrey; which ſhortly after ouerthrowne by an earthquake, was by his ſonne againe reſtored. Now was this great and famous citie, ſometime the beautie of the world, by theſe ſtrange and fatall mutations, wonderfully defaced, and brought to great deſolation : in euery place was to be ſeene great heapes, or rather (to ſay the truth) great hils of rubbidge, the eternall witneſſes of the ruine thereof; the houſes ſtood ſome quite fallen downe, ſome H readie to follow after, and ſome other great and ſtately buildings now the ſmall reliques of great fires : for the great beautie thereof was before, at ſuch time as the Latines tooke it, moſt defaced by fire; who all the time that they had it, ceaſed not night and day to deſtroy ſome part or other of it, as if they had knowne they ſhould not long keepe it; neither did this laſt fire raiſed by the Greekes themſelues to terrifie the Latines, a little deforme it : for which cauſe the Emperours chiefe care now was to cleanſe the citie, and in beſt ſort he could to reforme ſo great a confuſion of things not to be all at once amended; firſt beginning with the churches, which ruinous or readie to fall, he repaired; and next to that filled the emptie houſes with new inhabitants. And albeit that the chiefe of the Latines were together with the Emperour fled and gone, yet was the moſt part of the artificers and tradeſmen of the citie, Venetians, and of I them of PISA, mingled together; vnto whom alſo to ioyne the Genowaies, and ſo to fill the citie with Latines, he thought it not altogether ſafe, although that by them he reaped great profit : wherefore he aſſigned vnto them the citie of GALATA now called PERA, on the other ſide of the hauen, for them to inhabit; granting them great priuiledges, and euery of thoſe companies to be gouerned by a Conſull or Poteſtate of their owne. As for the imperiall citie it ſelfe, he ſtored it (ſo neere as he could) with naturall Greekes borne.

Paleologus iea-lous of his eſtate

Now although all things went as Paleologus the Emperour could himſelfe haue wiſhed; yet could he not reſt ſo contented, for feare leſt thoſe which now did eat their owne hearts, and with great griefe ſmouldred their anger, ſhould at length as the rightfull heires of the empire by him vſurped, breake out into open force, and ſo breed him great troubles, yea and perhaps worke K his confuſion. For ſuch is the tormenting ſtate of vſurping tyrants, neuer to thinke themſelues ſafe ſo long as any one liueth, whom they may ſuſpect. Wherefore at once to rid himſelfe of this feare, he thought it beſt ſo to diſpoſe of the children of the late Emperour Theodorus Laſcaris, as that he ſhould not need of them to ſtand in doubt : to take them out of the way, beſides that it was a thing odious, he ſaw it like to be vnto him alſo dangerous; Marie and Theodora (two of the eldeſt daughters) being before by their father maried vnto two great Princes, (one, the Deſpot of EPIRVS, and the other Prince of BVLGARIA) with whom he had much before to doe, and of them yet ſtood in ſome doubt; but theſe were ſafe enough out of his reach. Other two younger ſiſters there were in his cuſtodie, Theodora and Irene, with their brother Iohn, the only heire of the empire : Theodora he maried vnto one Belicurt, a gentleman of PELOPONE- L SVS; and Irene to one Vigintimilio of GENVA; both Latines, men of no great birth or power, ſuch as he needed not to ſtand in doubt of. Theſe two Ladies, the daughters of ſo great an Em-perour as was Theodorus, thus baſely beſtowed; remained onely their brother Iohn, the onely heire of the empire, then but ten yeeres old, whom Paleologus long before euen in the beginning of his raigne, had ſent vnto MAGNESIA, there to be ſafely kept farre off from the court, for feare leſt in his right and quarrell ſome diſcontented perſons deſirous of innouation, ſhould beginne ſome new ſtirres dangerous to his eſtate. Which indignitie done vnto the young Prince, Arſenius the Patriarch (put in truſt by his father for the bringing of him vp) tooke in ſo euill part, that he forſooke the court with all his eccleſiaſticall dignities, and as a man wearie of the world, retired himſelfe vnto a little monaſterie of Paſcaſins in the countrey, there to M ſpend the reſt of his dayes. From whence for all that he was after the taking of CONSTAN-TINOPLE from the Latines, almoſt againſt his will drawne thither by Paleologus the Em-perour, and made Patriarch thereof, there together with ſo great an honour to finde his greater diſcontent. For Paleologus the vſurper, altogether vnmindfull of his faith ſo ſolemnly before giuen, for the ſafetie of the young Prince, and the reſtoring vnto him of his empire; and

A now fully reſolued to eſtabliſh vnto him and his poſteritie the ſoueraignetie of ſo great an Empire, howſoeuer it was got, cauſed the young Princes eies to be moſt cruelly put out: the vſuall practiſe of the tyrants of the Eaſt, vpon ſuch as they are loath or feare to kill, and yet would make them vnfit for gouernment. Of which barbarous crueltie, his ſiſter Theodora (married to Conſtantinus prince of BVLGARIA) hearing, ceaſſed not with teares and praiers and all other womanly perſuaſions, to ſtir vp her husband in reuenge thereof: whereunto alſo Iathatines the Turks Sultan, gaue no ſmall furtherance; who wearie of exile, and to bee ſo into a corner confined, as into a priſon from whence hee might not ſtart, by ſecret meſſengers intreated the Bulgarian prince to make war vpon the vſurping emperour: promiſing him a great ſumme
B of money, if by his helpe hee might recouer his former libertie. Wherewith hee the rather mooued, with a great power of his owne, and aboue twentie thouſand Tartars which then lay by the riuer ISTER, ſuddenly brake into the Emperours territories, and in ſhorter time than was to haue beene thought, ouerran all the countrey of THRACIA euen vnto the ſea ſide, leauing neither man nor beaſt in all the countrey as he went: in good hope alſo to haue by the way ſurprized the Emperour himſelfe, euen then returning from his warres againſt the Deſpot in THESSALIE: who hearing of his ſpeedie comming, being got vnto the ſea ſide, and (hauing no way left to haue eſcaped by land) ſhipped himſelfe into a galley of the Latines, which with another her conſert bound for CONSTANTINOPLE, by good hap put in there for to water, and ſo in two daies arriued in ſafetie at the imperiall citie. Thus diſappointed of C the Emperour, all his care was for the deliuerie of the Turks Sultan. Wherefore marching in haſt to ÆNVM, he ſo terrified the citizens with his comming, that they without farther delay deliuered him into his hands, ſo to redeeme their owne peace. In his returne you might haue ſeene the ſouldiers, eſpecially the Tartars, driuing before them infinit numbers both of men and cattell, in ſuch ſort, as that in the open countrey of THRACIA for a ſpace, was hardly to be ſeene either countreyman or beaſt, it was ſo cleane ſwept both of inhabitants, and likewiſe of cattell.

Paleologus cauſeth the yong emperours eyes to be put out.

Iathatines the Sultan by the Tartars carried ouer ISTER, and ſo by them ſet at libertie, ſhortly after died. In whoſe kingdome ſucceeded not his ſonne Melicke (as ſome write) but two others (as the Turkes themſelues report) the one called Meſoot, the ſonne of Kei-Cubades, D and the other Kei-Cubades, the ſonne of Feramcine, borne alſo of the Selzuctian family, as were all the other Turkes Sultans, but how neere of blood vnto the late Sultan Iathatines they ſay not. Betwixt which two, as his vaſſals, Gazan the great Tartar Chan (by whom they were ſo preferred) for the payment of a yearely tribute, diuided the Turkes kingdome: aportioning vnto Meſcoot the cities of AMIDA in antient time called AMISVS, & AMINSVS in GALATIA, MELATIA otherwiſe called MELETINE in the leſſer ARMENIA, SIVASTE, in antient time SEBASTIA, and HARBERIE, before SATABREA, both in CAPPADOCIA, with all the countrey about them. And vnto Kei-Cubades, ICONIVM, the auncient ſeat of the Turkiſh Sultans, with all RVMILIA ASIATICA, or the countries of the leſſer ASIA alongſt the ſea coaſt; which theſe two princes held as the Tartars tributaries, as had the late Sultan Iathatines before them, vntill ſuch time as he was by the ſame Tartars againe expulſed. So that the E Turks kingdome, which had of long time flouriſhed in the Selzuccian familie in PERSIA, in SYRIA, PALESTINE, and ÆGYPT, there quite ouerthrown by the Mamalukes and Tartars (as is before declared) & now brought vnderfoot in the leſſer ASIA alſo, where only reſted all the hope of that nation, was now at a low ebbe, deuided betwixt two weake princes, raigning but at the deuotion of the Tartar. In which confuſion of the Turkiſh Empire, ſo rent, not onely diuers men of greater power and authoritie amongſt them, ſhared vnto themſelues, ſome one corner of the declining kingdome, and ſome another: but many of the obſcure and baſeſt people alſo, bearing with them nothing but their bowes and arrowes, tooke the ſtrait paſſages of the mountaines, and from thence with their dayly incurſions did much harme in the F countries of the Chriſtians ioyning vpon them: which was no great matter for them to doe; the garriſons which were woont to defend the ſame, being for want of pay quite disbanded, and the Caſtles vpon the frontiers by them abandoned; which at the firſt, as a thing of ſmall importance neglected, was at length vnto the Greekes a great cauſe of the ruine and decay of the greateſt part of their ſtate in ASIA. Theſe miſcheefes vnregarded, grew dayly more and more, the Turkes ſtill gaining vpon the Greekes what they loſt vnto the Tartars. Whoſe

inuasions (the glorie of their kingdome only excepted) was not so hurtfull vnto them, as the G cause of their much greater felicitie afterwards. At length it fortuned, that a great power of these aduenturous Turks meeting together in PAPHLAGONIA, were about to haue inuaded the territories of the Christians: against whom Michael Paleologus the Emperour sent out a strong and puissant armie to stay their further comming on, lest breaking in that way, they should without resistance at their pleasure forrage the countrey before them. Which armie conducted by vnskilfull captaines, encountering with the Turks, was by them in a great battell ouerthrowne and vtterly defeated, few or none of all that great multitude escaping: for whilest the Greekes vnaduisedly pursued the Turks, retiring of purpose before them, they were by them drawne into the danger of a greater power lying in ambush for them, and so entrap- H ped, were slaine with an exceeding great slaughter. After which so great a victorie (the beginning of the miserie of the Christians in the lesser ASIA) the Turks without let or stay ouer-ran all the countrey, vnto the riuer SANGARIVS: vpon the banks whereof the Greeke Emperour was glad to fortifie diuers townes and forts to keepe them out of BITHINIA. Neuerthelesse, they in short time after subdued all the countries from PONTVS and GALATIA, vnto the LYCIAN and CARIAN sea, and the riuer EVRIMEDON, which they diuided amongst them into diuers Toparchies: little or nothing acknowledging the soueraignitie either of Mesoot, or Kei-Cubades.

Whilest the Turks in the lesser ASIA thus win from the Christians on the one side, and lose to the Tartars on the other; many an hard conflict in the mean time passed betwixt the Ægyp- I tian Sultans with their Mamalukes, and the Tartars, for the soueraignitie of SYRIA. The poore remainder of the Christians all that while there, in doubt both of the one and of the other: from whom and from the Armenians (then also much infested by the Mamalukes) diuers embassa-dours were sent vnto the Pope and the Christian Princes of the West, to craue their aid and helpe in that their hard estate: whose praiers little preuailing with the rest, yet so moued Lewis the French King, & Henry the third, then raigning in ENGLAND, that they both promised them aid. Whereupon Lewis a man of great deuotion, and alwaies forward in that seruice against the Infidels, tooke vpon him the crosse, the cognisance of the sacred warre; causing his three sons, Philip that succeeded him in the kingdome, surnamed the Faire, Peter Countie of ALANCON, and Iohn Countie of NEVERS (surnamed Tristan, for that his mother was in her greatest heaui- K nesse for the taking of her husband, deliuered of him in ÆGYPT) and most of the nobilitie of FRANCE to doe the like: vnto whom also Theobald King of NAVAR his sonne in law, Alphonsus his brother, and Guydo Earle of FLANDERS, ioyned themselues. And so hauing put all things in readinesse, tooke his way to MARSEILLES, and from thence embarking himselfe with his armie in the Genowaies ships, hired for that purpose, set forward the first of March in the yeere

1270 1270. But being at sea, he was by force of weather constrained to land in SARDINIA, and there Carthage besie-ged by K. Lewis. to stay a while: departing thence, he at length arriued at CARTHAGE, the place by him desired, where in the entrance of the hauen he surprised certaine of the enemies ships; but landing his men, & assaulting the towne, he was there notably repulsed. This is not that ancient great & famous citie which somtime mightily stroue with the proud mistresse of the world for soueraign- L tie, but another built long after in the ruines, or at least not farre from the ruines of the same. In the besieging whereof, the Frenchmen found such resistance, as well put them in remembrance of the ancient glorie of the Carthaginians. One day it fortuned as the King thus lay at the siege, that the defendants made a great & fierce sallie out vpon the Frenchmen, who before commanded so to doe, by little and little retired, to draw their enemies farther on: betwixt whom and the citie, the Constable with a great power comming in & charging them behinde, and they which before retired now standing close vnto them, they were on both sides hardly beset; who for all that, as became valiant men, worthily defended themselues, & made there a great fight, though not without extreme perill: which they in the citie beholding, gaue out a most hideous and piteous crie, a certaine signe of their hard estate within; astonying with the suddennesse thereof, M both their friends & their enemies. But whilest they of the towne betwixt hope & despaire stood thus beholding the fight at land, the Frenchmen by sea approching a bulwark on that side of the Carthage won. towne, tooke it without resistance: which so dismaid them without, that they began forthwith to flie, of whom the greatest part casting away their weapons, were by the Kings commandement taken to mercie; and they likewise of the towne vpon promise of their liues, yeelded the same

A ſame vnto the King. CARTHAGE thus won, the King laid ſiege vnto TVNES, the chiefe citie of that kingdome, being not farre off: where by the way he was encountred by the King of the country, who hauing there loſt ten thouſand of his Moores, betooke himſelfe to flight with the reſt. Who thus ouerthrowne, reſolued no more to tempt fortune, but to keepe himſelfe ſafe within the wals of his citie, if happily ſo he might (as it oftentimes falleth out) more weaken his enemies by lying ſtill and protracting the time, than by open force and valour. Which their purpoſe King Lewis perceiuing, reſolued not to ſtirre from thence vntill that he were become maſter of the citie; which as it ſeemed, could not hold out for want of victuals, conſidering the multitude of people that were got into it. Neuertheleſſe thus beſieged both by ſea
B and land, and ſo ſtraightly hemmed in on euery ſide, as that no reliefe could poſſibly be brought vnto it; yet held it out by the ſpace of ſix moneths. After which time wants daily more and more increaſing among the beſieged, embaſſadours were ſent out to the King, to intreat with him of peace: But whileſt theſe embaſſadours goe to and fro, and reaſon vpon the capitulations of the deſired peace, behold a great and furious plague aroſe in the French campe, which began to cut them downe by heapes: there died Iohn Triſtan Countie of NEVERS, the Kings youngeſt ſonne, borne in the firſt expedition that the ſaid King his father made into the holy Land, euen at ſuch time as he was taken priſoner; which Triſtan died the 25 day of Auguſt, in the yeere of our Lord 1270. The good King hauing yet ſcarcely performed the obſequies of his ſonne, fell ſicke of the bloudie flix, whereof he there ſhortly after C died alſo. About which time arriued there Charles King of SICILIE, the French Kings brother, with a great number of freſh ſouldiers: whoſe comming lightned ſomewhat the Frenchmens hearts (heauie for the death of their King) and daunted the Moores, before bragge of the ſame. Shortly after whom arriued there alſo Prince Edward, King Henry the third his eldeſt ſonne, who trauelling thorow FRANCE, and taking ſhipping at AQVESMORT, not farre from MARSEILLES, was now in ten dayes with a braue companie of Engliſhmen come to TVNES; and there of the other Chriſtian Princes, namely of Philip the French King (his father Lewis being now dead) of Charles King of SICILIE, and of the two Kings of NAVAR and ARAGON, ioyfully receiued. But theſe Princes had a little before his arriuall concluded a peace with the Moores King, and the Infidels, vpon condition that he ſhould pay a yeerely tribute of D fortie thouſand crownes vnto the King of SICILIA; and to ſuffer the Chriſtian religion to be freely preached in his dominions, by ſuch deuout perſons as ſhould be there left for that purpoſe; and that vnto ſuch perſons as ſhould by their preaching be conuerted vnto the faith in Chriſt Ieſus, it ſhould be lawfull for them to be baptized, and to profeſſe the Chriſtian religion. Of which peace, Prince Edward vnderſtanding, did what he might to haue diſſwaded them from the ſame, ſaying, that the warre was by them all taken in hand againſt the Infidels, as enemies vnto the croſſe of Chriſt, with whom they were not to haue peace: and for the recouerie of the Holy Citie. But ſay what he would, and what he could, the peace (to his great diſcontentment) was now concluded, which they might not (as they ſaid) againe breake: and thereupon with the firſt faire winde hoiſſed ſaile, and returned towards SICILIA, with purpoſe the E next Spring to haue gone into SYRIA; which their determination was ſhortly after by the hand of God diſappointed. For being come vpon the coaſt of the Iſland not farre from DREPANVM, moſt of the great Princes & other nobilitie, in their long boats went on land, the reſt of the fleet lying at anker about a league off; for that being for the moſt part ſhips of great burthen, they were not able to put into the harbour: But as they ſo lay, by force of a ſudden and violent tempeſt then ariſing, ſome were eaten vp with the rough ſea; ſome falling foule one of another, there periſhed together; others driuen vpon the maine, were there beaten in peeces: ſo that of that great fleet, before the ſtorme ceaſed, periſhed about an hundred and twentie ſaile, with all the people, as well mariners as ſouldiers left in them, and great ſtore both of armour and munition: In ſuch ſort that moſt of the common ſouldiers and mariners which had eſca-
F ped the plague at TVNES, there vpon the coaſt of SICILIA periſhed by ſhipwracke. Only Prince Edwards fleet, being in number but thirteene ſhips, eſcaped free without loſſe either of ſhip or man. Neither were they that were got to land at DREPANVM in much better caſe, the plague ſtill following them; whereof died Theobald King of NAVAR, and Iſabel his wife, King Lewis his daughter, Elizabeth the French Queene, with a wonderfull number of noble gentlemen, and other common ſouldiers; in ſuch ſort that Philip the French King diſcouraged discouraged with the greatnesse of the mortalitie, and the miserable losse at sea, resolued there to make an end of the intended warre, and so returned into FRANCE, as did the rest that were left, euery man into his owne countrey. Only Prince Edward hauing passed that Winter in SICILIA, with the first of the next Spring set forward againe on his voyage, and in fifteene dayes after arriued with his fleet at PTOLEMAIS: where after he had by the space of a moneth rested himselfe and his souldiers after their long trauell, and fully inquired of the state of the country, he with six or seuen thousand souldiers marching from PTOLEMAIS about twentie miles into the land, tooke NAZARETH, and put to sword all them he found therein, and so againe returned. After whom the enemies following, in hope to haue taken him at some aduantage, he vnderstanding thereof, turned backe vpon them, and killing a great number of them, put the rest to flight. And after that about Midsummer, vnderstanding that the Sarasins were againe making head at a place called CAKHOW, about fortie miles off, he set forwards towards them; and comming vpon them early in the morning, before they were aware, slew aboue a thousand of them, and dispersed the rest. Aided also by the nobilitie of CYPRVS, he with like successe as before, made a third expedition against the Infidels: insomuch, that his fame began to grow great amongst them, and they to stand of him in no little dread. But whilest he thus preuailed, he was by foule treacherie almost taken out of the way. The Admirall of IOPPA faigning himselfe desirous to become a Christian, and willing to further the Princes proceedings, had by a secret messenger and letters sundrie times intelligence with him, as well concerning his owne good entertainment, as the effecting of that which he had promised. This messenger by the Admirall thus imployed, was (though to the Prince vnknowne) one of the Assasines, a companie of most desperate and dangerous men among the Mahometans, who strongly deluded with the blinde zeale of their superstition, and accounting it meritorious, by any means to kill any great enemie of their religion; for the performance thereof, as men prodigall of their liues, desperately aduenture themselues vnto all kinde of dangers. So now this messenger, before resolued to die, comming the fift time vnto the Prince, and being searched for hauing any weapon about him, as the manner was, had accesse vnto him, then lying in his chamber vpon his bed, in his ierkin, bare headed, because of the heat of the weather: where after due reuerence done, hee pulled out certaine letters from his Lord vnto the Prince, which hee read with great delight, as penned of purpose for to please. But as he was farther questioning with him of many matters, and all the companie voided, the desperate messenger making as though he would haue pulled out some other secret letters, suddenly pluckt out an enuenomed knife, which he had secretly hidden about him, thinking to haue strucke him into the bellie as he lay: for the auoiding of which stroke, the Prince lifting vp his arme, was therein grieuously wounded. But as the villaine was about to haue doubled the stroke, the Prince with his foot gaue him such a blow, that hee felled him to the ground, and with that starting vp, caught him by the hand, where in strugling with him for the knife, in wresting it out of his hand, he hurt himselfe therewith in the forehead: but getting it from him, presently thrust it into the murtherers bellie, and so slew him. The Princes seruants being not farre off, and hearing the busteling, came running in; where finding the messenger dead on the floore, one of them with a stoole beat out his braines: whereat the Prince tooke some displeasure, for so striking a dead man. This danger of the Princes much troubled and grieued all the Christians in SYRIA, and the more, for that the wound in his arme, after it had beene certaine dayes well dressed by the skilfull Surgeons and Physitians, began to mortifie and grow blacke, insomuch, that they and others about him began to mutter among themselues, and to looke heauily vpon the matter, as not without danger. Which he perceiuing, said vnto them: Why whisper you thus among your selues? What see you in mee? Can I not be healed? Tell mee the truth, and feare not. Whereunto one of them answered: And like your Highnesse, wee doubt not of your healing, but that it will be painfull for you to suffer. If suffering (said hee) may againe restore my health, I commit my selfe vnto you, worke on me your skill, and spare not. So the next day they cut out all the dead and poisoned flesh out of his arme, and in fifteene dayes after perfectly cured his wound, to the great reioycing of all his people. The great Sultan to cleere himselfe of this so dishonourable a trecherie, sent three of his noblemen vnto the Prince, calling to witnesse his false Prophet, that the same was done neither by him nor his consent. Which embassadours the Prince honourably vsed, but suffered them

A them not to come nigh him. So hauing taried eighteene moneths at PTOLEMAIS, and no aid comming from the other Christian princes as was expected, he tooke shipping; and returning homeward, landed first in SICILIA, and from thence crossing ouer into APVLIA, and so trauelling to ROME, was there honourably entertained by Gregorie the tenth, then Pope; and from thence by the way of FRANCE arriued in ENGLAND, where he was shortly after crowned King in the yeare 1272, his father the old King, Henrie the third, being a little before his returne dead.

The yeare following, Gregorie the tenth, not ignorant of the hard estate of the Christians in SYRIA (as hauing there bin of late himselfe with prince Edward, at which time he was in his ab- 1273
B sence elected Pope) and now desirous to procure them some reliefe, ratified the election of Rodulphus of HAPSPVRGH vnto the Empire, vpon condition, That he should promise to take vpon him selfe the crosse, and to giue them reliefe: for the performance whereof, he offered vnto the Emperour two hundred thousand crownes, with the tenths both of the Cleargie and Temporaltie for sixe yeares: and many goodly blessings were in his name also, by the preachers of that time, promised vnto all such as should with him take vpon them that sacred warre. Whereupon the Emperour with all his familie tooke vpon them the crosse, the signe of the sacred expedition intended; as did also the Duke of LORRAINE shortly after, with some others: Neuertheless, the Emperour otherwaies busied in warres against the Bohemians and Bauarians, and delaying still the time, as not greatly willing to take vpon him so long and dan-C gerous a iourney, and the Pope still threatening his high sentence of excommunication, the time passed, the Pope died, and nothing was as yet done. Vntill that at length the Emperour hauing happily finished his warres in BOHEMIA, and finding himselfe at some good leisure in some part to discharge his vow, and to satisfie the expectation the world had of long conceiued of him, sent Henrie prince of MEGAPOLIS, or as the Germanes call it, MECKELBVRG, with a strong power into SYRIA, to performe what himselfe had promised. Who comming to PTOLEMAIS made many notable incursions into the countrey about DAMASCO, with fire and sword destroying all before him as he went, and carrying thence many great and rich booties; vntill that at length he was by the Mamalukes circumuented and taken prisoner, and so ca- Henry the prince taken prisoner & sent to Caire.
D ried vnto the Sultan at CAIRE, where he remained in strait prison sixe and twentie yeares after; vntill that by chance one of the Mamalukes (a renegate Germane) being chosen Sultan, caused him to be brought before him, and at his comming demaunded of him, If it would not doe him good to celebrate the remembrance of the natiuitie of his Christ with his friends in GERMANIE? (for now that time of the yeare was at hand) And I know (said the Sultan) that thou art so addicted vnto thy superstition, that thou respectest the same more than thy libertie. Truth (said Henrie) mightie prince: for libertie would auaile me nothing, if Christ by his most milde incarnation had not taken away our captiuitie: and therefore how much all men owe vnto the reuerend remembrance thereof, I would to God thou, O king, diddest also vnderstand, which as I most heartely wish, so I would I could thereof perswade thee. God forbid (said the Sultan) for I remem ber, that at such time as I was cheefe enginer vnto thy father at KNESE-FENICKE in E LIVONIA, & there did him good seruice, I was altogether of the Christian perswasion; but now hauing left that common error, haue therewith also changed my priuat fortune. But as for thy religion, I haue nothing to say, my talke is only concerning thy libertie: Wouldest thou therefore gladly be free, and so returne home to thy friends? That nature craueth (said Henrie) although my fortune gainesaieth, which yet dependeth of your pleasure: I desire indeed to returne home, which if you shall denie me, I must as I haue done, take it in good part; assuring my selfe, that my wife Anastasia, with my beloued sonnes Henrie, Leo, and Iohn, haue long since celebrated my funerals, & ended their mourning. Thou art deceiued (said the Sultan) for I am sure that they know that thou yet liuest, and pray most heartely for thy returne: Truly I owe much vnto the remembrance of thy father, and therefore this day giue thee thy libertie. And hauing
F so said, furnished him with all things necessarie, and gaue him leaue to depart with one Martin his seruant, who taken with him, had borne him companie all the long time of his captiuitie. So taking his leaue of the Sultan, he came to PTOLEMAIS: but shipping himselfe for CYPRVS, he was by the way by certaine pyrates taken at sea, and as a fugitiue captiue brought backe againe vnto the Sultan: who pitying his hard fortune, set him againe at libertie, and by a ship set out for that purpose, transported him into CYPRVS: where he was by the Queene of that

Iſland his aunt (as ſome ſay) honourably entertained, and ſo furniſhed of all things fit for his G eſtate. Departing thence, he came to MARSEILLES, where after he had ſome few dayes re-freſhed himſelfe, he from thence trauelled by land home into his owne countrey: where at the firſt he was not knowne of his owne children and friends, as being growne old in priſon, and by them long before accounted among the dead; but now at laſt found againe, and by them known, he was of his children ioyfully receiued as their father, & of his ſubiects as their Prince.
Howbeit he ſhortly after died, and was honourably buried in the monaſterie of DOBRAN.

Thus in the whole courſe of this hiſtorie it appeareth by that which is alreadie written, what notable expeditions euen the greateſt Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt, to their immortall glorie, from time to time vndertooke againſt the enemies of Chriſt and his moſt ſacred word, and for H the reliefe of the poore diſtreſſed Chriſtians in SYRIA and in the land of PALESTINE: whereof as diuers of them had right glorious ſucceſſe, vnto the great profit of the Chriſtian common weale; ſo ſome of them anſwered not with like euent, as vndertaken with too ſmall ſtrength, or otherwiſe ouerthrowne by the diſcord or malice of the Chriſtians themſelues, rather than by the enemies force. Which neuertheleſſe how vnfortunately ſoeuer they fell out in the hands of ſuch worthie men as vndertooke them, yet haue they this glorie, commendation, and comfort, That they were taken in hand for the honour of the Sonne of God, Chriſt Ieſus, and the defence of his veritie, againſt the falſe Prophet Mahomet, and his moſt blaſphemous doctrine; ſo honourable and iuſt a quarrell, as might well beſeeme the greatneſſe of the greateſt Prince, yea of all the Princes of Chriſtendome. Yet could not the worthineſſe thereof, euen I in thoſe more zealous times, or the dangerous eſtate of that part of the Chriſtian common-weale, euen then like to periſh, (as ſome others be now) or the lamentable complaints of the poore oppreſſed Chriſtians, crying out vnto their Chriſtian brethren for aid, any whit moue the Chriſtian Princes of that time, with their combined forces to reach vnto them their helping hands, or to yeeld vnto them any ſuccour or reliefe: for they little feeling thoſe harmes ſo farre off, and more regarding their owne hereditarie quarrels, emploied thoſe forces one againſt another, vnto the effuſion of ſo much Chriſtian bloud, as might haue ſuffiſed not for reliefe of the diſtreſſed Chriſtians in SYRIA only, but to haue regained whatſoeuer had beene before from them taken by the Turks or Saraſins. The Germane Princes were ſtill at a iarre about the choice of their Emperours: the French agreed not with the Engliſh, or them of the Low countries: K neither the Engliſh with the Scots: the Arragonians were at oddes with the French: and in ITALIE were almoſt as many deadly factions as prouinces. Of which diſcord of the Chriſti-ans (the greateſt occaſion of their ruine and decay) Melechſares the Ægyptian Sultan vnder-ſtanding by his eſpials, raiſed a great armie of the Mamalukes, and others, with a full purpoſe to haue vtterly rooted out all the remainders of the Chriſtians in SYRIA and the land 1289 of PALESTINE, and ſo to haue entirely ioined thoſe two great countries vnto his owne kingdome. But what he had ſo miſchieuouſly deuiſed, he liued not to bring to paſſe, being in the middeſt of thoſe his great deſignes taken away by ſudden death. After whom Alphix (or, as ſome call him, Elpis) ſucceeding him in the kingdome, and with a puiſſant armie entring into SYRIA, Tripolis won and raſed by Elpis the Ægyptian Sultan. laid ſiege to TRIPOLIS, which he at length tooke by vndermining of it, and put to ſword L all the Chriſtians therein, except ſuch as by ſpeedie flight had in time got themſelues out of the danger, and raſed the citie downe to the ground: which calamitie betided vnto the Chriſti-ans the ninth of Aprill, in the yeere 1289. Preſently after he had the ſtrong caſtle of NE-LESINE yeelded vnto him, whereinto he put a ſtrong garriſon, to hinder the Chriſtians from building againe the late deſtroied citie. In like manner alſo hee tooke the cities of Sidon and Berythus raſed. Tyre yeelded. SIDON and BERYTHVS, which he ſacked, and laied them flat with the ground. And after that hee remoued to TYRE, which after three moneths ſtraight ſiege, was by the citizens (now out of all hope of reliefe) yeelded vnto him, vpon condition, That they might with bagge and baggage in ſafetie depart. With like good fortune he in good time, and as it were without reſiſtance, tooke all the reſt of the ſtrong townes and caſtles which M the Chriſtians yet held in SYRIA and the land of PALESTINE, excepting onely the citie of PTOLEMAIS; whereunto all the poore Chriſtians fled, as vnto a Sanctuarie, to be there defended by the honorable Knights Templars and Hoſpitallers. Nothing now left vnto them more than that ſtrong citie, the Sultan of his owne accord made a peace with them for the ſpace of fiue yeeres, fearing (as was ſuppoſed) to haue drawne vpon him all the Chriſtian
Princes

A Princes of the Weſt, if he ſhould at once haue then vtterly rooted out all the Chriſtians in thoſe countries together.

The Chriſtian affaires thus brought to the laſt caſt in SYRIA, and yet faintly as it were breathing, by the benefit of the late obtained peace: Peter Beluiſe, maſter of the Templars, with the Grand Maſter of the Knights Hoſpitallers, ſuddenly paſſed ouer (as embaſſadours from the reſt) into EVROPE, vnto Nicholaus quartus then Pope, crauing his fatherly aid: who moued with ſo great miſeries of the poore afflicted Chriſtians, ſollicited the other Chriſtian Princes to haue ſent them reliefe; eſpecially Rodolph the Germaine Emperour, who then buſied with the affaires of the empire, and his troubles neerer home (as were the other Chri-
B ſtian Princes alſo) gaue good words, but no helpe at all. Yet ſome of them vnder the colour thereof, got from their ſubiects great ſummes of money, which they employed to their other worſe vſes: onely the Pope ſent fifteene hundred men at armes, whom with deuout perſwaſion, and much earneſt preaching, he had induced to take vpon them that ſacred expedition, and entertained them of his owne charge: vnto whom alſo many others out of diuers countries, vpon a religious zeale, ioyned themſelues, as voluntarie men; who meeting together at BRVNDVSIVM, and there embarked, with the two grand maſters of the Templars and Hoſpitallers, in ſafetie at length arriued at PTOLEMAIS. There was then in the citie a great number of people of all ſorts; of able men there was about fiftie thouſand, and about fortie thouſand of the weaker ſort: amongſt whom, diuers murders, felonies, rapes, and ſuch
C other ſhamefull outrages (all hafting the dreadfull iudgements of God) were daily committed, and let paſſe vnregarded, more than of them that were ſo iniured. For all the chiefe commanders were then at variance among themſelues, euery one of them laying claime (not worth a ruſh) vnto the vaine title of the kingdome of HIERVSALEM. Henry King of CYPRVS comming thither with a great fleet, charged the Templars to deliuer vnto him the crowne of that kingdome, which they had (as he ſaid) wrongfully taken from Almericus and Guy, his aunceſtors. And Charles King of SICILIA, by his embaſſadours laid claime vnto the title of that kingdome, as due vnto the Kings of that Iſland: and vnderſtanding it to be giuen vnto Henry, King of CYPRVS, cauſed all the reuenewes of the Templars within his dominion to be brought into his treaſuries, and their lands and houſes to be ſpoiled. Hugh alſo Prince D of ANTIOCH, laboured with tooth and naile to defend the ouerworne right that his father and grandfather had vnto that loſt kingdome. And the Countie of TRIPOLIS laid in for himſelfe, that he was deſcended from Raymund of THOLOVS; and that beſide himſelfe remained no Prince of the ancient nobilitie, which had won that kingdome out of the hands of the Saraſins, and that therefore that regall dignitie did not of better right appertaine vnto any other than vnto himſelfe. Neither did theſe foure Princes more ſtriue for the title of the loſt kingdome, than for the preſent gouernment of the citie, ſtraightway about to periſh. The Popes Legate pretended thereunto a right alſo; for that King Iohn Brenne had before ſubiected it vnto the See of ROME. As for the claime vnto the citie of PTOLEMAIS, the Patriarch of HIERVSALEM challenged vnto himſelfe the preheminence: for that the metropo-
E liticall citie of TYRE, vnder which the citie of PTOLEMAIS was the third epiſcopall ſeat, was vnder his iuriſdiction, euen by the decree of the Weſt church. The Templars alſo, and the Knights Hoſpitallers, whoſe power in the citie was at that time farre the greateſt, pretended the gouernment thereof of beſt right to belong vnto them, as the iuſt reward of their bloud alreadie, and afterward to be ſpent in the defence thereof: promiſing great matters if it might be wholly referred vnto them. Neither ſpared the French King or the King of ENGLAND by their meſſengers to claime the ſoueraignetie of the citie, by their predeceſſours ſometimes won. And they of PISA hauing ſtill a Conſull therein, and by often mariages with the naturall inhabitants growne into great affinitie with them, did what they might to get the gouernment into their hands. The Venetians alſo by their authoritie and great wealth labou-
F red to gaine the good will of the people, ſparing therein no coſt. And they of GENVA no leſſe cunning than the reſt, ſupplanted the ſtrongeſt factions, by giuing aid both apertly and couertly vnto the weaker; that ſo hauing weakened the faction they moſt doubted and hated, they might by the ioynt fauour of the weaker aſpire vnto the gouernment of the ſtronger, and ſo conſequently of the citie it ſelfe. The Florentines alſo by their continuall traffique thither, were not out of hope by one fineneſſe or other amongſt ſo many competitours, to finde a meane to ſtep vp aboue the reſt. But the greateſt part of the people for all that were G moſt inclined vnto the Armenians and Tartars, as both for their neereneſſe and power moſt like of all other to ſtand them in ſtead. All theſe aimed at one marke, which was the gouernment and command of the citie: and moſt of them had in the ſame their owne proper lawes and courts, to decide their cauſes and controuerſies in. Whereby it came to paſſe, that euery man might without checke or controlement almoſt doe what he liſt, the offenders from one court to another remouing their ſutes, as beſt ſerued their turnes. Thus were murders (as is before ſaid) daily committed in the ſtreets, men abuſed, houſes robbed, ſhops broken vp, and many other outrages done, to the haſtening of the wrath of God, and griefe of all good men. H

The miſerable eſtate of a citie about to periſh.

1291 Diuiſion and diſſention (the ruine of all common-weales) thus raigning in the citie (the ſouldiers of late ſent thither, or in zeale come of themſelues, for the defence thereof) gaue occaſion for the ſpeedie deſtruction of the ſame: Such is the power of the Almightie, in his wrath and iudgements for ſinne, euen by thoſe things wherein wee moſt truſt and ioy to worke our vtter ruine and deſtruction. Theſe ſouldiers, for want of ſuch pay as was promiſed them, were enforced to ſeeke abroad, and therefore contrary to the league before made with the Ægyptian Sultan, oftentimes went out in great parties into the frontiers of his territories, taking the ſpoile of ſuch things as they light vpon. Whereof the Sultan vnderſtanding, demanded by his embaſſadours, That reſtitution might be made, and the offenders deliuered vnto him to be puniſhed, according vnto the league. But in that ſo ſicke a ſtate of a dying I common-weale, neither was reſtitution made, as reaſon would, or yet the embaſſadours courteouſly heard. With which inſolencie the Sultan prouoked, ſent Emilech Araphus, a notable captaine (and as ſome ſay, his ſonne) with an hundred and fiftie thouſand men, to beſiege the citie: who comming thither, and hauing made his approches, had by a mine in ſhort time ouerthrowne a peece of the wall; but in ſeeking to haue entered by the breach, he found ſuch ſtrong reſiſtance, that hee was glad with loſſe to retire. Whileſt Araphus thus lay at the ſiege of PTOLEMAIS, Alphir the Sultan died at DAMASCO, in whoſe ſtead the Mamalukes made choice of this Araphus for their Sultan, who more deſirous of nothing than of the glorie of the vtter rooting vp of the Chriſtians in SYRIA, was ſo farre from raiſing of his ſiege (either for the death of the Sultan, or the newes of his kingdome) that he more ſtraitly K beſet the citie than he had in the three moneths ſpace that he had there lien before. Now had they in the citie choſen Peter the maſter of the Templars, their gouernour, a man of great experience and valour: vnto whom and the reſt of the nobilitie, the Sultan offered great rewards, and vnto the ſouldiers their pay, with free libertie to depart, ſo that they would without more adoe yeeld vnto him the citie, which they could not long hold: which his offer the maſter reiected, and flatly told him, That hee had not learned of his anceſtours, to ſell for money vnto the Infidels a citie bought with ſo much Chriſtian bloud; either did ſo much regard his vaine threats, as therefore to forget his ſeruice due vnto his Sauiour Chriſt and the Chriſtian Ptolemais in vaine aſſaulted by the Sultan. common-weale. With which anſwer the tyrant enraged, the next day with all his forces aſſaulted the citie, and that in ſuch deſperate and furious manner, as if he would euen then haue L carried it; hauing before filled the ditches, and promiſed the ſpoile vnto his ſouldiers, the more to encourage them. Yet hauing done what he could, and loſt a number of his men, ſlaine both in the aſſault, and in a ſallie which the Chriſtians made out at the ſame time, hee was inforced to retire backe againe into his trenches. In this ſo terrible an aſſault, not repulſed without ſome loſſe alſo of the Chriſtians, the grand maſter and gouernour of the citie was wounded with a poiſoned dart, whereof hee in three dayes after died: with whom the courage of the defendants fainted alſo, no man being left like vnto him to vndertake ſo great a charge, although many there were, that ouerweening of themſelues, deſired the ſame. In the beginning of this ſiege, the Chriſtians had ſent away all their aged and weake people, vnfit for ſeruice, into CYPRVS, where they in ſafetie arriued. But now many of the better ſort, both captaines and M others, diſcouraged, one after another conuaighed themſelues away out of the citie: of whom a great number in paſſing thence to CYPRVS, were vpon the coaſt of the Iſland, together with the Patriarch drowned. In the citie remained only twelue thouſand, which were thought ſufficient for the defence thereof: who afterwards (as ſome report) fled alſo by ſea after their fellowes, and ſo left the citie emptie vnto the barbarous enemie: ſome others reporting

A of them more honourably, as that they ſhould right valiantly defend the citie againſt the aſſault of their enemies, vntill ſuch time as that moſt of them being ſlaine or wounded, and the reſt by force driuen from the wals into the market place, and there for a while notably defending themſelues, in flying thence vnto the ſhips, were by the way all cut in ſunder, or elſe drowned. But howſoeuer it was, the Sultan entering the citie (by the Chriſtians abandoned, or by force taken) gaue the ſpoile thereof vnto his ſouldiers; who after they had rifled euery corner thereof, by his commandement ſet it on fire and burnt it downe to the ground: and digging vp the very foundations of the wals, churches, and other publike and priuate buildings, which the fire had not burnt, left there no ſigne of any citie at all; but purging the place euen of the very
B heapes of the ſtones and rubbidge left of the raſed citie, made it a fit place for huſbandmen to plough and ſowe corne in; which he did both there, at SYDON, BERITVS, and other towns alongſt the ſea coaſt, becauſe they ſhould neuer more ſerue for a refuge vnto the Chriſtians, or giue them footing againe into thoſe countries. Thus together with PTOLEMAIS was the name of the Chriſtians vtterly rooted out of SYRIA and the land of PALESTINE, in the yeere 1291, about 192 yeeres after the winning of HIERVSALEM by Godfrey of BVILLON and the other Chriſtian Princes his confederates.

This loſſe, as tending to the great diſgrace of the Chriſtians in generall, mooued not a little euen the greateſt of the Chriſtian Princes; wronged all or moſt part of them in the perſons of the Templars or Knights Hoſpitalers, their ſubiects, ſo ſhamefully now quite caſt out of SY-
C RIA and the land of promiſe: howbeit, troubled with their owne turbulent affaires at home, or with their neighbour Princes not farre off, none of them once ſtirred for the redreſſe or reuenge thereof. Onely Caſſanes the great Tartar Prince, hauing of late ſubdued the Perſians, and married the daughter of the Armenian King (a Ladie of great perfection, and of a Mahometane become a Chriſtian) at the requeſt of his wife and his father in law, tooke the matter in hand. And for that purpoſe hauing raiſed a moſt puiſſant armie of two hundred thouſand fighting men, and aided by the Armenians and Georgians, paſſing ouer the mountaine AMANVS into SYRIA, not farre from the citie HAMA met wit Melcenaſer, the Ægyptian Sultans lieutenant, with a mightie armie, whom hee ouerthrew in a great and mortall battell, wherein fortie thouſand of the Ægyptians are reported to haue beene ſlaine, and ſo D draue him quite out of SYRIA: ſending Molais, one of his captaines, with part of his armie to purſue him, who neuer left him vntill hee had chaſed him ouer the deſart ſands into ÆGYPT. The victorious Tartar after this battell tooke the citie of HAMA, where lighting vpon the great treaſures of the Sultan, hee bountifully diuided it, together with the ſpoile, amongſt his ſouldiers; reſeruing nothing thereof vnto himſelfe, more than a ſword and a casket full of ſecret letters. The Ægyptian thus put to flight, hee without reſiſtance tooke in moſt of the cities of SYRIA, with the citie of HIERVSALEM alſo; which in many places by the Turks and Ægyptians defaced, he againe repaired: and together with the Temple of our Sauiour, gaue it to the Armenians, Georgians, and other Chriſtians, repairing thither out of CYPRVS, CRETE, and other places, to inhabite. And hauing himſelfe honoured the holy E places with great gifts, returned with his armie to DAMASCO, which was forthwith deliuered vnto him. But lying there, with purpoſe in Autumne following to haue gone into ÆGYPT, and to haue vtterly deſtroied that kingdome, he was certified of new troubles ariſing in PERSIA, and ſome other parts of his empire: for repreſſing whereof, he with the greateſt part of his armie returned himſelfe into PERSIA, leauing one Capcapus gouernour of DAMASCO; who after the ouerthrow of the Sultans armie had reuolted vnto him; and Molais (of whom wee haue before ſpoken) gouernor of HIERVSALEM: commanding them at his departure to reedifie the citie of TYRE, and to ſend embaſſadours vnto the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt, to ioine in league with them, for the more ſure holding of thoſe new gained countries. And ſo TYRE was indeed repaired as he had commanded, and deliuered to the Chriſtians, with a con-F uenient garriſon for the keeping thereof: but the embaſſadours comming to the proud Biſhop Boniface the eight, then Pope, whom of all others it beſeemed to haue furthered their buſineſſe, they could of him obtaine nothing, but returned as they came. For hee at the ſame time fallen out with Philip the French King, thundering out his excommunications, diſcharging his ſubiects of their loyaltie, and ſo much as in him was, depriuing him of his kingdome, had giuen the ſame vnto Albertus Duke of AVSTRIA, whom he had declared Emperor: whereof ariſe great troubles. Beſides that, he being of the Guelphes faction, was not in any thing more G carefull, than of the vtter extinguiſhing of the contrarie faction of the Gibellines, eſpecially of the moſt honourable familie of the Columnij, of whom ſome he had ſlaine, ſome he had depriued of their honours, ſome he had impriſoned, & driuen other ſome into exile; ſo that thus wickedly buſied for the maintenance of his owne proud eſtate, he had no leiſure to further the good of the Chriſtian common weale: which his intolerable pride, and forgetfulneſſe of dutie, long eſcaped not the reuenging hand of God; being when he thought leaſt, ſuddenly taken priſoner at his fathers houſe in the citie of ANAGNIA (where he was borne) by Sara Columnius his mortall enemie; whom but lately before redeemed out of a pirates gallie, the French King had ſent for that purpoſe, with one Longaret, or as ſome call him, Nogaret, a French Knight: By whom H

This worthy Tartar Prince Caſſanes, by whom the Chriſtian common weale might haue againe riſen in SYRIA & the land of PALESTINE, had not the pride of the great Biſhop, and the diſſention of the Chriſtian Princes hindered the ſame; was as Aitonus writeth (who was preſent in this warre, following his vncle the Armenian King) a man of a very ſhort ſtature, and exceeding hard fauour; but with valour, bountie, and other vertues of the minde plentifully recompencing what wanted in the feature of his body. After whoſe departure into PERSIA, Capcapus gouernour of DAMASCO, conſidering that the power of the Tartars there left was not great, and that no aid was to be expected from the other Chriſtian I Princes of the Weſt, to recompenſe his former treaſon of reuolting from the Sultan, with a new reuolt from the Tartar; riſe vp into open rebellion, drawing after him not only the citie of DAMASCO, but the greateſt part of SYRIA alſo: whereof Molais gouernour of HIERVSALEM vnderſtanding, was about to haue gone againſt him with his Tartars; but aduertiſed by his eſpials, that Capcapus in this his conſpiracie had compacted with the Ægyptian Sultan alſo, perceiuing himſelfe too weake to withſtand ſo great a power, he retired with his Tartars into MESOPOTAMIA, there expecting new ſupplies both from Caſſanes and the King of ARMENIA. Of The citie of Hieruſalem with al Syria againe recouered by the Aegyptian Sultan. whoſe departure out of SYRIA, the Ægyptian Sultan vnderſtanding, came directly with his armie to HIERVSALEM, which he tooke, being forſaken of the inhabitants; and prophaned the Temple, ſparing only the Sepulchre of our Sauiour, at the humble ſute of the religious, ma- K king there a greater ſhew of deuotion than of crueltie. After that hee won all the other leſſer townes, which the Tartars had either kept for them ſelues, or giuen to the other Chriſtians, and vtterly raſed all the caſtles and forts of the Hoſpitalers and Templars: which valiant men without other helpe, for the ſpace of almoſt a yeere held out againſt the Tyrant, in which time moſt 1300 of them were honourably ſlaine: the reſt that were left aliue, being taken by the enemie, had neuertheleſſe leaue giuen them with bag & baggage in ſafetie to depart, hauing before by ſolemne oath for euer abiured the country of SYRIA: and ſo theſe worthy men, the great ornaments of the Chriſtian common weale, the Hoſpitalers and Templars, which to the vttermoſt of their power had by the ſpace 300 yeeres right worthily defended both the Chriſtians and the Chriſtian religion, againſt the Infidels in SYRIA and the Holy Land, were now for euer driuen out L thence, about the yeere of our Lord 1300, to the great diſhonour of all Chriſtendome.

Wherefore with them now taking our leaue of SYRIA and the Holy Land, leauing the ſame in the poſſeſſion of the Ægyptian Sultan and the Mamalukes, although it were ſhortly after like enough to haue beene againe recouered from them by the Tartars, had not the death of the great Tartar Prince Caſſanes, and their domeſticall troubles letted: wee will againe returne vnto the troubled affaires of the Turks in the leſſer ASIA, whither the courſe of time had ſomewhat before called vs, with the occurrents thereof, more proper vnto our purpoſe and the argument we haue in hand, but that all cannot be at once told: And for the better vnderſtanding of the deſirous Reader, I thought it not good abruptly to breake off the courſe of the aforeſaid hiſtorie drawing ſo neere vnto an end, but to make him partaker of the heauineſſe thereof. M

The death of Meſoot & Cei-Cubades. Now had the Turkes no kingdome left in the leſſer ASIA, and that alſo at the pleaſure of Gazan the great Tartar Chan diuided betwixt Meſoot and Cei-Cubades, as his vaſſals, bound vnto him by a yeerely tribute (as is aforeſaid:) who both kept in awe by the greatneſſe of the Tartar, did nothing worth the remembrance, but as they liued ſo alſo died, almoſt buried in obſcuritie. Of theſe two, Meſoot died without iſſue; but Cei-Cubades departing, left behinde him his ſonne

Aladin,

A Aladin, who by the name of Aladin the ſecond ſucceeding in the kingdome, vnited againe the ſame before diuided, yet paying ſtill tribute vnto the Tartar his Soueraigne, as had his father with the other late Sultans of the Turks before him. Much it was not that this Aladin did, albeit that the power of the Tartars in his time began to decline, and not to lie ſo heauie vpon the Turkes as before. He was a man of a quiet ſpirit, and therefore much delighted in peace: a great friend vnto Othoman the firſt founder of the glorious and mightie Othoman empire, as in his life ſhall appeare. But this Aladin, the laſt of the Turkes Sultans of the Selzuccian familie, dying without iſſue; one Sahib his Veſir-Azemes or chiefe counſeller, and then a man of greateſt authoritie, aſpired vnto the kingdome, which he had for moſt part himſelfe ſwaied all the raigne
B of the late Sultan his maſter: which vſurped ſoueraigntie, no way vnto him due, he could neither himſelfe long hold, or deliuer to his poſteritie; for that many others of the nobilitie, men of great power, and borne of greater families than he, enuying at his honour, and diſdaining to be gouerned by him, or any other no greater than themſelues, laid hold ſome vpon one countrey or prouince, ſome vpon another, where they were able to doe moſt, erecting vnto themſelues greater or leſſer Satrapies, according to the meaſure of their owne ſtrength and power, without reſpect of any ſuperioritie one ſhould haue ouer another; but euery one of them abſolutely commanding ouer ſo much as he was able by ſtrong hand to hold. So that as it had oftentimes before chanced, that great Monarchies deſtitute of their lawfull heires, had in part, or all, become rich preyes vnto ſuch as could firſt lay ſtrong hand vpon them: euen ſo fell it
C now out in the great kingdome of the Turkes; euery one of their great Princes, meaſuring the greatneſſe of his territorie, not by the meaſure of his right, but by the ſtrength of his owne power. Wherein they ſhared ſo well for themſelues, that Sahib at firſt in poſſeſſion of all, was in ſhort time thruſt quite out of all: and ſo the great kingdome of the Turkes in the leſſer Asia, brought vnto a meere Anarchie; no King now left among them, the whole kingdome being now diuided into diuers Satrapies, or other leſſer Toparchies. The greateſt of theſe Princes that thus ſhared the Turkes kingdome amongſt them, was one Caraman Aluſirius; who as ſtrongeſt, tooke vnto himſelfe the citie of Iconivm, the regall ſeat of the Turkiſh Sultans, with all the great countrey of Cilicia, and ſome part of the frontiers of the countries of Lycaonia, Pamphilia, Caria, and the greater Phrigia, as farre as Philadel-
D phia, and the citie of Antiochvpon the riuer Meander: All which large territorie, was of him afterward called Caramania, and by the ſame name is commonly at this day knowne, and by our late Geographers deſcribed. Of this Caraman alſo deſcended the Caramanian Kings, who of long time after vnfortunately ſtroue with the Othoman Sultans for the ſoueraigntie of their empires; vntill that at length they with their kingdome, and all the reſt of theſe Turkiſh Satrapies, were in the fatall greatneſſe of the Othoman empire, ſwallowed vp and deuoured, as in the proceſſe of this hiſtorie ſhall (if God ſo will) in due time and place be declared. Next neighbour vnto him was Saruchan, of the Greekes called Sarchan, of whom the countrey of Ionia-Maritima was and yet is called Sarv-Chan-Ili, and Sarvchania, that is to ſay, Saruchans countrey. The greateſt part of Lydia, with ſome part of the greater E Misia, Troas, and Phrygia, fell to Calamus and his ſonne Caraſius, of whom it is called Carasia, or Carasi-Ili, (or as we might ſay) Caraſius his countrey. The greateſt part of the ancient Misia, with ſome part of Lydia, was poſſeſſed by Aidin, and was of him called Aidinia or Aidin-Ili, as his countrey. Some part of the great countrey of Pontvs, with the cities of Heraclea-Pontica, Castamona, Synope, and others neere vnto the Evxine, and the countrey of Paphlagonia, fell into the hands of the ſonnes of Omer, or as the Greekes call him, Amur: of whom that countrey tooke not name, as did the others, of ſuch Princes as poſſeſſed them, but is commonly called Bolli, of a citie in that countrey by the Turkes ſo named. As was alſo Mendesia, or as ſome call it Mentesia, a countrey in the leſſer Asia, ſo by the Turkes called of Mendos or Myndvs, F a citie in Caria. There were beſide theſe, diuers other places and Toparchies in the leſſer Asia, which in the renting of this great kingdome, from the Turkes receiued names, before vnto the world vnknowne; all which to proſecute were tedious. Sufficeth it vs, for the manifeſting of the Turks Anarchie, and the ruine of their kingdome in the leſſer Asia, as in part alſo for the more euidence of the heauie hiſtorie following, to haue remembred theſe as the chiefeſt; eſpecially ſuch as tooke their names of ſuch great Princes or Captaines as in that ſo great a confuſion confuſion of the Turkes kingdome, by ſtrong hand firſt ceazed vpon them, and ſo left them to G their poſteritie, of whom much is to be ſaid hereafter. Theſe Princes one and all that thus ſhared the late Aladinian kingdome, were deſcended of the better ſort of the Turkes, which with the Selzuccian and Aladinian Sultans driuen out of PERSIA by the Tartars, had vnder them ſeated themſelues in the leſſer ASIA, as is before at large declared. Now amongſt theſe great men that thus diuided the Turkes kingdome, moſt of them that write of the Turkes affaires, both Greekes and Latines, reckon vp Othoman (the raiſer of his houſe and familie) for one; who indeed in the latter time of the late Sultan Aladin began to flouriſh, and was of him for his valour extraordinarily fauoured (as in his hiſtorie ſhall appeare) but of his kingdome held no more than one poore lordſhip, called SVGVT a in BYTHINIA, not farre from the mountaine OLIMPVS, H (long before giuen vnto his father Erthogrull, for his good ſeruice) with ſuch other ſmall holds thereabout, as he had himſelfe gained from the weake Chriſtians his neighbours. For although Othoman none of the Selzuccian familie. he were a Turke borne, yet was he not of the Selzuccian familie, as were the reſt, but of another houſe and tribe, and therefore not of them fauoured or thought to haue ſo good right vnto any of the late Sultans prouinces or territories, as had they who being of his houſe, and holpen with the preſcription of time, enuied at the ſudden riſing of this Oguzian Turke, being vnto them as it were a meere ſtranger: whoſe fortune for all that (I know not by what ſecret foreknowledge) they ſeemed to feare, as in time to grow dangerous vnto them and their poſteritie; wherin they were no whit deceiued. But of him and his proceedings much more is to be ſaid hereafter: leaue we him now therefore with the reſt vnto their fortunes in this the Turkes Anarchie, and ſo con- I clude this part of our Generall Hiſtorie: Glad when I looke backe to haue waded thus farre, yet fearing to be drowned before I get ouer; ſuch a ſea of matter and world of troubles yet remaining, not without much labour and toile, and that in long time to be paſſed through.

With endlesse wars the Asian state farre spent and ouerworne:
By Sarasins and Tartars force, is all in peeces torne.
The Christians draw their bloudie swords, wherewith themselues to wound:

THE RISING OF THE GREAT AND MIGHTIE EMPIRE OF THE TVRKS VNDER OTHOMAN FIRST FOVNDER THEREOF: WITH HIS LIFE AND DOINGS.

WHat ſmall aſſurance there is in mens affaires, and how ſubiect vnto change euen thoſe things are wherein wee for the moſt part repoſe our greateſt felicitie and bliſſe, (beſide that the whole courſe of mans-fraile life, by many notable examples well declareth) nothing doth more plainly manifeſt the ſame, than the heauie euents and wofull deſtructions of the greateſt kingdomes and empires: which founded vpon great fortunes, increaſed with perpetuall ſucceſſe, exalted by exceeding power, eſtabliſhed with moſt puiſſant armies, wholeſome lawes, and deepe counſels; haue yet growne old, and in time come to naught: So that euen as men, all things elſe belonging vnto man, are ſubiect vnto the ineuitable courſe of deſtinie, or more truly to ſay, vnto the fatall doome of the moſt higheſt, preſining vnto euery thing that in time begun, a time alſo wherein to take end, being himſelfe without time the great commander thereof, and of all things elſe done therein. The fame of the firſt Aſſyrian Monarchie, is very ancient, and was no doubt both great and long, yet hath it neuertheleſſe found an end; and the more to put vs in remembrance of our infirmitie, was neuer with ſo much glorie and valour by Ninus erected, as it was with ſhame and cowardiſe by Sardanapalus ſubuerted. With like neceſſitie fell the great empire of the Medes and Perſians, the time thereof being come. And after them, the Macedonians alſo. Neither hath the great Romane empire, or the proud citie of ROME it ſelfe (ſometime the miſtreſſe of the world) herein found any exemption, but run the ſame courſe with the reſt: which growne great with continuall triumphs, and ſo ſtrong as that it was not with forraine power to be ſhaken; conuerted the forces of it ſelfe vpon it ſelfe, to the ouerthrow of the ancient libertie thereof, together with the vtter ſubuerſion of the ſtate. After which time that mightie monarchie (of all that euer yet were, the greateſt) vnder the Romane Emperours felt many an hard and perillous ſtorme, and by little and little ſtil declining (though ſometime like a ſicke aged bodie, by the valour or vertue of ſome one or other her worthie Emperours a little relieued, and by and by againe caſt downe by the follie or negligence of ſome others ſucceeding) it became at length a prey vnto a fooliſh rude & barbarous nation, which it had before oftentimes ouercome, and ouer which many the Romane captains had triumphed, and therof taken their glorious ſurnames: which now againe without compaſſion, burning and ſacking it, cauſed it to ſtoope, and to yeeld vnto the ſeruile yoake which it had in former time proudly impoſed vpon the necks of others: wherein if any thing be to be blamed, it is not the fortune or folly of this or that man, then ſitting at the helme (although that may alſo much helpe the the matter as a meane) but the inſtabilitie of worldly things neuer permanent, but alwayes changeable, and the ſooner for their height; and that ſo forcibly, as that no man knoweth how to remedie the ſame, either if he did, were he able to performe it; the greateſt meanes that men could poſſibly deuiſe for the ſtay thereof, being oftentimes by a greater power from aboue, conuerted vnto the more ſpeedie effecting of that, againſt the which they were by mans wiſedome prouided. The like might be ſaid of the Athenians, the Lacedæmonians, the Thebanes, and of whom not? What maruell then, if the ancient kingdomes of the Turks likewiſe in PERSIA, and the leſſer ASIA, in SYRIA, PALESTINA, and ÆGYPT, hauing run their appointed times, mightily impugned by the Chriſtians, oppreſſed on the one ſide by the Tartars, and on the other by the Mamalukes, and at length by themſelues rent in ſunder (their deſtinie ſo requiring) loſt at laſt their wonted maieſtie, and ſo fell into a meere Anarchie, as is in the former part of this Hiſtorie at large declared? Yet in this farre more than any other people fortunate, That after the ruine of their former kingdomes, ſtraightway out of themſelues ariſe another, namely this Othoman monarchie, the chiefe obiect of this Hiſtorie: which at the firſt ſcarce of the world perceiued, or of themſelues regarded, in ſhort time ſo proſpered, as that the power and glorie thereof obſcured not their former kingdomes onely (nothing, in compariſon of this) but euen the greateſt monarchies of the world; ouer a great part of which, it now ſo proudly triumpheth, as if it ſhould neuer haue end: at the beautie whereof the world wondereth, and at the power thereof quaketh: within the greatneſſe whereof are contained no ſmall portions of ASIA, EVROPE, and AFRICKE, but euen the moſt famous and fruitfull kingdomes thereof: no part of the world left vntouched but AMERICA onely; not more fortunate with her rich mines, than in that ſhe is ſo farre from ſo great and dangerous an enemie. The foundation of this ſo great a kingdome (and now ſo mightie an empire, as holdeth the world in awe) was firſt laid by the valiant Othoman, or as the Turks call him, Oſman; not deſcended of the Selzuccian familie, as were all the former Turks Sultans, but of the Oguzian tribe and kindred: in whoſe line this glorious empire hath euer ſince, by the ſpace of three hundred yeeres and three, to the aſtoniſhment of the world, wonderfully flouriſhed; and ſo yet doth at this day, vnder the gouernment of Mahomet the third, which now raigneth thirteenth in deſcent from him, knowing none in this world greater than himſelfe. But foraſmuch as both his greatneſſe, and the greatneſſe of the reſt of the Othoman Kings and Emperours his progenitors, tooke their beginning from this worthy and warlike Othoman, with whoſe life and doings wee purpoſe to begin this part of our Hiſtorie, it ſhall not be amiſſe both for the continuation of that wee haue in hand, with that we haue alreadie written, and for the more manifeſting of that which hereafter followeth, a little farther to fet his race and deſcent alſo: Not meaning with a long and faigned pedegree to fet him out of Noah his arke, (which continuall ſucceſſion of Princes, no nation of the world, be it neuer ſo ancient, the Iewes only excepted, and they alſo by writings and hiſtories as much as was poſſible eternized, could truly and iuſtly challenge) but onely ſo farre as ſhall be pertinent vnto our purpoſe, and by the authoritie of good hiſtories to be auerred.

At ſuch time as the Turks kingdome founded by Tangrolipix in PERSIA, flouriſhed in the Selzuccian Princes his ſucceſſors, there was alſo another kingdome of theirs at the citie of MACHAN, as is before declared, but nothing comparable to the other either in glorie or power. In this citie, and ouer this ſmall kingdome, raigned one Solyman, by his ſubiects honored alſo with the name of a Sultan or King; at the ſame time that the Tartars vnder the leading of old Zingis their great captaine, leauing their owne countrey, and bearing downe the world before them, hauing conquered the fartheſt parts of the Eaſt, and there ſeated their kingdome, turned their forces into PERSIA, and there ouerthrew the Turks kingdome at BALCH in CORASAN, and draue the Turks with Curſumes their laſt King, out of the countrey: after that they had there from the time of Tangrolipix raigned about an hundred and ſeuentie two yeeres.

This Solyman of whom we ſpeake, then raigning at MACHAN, was not of the Selzuccian familie (as were all the other Turks Sultans, the ſucceſſours of Tangrolipix) but of the Oguzian tribe, a familie famous alſo amongſt the Turks: who ſeeing the Selzuccian Sultan Curſumes (or as ſome call him, Cuſſumes) his countryman, beaten out of his kingdome by the Tartar, and his country ouerrun, and the great Caliph of BABYLON alſo ouerthrowne; thought it not good longer to ſtay in that country which he could not hold, but by ſpeedie flight betimes to prouide for the ſafetie of himſelfe and of ſuch his ſubiects as would follow him. And hearing that Aladin the

A the ſonne of Kei-Huſreu, or as the Greekes call him Cai-Coſroe (a great man of the Selzuccian familie, and neere of kin vnto the late Sultan Curſumes) who for feare of the Tartars, but lately come into ROMANIA-ASIATICA, had there by force of armes moſt honorably ſeated himſelfe and the Turks his followers, amongſt the Chriſtians: in hope of like good fortune, and for the zeale towards his ſuperſtition (accounting all well gotten that was gained from the Chriſtians) tooke his way after him, with ſuch of his kinſmen and ſubiects as would accompanie him in his new aduentures. And comming to ARTEZERVM, a citie in the borders of ARMENIA and CAPPADOCIA, thereabout in the country according to the ſeaſon of the yeere, ſeated himſelfe with his followers, being in number many; who with their wiues and children af-
B ter the manner of the Tartar Nomades their anceſtours, in poore tents and carts couered with a courſe kinde of cloth, had followed him; being indeed nothing elſe but a very rude and rough kinde of ſturdie heardſmen, not wedded to any place, but ſtill remouing with their tents and carts vp and downe, as beſt ſerued for their purpoſe and the feeding of their cattell, as doe the Turcoman nation, the true deſcent of the Turks, in many parts of ASIA at this day: and were thereof not onely called Nomades, that is to ſay heardſmen, (by which name the proud Ianizaries will oftentimes in contempt call euen the greateſt of the naturall Turks) but Hamaxophoretie, and Hamaxobij, that is to ſay, people carried or liuing in carts. Solyman hauing ſtaied a while about ERZERVM, remouing thence came to AMASIA; and there ſpoiling the countrey then inhabited by the Chriſtians, did them much harme, oftentimes encountring them in C the plaine field, and ſometimes ceazing vpon their townes & cities, vntill he had ſubdued vnto himſelfe a right large territorie: yea at length hauing in ſo many battels by him fought, and cities by him beſieged, loſt a great number of his people, and ſo wearied the reſt as that they were not willing farther to follow him; & fearing alſo with ſuch ſmall power as he had left, to be able to defend and keepe the country by him already gotten, in the midſt of ſo many enemies; thought it beſt to depart thence, and to ſeeke his better fortune elſewhere. At the ſame time it was rifely reported, that the affaires of PERSIA after ſo long trouble (for all this was not a while in doing) began to grow againe to ſome good quiet, the furie of the Tartars being now well abated, and that ſtorme ouerblowne: wherefore Solyman reſolued now to returne home againe, and to viſit his natiue countrey, of him and his people aboue all others deſired. So paſſing thorow SY-
D RIA (for that was now his way) neere vnto ALLEPO, he ceazed vpon a caſtle called ZIABER-CALA, and there ſtaied a ſpace for the refreſhing of his people. Afterward ſetting forward againe, he came at length to the great and famous riuer EVPHRATES, ouer which he muſt needs paſſe: but finding there neither bridge nor foord, or other meanes to get ouer, he ſtood ſtill as a man diſmaid, not knowing what to doe. Stay there he would not, and goe further he could not: his deſire bid him goe, but the great riuer ſaid, not ſo. In this perplexitie Solyman himſelfe with his horſe oftentimes taking the riuer, in hope to haue found ſome paſſage; but finding none, aduenturing too farre, was with the force of the ſtreame carried away, & ſo together with his horſe drowned. His body after long ſeeking, being at length found, was with the great lamentation of his people buried neere vnto the caſtle ZIABER, not long before by him taken: whereof they ſay E the place is at this day in their tongue called Meſari-Zuruc, that is to ſay, the Turks Graue. Some of theſe Oguzian Turks, after the death of their Sultan, wearie of their long trauell, ſeated themſelues in the countrey thereabouts, vnto whom the Turks that now hold that caſtle doe referre their beginning. The reſt of that great tribe and familie diuerſly diuided, went vnto diuers places as their fortunes led them; ſome of them into the waſte ground and deſarts of ARABIA and SYRIA, & are at this day called the Damaſcene Turcomans: otherſome returned backe againe into ROMANIA, the ſame way that they came, of whom are deſcended the Turcomans of ICONIVM and ANATOLIA: who yet with their wiues and children, as heardſmen, in great companies wander vp and downe the countrey, after the manner of their anceſtors. Romania Aſiatica.

F les (the father of this Othoman founder of the Turks empire that now is) and Dunder. With theſe foure brethren, moſt part of theſe Oguzian Turks that were left, returning into ROMANIA (as is aforeſaid) after they had there reſted themſelues a while, marching vp along the riuer EVPHRATES, came to a place called PASIN-OVASI, about ten miles aboue ARTERVM, where Ertogrul and his brother Dunder, with foure hundred families, not willing to goe any farther, ſtaied with their tents and carts, their beſt dwellings. Sencur and Iundogdis their other two brethren, in the meane time passing the riuer, returned with the rest into PERSIA: whom we there G leaue vnto their vnknowne fortunes. In this place Ertogrul with his brother and his three sons staied a while, and had diuers conflicts with the country people thereabout, vntill that at length he thought it best to returne againe into ROMANIA. So setting forward, he came to ANCYRA, and from thence vnto the blacke Mountaines, and so to a plaine called of the Turks Sultan Vngi about 75 miles Eastward from the citie of NICE in BYTHINIA, where he had many skirmishes with the Christians.

Now a good while before this, Aladin the elder (of whom we haue before spoken in the former part of this Historie) fled out of PERSIA, had subdued diuers great prouinces & countries in ROMANIA ASIATICA or the lesser ASIA (for so it is more truly called) so that he was of all H the people thereabouts accounted for a great Prince, and of the Turks themselues honoured with the name of their Vlu Padischach, that is to say, their great King or Emperor. Hauing placed his regall seat first at SEBASTIA, and afterward at ICONIVM; which two cities before ruinous, he repaired, and therein raigned, as did some few of his posteritie after him, as is before declared. Neither was Ertogrul ignorant of the honour, glorie, and power of this great Sultan: but hauing three sons, namely Iundus, Sarugatin, and Othoman, sent Sarugatin his second sonne (a bold well spoken man) vnto him to request him in that his so large a kingdome, and as yet not well peopled by the Turks, to grant vnto them his poore exiled countreymen, of long time oppressed with diuers fortunes, some small corner for them with their families and cattell to rest in. Which his request, the Sultan not forgetfull of his owne distresse sometime in like case, graci- I ously heard, and with great courtesie vsed the messenger. Now for the furtherance of his sute, it fortuned, that this Sultan before driuen out of PERSIA by the Tartars, and by them also much troubled in these his new gotten countries in the lesser ASIA, had with them diuers hot skirmishes, and sharpe conflicts; in one of which it fortuned the Sultan himselfe, with all the power he then had, to be hardly beset by his enemies, and in danger to haue lost the day: when as Ertogrul but newly come into the countrey, and willing to doe the Sultan seruice, and awaiting all opportunities for the commending of himselfe and his followers; vpon the sudden vnlooked for, with foure hundred men came vpon the backs of the Tartars, then almost in possession of a great victorie, and so forcibly charged them, that vnable to endure the charge and to maintaine the fight against the Sultan, (whose men encouraged by this vnexpected aid, as by succour sent K from heauen, began now to fight with greater courage) being both before and behinde hardly beset, they as men in despaire of the victorie they had before assured themselues of, turned their backs and fled. After which good seruice, the Sultan honourably welcommed this new come Turke, giuing him his hand to kisse, as the manner of the nation is; and highly commending his valour, commanded a rich cloke to be cast vpon him (amongst those Easterne nations a great honour) and all his souldiers to be bountifully rewarded: and presently after gaue vnto Ertogrul and his Turks a countrey village called SVGVTA, betwixt the castle of BILEZVGA and the mountaine TMOLVS in the greater PHRYGIA: in which village they might liue in, in Winter; and vpon the aforesaid mountaine, and the mountaine ORMENIVS, betwixt the riuers SANGARIVS and LICVS, feed their cattell in Summer. And yet not so contented thus L to haue honoured him, in whom he saw such approued valour, committed to his protection that side of the countrey wherein he dwelt, being in the very frontiers of his kingdome: which his charge he so well looked vnto, that all the countrey thereabout, before much infested with the often incursions of the enemie, was by his vigilant care and prowesse well secured.

Thus is Ertogrul the Oguzian Turke, with his homely heardsmen, become a pettie Lord of a countrey village, and in good fauour with the Sultan: whose followers, as sturdie heardsmen with their families, liued in Winter with him in SVGVTA; but in Summer in tents with their cattell vpon the mountaines. Hauing thus liued certaine yeeres, and brought great peace vnto his neighbours, as well the Christians as the Turks, before much troubled with the inuasions of the Tartars: it fortuned, that the Christians of CARA-CHISAR, a castle thereby (called by the M ancient Greekes Melanopyrgon, and of latter time Maurocastron, that is to say, the blacke tower or castle) wearie of their owne ease, and of the peace they had by his meanes enioyed, fell out with him, and euill intreated both him & his people. Which their ingratitude he taking in euill part, thereof, and of the wrongs by them done vnto the Turks, so grieuously complained vnto the Sultan, that he therewith moued, raised a great armie, and so himselfe in person came and besieged besieged the castle. But lying there at the siege, newes was brought him, that the Tartars with a great armie, vnder the leading of one Baintzar, were entred into CARIA, and there spoiling the country, had taken HERACLEA. For the repressing of whom, the Sultan was glad to rise with his armie; yet leauing a sufficient strength behinde him for the continuing of the siege, vnder the charge of Ertogrul Beg, for so the Turks now called him. The Sultan afterwards encountering with the Tartars at BAGA, ouerthrew them in a great battell: whileſt Ertogrul in the meane space hardly besieged CARA-CHISAR, wherein fortune so much fauoured him, that at length he tooke the castle, the spoile whereof he gaue vnto the souldiers, reserving onely the fift part thereof, as due vnto the Sultan, which he sent him for a present, together with the captaine of the castle, whom he had taken aliue: which captaine the Sultan afterward enlarged, and restored againe to him his castle, for the paiment of a yeerely tribute, which he truly paid during the life of the Sultan; but he dying about two yeeres after, he refused any more to pay it, and so reuolted from the Turks.

Sultan Aladin, founder of the Aladinian kingdome (for so the Turks call it) being dead at ICONIVM, after him succeeded Azatines his eldest sonne; and after him Iathatines his younger brother; who slaine by Theodorus Lascaris the Greeke Emperour (as is before declared) after him succeeded in that kingdome another Iathatines, the sonne of Azatines, who was by the Tartars expulsed, and his kingdome subdued (as in the former part of this Historie it appeareth.) After which time the Selzuccian familie there also by the Tartars in the lesser ASIA depressed, retained scarce the name and shadow of their former maiestie and glorie. In which troublesome times, and confusion of the state, Ertogrul well beaten and wearied in the world, kept himselfe close in his house at SVGVTA, as well contented therewith as with a kingdome; seeking by all meanes to keepe peace on euery side with his neighbours, as well Christians as others. In which quiet kinde of life he sweetly passed ouer the troublesome times of Mesoot the sonne of Kei-Cubades, and of Kei-Cubades the sonne of Feramuzin, both Sultans, but the great Tartars tributaries, and raigning but at their pleasure, vntill the time of the second Aladin, the sole and last heire of the Iconian kingdome, before by the Tartars diuided, which was no few yeeres. All which time Ertogrul liued quietly at SVGVTA, as one amongst many other of the Iconian Sultans subiects, wisely considering the fall of the Selzuccian Sultans, both in PERSIA and at ICONIVM; as also the ruine of his owne house and familie, both from royall state brought almost vnto nothing: and therefore with patience taking the world as it came, and making a vertue of necessitie, contenting himselfe with a little, bare himselfe kindly towards all men. In which contented kinde of life, he grew to great yeeres, with his three sonnes, greatly beloued and honoured of their neighbours, as well Christians as Turks; and no lesse fauoured by the second Aladin, then Sultan, than he had been of all the Sultans before him: whom the young men his sons, after the manner of their nation (forbidding them with emptie hands to salute their Princes) oftentimes visited with one present or other. In all which his sonnes were many good parts to be seene, yet so, as that in Othoman was easily to be perceiued a greater courage and spirit than in the other two his brethren: which was the cause that he was the more of all them of his tribe regarded, but especially of the youthfull and warlike sort, which commonly resorted vnto him when he went to hawke or hunt, or to other delights of the field (the counterfeits of warre) and was of them commonly called Osman Gazi, that is to say, Osman the warlike.

Small things in time of trouble yeeld vnto the wise great content.

In this frontier countrey neere vnto SVGVTA, the dwelling place of old Ertogrul, had Sultan Aladin diuers lieutenants & captains, gouernours of his castles and strong holds vpon those frontiers, with whom Othoman was well acquainted, and vnto whom he for friendship sake oftentimes resorted: but especially vnto the captaine of IN-VNOI, for that he knew himselfe to be of him well beloued, and therefore vnto him very welcome. So it fortuned vpon a time, that as Othoman being yet but young, was going to make merrie with the gouernour of ESKI-CHISAR (a castle about foure and twentie miles off, called of the Greekes Palæocastron) by the way as he went, at a place called ITBVRNE (a towne in PHRYGIA) chanced there to see, and afterwards to fall in liking of a faire maiden called Malhatun: vnto whom his affection daily increasing, he without his fathers knowledge sent a secret friend of his to intreat with her of marriage. Which after long discourse to her made concerning Othomans affection and request, gaue him answer, that betwixt Othoman & her was great inequalitie, a thing especially to be regarded and eschued of such as wished to liue an happie life in wedlock bands; she was (as she said) but meanly born, Othoman amorous of Malhatun a country maid.

and therefore was not to expect so great a match: whereas he could not want choice of other maidens of more worth, and in all respects more answerable vnto himselfe. But amongst other causes why she gaue him this answer, one was, for that some that wished her well, had put into her head, that Othoman meant not indeed to marie her, but vnder that colour to obtaine of her some few dayes pleasure, and so hauing dishonoured her, afterward againe to cast her off: which was indeed far from his thought; for he the more enflamed with her modest deniall, the more desired her for his wife. In the meane time, Othoman going againe vnto the gouernour of Eski-Chisar, and courteously by him entertained, chanced (as it oftentimes doth amongst familiar friends in their merriments) to fall in speech of his loue, with greater affection than discretion, commending her beautie, her feature, & gracious perfections, not dissembling also, to her greater praise, the repulse by him receiued at her hands. Which the gouernor hearing, seemed greatly to like of his choice, saying, that she was by the diuine prouidence (for so the Turks religiously vse to speake) appointed only for him to haue. But in the meane time secretly inflamed with the immoderat commendations of Othoman, without respect of friendship, he began to grow amorous of her himselfe, whom he had neuer seene; so light is that fooliſh affection: and that so far, as that being otherwise a man of good discretion, he was not able to conceale or couer these new conceiued flames, but that Othoman by certaine coniectures & tokens perceiued the same. And yet dissembling the matter, as if he had suspected nothing, being risen from the banquet, calling vnto him one of his trustie seruants, secretly sent him away vnto certaine of the maidens friends, willing them in his name, as they tendred her honor, without delay to send her away vnto some safe place farther off, for feare she were not ere long taken from them by a great man, more amorous of her person than respectuous of her honour. And by and by after, taking his leaue of his vnfaithfull friend and bidding him farwell, tooke his way vnto the captaine of In-Vngi, whom he knew to be his deare friend. But whilest he there staied certaine dayes, passing the time in hawking, hunting, and other youthfull disports, with the captaine his friend; the gouernour of Eski-Chisar, who commanded all the countrey thereabout (called Sultan-Vngi) sent one of his trustie seruants to Iznik, to see faire Malhatun, and how all things there went: who comming thither, and vnderstanding of her secret departure, and that by the aduertisement from Othoman she was conueyed to certaine of her friends a farre off; at his returne, from point to point certified his master thereof. Who exceedingly grieued with the report, and fretting aboue measure to see himselfe so deluded by Othoman, presently sent vnto the captaine of In-Vngi (being within his iurisdiction) to command him without delay to deliuer Othoman vnto him. But he louing of him well, as a faithfull man vnto his friend, could with no threats or intreatie be perswaded so to doe. Wherefore the gouernour in a great rage presently raising the greatest power he was able to make, came to the castle of In-Vngi, requiring to haue Othoman forthwith deliuered vnto him. Where among the souldiers there in garrison with the captaine, began to arise diuers opinions; some wishing, for the auerting of the present danger for which they were now vnprouided, to haue him deliuered; and otherſome abhorring so trecherous a fact, willing rather to endure all extremities. In the end after much consultation, honestie preuailed, & it was generally resolued, that he should be defended, who could not without their great infamie be deliuered. But Othoman terrified with that diuersitie of opinions, which had euen at the first shewed it selfe; and thinking it not for his safetie, to commit himselfe vnto the trust of such wauering men, entred into a deepe conceit of a matter of great aduenture, which was, by a sudden sallie to make himselfe way thorow the midst of his enemies. Wherewith hauing made his brother Iunus & those few his followers there present acquainted, and thereupon resolued; he fiercely sallied out, and by plaine force brake thorow the thickest of them, and so tooke his way towards Svgvta, still notably repulsing them that were sent to pursue him. But being come into the frontiers of his fathers territorie, and the report of his danger knowne, and that being but weakly accompanied, he was by a great number of his enemies pursued; presently all the lustie youths and such as loued him well, tooke horse to come vnto his rescue: who meeting with the gouernors souldiers, that had Othoman in chace, in a sharpe conflict slew diuers of them, and put the rest to flight. Of whom some were also taken prisoners, and amongst the rest one Michael Cosse a Christian, captaine of a little castle in that countrey called Hramen-caia, or the rocke of Ormeni: of whom Othoman taking compassion, freely pardoned him that offence. With which vnexpected courtesie he was so moued, that euer after he tooke part with him,

A folie common vnto louers.

No friendship in loue.

Othoman besieged & in danger for his loue.

A him, and did him great ſeruice in his wars: whoſe poſteritie hath euer ſince euen vntill this our age continued, next vnto the Othoman familie, moſt honorable and famous amongſt the Turks, by the name of the Michael-Oglies, that is to ſay, the ſonnes or poſteritie of Michael.

Ertogrul now ſpent with age, ſhortly after died, in the yeere of our Lord 1289, hauing liued 93 yeeres, and thereof gouerned the Oguzian familie after the death of his father Solyman, 52. His death was of all his tribe and kinred greatly lamented, and his bodie after the Turkiſh manner honourably buried at SVGVTA, where he had of long time liued.

After whoſe death, theſe plaine Oguzian Turks, in a generall aſſemblie conſulting whom they might chuſe for their lord and gouernour in ſtead of old Ertogrul; caſting their eyes eſpecially
B vpon two, ſtood in doubt of which of them to make choice. For although moſt men were of opinion, that Othoman for the rare gifts and vertues as well of bodie as of minde, was to be preferred before the reſt of his brethren, the ſonnes of Ertogrul: yet were there ſome, and they alſo men of great grauitie and experience, who had in ſuſpect the young mans age, as of it ſelfe ſlipperie, and for moſt part prone to vice, eſpecially in the libertie of great power: and therefore thought it better to make choice of Dunder (Ertogruls brother, and Othomans vncle) a man of far greater grauitie, iudgement, and experience. But Dunder himſelfe, being indeed a wiſe man and far from all ambition, perſwaded them in that choice not to haue any regard at all vnto his honour or preferment, but to conſider what were beſt for their ſtate and welfare in generall. For he prouidently foreſaw in what danger the Oguzian ſtate ſtood, expoſed on the one ſide to the C mortall hatred and trecheries of the Greekes, grieued to ſee themſelues ſpoiled by the Turks, and naturally hating them for the Mahometane religion: and on the other ſide not ſurely backt with the Sultans of ICONIVM, brought in thraldome to the Tartars, and daily growne weaker and weaker: Vnto which inconueniences and dangers (he ſaid) an old weake and ouerworne bodie (as was his) could giue no helpe or remedie at all; but required the helpe of a wiſe, politicke, vigilant, ſtirring, and valiant man, ſuch as they all well knew was Othoman his brothers ſon. Thus before he came vnto the election, he in priuate declared his mind vnto the chiefe of the Oguzian familie: and afterward at their requeſt comming vnto the generall aſſemblie, all mens minds and eyes now fixed vpon Othoman, he firſt of all (by his example to encourage the reſt) for the good of the Oguzian tribe, his ancient houſe and familie, ſaluted him their great lord and gouernour, D promiſing vnto him all loyaltie, with the vttermoſt of his ſeruice: whereunto by and by enſued the great applauſe of the reſt of the people, as vnto a gouernour ſent vnto them by God: vnto whom they ioyfully wiſhed all happie ſucceſſe, with long life, and a moſt proſperous gouernment. Thus with all mens good liking was Othoman made the great gouernour of the Oguzian Turks, and ſo become amongſt them a great commander, and honoured with the name of æſman-Beg, or, the lord Oſman. Yet was this his honour included in a ſmall circuit, plaine and homely, without any great pompe or ſhew, as commanding amongſt rough and rude heardſmen and ſhepheards, not acquainted with the courteſie of other more ciuill nations: for as yet they were the ſame homely Scythian Nomades that they were before, and could not as yet be perſwaded to forſake their wonted rude and vnciuill manners, by long tradition receiued from E their anceſtors, and ſo beſt agreeing with their nature and calling. Amongſt which rude heardſmen, this new gouernour (himſelfe not too farre exceeding the reſt in ciuilitie) commanded much like vnto another Romulus; of whom alſo the Turks report many ſuch things as doe the Romanes of their founder, which for breuitie I thought good to paſſe ouer.

The Oguzian Turks in doubt of whom to make choice for their gouernour.

Now it fortuned that Othoman euen in the beginning of his gouernment, fell firſt at ods with one Hagionicholaus, or S. Nicolas (captaine of EINEGIOL, a caſtle there by) for that he had oftentimes of purpoſe troubled & moleſted theſe Oguzian heardſmen, in paſſing too and fro with their cattell by his caſtle. For which cauſe Othoman was enforced to requeſt the captaine of BILEZVGA (another caſtle there by, alſo his neighbour and friend) that his people in paſſing that way to the mountaines, might with their goods and cattell as occaſion ſhould require, take the F refuge of his caſtle; which the courteous captaine (well acquainted with old Ertogrul, Othomans father) eaſily granted, yet with this prouiſo, that none ſhould with ſuch goods or cattell haue acceſſe into his caſtle, but the Turks women only: which his courteſie Othoman refuſed not. So was the caſtle of BILEZVGA from that time forward a refuge vnto the Turks women, who paſſing that way, and there ſhrowded with their goods & cattell, vſually preſented the captaine with ſome one homely countrey preſent or other, which afterwards was the loſſe of the caſtle.

Yet was not Othoman vnmindfull of the wrong done vnto his people, by his euill neighbour G the captaine of EINEGIOL: but purposing to be thereof reuenged, made choice of seuentie of his best and most able men, whom he appointed secretly to passe the mountaine ORMENIVS, and so if it were possible, to surprise or set on fire his enemies castle. Of which his designement, the warie captaine hauing intelligence by one of his espials, in place conuenient vpon the mountaine laid a strong ambush for the cutting off of such as were by Othoman sent to haue surprised his castle: whereof Othoman (no lesse warie than he) before warned by his scouts, & augmenting the number of his men, marched directly vnto the place where the enemie lay. Where betwixt them (for so small a number) was fought a right cruell and bloudie battell, and many slaine on both sides; amongst whom Hozza, Othomans nephew was one. The victorie neuer- H theless fell vnto Othoman: after which time his people in much more safetie fed their cattell in the Summer time on the mountaines as their manner was, and so in quiet passed to and fro.

The castle of Chalce surprised by Othoman.

Shortly after, Othoman by night surprised the little castle of CHALCE, not far from EINE-GIOL: and there without mercie put to the sword all the Christians he found therein, and so afterwards burnt the castle; which outrage was the beginning and occasion of great troubles thereof ensuing. For the Christians of the countries adioyning, much grieued therewith, and assembling themselues together, complained vnto the captaine of CARA CHIZAR, the greatest commander thereabout, that these Turks, which not many yeeres before were of meere pittie receiued as poore heardsmen into that countrey, began now in warlike manner to lay violent hands vpon the ancient lands and possessions of the Christians; which insolencie (as I they said) if it were longer winked at and suffered by him, and other such men of account and authoritie as were to reforme the same, they would no doubt in short time driue both them, and all the rest of the Christians out of their natiue countries: wherefore it were now high time and more than necessarie for him, and all the rest to awake (as it were) out of the dead sleepe wherein they had long time drousily slept; and ioyning their forces together, to expulse those vnthankfull encroching and merciless strangers out of their countries: The mischiefe they said being now spred far, therefore needed speedie remedie; and that repentance would come too late when it was past cure. The captaine moued with the indignitie of the late fact, and iust complaint of the poore countrey people, sent with all speed a strong companie of souldiers, vnder the leading of Calanus his brother, with commandement that they should march vnto the K castle of EINEGIOL, and there to ioyne with the rest of the Christian forces.

Othoman vnderstanding of this preparation made against him, gathering his souldiers together, marched to a place called OPSICIVM, neere vnto mount TMOLVS in PHRYGIA, where betweene him and the Christians was fought a sharpe battell, wherein he lost his brother Sarugatin (whom the Turks account for a Saint or Martyr at this day) with many other of his soul-diers. In this battell was also Calanus slaine, whose bellie Othoman caused to be ripped, and his intrals to be pulled out, naming the place where he was buried Mesari-Repec, that is to say, the Dog-Graue, by which name the place is at this day knowne. The bodie of his brother Sarugatin he carried to SVGVTA, and there honourably buried it neere to the bodie of his father Er-thogrul. Aladin Sultan of ICONIVM vnderstanding of this conflict, was very sorie for the losse L hapned vnto Othoman, being a Mahometane of his owne religion: wherefore in token of his good will and fauour, he gaue vntō him the citie of PALEAPOLIS, with all the territorie there-unto belonging, giuing vnto him also leaue to besiege, take, or spoile, the signiorie and castle of CARA-CHISAR: for accomplishment whereof, he sent vnto him both souldiers and munition.
Othoman encouraged with this great bountie of the Sultans, straightly besieged the castle of CA-RA-CHISAR; which at last he wan, and slew all the Christians therein: the captaine he tooke aliue, whom he cruelly executed: the spoile of the castle he gaue vnto his souldiers, reseruing only the fift part thereof, which he sent for a present to the Sultan. All this happened in the yeere of our Lord 1290. This castle of CARA-CHISAR, with the rest, as EINEGIOL, BI-LEZVGA, CHALCE, and others before and hereafter in the life of Othoman to be mentioned, M were all situate in the borders of the greater PHRYGIA, or else neere thereunto in the confines of BYTHINIA and MYSIA: In which pleasant countries (but lately part of the Constantinopolitane empire) the Christians the ancient inhabitants thereof yet dwelt, intermingled with the Turks, at the rising of the Othoman empire; with whom they liued at continuall iars, vntill that at length they were by them altogether oppressed and extinguished.

Othoman

A Othoman encouraged with this good ſucceſſe, and ſupported by the great Sultan of ICONIVM, began now after his ambitious nature to conceit greater matters, for the further increaſe of his honor and territorie: yet not truſting altogether to his owne deuiſe, he entred into conſultation with his brother Iundus, which way was beſt to take to diſtreſſe and bring in ſubjection his neighbours the Chriſtians. In which caſe, Iundus a man of greater courage than diſcretion, aduiſed him with all celeritie to vrge his good fortune, and preſently to inuade the Chriſtians alreadie diſcouraged with the loſſe of CARA-CHISAR. But this counſell altogether pleaſed not Othoman for (ſaid he) the caſtles & forts by vs gained, muſt be kept with ſtrong garriſons, otherwiſe they will againe be recouered by the enemie; which garriſons cannot be maintained and
B kept, if we ſpoile or diſpeople the countries adjoyning vpon vs; for in ſo doing wee ſhall (as it were) with our owne hands cut our owne throats: wherfore I thinke it better, that we enter into a league of amitie and friendſhip with the Chriſtians round about vs, which league we wil keep with ſome, or breake with others, as ſhall ſerue beſt for our purpoſe. And according to this reſolution, he made peace indeed with all the Chriſtians, but eſpecially with Michael Coſsi, captaine of HIRMEN-CAIA caſtle, of whō we haue before ſpoken, who afterward ſerued him to great vſe in the mannaging of his wars, and became alſo a renegate of the Mahometane religion. All this Othoman did the rather, becauſe he was then at great variance with one Germean-Ogli (a great man among the Turkes, but one of the Selzuccian familie) who enuying at the riſing of Othoman, ſought by all means poſſible to hinder his greatneſſe, as did alſo the others, his quiet-
C neſſe: which diſcord the Chriſtians liked well, as a meane for them to liue in more reſt by.

Othoman conſulteth with his brother Iundus what courſe to take for the oppreſſing of the Chriſtians his neighbours.

In the meane time, Othoman deuiſed with all carefulneſſe to beautifie and ſtrengthen his new commonweale: and for the greater concourſe of people, built a faire temple in CARA-CHISAR for the exerciſe of the Mahometane religion; appointed markets to be kept in all peaceable maner in his great townes, granting great priuiledges vnto ſuch as reſorted thither, as well Chriſtians as Turks; vſing therein ſuch juſtice, that all ſorts of people without feare in hope of gaine reſorting thither, furniſhed his countrey and townes with all things neceſſarie: yet this care of ciuile pollicie and gouernment, could not ſo withdraw him, but that according to his aſpiring mind, he had alwaies a greater deſire and care to enlarge his poſſeſſions and territorie. Wherefore intending to make a road into BITHINIA, he requeſted Michael Coſsi, the Chriſtian cap-
D tain before mentioned, to deliuer his opinion what was beſt to be done? who ſo politickely directed him in that exploit, that he returned victorious, enriched with great ſpoile and more honor. This road ſo terrified moſt of the Chriſtians thereabouts, that they were loth to giue Othoman any cauſe of offence, for feare leaſt they ſhould by him be ſpoiled.

It fortuned about this time, that the captaines of BILEZVGH & CVPRI-CHISAR falling at ods; he of CVPRI-CHISAR firſt taking vp armes, fiercely inuaded the captaine of BILEZVGA: who thereupon ſent vnto Othoman, to pray his ayd, which he eaſily graunted, and ſo without further delay preſently came vnto him with certeine companies of luſtie tall ſouldiours. By whoſe comming, the captaine of BILEZVGA not a little encouraged and ſtrengthened, ſet vpon his enemie: where betwixt them was made a ſharpe conflict, and diuers on both ſides
E ſlaine: but the victorie by the helpe of Othoman the Turke, at length enclining vnto the BILEZVGIAN, the other vanquiſhed captaine in all haſt fled vnto his owne caſtle. After whom Othoman following, laid ſeige vnto the caſtle, which at length he tooke together with the captaine, whom he cauſed to be preſently ſlaine. It is ſtrange to tell, how proued the lord of BILEZVGA was, to haue ſo reuenged himſelfe of his enemie, and to haue gayned the victorie; although it were indeed gotten, not ſo much by his valour as by the proweſſe of the Turke: for whom and his followers, in token of his thankfulneſſe, he cauſed a great feaſt to be prouided in the countrie thereby, where he honorably entertained them; & in the end of the feaſt, cauſed garments of great price (according to the manner of the Eaſterne nations) to be giuen vnto Oheman, in token of his fauour; and his ſouldiors to be alſo bountifully rewarded: but this was done with F ſuch a preſumptious ſtate and grace as if he had been ſome great prince, offering vnto the common ſouldiors of the Turks, in paſſing by them, his hand to kiſſe, as a great fauour. With which exceeding inſolencie, Othoman was ſo much offended, that he had much adoe to hold his hands from him: yet repreſſing his anger; he in ſecret imparted his diſcontentment vnto his coſin Dunder, his vncle Dunders ſonne; grieuouſly complayning of the intollerable pride of the Chriſtian captaine, and of the diſgrace by him done vnto the Turks, in offring them his hand to kiſſe; requiring his opinon how he were for the ſame to be corrected: who but a little before, being by the ſaid captaine made his lieutenant, franckly told his kinſman, That as then nothing was to be attẽpted againſt him; firſt, for that on the one ſide they had Germean-ogli (a great man amongſt the Selzuccian Turks) their enemie, & round about them beſides they were inuironed with the Chriſtians, whom he ſhould haue all in his neck atonce if he ſhould offer the BILEZVGIAN captaine any wrong. By which anſwere, Othoman perceiuing his coſins great affection towards the Chriſtian captaine, & doubting to haue the miſchiefe he had imagined againſt him, by him reuealed, or at leaſtwiſe hindered; without more adoe ſuddenly taking vp his bow in his hand, with an arrow ſhot him quite thorow, and ſo ſlew him. Michael Coſſi inuiteth Othoman to the mariage of his daughter.

Not long after Michael Coſsi the captaine of HIRMEN-CAIA, Othomans great friend, hauing concluded a mariage betweene a gentleman of that countrey and his daughter, inuited all the Chriſtian captaines of the caſtles thereabouts, requeſting them to come to the mariage; and the rather that ſo they might grow into acquaintance with Othoman, whoſe power began now to grow dreadfull vnto them: hoping that ſuch meanes might be found at that merrie meeting, that all being made friends, euery man might in more ſecuritie poſſeſſe his owne without feare of being ſpoiled by him. Vnto this mariage came all theſe bidden gueſts, bringing with them ſuch preſents as they thought good to beſtow vpon the new maried folkes, according to the maner of the countrey: but Othomans gifts far exceeded all the reſt, who beſides many other rich things, gaue vnto them whole flocks and droues of ſheepe and cattell: which thing drew all the Chriſtian captaines into no little admiration of his bountie; inſomuch that they began to ſay amongſt themſelues, that Othomans wealth and good fortune did portend ſome greater matter, to their vtter ruine and fall; which to preuent, they thought it beſt by ſecret meanes to compaſſe his death. The execution of which deuiſe they referred to the captaine of BILEZVGA, as vnto one with him beſt acquainted. This captaine was of great wealth, credit, and authoritie amongſt the Chriſtian rulers thereabouts, but verie full of craft and diſſimulation: which his euill diſpoſition Othoman of long time well perceiued; yet hauing occaſion to vſe him, in ſubtill manner gaue him (in outward ſhew) all the honour he could, magnifying him in words, and debaſing himſelfe as plaine & poore in compariſon of him. But to giue a beginning to this trecherous deuiſe, the captaine meeting with Othoman, in friendly manner told him, how that he intended ſhortly to marie the daughter of the captaine of IAR-CHISER, earneſtly requeſting him to honor that his marriage with his preſence, of the time wherof, he ſaid he would giue him farther knowledge afterwards: and all was but a colour, to bring Othoman within his danger, not fearing any ſuch treaſon. Othoman vnderſtanding that the time of the mariage drew nigh, ſent thither a preſent of certaine fat oxen & ſheepe, in the name of his brother Iundus, for the captaines prouiſion againſt the mariage; certifying him, That Othoman himſelf, with his ſimple retinue, would be preſent at the mariage, and then preſent him, not with ſuch preſents as were agreeable with his honour, yet ſuch as his poore abilitie could affoord. This meſſage with the preſents, were wonderfull welcome to the captaine, hoping aſſuredly that his deuiſed treacherie would take ſuch effect as he wiſhed. And therefore calling vnto him Michael Coſsi, in whom he had repoſed an eſpeciall truſt, declared vnto him his whole deuiſe (wherof he was not before altogether ignorant,) requeſting him to take the paines to go vnto Othoman to bring him to the marriage, the time being now certainly appointed and at hand; which he knew Coſsi might eaſily do, being of his familiar acquaintãce. And in token of great friendſhip, he ſent vnto Othoman by the ſame meſſenger, a preſent of gilt plate. Coſsi tooke vpon him this meſſage, which whẽ he had deliuered vnto Othoman, he foũd him verie willing to go, as a man not doubting any harme. But Coſsi inwardly grieuing to ſee ſo braue a man, and his kind friend, by ſuch treacherous maner to be brought to his end; moued with compaſſion, diſcouered vnto him the whole conſpiracie of the captaine againſt him, and of the plot laied for his deſtruction, willing him to take heed vnto himſelfe: for which verture, Othoman great Coſsi gaue thankes, as to his friend, for ſauing his life; and withall richly rewarded him, promiſing him greater matters if he would continue that his faithfull friendſhip. Now concerning the captaine of BELIZVOA (ſaith he) at your returne recommend me vnto him, and tell him, That I thinke my ſelfe much bound vnto him for many courteſies, but eſpecially for that he hath heretofore diuers times in moſt friendly manner protected my goods and cattell, within the ſafegard of his caſtle: which his friendſhip I moſt humbly requeſt him to continue for one yeare more, enforced therunto by H I K L M

A reaſon of the dangerous wars betwixt me and the Prince Germean-Ogli, as he well knoweth: wherefore if it might ſo ſtand with his good pleaſure, I would preſently ſend vnto his caſtle ſuch things as I make moſt reckoning of, requeſting him once more to be the faithfull keeper thereof, as he hath beene before: and tell him further, that my mother in law, with her daughter my wife, deſire nothing more than to finde opportunitie to be acquainted with the honourable Ladie his mother; for which cauſe (if it pleaſe him) I will bring them both with me to the marriage. This Othomans requeſt, when the captaine of BILEZVGA vnderſtood by Michael Coſſi, he ſent the ſame Coſſi backe againe to haſten his comming, willing him to bring with him what geſſe he pleaſed; appointing certaine time and place when and where the marriage ſhould be
B ſolemniſed. And becauſe the caſtle of BILEZVGA was thought to be too little conueniently to receiue the multitude of people which were expected at the marriage, there was another open place of greater receipt appointed in the countrey for that purpoſe, about three miles diſtant from the caſtle. The marriage day drew nigh, whereunto Othoman muſt repaire for his promiſe ſake: and therefore prepared with all diligence to ſet forward, and to put in execution what he had deuiſed for the ſafetie of himſelfe, and deſtruction of his enemie. Othoman had of long accuſtomed in dangerous times, to ſend by carriage the beſt of his things, made vp in packs, to be kept in ſafetie in the caſtle of BILEZVGA: vnder the colour whereof, he now made great packs in forme as he was wont; but in ſtead of his rich houſhold ſtuffe, and ſuch other things of price, he thruſt in armed men, couering thoſe packs with homely couerings, ſending them by carria-
C ges to the caſtle of BILEZVGA, giuing charge that they ſhould not come thither before twilight. After that, he apparelled certaine of his beſt ſouldiers in womens apparell, as if it had beene his wife and mother in law, with their women: ſo caſting his iourney, that he with theſe diſguiſed ſouldiers, and the other ſent in packs, might at one inſtant meet at the caſtle aforeſaid. The captaine being now in the countrey, and vnderſtanding that Othoman was comming in the euening with a great traine of gentlewomen; thought the cauſe of his late comming to be, for that the Turkiſh women vſe to ſhun the ſight of Chriſtian men by all meanes they can. Othoman being now come to the place in the countrey where the marriage was next day to be ſolemnized, hauing done his humble reuerence to the captaine, requeſted him to doe him the honour, that his gentlewomen which were nigh at hand, might by his appointment be ſent to his caſtle, there to D haue ſome conuenient lodging where they might alight and beſtow themſelues apart from others, according to the homely faſhion of their nation; leſt peraduenture the preſence of ſo honourable a companie of noblemen and gallants, might put them out of countenance: which the captaine granted, and hauing ſaluted them afarre off after the Turkiſh manner, commanded them to be conueyed to his caſtle, making reckoning of them all as of a rich prey. At the ſame time that theſe diſguiſed ſouldiers arriued at the caſtle, came thither alſo the other ſouldiers couered in packs in the carriages: which ſo ſoone as they were within the caſtle, ſuddenly leapt out of the packs, and drawing their ſhort ſwords, with the helpe of their diſguiſed fellowes, ſlew the warders of the caſtle, and without more adoe poſſeſſed the ſame: the greateſt part of the captaines people being before gone out of the caſtle to the place of the marriage.
E Othoman hauing tarried ſo long with the captaine, as he ſuppoſed the caſtle by that time by his men ſurpriſed; ſo ſoone as the captaine had taken his chamber, ſuddenly tooke horſe, with al his followers, accompanied alſo with Coſſi, taking his way directly to the caſtle of BILEZVGA: of whoſe ſudden departure the captaine vnderſtanding, preſently tooke horſe and purſued him with all his traine, which were for the moſt part drunke; and ouertaking him before he came to the caſtle, ſet vpon him: in which conflict, he was by Othoman ſlaine, and the reſt put to flight.

The captaine of Bilezuga treacherouſly ſeeking the death of Othoman, is by him, himſelfe ſlaine.

The ſame night Othoman vſing great celeritie, earely in the morning ſurpriſed the caſtle of IARCHISAR alſo, where he tooke priſoners the captaine thereof, with his faire daughter Lulufer, (which ſhould haue beene maried to the captaine of BILEZVGA the next day) with all her friends, as they were readie to haue gone to the mariage: which faire Ladie he ſhortly after F maried vnto his eldeſt ſonne Orchanes; who had by her Amurath, third King of the Turks, and Solyman Baſſa.

Othoman omitting no opportunitie, preſently ſent one of his captaines called Durgut-Alpes, a man of great eſteeme and valour, to beſiege the caſtle of EINEGIOL: wherein he vſed ſuch celeritie, that preuenting the fame of that was done at BILEZVGA, he ſuddenly inuironed the caſtle, in ſuch ſort that none could paſſe in or out; vntill ſuch time, as that Othoman hauing brought

brought his prisoners and prey to the castle of BELIZVGA, and there hauing set all things in good order, came with the rest of his men of warre to EINEGIOL; which he presently by force tooke, promising the spoile thereof vnto his souldiers. The captaine called Hagio-Nicholaus his ancient enemie, he caused to be cut in small peeces, and all the men to be slaine: which crueltie he vsed, because they a little before had vsed the like tyrannie against his Turks. G

Othoman by administration of iustice strengtheneth his gouernment.

When Othoman had thus got into his subiection a great part of the strong castles and forces of the greater PHRYGIA, with the territorie to them belonging, he began with all carefulnesse to make good lawes, and to execute iustice to all his subiects, as well Christians as Turks: with great indifferencie studying by all meanes to keepe his countrey in peace and quietnesse, and to protect his subiects from the spoile of others, as well Christians as Turks: whereby it came to passe, that the old inhabitants which for the most part had forsaken the countrey, by reason of the great troubles therein, repaired now againe to their ancient dwellings; and not only they, but many other strangers also, supplying the places of them whom the late warres had consumed. So that by his good gouernment, that wasted countrey in short time grew to be againe very populous. H

The citie of Nice besieged by Othoman.

The ciuill gouernment of his countrey well established, he besieged the citie of ISNICA, in ancient time called NICE, a citie of BYTHINIA, famous for the generall Councell there holden against Arius in the time of Constantine the Great. This citie he brought into great distresse, by placing his men of warre in forts new built vpon euery passage and way leading vnto the same, so that nothing could be brought out of the countrey for the relieue of the poore citizens. I They in this extremitie, by a secret messenger certified the Emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE (vnder whose obedience they were) in what distresse the citie stood; and that except he sent them present relieue, they must of necessitie either perish with famine, or yeeld themselues into the hands of their enemies the Turks. The Emperour moued with the pitifull complaint of this messenger, with all expedition embarked certaine companies of souldiers from CONSTANTINOPLE to relieue his besieged citie. But Othoman vnderstanding by his espials where these souldiers were appointed to land, in secret manner withdrawing most of his forces from the siege, lay in ambush neere vnto the same place where the Emperours souldiers (casting no perill) landed: who before they could put themselues in order of battell, were by Othoman and his Turks in such sort charged, that most part of them were there slaine, and the rest driuen into the sea, where they miserably perished. Othoman hauing thus politikely ouerthrowne the Constantinopolitan souldiers, returning to the siege, continued the same in straighter manner than before. The besieged citizens driuen into great penurie, and now despairing of all helpe, yeelded themselues with the great and rich citie of NICE into the hands of Othoman, with the spoile whereof he greatly enriched his men of warre. K

Aladin the great Sultan of ICONIVM, glad to heare of this good successe of Othoman against the Christians, in token of his fauour and loue, sent vnto him a faire ensigne, with certaine drums, and trumpets, a sword, and princely robe, with large charters, That whatsoeuer he tooke from the Christians should be all his owne; and also that publike praiers should be said in all the Turks temples, in the name of Othoman, for his health and prosperous estate: which two things properly belonged to the dignitie of the Sultan. These extraordinarie fauours gaue occasion for many to thinke, that Sultan Aladin (hauing no children) intended to make Othoman his adoptiue sonne and successour in his kingdome. L

The presents and charters sent him, Othoman humbly accepted, sending vnto Aladin the fift part of the spoile of NICE, taken from the Christians; but the princely honors due vnto the Sultan onely, he vsed not during the life of Aladin: intending not long after to haue gone himselfe in person to visit the Sultan, and so to haue growne into his further fauour. But hauing prepared all things for so honourable a iourney, at what time as he was about to set forward, he was certainly informed of the death of Aladin; and that Sahib (one of his great counsellors) had taken vpon him the dignitie of the Sultan (as is before declared:) which newes much discontented the aspiring mind of this Oguzian Turke, in good hope to haue succeeded him in the kingdome, or at leastwise to haue shared the greatest part thereof vnto himselfe, whereof he was now altogether disappointed. Yet immediatly after the death of Aladin, he thought it now fit time to take vpon him the princely honours before granted vnto him by the Sultan in his life time, which he for modestie sake had forborne, Aladin yet liuing: wherefore he made one Dursu surnamed M

A named Fakiche (that is to say, a man learned in the Turkish law) Bishop and Iudge of CARA-CHISAR, commanding the publike praiers which were wont to be made for the health and prosperous raigne of the great Sultan, to be now made in his own name; which was first openly done by the said Bishop in the pulpit of CARA-CHISAR. At the same time he began also to coine money in his owne name, and to take vpon him all other honours belonging vnto a Sultan or King: which was about ten yeeres after the death of his father Ertogrul, and in the yeere of our Lord 1300, vnto which time the beginning of the great empire of the Turks is vnder the 1300 fortune of this Othoman, to be of right referred, as then by him thus begun.

When Othoman had thus taken vpon him the maiestie of a King, he made his sonne Orchanes
B Prince and gouernour of CARA-CHISAR; promoting his principall followers, to be gouernours of other strong castles and forts, diuers of which places retaine the name of those captaines at this day. He himselfe made choice of the citie NEAPOLIS, about twentie miles from NICE, to seat his regall palace in, where also diuers of his nobilitie built them houses, and changed the name of the citie, calling it DESPOTOPOLIS, as who should say, the citie of the Lord or Prince. For all this, Othoman ceased not to deuise by all meanes he could, to augment his kingdome: and for that cause being accompanied with his sonne Orchanes, made many rodes into the countries adioyning vpon him, surprizing such places as might best serue his purpose, for the enlargement of his kingdome, all which in particular to rehearse were tedious.

Neapolis the first regall citie of the Othoman Kings.

The Christian Princes, rulers of the countries bordering vpon this new kingdome, fearing
C lest the greatnesse of Othoman might in short time be their vtter confusion, agreed to ioyne all their forces together, and so to commit to the fortune of one great battell their owne estates with his: according to which resolution, the Christian confederate Princes, which were for the most part of MYSIA and BYTHINIA, leuying the greatest forces they were able to make, with fire and sword inuaded Othomans kingdome. Who hauing knowledge beforehand of this great preparation made against him, had in a readinesse all his captaines and men of warre: and hearing that his enemies had entred his dominion, in warlike manner marched directly towards them; and meeting with them in the confines of PHRYGIA & BYTHINIA, fought with them a great and mortall battell, wherein many were slaine on both sides, as well Turks as Christians: and after a long fight, obtained of them a right bloudie victorie. In this battell Castoleanus, D one of the greatest Christian captaines was slaine: another called Tekensis of the country which he gouerned in PHRYGIA, chased by Othoman vnto the castle of VLVBAD, not farre distant from the place where the battel was fought, was for feare deliuered vnto him by the captaine of the same castle, and was afterward by Othomans commandement most cruelly cut in pieces, within the view of his chiefe castle: which Othoman afterward subdued, with all the countrey thereabouts. The other Christian Princes and captaines saued themselues by flying into stronger holds farther off. The Prince of BYTHINIA, the chiefe author of this warre, fled into the strong citie of PRVSA, which the Turks now call BVRVSA, whither Othoman not long after led his armie, in good hope to haue won the same: but finding it not possible to be taken by force, began presently at one time to build two great and strong castles vpon the chiefe passages
E leading to the citie, which castles he with great industrie finished in one yeere: and in the one placed as captaine Aktemeur his nephew, in the other one Balabanzuck, both men of great courage, and skilfull in feats of warre: and in this sort hauing blocked vp the citie of PRVSA, so that little or nothing could without great danger be brought into it, he subdued the most part of BYTHINIA; and so returned home, leauing the two castles well manned with strong garrisons, vnder the charge of the captaines beforenamed.

Prusa besieged by Othoman.

Othoman returning home to NEAPOLIS, honourably rewarded his souldiers, according to their deserts, establishing such a quiet and pleasing gouernment in his kingdome, that people in great number resorted from far into his dominions, there to seat themselues: whereby his kingdome became in few yeeres exceeding populous, and he for his politicke gouernment most fa-
F mous. And so liuing in great quietnesse certaine yeeres, being now become aged & much troubled with the gout; his old souldiers accustomed to liue by the wars, abhorring peace, came vnto him, requesting him as it were with one voice, to take some honourable war in hand for the inlarging of his kingdome, with great cheerefulnes offring to spend their liues in his seruice rather than to grow old in idlenesse: which forwardnesse of his men of war greatly pleased him, and so giuing them thanks, for that time dismissed them, promising that he would not be long vnmind-

full of their requeſt. But yet thinking it good to make all things ſafe at home before he tooke G any great wars in hand abroad, thought it expedient to call vnto him Michael Coſſi, the onely Chriſtian captaine whom for his great deſerts he had at all times ſuffered to liue in quiet with his poſſeſſions, as it were in the heart of his kingdome; and by faire meanes (if it might be) to perſwade him to forſake the Chriſtian religion, & to become a follower of Mahomets, ſo to take away all occaſion of miſtruſt: which if he ſhould refuſe to doe, then forgetting all former friendſhip, to make warre vpon him as his vtter enemie. Whereupon Coſſi was ſent for, being per-ſwaded by the meſſenger, that Othoman had ſent for him becauſe he had occaſion to vſe his wonted faithfull counſell and ſeruice in a great exploit which he had intended, as he had oftentimes before. Coſſi thinking of nothing leſſe than of that which enſued, came accompanied with H ſuch ſouldiers as he thought to vſe in that ſeruice: But comming vnto Othoman, and vnderſtan-Michael Coſſi turneth Turke. ding the very cauſe why he was ſent for, and ſeeing danger imminent on euery ſide, kiſſing Otho- mans hand, after the manner of the Turks, requeſted him in courteous manner to enter him in the principles of the Mahometane religion, which he promiſed euer after to embrace: And ſo ſaying certaine words after Othoman, he turned Turke, to the great diſpleaſure of God, and the contentment of Othoman and his nobilitie. For which his reuolting, Othoman preſently gaue him an enſigne and a rich robe, tokens whereby the Mahometane Sultans aſſure their vaſſales of their fauour and the vndoubted poſſeſſion of ſuch land and liuing as they then hold.

Oftentimes after this, Othoman for the contenting of his ſouldiers inuaded the countries bordering vpon him, tooke many ſtrong caſtles and forts, ſubdued the moſt part of PHRYGIA, I MISIA, and BYTHINIA, and other great regions, vnto the Euxine ſea: and being now very aged, and diſeaſed as is aforeſaid with the gout, and thereby vnable to goe into the field in per-ſon himſelfe, oftentimes ſent his ſonne Orchanes againſt his enemies; who to the imitation of his father atchieued many great enterpriſes, Othoman his father yet liuing.

Now happily might the conſiderate reader (and not without iuſt cauſe) maruell, what dead ſleepe had ouerwhelmed the Greeke Emperors of thoſe times; firſt Michael Paleologus, and afterward his ſonne Andronicus, both men of great valour, and ſtill reſiant at CONSTANTINO-PLE, thus to ſuffer the Turks (not Othoman, for he as yet bare no ſway, but others the ſharers of Sultan Aladins kingdome) to take their cities, ſpoile their countries, kill their ſubiects, and daily to incroach vpon them in the leſſer ASIA, and eſpecially in BYTHINIA, ſo neere vnto them, K and as it were euen vnder their noſes: But let him, with me, here as in a moſt conuenient place but breath a little, and conſider the troubled eſtate of that declining empire, now haſting to an end; and he ſhall plainly ſee the cauſes of the decay thereof, and how like an old diſeaſed bodie quite ouerthrowne and ſicke to death, it became at length a prey vnto the aſpiring Turks. Mi- chael Paleologus hauing by great trecherie obtained the Greeke empire, and by rare fortune re-couered alſo the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE from Baldwin the Emperour (as is in the former part of this Hiſtorie declared) fearing the power of the Princes of the Weſt, but eſpecially of Charles King of SICILIA, then a Prince of great fame & power, whom he knew Baldwin (the late Emperour) ceaſed not to ſollicite for the reſtitution of him againe into his empire, and to haue alſo ioyned with him a neere bond of affinitie, by marrying his daughter vnto Charles his L ſon: to auert this danger, and to intangle Charles with troubles neere home, he by his embaſſa-dours offered vnto Gregorie the tenth, then Biſhop of ROME, to vnite and conforme the Greeke church vnto the Latine, & to acknowledge the Biſhops ſupremacie, in ſuch ſort, as that it ſhould be lawfull for any man to appeale vnto the court of ROME, as vnto the higher and more excellent court: of which his offer the Pope gladly accepted, promiſing to performe what he had be-Alteration of religion in the Greeke church. fore requeſted, for the keeping of Charles otherwiſe buſied. But when it came to the point, that this reformation and alteration of religion in the Greeke church ſhould be made, Ioſeph the Patriarch, to begin withall, gaue vp his place, & ſhortly after forſaking the citie, retired himſelfe into a monaſterie neere vnto the ſtrait of BOSPHORVS, where he at quiet deuoutly ſpent the remainder of his life. The reſt of the clergie alſo diſcõtented with this innouation, in their ſermons M openly inuaighed againſt it, perſwading the people not to receiue it, crying out, That now was come the time of their triall, the time of their martyrdome, and the time wherein they were to receiue the glorious crowne of their painfull ſuffrings: inſomuch, that great tumults were thereupon raiſed, and all the citie and the countrey in an vprore: for it was not the clergie only, and the vulgar people by them moued, which diſliked and abhorred theſe the Emperours procedings,

A dings,and made theſe ſtirs, but many of the better ſort,yea of the chiefe magiſtrates themſelues alſo. So that Michael Paleologus, the emperour leauing all other forraine buſineſſe, was inforced to conuert al his power and ſtudie vnto the appeaſing of theſe domeſticall troubles,as deeming them of greater danger than his was abroad.And firſt to perſuade his diſcontented ſubjects,he told them, That this alteration was made, not for any good liking he had thereunto, but in reſpect of the dangerouſneſſe of the time:and that it was a ponit of wiſedome,to foreſee dangers hanging ouer our heads,and not to delay,if any thing were to be altered,for the auerting therof: for if the enemies as he ſaid ſhould come,the citie yet in many places rent, or but lately repaired,& as it were but newly raiſed from death to life; the preſent miſchiefes would be far greater
B than thoſe forepaſſed,and that then their enemies would become lords, not of their religion & ceremonies onely, but of all at once,their wiues, their children, and whatſoeuer elſe they had: where their liberty changed into bondage,they ſhould be conſtrained to conforme themſelues not with their bodily ſeruice only, but euen with their minds alſo, vnto the wils of the Latines their enemies.And that ſo it would come to paſſe, that no man ſhould be able to keepe the old cuſtomes and manners of his anceſtors, but ſhould ſee euen their moſt ſacred rites and ceremonies changed and quite ouerthrowne: Which he carefully foreſeeing, had not(as he ſaid)refuſed to yeeld vnto neceſſitie,and as wiſdome would,neglected a little harme in reſpect of a greater benefit; and in the leſſe, to haue yeelded vnto his enemies, to enjoy the benefit of the greater.With which the emperours perſuaſion,ſome were mooued,& ſo held themſelues contented: and ſome others not; againſt whom he was enforced to vſe other more ſeuere remedies, as againſt his rebellious ſubjects:of whom,ſome he impriſoned,ſome he baniſhed,ſome he tortured, ſome he diſmembred, ſome he depriued of their ſight, or confiſcated their goods,vſing (in briefe) all the meanes whereby the minds of the reſolute or the weake were to be mooued. Perſecution in the Greeke Church for matters of Religion.
All which things,they whoſe zeale was grounded vpon knowledge(in number the feweſt)with patience endured:but the greater part void of judgement, and the refuſe of the people in ſimple attire,ran roguing abroad, ſome into PELOPONESVS,ſome into THESSALIA, ſome into ACHAIA, & ſome as far as COLCHOS,as men perſecuted for their conſcience,not regarding greatly whether,ſo it were out of the Emperors juriſdiction,and ſomething fitting their owne humors;neither conforming themſelues vnto the religion then commonly by the Emperour eſtabliſhed, D neither yet agreeing among themſelues, but taking vnto them diuers names, ſome as the diſciples of Arſenius,ſome of Ioſeph,& ſome of others;ſome of them,themſelues deceiued,and deceiuing others alſo. Thus for the auoiding of forraine danger out of the Weſt, was the Empire at home no little indangered, and the ſtate thereof ſhaken. Wherewith the Emperour was ſo encõbred, as that he had no leiſure to prouide for the tempeſt ariſing by the Turks out of the Eaſt, but was inforced wholly to imploy himſelfe & all his indeuours vnto the keeping of his people and ſubjects in their due obedience at home. All whoſe deepe deuiſes,firſt in aſpiring vnto the empire, (no way vnto him due) and great trauels afterwards for the aſſuring of the ſame vnto himſelfe and his poſteritie,againſt all right,euen with the alteration of the religion of his fathers, yeelded him in the winding vp of all,not ſo much,as the credit of an honourable ſepulture. But E dying in theſe troubles not far from LISIMACHIA, as hee was making preparation againſt the prince of THESSALIE, was there by his ſonne Andronicus his commandement (for whoſe aduancement he had ſtrained both his faith & honour) obſcurely buried in the field, a good way from his campe;as vnworthie of a better ſepulture, for reuolting from the antient religion of his anceſtors, although his obſequies were for faſhion ſake afterwards with ſome ſolemnitie celebrated. This was the end of the great emperour Michael Paleologus, in whoſe time the Turks,the ſucceſſors of Aladin,greatly incroched vpon him in the leſſer ASIA, as is in part before declared:a man greatly adorned with the good gifts both of the bodie and the mind, had he not for the aduancement of himſelfe & his poſteritie,ſtained the ſame with foule trecherie & apoſtaſie: for which(as ſome ſay) he euer after liued in conſcience troubled, and dying, was euen by his F owne ſonne not thought worthie of an honourable funerall. A notable example vnto all ſuch as with greedineſſe ſeeke after vaine glorie,and fooliſhly expoſe themſelues vnto ſuch aduentures, as oftentimes ouerwhelme their deepeſt deuiſes, hauing in themſelues no certainetie: preferring their inordinat deſires (either for themſelues or their poſteritie) before that which is good and vertuous: Twice wretched in ſo doing: firſt in their folly, and then in their indeuours. Who beſide that they finde God himſelfe aga inſt their deſignes and purpoſes, they by and by alſo euidently meet with other things than what they had forecasted, contrarie vnto them; and so themselues oftentimes, contrarie to their expe- G ctation, cast headlong into extreame miserie: for loe, euen he of whom wee now speake, otherwise a man of great wisdome, and happie in his doings, ouercome with his affection towards his children, in desiring to leaue vnto them the empire, when as he ought to haue cast all the care both of himselfe and of them, especially vpon the prouidence of God; he like a blind man following his owne deepe conceits, not grounded vpon the feare of God but mans wisdome only, cast himselfe before he was aware into miserable troubles, and became odious euen vnto his subiects, and them also for whom he had so forgot himselfe. For wher as God had euen from his childhood alotted vnto him the Empire (as was by many euident signes and tokens to haue bin gathered) if he could haue moderated his vntimely desires, kept his tongue from periurie, and his hands from blood, and not turned out of the way after strange doctrine; he had by many degrees ex- H celled euen the best Emperours his predecessors: whereas now he lieth obscurely buried, shrouded in the sheet of defame, the report of his foule and faithlesse dealings far exceeding all his other worthy vertues.

Andronicus Paleologus succeeding his father in the empire, and thinking by restoring againe the gouernment of the church, together with the rites and customes of the Greeks, to haue appeased all such troubles as were before by his father raised, by bringing in those of the Latines; found himselfe therein much deceiued, and his troubles no lesse than his fathers: they which had before receiued the Latine customes, and well liking of them, with great obstinacie defending the same: and the other of the contrarie faction now countenanced by the emperor, without modestie or measure insulting vpon them: wherof arose exceeding great stirs and troubles, especially in the beginning of his raigne: to the great benefit of the encroaching Turks, who in I the meane time ceased not by all meanes to increase their territories in Asia; and not onely there, but in the islands of the Mediterranean sea also. For Andronicus, by the death of Charles king of Sicilie, deliuered of the greatest feare, for which both he and his father before him had to their great cost and charge both built and maintained a strong fleet of gallies; now perswaded by some, whose actions and speeches were after the manner of the court, all framed vnto the princes appetite, (as the readiest way to thriue, without respect of the cõmon good) to spare that needlesse charge (as they tearmed it) which yearely cost him more than any other thing else: had discharged all his mariners & sea men, and commanded all the gallies to be laied vp, some in one creeke, some in another; where neglected & not looked vnto, they in time for most part rotted and perished. As for the mariners they went some one way, some another, as their K fortunes lead them, to seeke for their liuings in forreine countries, euen with the Emperours enemies; and some gaue themselues to husbandrie, thinking it better by doing something to liue, than by sitting still to perish: which good husbandrie at the first seemed to be verie profitable vnto the emperour, but especially vnto such as being neere vnto him, and couetously giuen, made small reckoning of all other the most necessarie defences of the empire, in comparison of hoording vp of money, vntil that it was afterwards too late by experience found hereof to haue sprung many great mischiefes, vnto the great weakning of the Greeke empire. For besides that the Turkes without let, did great harme on the sea; the pirates now out of feare of the Emperours gallies, at their pleasure tooke the spoile of the rich Islands in the Mediteranian, and robbed the townes all along the sea coast, to the vnspeakable griefe of the poore countrie people. L
And yet not so contented, came with their gallies sometime two, sometime three, & sometime moe as it were in contempt, euen close vnto the imperiall citie. Yea the Venetians were so bold as vpon a right small displeasure to rifle and afterward to set fire vpon the suburbes thereof, which they would hardly haue aduentured, had the Emperours fleet bene preserued and maintained in the woonted strength.

At the same time also, Andronicus the Emperour (to the great hinderance of the affaires of the Empire, and aduantage of the forreine enemie) was not a little troubled with a jealous suspition of his brother Constantine (commonly called Porphyrogenitus) as if he had sought to haue aspired vnto the Empire; seeking by all meanes to win vnto himselfe the loue and fauour of all men, but especially of the nobilitie both at home & abroad, and so by that meanes to mount M vnto the height of his desires: All which (as most men thought) were but meere slanders, maliciously deuised by such as enuying at his honor, and taking occasion by the emperours suspition, ceased not to increase the same, vntill they had wrought his vnworthie destruction. The first ground of this false suspition in the Emperours head, was for that this Constantine was euen from his childhood, for many causes, better beloued of the old Emperour his father than Andronicus,

A dronicus, as better furniſhed with thoſe gifts of nature which beautifie a Prince, and of a more courteous behauiour than was his brother: inſomuch, that had he not beene the younger brother, his father could willingly haue left him his ſucceſſour in the empire. This was one and the chiefeſt cauſe of the Emperours grudge, and the ground of his ſuſpition. Yet was there another alſo, and that not much leſſe than this: for that his father in his life time had of long thought to haue ſeparated from the empire a great part of THESSALIA and MACEDONIA, and to haue made him abſolute Prince thereof; and had happily ſo done, had he not beene by death preuented: which thing alſo much grieued Andronicus, and the more incenſed him againſt his brother. Which his ſecret hatred he for all that according to his wiſdome, cunningly diſſem-
B bled, not only during the time that his father liued, but three yeeres after his death alſo, making ſhew of the greateſt loue and kindneſſe towards him, that was poſſible. Conſtantine in the meane time, of ſuch great reuenues as were by his father aſſigned vnto him, reaping great profit, moſt bountifully beſtowed the ſame vpon his followers and fauourites, and others that made ſute vnto him, as well the meaner ſort as the greater, and with his ſweet behauiour won vnto him the hearts of all men: for affabilitie and courteſie in high degree eaſily allureth mens minds, as doe faire flowers in the ſpring the paſſengers eyes. This was that precept of the wiſe Indians, That the higher a Prince was in dignitie, and the more courteous he ſhewed himſelfe vnto his inferiours, the better he ſhould be of them beloued. He therefore that ſhould for the two firſt cauſes blame Conſtantine, ſhould doe him wrong; as both proceeding not of himſelfe, but of his fathers
C too much loue: but in the third he was not altogether blameleſſe; for if for want of experience he prodigally gaue ſuch gifts, as for the moſt part might haue beſeemed the Emperour himſelfe, he ignorantly erred, yet did he no little offend: but if he knew, that for his too profuſe bountie he could not be vnſuſpected of his brother, and yet without regard held on that courſe, he was greatly to be blamed therein. For if nothing elſe might haue moued him, yet he ſhould haue conſidered, to what end the like doings of others in former times had ſorted, and how many it had brought to vntimely end. So although perhaps that Conſtantine meant no harme vnto his brother, or any way to ſupplant him, yet did theſe things not a little increaſe and aggrauate the former ſuſpitions, and open the eares of the Emperour his brother vnto ſuch calumniation as commonly attendeth vpon immoderate bountie. But to returne vnto our purpoſe. This ho-
D nourable Conſtantine then liued in LYDIA, but lately married, and in good hope long to liue, being not paſt thirtie yeeres old: but pleaſantly ſpending the time with his wife at NYMPHEA in LYDIA, at ſuch time as he was thus ſecretly accuſed vnto his brother, the Emperor thought it good, as vpon other occaſions of buſineſſe, to paſſe ouer into ASIA himſelfe; but indeed with a ſecret reſolution, vpon the ſudden to oppreſſe his brother vnawares, as by proofe it fell out. For at his comming ouer, Conſtantine fearing nothing leſſe, was forthwith apprehended, with all his greateſt fauourites, of whom one Michael Strategopulus (ſometime a man in great authoritie with the Emperour his father, and of all other for wealth, honour, and noble acts moſt famous) was chiefe: who together with Conſtantine were faſt clapt in priſon, where we will leaue them euery houre looking to die, their lands and goods being before confiſcated. But E theſe worthie men, eſpecially Conſtantine and Strategopulus, thus laid faſt; who many times in great battels diſcomfited the Turks, and notably defended the frontiers of the Empire alongſt the Eaſt ſide of the riuer MEANDER; they now finding none to withſtand them, forraged not only all the rich countrey beyond the riuer, but with an infinite multitude paſſing the ſame, did there great harme alſo: ſo that there was no remedie, but that the Emperour muſt of neceſſitie make choice of ſome other worthie captaine for the defence of thoſe his cities and countries, by the incurſion of the Turks then in danger in that part of ASIA.

Immoderate bountie in great men dangerous.

There was then in the Emperours court one Alexius Philanthropenus, a right valiant and renowned captaine, and then in the flower of his youth; of him the Emperour thought good to make choice for the defence of thoſe frontiers of his empire in ASIA (againſt the Turks) which F were before the charge of his brother Conſtantine and Strategopulus; ioyning vnto him one Libadarius, an old famous captaine, and a man of great experience alſo: appointing vnto him the gouernment of the cities of IONIA; and vnto the other, the frontiers along the winding bankes of MEANDER. Where Alexius hauing now gotten a charge worthie his valour, and in many great conflicts with the Turks ſtil carying away the victorie, became in ſhort time of great fame: beſides that, he was exceeding bountifull and courteous vnto all men; a coſtly, but a readie way vnto dangerous credit & renowne. Thus at the first all things prospered in his hand according G to his hearts desire: yea the Turks themselues, bordering vpon him, hardly beset on the one side by the Tartars, and on the other by himselfe; and yet not so much feared with their enemies behind them, as moued with his courtesie, came ouer vnto him with their wiues and children, and serued themselues (many of them) in his campe. But as they say, That in Iupiters court no man might drinke of the tun of blisse, but that he must taste also of the tun of woe: so fell it out with this great captaine; who hauing but tasted of the better tun, had the worse all poured full vpon his head. For Libadarius seeing all so prosper with him, and somewhat enuying thereat, began to feare and suspect, lest he proud of his good fortune, and now growne very strong, casting off his allegeance, should aspire vnto the empire, and so first begin with him, as the neerest vnto him: H which thing many of the nobilitie secretly surmised also, but how truly many doubt. But this enuious plot was not yet ripe, but lay as fire raked vp in the ashes. Now there was with Alexius Philanthropenus, certain companies of Cretensians, whom for their good seruice and fidelitie he both honored and trusted aboue others, vsing them all for the guard of his owne person. These men proud of their credit, hearing of the surmised aspiring of their Generall, and in hope by his aduancement to raise their owne fortunes also, ceased not continually to suggest vnto him high conceits of himselfe, and to perswade him with all speed to take the matter vpon him; the very conceit whereof (as they said) would be vnto him no lesse danger, than if he should enter into the action it selfe, as he might well see by the wofull examples of the noble Constantine and Stra- tegopulus, both in extreame perill, but for the iealous conceit surmised against them. Which I quicke suggestions wrought in his great mind diuers, and those most contrary motions; so that he scarce knew himselfe what he would or would not. For they which are vnto themselues in con- science guiltie of any grieuous crime, if any mischiefe hang ouer their heads therefore, it happeneth vnto them, as foreknowing and expecting the same euen from the time that they offended: vnto whom, if nothing else, yet that same very foreknowledge easeth not a little the griefe and miserie: whereas contrariwise, they which are with sudden mischiefes and vnlooked for, ouerwhelmed, not knowing any iust cause why, must needs stand as men dismaied, and almost beside themselues. But at length after diuers great conflicts with himselfe, the euill perswaders of rebellion, preuailed with him. Yet did he at the first forbid any mention to be made of him in the armie as Emperour, which caused the Cretensians, the chiefe authors of his rebellion, almost to force him forthwith to take vpon him the K imperiall ornaments, thereby to confirme the minds of his followers and fauourites: for that such resolutions were (as they said) to be forthwith put into execution; neither that any thing required so ioynt celeritie and dexteritie both of the minde and the hand; and for that longer delay would but fill his souldiers heads with doubts, and discourage them with the feare of the vncertaintie of the euent: all which for all that moued him not so to doe; but whether for feare of the greatnesse of the danger, or for that he secretly thought how first to circumuent Libada- rius, of whom he stood most in doubt, is vncertaine. The report of all which his doings and designes were in short time carried first vnto Libadarius, as the neerest, and so in post vnto the Emperour: who were therewith not a little both disquieted. And had Alexius (as some perswaded him) at the first set vpon Libadarius, then vnprouided, no doubt but he had done much: L but God by whom all Princes raigne, and whose power confoundeth the deuices of the proud, turned him from Libadarius, by whom he was to be oppressed, to follow after Theodorus the Emperours brother, of whom he was to haue feared no harme. This Theodorus, the first man that Alexius shot at, warned by his brother Constantine his harmes, then liued a pleasant priuate life in LYDIA, far from the ambition of the court, and therefore so much the more beloued of the Emperour: but Alexius fearing lest in that hurle many should resort vnto him, as vnto the Emperours brother, and so hinder his proceedings; thought best first to make him sure, and afterward to oppresse Libadarius, not aware, that in stead of the bodie he followed but after the shadow. But Libadarius, as a man of great experience, taking the benefit of this his ouersight, and knowing money to be the sinewes of warre, gathered together all the coine he possibly could, M both of his owne and his friends, sending also for the Emperours treasures to PHILADEL-PHIA; and with all speed raised the greatest power he possibly could out of IONIA, which he furnished with all things necessarie, promising vnto his souldiers great matters, and filling them with greater hopes, and that within ten daies he would with a great armie meet the rebell in the heart of LYDIA, and there dare him battell. But withall considering, that the Cretensians, men

but

Alexius Philanthropenus aspireth.

Libadarius opposeth himselfe against the proceedings of Philanthropenus.

A but of a mercenarie faith, had alwaies the guard of Alexius his perſon, he thought good to make proofe if they might with gold be woon to batray him: and ſo well wrought the matter by great ſummes of money preſently giuen, and promiſes of greater preferments with the emperour, that they (ſomwhat before diſcontented with Alexius his ſlackeneſſe, and now doubting alſo his ſucceſſe) yeelded vnto his deſire, promiſing in the beginning of the battell to deliuer him into his hands; which they ſhortly after in the very joyning of the battel, accordingly performed, deliuering him faſt bound vnto Libadarius his enemie. Who not a little proud thereof, vſed him with great inſolencie, and within three daies after put out his eyes, for feare the emperour according to his courteous nature ſhould haue giuen him his pardon; and ſo kept him in priſon vntill the B emperours pleaſure were farther knowne. Thus through falſe ſuſpect and ambition were the greateſt champions of the Greeke empire brought to confuſion.

Now after this rebellion of Philanthropenus; Andronicus became ſo jealous of his owne people, as that he wiſt not whō to truſt, repoſing greater cōfidence in ſtrangers than in his own ſubiects, to the great hurt of his eſtate. At the ſame time it fortuned that the Meſſagets (commonly called Alani) which then dwelt beyond ISTER, being Chriſtians, but oppreſſed by the Europian Tartars, wearie of their ſlauerie, ſent ſecretly vnto the Greeke Emperor Andronicus; offering that if he would aſſigne vnto them a conuenient place for them to dwell in, they would come ouer vnto him with ten thouſand of their families, and faithfully ſerue him in his warres againſt the Turks (who then grieuouſly waſted his countries in ASIA, deſtitute of good
C captaines and commanders) which their offer he gladly accepted, as ſtanding then in need of aid, and not greatly truſting his owne people. But when theſe Maſſagets, in number aboue ten thouſand, comming ouer with their wiues and children, were to be furniſhed with all things, and eſpecially the men with horſes, armour, and pay, all which the Emperor could not of himſelfe doe; the ſubiects were therewith hardly charged, and commiſſion ſent out into euery countrey and prouince for the taking vp of horſes and armour: euery citie, euery countrey towne and village, euery gentlemans houſe and poore mans cottage, was ſearched and ranſacked, and all things taken from them that was there found fit for ſeruice, to their great diſcontentment: euery man murmuring and grudging to haue his armes taken from him, and giuen to ſtrangers. But when they were alſo to be contributers vnto their pay, they then openly curſed
D and banned them, euen vnto their faces. Yet at length (though with much adoe) theſe ſtrangers well furniſhed with all things neceſſarie, were with ſome other forces alſo ſhipped ouer into ASIA, vnder the leading of Michael Paleologus the Emperours eldeſt ſonne, and then his companion in the empire. Who marching alongſt the countrey, came and encamped about MAGNESIA: where the Turks at the firſt, after their wonted manner, retired themſelues into the high mountaines and thicke woods, that from thence they might more ſafely learne what ſtrength their new come enemies were of, and what diſcipline of warre they kept: for they knew that vpon the comming of great armies, many falſe reports did run, and that things were made farre greater than indeed they were; as did of theſe alſo, as of a people inuincible: and therfore they thought it beſt ſo to protract the time, vntill they might ſee in what ſort beſt to deale with them.
E But ſo houering ouer their heads, and perceiuing them oftentimes without order to roame abroad into the countrey ſeeking after prey, (for why, they after the manner of mercenarie men ſpoiled their friends no leſſe than if they had beene their enemies) they came downe in good order from the mountaines, from whence at the firſt they aduentured but a little: but afterward they came on further and with greater confidence, in ſuch ſort, as that it ſeemed they would ere long aſſault the young Emperour in his campe. Wherewith he with the reſt diſcouraged, without any ſtroke giuen, retired; the Turks ſtill following him at the heeles. For neither he, neither the reſt, any thing conſidered the ſmall number of their enemies: but as drunken men whoſe heads filled with groſſe vapours, are deceiued in the greatneſſe of the obiect that they ſee, and oftentimes thinke one thing to be two; ſo were they alſo in like manner with their owne feare
F blinded. Beſide that, moſt commonly it falleth out, that the armie which inſolencie and iniurie forerunneth, is appointed to deſtruction, and by the fearfulneſſe of it ſelfe ouerthrowne before the enemie ſet vpon it, they themſelues becomming enemies vnto themſelues; and God his iuſt vengeance appointing vnto them ſuch an end as their deeds haue deſerued: neither was it like that they ſhould doe any great good, that at their firſt ſetting forth, in ſtead of prouiſion carried out with them the bitter curſes and execrations of their friends. Michael the Emperour ſeeing the Massagets flie, and not daring with those few he had left, to oppose himselfe against his ene- G mies, retired himselfe into the strong castle of MAGNESIA, there to expect what would become of these mischiefes. But the Massagets spoiling the countrey of the poore Christians as they went, marched directly vnto the strait of HELLESPONTVS, and there againe passed ouer into EVROPE, as if they had beene therefore onely sent for ouer the riuer ISTER, to shew the Turks the sooner the way vnto the sea in ASIA. For it was not many dayes after, but that Mi- chael the Emperour being returned to CONSTANTINOPLE, the Turks comming downe with a great power, subdued all the countries, euen vnto the coast of LESBOS, to the great weakning of the Greeke empire.

It was not long after these great stirs made by the Massagets, but that one Ronzerius (some- H time a notable pirate, but as then a most famous captaine) hearing of the great entertainment that the Greeke Emperour gaue vnto strangers, by messengers sent for that purpose, offered Ronzerius what he was. vnto him his seruice in his wars against the Turks, as had before the Massagets. This Ronzerius of whom we speake, had out of CATALONIA a prouince of SPAINE, and out of that part of FRANCE which is called NARBONENSIS, and some other places also, gathered together a great number of base needie naked men, yet lustie able bodies, and fit for seruice either by sea or land; with whom he manned foure tall gallies, and so as a notable pirate long time robbed, not onely the merchants trading to and fro in the Mediterranean, but landing his men oftentimes in the rich Islands, carried away thence much rich spoile also; vntill at length by the mis-chiefe he did being become famous, and great wars then arising betwixt Charles King of NA- I PLES and Theodorus King of SICILIA, he was by Theodorus sent for and requested of aid: which he (liuing of the spoile) easily granted, and so came vnto him with a thousand horse, and as many foot, all old expert souldiers, whose good seruice stood the King in those wars in great stead. But as the end of war is peace, so at length vpon the euill successe of Charles, a peace being concluded betwixt the two Kings, and confirmed by a marriage betwixt their children, Ronze- rius liuing altogether by his fortunes, was to seeke for new entertainment, both for himselfe and his men, as hauing neither house nor certaine dwelling place to repaire vnto; but being as needie men met together, some out of one place, some out of another, in hope of bootie as their fortune led them. In which case Ronzerius their Generall thought it best to offer his seruice vnto the Greeke Emperour in his wars against the Turks, whereof he gladly accepted, and so sent K for him: vnto whom he shortly after came with two thousand good souldiers, called (after the proud Spanish manner) by the name of CATALONIANS, for that they were for the most part Spaniards of the countrey of CATALONIA. Of whose comming the Emperour reioycing more than he had cause (as afterward by proofe it fell out) in token of his greater fauour, honoured him with the name of the Great Captaine; and afterwards gaue him his neece Marie in marriage. But within a while after, when as one Uensa, another Catalonian captaine sent for by Ronzerius, was come thither also with more aid; the Emperour to gratifie them both, gaue vnto Ronzerius the name of Cæsar, and vnto the other the name of the Great Captaine. But when these new come captaines with their followers, were to be transported into ASIA, it is not to be spoken what harme they did by the way vnto the countrey people, and in the villages L alongst the sea coast; abusing the men and women as their slaues, and spending their substance at their pleasure, for which they had many a bitter curse: and this was their first yeeres entertainment. The next Spring they set forward to relieue the great citie of PHILADELPHIA, being as then long besieged by the Turks, and hardly bestead without with the enemie; and within, with extreme penurie and famine: which good seruice, they most valiantly performed and raised the siege: For the Turks beholding the good order of these Latine souldiers, their bright armour, and couragious comming on, rise presently and departed, not onely from the citie, but quite out of the Emperours territorie. Besides that, in this armie were ioyned vnto these Catalonians great numbers of the best souldiers of the Greekes, and all the power of the Massagets: so that had not the Emperour expresly before commanded, not to pursue them too M far, it was by many thought all those cities and countries might then againe haue been in short time recouered from the Turks, which they had before taken from him. But in kingdomes appointed vnto ruine, faire occasions helpe not for the stay thereof: yea the greatest helpes prouided by the worldly wise, by a secret commanding power aboue, being oftentimes conuerted to the destruction of that they were prouided for the safegard of; as it now fell out with the

Emperour

A Emperour and these Spanish souldiers: for this seruice done, the Greekes returned home, as did the Massagets also. But these Catalonians with Ronzerius their Generall, roaming vp and downe the Emperours territories in ASIA, did there great harme, turning their forces (as enemies) vpon them whom they were sent for to relieue: alleadging that they had not their pay according to the Emperours promise, and that therefore they must liue vpon them that had sent for them and deceiued them. So were the poore people in euery place spoiled, their wiues and daughters rauished, their Priests and aged fathers tortured to confesse such secret store as they had: all was subiect vnto these dissolute souldiers rage and lust; yea many of them that had nothing to redeeme themselues, vpon the greedie souldiers imagination, hauing their hands or
B feet, or some other part of their bodies cut off, lay by the high wayes side begging an halfepenie or a peece of bread, hauing nothing left to comfort themselues with, more than their miserable voice and fountaines of teares: with which their wrongs and miseries, worse than those they had sustained by the Turks, the Emperour much grieued, and well the more, for that they were done by him whom he had entertained to relieue them: but what remedie, his coffers were so bare as that he was not able to doe any thing for the redresse thereof. Ronzerius hauing thus spoiled the Emperours countrey in ASIA, and left nothing that pleased either him or his, with all his power passed ouer into EVROPE: and leauing all the rest of his armie at CALIPOLIS, with two hundred of his men went vnto the young Emperour Michael (then lying with a small power at ORESTIAS in THRACIA) to demand of him his pay, or if need were to extort it
C from him with threats: with whose insolencie at his comming, the Emperour more offended than before, his souldiers there present perceiuing the same, with their drawne swords compassing him in, fast by the court, slew him, with certaine of his followers, the rest in all haste fled to CALIPOLIS to certifie their fellowes what had happened.

Ronzerius for want of pay spoileth the Emperors subiects.

Ronzerius slain.

Thus by the death of Ronzerius, the young Emperour had thought to haue discouraged the Catalonians & abated their pride, as like enough it was to haue done: yet in proose it fel not out so, but was the cause of far greater euils. So when God prospereth not mens actions, the best falleth out vnto the worst, and their wisest deuices turne vnto meere follies: for the Catalonians at CALIPOLIS hearing of the death of Ronserius their Generall, first slew all the citizens in the citie, and notably fortifying the same, tooke that as their refuge. Then diuiding their souldiers
D into two parts, with the one part of them manned out eight gallies, which vnder the leading of the great captaine Tenza, robbed and spoiled all the merchants ships, passing the straits of HELLESPONTVS, to or from CONSTANTINOPLE: the other part left in the citie, in the meane time forraging the countrey all about them. But Tenza shortly after encountering with a fleet of the Genowaies, well prouided for him, was by them ouerthrowne, & most of his gallies sunke, and himselfe taken; but yet afterwards redeemed by his fellowes, & so again inlarged. Now the Catalonians at CALIPOLIS somewhat discouraged with the losse of their fleet and so many of their men, for certaine daies kept themselues quiet within their wals, as not well knowing what course to take; for they feared both the Massagets & Thracians: them, for that they had vpon light causes abused them, and slaine diuers of them in the late Asian war; and these, for that they
E had but euen the other day burnt their houses and spoiled their labours in the country there by: for which and other their outrages, they vtterly despaired of the Emperours fauour whom they had so highly offended. But that which most of all terrified them, was, for that they looked euery day when Michael the young Emperour, who as then lay not farre off, should with a great power come to assault them: for feare of whom they cast a deepe ditch about the citie, with a strong counterscarfe, so preparing themselues, as if they should haue been euen presently besieged. But the time so passing, and the Emperour delaying his comming, they began to thinke of other matters: for being brought to that strait, that they could not well tell which way to turne them, but that they were on euery side beset with danger, they vpon a malicious resolution, and vnto the Greekes most fatall, by messengers sent of purpose, craued aid of the Turks that dwelt F on the other side of the strait ouer against them, in ASIA: who presently sent them fiue hundred good souldiers, after whom followed also many other fugitiues and loose companions, in hope of spoile: with whom the Catalonians for the present strengthened, and being themselues three thousand strong, issued out of the citie, and forraged the country thereabouts, bringing in with them great heards & flocks of sheepe and other cattell, together with their keepers: wherewith both the Emperours and their subiects incensed, prepared themselues for reuenge. This was the first

The Turks first called into Europe by the Catalonians.

first calling in of the Turks into EVROPE (that I read of) and the beginning of those endlesse G miseries wherewith the Christian commonweale hath beene euer since most grieuously afflicted, and a great part thereof ouerwhelmed; few or none greeuing thereat, but such as themselues feele the heauinesse thereof, whom God in his mercie comfort.

The Catalonians and Turks now lying about CYPSELLA and APRI in THRACE, Michael the Emperour with his Macedonian and Thracian souldiers, the Massagets and the Turcopuli, encamped at APRI. These Turcopuli were Turks, also in number about a thousand, who (as is in the former part of this Historie declared) being fled with their Sultan Iathatines vnto the Greeke Emperour, and left behinde him at such time as he was by the Europian Tartars deliuered, had forsaken their Mahometane superstition, and so being become Christians, were H enrolled amongst the Greeke souldiers. Shortly after the Emperour (aduertised by his scouts of the approch of his enemies) commanded euery man to be in a readinesse, and his captaines to put his armie in order of battell: who seeing the enemies battell diuided into three parts, put theirs also in like order, placing the Turcopuli and Massagets in the left wing, the Macedonian and Thracian choice horsemen in the right wing, and the rest with the footmen in the maine battell. At which time the Emperour himselfe riding from place to place, with comfortable speeches encouraged his men to fight valiantly against their enemies. The Sunne rising, the enemies battell began to come on, in number much inferiour vnto the Emperours, yet in like order; the Turks being placed in both wings, and the Catalonians well armed in the middest. But the signall of battell being giuen on both sides, the Massagets, whether it were by agreement so I before made with the enemie, or vpon a sudden conceiued treason, presently withdrew themselues aloofe off, and so stood as idle beholders, giuing aid neither to the one nor to the other, as did also the Turcopuli their companions; which greatly dismaied the Grecians, and encouraged their enemies: for the Greekes dismaied with that sudden defection of their fellowes, were euen in the ioyning of the battell discouraged. Which the Emperour perceiuing, with great instancie intreated the captains and commanders of his armie, calling them oftentimes by name, not to be so suddenly discouraged: but they in so great a danger little regarding his words, and still shrinking from him, when as the greatest part of his footmen were trodden vnder foot and slaine, turning himselfe vnto them that were left, which were but few, he said: Now worthy men is the time wherein death is better than life, and life more bitter than death. And hauing so said, valiK antly charged the enemie: in which charge his horse was slaine vnder him, and he in danger to haue beene taken, had not one of his faithfull followers remounted him vpon his owne horse, and so saued his life with the losse of his owne. The Emperour flying to DYDIMOTICHVM, where Andronicus his father then lay, was of him ioyfully receiued, but sharply reproued for aduenturing his person so far. The enemies pursuing the chase, slew some, tooke others, vntill that by the comming on of the night, and wearie with the long fight, they retired: and the next day diuiding the spoile, afterwards at their pleasures forraged the countrey. The renegate Turks, called Turcopuli, within a few dayes after reuolting vnto the Catalonians, were of them ioyfully entertained, and enrolled into the regiment of Chalel, the Turks Generall.

The Turcopuli.

The vnfortunat battell of Michael the Emperour against the Catalonians and Turks.

Shortly after this victorie, the Catalonians began to mutinie among themselues, the great L captaine Tenza, and Pharenza his companion, disdaining to be commanded by Recafort their Generall: in which tumult, the matter comming to blowes, Tenza was slaine, and Pharenza for safegard of his life glad to flie vnto the Emperour Andronicus; of whom he was, contrary to his expectation, right honourably entertained. About this time also, the Massagets hauing done the Greekes more harme, than the Turks against whom they were entertained, and enriched themselues with the spoile of their friends both in ASIA and EVROPE, were about with their wiues and children, and wealth, to returne againe vnto their old dwellings beyond ISTER: Which the Turcopuli, with the Catalonians vnderstanding, and bearing vnto them a secret grudge, for that they (as the weaker) had by them oftentimes beene wronged in the diuision of the spoile of the Greekes, lay now secretly in wait for them as they should passe the straits of the M great mountaine HEMVS, which bounded the Greeke empire from the Bulgarians: where setting vpon them, fearing no such danger, they slew them almost all; and with the spoile of them, recompenced themselues for all the wrongs they had from them before receiued.

The Catalonians proud of their victorie at APRI, and well strengthened by the reuolt of the Turcopuli, with continuall rodes spoiled not only all alongst the sea coast of THRACIA,

but

A but all the inland countrey alſo, as far as Maronea, Rhodope, and Bizia, laying all waſte before them. And hauing forraged moſt part of Thracia, brake into Macedonia, and there wintred about Cassandria, ſometime a famous citie, but as then all deſolate and ruinous. But the Spring being come, they remoued thence, with purpoſe to haue ſpoiled the cities of Macedonia, and eſpecially the rich citie of Thessalonica, where the Empreſſe Irene then lay: wherein they were by the Emperors good foreſight and care preuented, who doubting ſuch a matter, had fortified his cities in that countrey, and furniſhed them with ſtrong garriſons and all other things needfull for their defence: which they quickly perceiuing, and finding the country all deſolate and forſaken by the inhabitants, were about to haue againe returned in- Cassandria.

B to Thracia. But as they were thereupon reſoluing, they were informed by one that was with them captiue, how that the Emperor by a mightie ſtrong wall built at a place called Christopolis, from the ſea ſide euen vnto the top of the mountaines, had ſo ſhut vp the paſſage, as that it was not poſſible for them that way to enter. With which vnexpected newes they were at the firſt exceedingly troubled, as foreſeeing, That if they ſhould there long ſtay in that ſpoiled country, they ſhould in ſhort time be driuen vnto exceeding wants (for they were now in number aboue eight thouſand fighting men) and afraid alſo by a generall conſpiracie of the people about them, to be oppreſſed. Thus beſet, & not well knowing what to do, or which way to turne themſelues, they deſperatly reſolued, no longer there to ſtay, but forthwith to ſet forward, and to breake into Thessalie, with the plentifulneſſe thereof to relieue their wants, or into ſome The Catalonians ſhut out of Macedonia.

C other countrey farther off towards Peloponesvs, and there to ſeat themſelues, and to end their long trauels: or at leaſtwiſe, if they could not ſo doe, to enter into league with ſome that dwelt vpon the ſea coaſt, and ſo returne againe into their owne countrey. Wherefore leauing Thessalonica, and deliuering the Emperour of a great feare, they in three dayes came to the Theſſalian mountaines, Olympvs, Ossa, and Pelivs, where they at the foot of them found ſuch plentie of all things neceſſarie for their reliefe, that they there wintred. But Winter paſt, and the Spring being come, they paſſed ouer thoſe high mountaines and the pleaſant vallies called Tempe, and ſo at laſt came downe into the fruitfull plaines of Thessalie, where they ſpent that yeere at their pleaſure, without reſiſtance, deuouring the labours of the poore country people, and making hauocke of whatſoeuer thing came in their way: for as then the ſtate of that

D countrey was but weake, the Prince thereof being but young, and withall very ſicke and like to die, & the ſucceſſion ſo ending in him, as that it was feared, who after his death ſhould lay hand thereon; and euery man therfore more carefull of his owne priuate than of the common good. Yet to auert theſe forraine enemies, who like a conſuming fire deuoured the countrey before them, the nobilitie thought it good, with great gifts to ouercome their captains & commanders, and then to offer them guides to conduct them into Achaia and Beotia, countries more pleaſant & fruitfull than was theirs, and more commodious for them to dwell in: promiſing alſo to giue them aid for the ſeating of them there, if they ſhould ſo need. Of which their offers the Catalonians accepted, as thinking it better with their hands ful of gold ſo eaſily gotten, to go ſeeke their better fortunes, with their power yet whole and ſtrong, and helpe alſo if need were, than to

E hazard all vpon the ſucceſſe of a doubtfull victorie, and ſo fooliſhly to preferre an vncertaine hope before a moſt certaine benefit. So making peace with the Theſſalians, and the Spring being come, receiuing of them their promiſed rewards, and guides to conduct them; paſſing ouer the mountaines beyond Thessalie, and the ſtraits of Thermopile, they encamped neere vnto Locris and the riuer Cephisvs: which riſing out of the mountaine Pernassvs, and running toward the Eaſt, hath on the North ſide of them Locris and Opvs; and on the South the inland countrey of Achaia and Beotia: and being a great riuer vntill it come to Lebadia and Haliartes, is there diuided into two riuers, the one called Æsopvs, and the other Ismenvs; whereof the former runneth thorow the countrey of Attica, vntill it come into the ſea, and the other neere vnto Avlis (where the noble Grecians, as they ſay, be-

F ing about to goe vnto Troy, met and there ſtaied) falleth into the Euboean ſea. But the Duke of Thebes and Athens and of all that countrey, hearing of their comming, and (as he thought) well prouided alſo for them (as hauing all the Winter and Spring time before put his forces in readineſſe) with great pride and contempt denied them paſſage thorow his countrey, at ſuch time as they asked the ſame; making no more reckning of them, than as of a ſort of looſe wandering rogues that could find no place to reſt or thriue in: wherwith they enraged, reſolued among among themselues, either there to seat themselues in his countrey, or to die therefore. And so G passing the riuer into BOETIA, not far from the same encamped themselues, being in number A notable stratageme of the Catalonians. about 3500 horse, and 4000 foot. But so lying and expecting the comming of their enemies, they caused all the plaine ground about where they lay and meant to fight, to be plowed vp, which they with certain small cuts out of the riuer so watered, as that it differed but a little from a deepe marish or bog. Hither about the middle of the Spring commeth the Prince of the countrey, with a gallant armie raised out of ATHENS, THEBES, PLATEA, LOCRIS, PHOCIS, and MEGARA, in number about 6400 horse, and 4000 foot, an armie too strong he thought for so contemptible an enemie. But the weakest enemie not feared, doth oftentimes the greatest harme, as here by proofe was to be seene: for the Prince comming vnto the afore- H said plaine, now growne greene with grasse, and casting no perill, encouraging his men, came brauely on with all his horsemen to haue charged his enemies: who stood fast vpon the firme ground, a little without their trenches, as readie to encounter him. But before he was come to the middle of the plaine, his horses sinking deepe into the rotten and new ploughed ground, and there intangled as in a marish, lay for the most part tumbling in the mire, together with their riders; or else plunging in the deepe, and hauing cast them, ran vp and downe the plaine, as fortune led them; othersome sticking fast, stood with their riders vpon their backs, as if they had beene very images, not able for to moue. Which the Catalonians beholding, and therewith encouraged, ouerwhelmed them with all manner of shot, and slew them at their pleasure, vntill they had almost made an end of them: and with their horsemen so speedily pursued the rest in I chace, euen vnto the cities of THEBES and ATHENS, that they without more adoe euen at that instant surprised them both, with all that was in them. So the Catalonians hauing as it were at a cast at dice won a most goodly countrey, garnished with faire townes and cities, which they neuer built; and stored with all manner of wealth, which they neuer sweat for; there ended their long trauels, and seated themselues: not ceasing (as saith Nicephorus Gregorias, the reporter of this historie, speaking of the time wherein these things were done, and wherein he himselfe liued in CONSTANTINOPLE) vnto this present day, by little and little to extend the bounds of their territorie. Where leauing them, with whom we happily haue too long straied from our purpose, let vs againe returne vnto the Turks and Turcopuli their companions.

In the armie of the Catalonians, at such time as they were about to haue besieged THESSA- K LONICA, were three thousand Turks, of whom eleuen hundred were of them (as wee said) which remained with Melech at ÆNVM, after the flight of Iathatines there Sultan vnto the Tartars, and renouncing their superstition, became Christians; and so being baptized, and hauing wiues and children, were enrolled among the Emperours souldiers; but at the battell of APRI reuolted vnto the Catalonians, and were commonly knowne by the name of Turcopuli: the other being the greater part, were such Turks as with Chalel their captaine came out of ASIA, being sent for by the Catalonians. Now all these Turks, as well the one as the other, at such time as the Catalonians were about to inuade THESSALIA, and to seeke their new fortunes in the countries more Westward, and so farther off from ASIA: partly distrusting the societie of them, as dangerous vnto them; and loth also further to follow their vncertaine fortunes into L countries further off, among people to them vnknowne; began to arise in mutinie, and to refuse to goe. Whereupon their captaines Melech and Chalel requested of the Generall of the Ca-talonians to giue them leaue with quietnesse to returne: which their request he easily granted, (as now not greatly needing their helpe, after that he was departing out of the Emperours dominion) and so they gladly departed; proportionally diuiding all the captiues and spoiles they had taken in that long war, according to the number of both parts.

The Turks diuided into two factions. These Turks after their departure from the Catalonians, diuided themselues into two parts, the Turcopuli or renegat Turks following Melech, and the rest Chalel their Generall. But Melech being before become a Christian, as were his followers also; and after that hauing receiued most honorable entertainment at the Emperors hands, and yet againe most shamefully breaking his M faith before giuen, and violating his religion, had reuolted vnto his enemies; despairing of the Emperours further friendship, which he had so euill deserued, made choice rather to goe vnto Crales Prince of SERVIA, by whom he was sent for, than to come againe into the sight of An-dronicus the Greeke Emperour. And so going vnto him with a thousand horse, and fiue hundred foot, was there of him well entertained himselfe: but his souldiers all commanded to deliuer

A vnto the Prince both their horſes and armour, and to fall to other trades, and not to beare armes but at ſuch time, and ſo many of them as ſhould ſeeme good vnto the Prince, that had receiued them into his countrey.

But Chalel with the Turks his followers, in number about 1300 horſe and eight hundred foot, ſtaying at MACEDONIA, offered vnto the Greeke Emperour quietly to depart his country, ſo that he would giue him paſſage by the ſtraits of CHRISTOPOLIS by him fortified; and in ſafetie tranſport him and his ſouldiers with all their ſubſtance, ouer the ſtrait of HELESPONTVS into ASIA: vnto which his requeſt, the Emperour conſidering the great harme done in his prouinces, and deſirous alſo to be diſcharged of ſo great a burthen, eaſily granted; and ſo ſent Sennacherib, B one of his moſt valiant captaines, to conduct them out of MACEDONIA into THRACIA, vnto the ſtraits of HELESPONTVS. Where the Greeke captaines and ſouldiers ſeeing the great multitude of horſes, and abundance of money and other ſpoiles, which they hauing taken from the Greekes, were now about to carrie away with them into ASIA; they thought it a great indignitie to ſuffer them ſo to doe: and allured alſo with the hope of ſo rich a prey, as had beene of long in gathering, they entred into a deuice far different from that which was vnto the Turks before promiſed; neither prouiding them of ſhipping, neither carefull of their ſafetie, but purpoſing vpon the ſudden by night to deſtroy them. Whereof the Turks hauing got vnderſtanding, ſuddenly riſing, ſurpriſed a caſtle in the country there by, which they notably fortified for the defence of themſelues, to the great aſtoniſhment of them that had purpoſed their de-C ſtruction; who not now able to force them, were glad to get them farther off, and to certifie the Emperor what had happened: who (after I wot not what receiued cuſtome of the Greeke Emperors his predeceſſors) ſlowly diſpatching things requiring greateſt haſte, careleſly delaied the time, to the great trouble of his ſtate and aduantage of his enemies. For they wiſely conſidering the danger and diſtreſſe they were in, by ſpeedie meſſengers ſent ouer the ſtrait, craued aid of the Turks their countreymen in ASIA, which they preſently ſent them: wherewith they not a little both encouraged and ſtrengthened, with their often and ſudden incurſions grieuouſly waſted the countrey round about them, to the great diſcontentment of the Greeke captaines, not able without greater helpe to remedie the ſame. Who thereof certified the young Emperour Michael Paleologus, requeſting him with all the power he could make, to come and beſiege the D caſtle, and to ſuppreſſe theſe ſo dangerous enemies. For the performance whereof, not onely the captaines with their ſouldiers, but the countrey people in generall with their ſpades and mattocks came flocking vnto the Emperour; not as if they would haue beſieged the caſtle, but haue digged it downe and ouerthrowne it together with the Turks their enemies.

The vnfortunat battell of the Emperour Michael Paleologus with the Turks in Chersoneſus.

Now the Emperour with his captaines and ſouldiers, and a multitude of theſe countrey people, being come thither; who all gladly followed him, moſt part of them fooliſhly thinking of nothing, but of the ſpoile of their enemies; not conſidering with what danger the ſame was to be gained: ſo that the more the enemies prouided for the neceſſarie defence of themſelues, as in number but few, and ſhut vp in their enemies countrey; the more careleſly and negligently, and without all order, the Greeks proceeded in their ſiege, for that they were in number far more, &
E better prouided of all things than their enemies: not reputing with themſelues, Nothing in this world to be firme and ſure; and all worldly things (as ſaith the diuine Philoſopher) to be but the mockerie of God, and to be haſtily turned vpſide downe, and with moſt vncertaine courſe this and that way to wander. But their enemies, who before feared euen the very fame of their comming, accounting themſelues rather among the dead than the liuing, ſeeing their confuſed and diſordered raſhneſſe; therewith much more than before encouraged, beſtowed all their wealth, their women, and other things vnneceſſarie for battell, in good ſafetie within their trenches: but themſelues, with eight hundred choſen horſemen onely, and they very well armed, ſallied out, euen vnto the place where the imperial enſigne ſtood, being neither of any great ſafetie, neither guarded with any ſuch ſtrength or carefulneſſe as beſeemed: with which ſudden and F deſperate eruption of the enemies, the Grecians terrified, eſpecially that ruſticall and vplandiſh companie, began to flie; after whom by little and little others followed, vntill at length all the reſt without farther reſiſtance, fled alſo: which the Emperour ſeeing, did what he might to haue ſtaied their flight: but in ſo generall a confuſion and feare, when euery man was to ſhift for one, who regarded him? Wherefore wearied and ſeeing no other remedie, he was glad to take the ſame courſe and to flie with the reſt. Yet many of the more expert captains, aſhamed of ſo foule a flight,

a flight, made diuers ſtands: and ſo ſtaied the barbarous enemie from further purſuit of the Emperour and the other flying Greekes. In which doing, many of them incloſed by the Turks, were of them taken priſoners: vnto whom all the Emperours treaſure became a prey alſo, and whatſoeuer honourable enſignes of the empire elſe that were found in the Emperours tent; yea the imperiall crowne it ſelfe, richly ſet with pearle and precious ſtones, was there taken alſo, which (they ſay) Chalel putting vpon his head, pleaſantly ſcoffed at the Greeke Emperour that but late before wore it. C

Thracia ſpoiled by the Turks.

After this victorie, the Turks with great pride ſpoiled almoſt all THRACIA, in ſuch ſort as that the people for two yeeres together durſt ſcarcely goe out of their ſtrong walled townes to plough and ſow their land; which exceedingly grieued both the Emperours, the father and the ſonne: for in their owne power they had no great confidence, God hauing (as it were) taken from their people both their hearts & courage, ſo that all their hope was to entertain forrain aid (the miſerable ſhift of the great diſtreſſed ones) wherein alſo they found many difficulties and lets, whileſt they conſidered the greatnes of their charge, their coffers being then (if euer) empty, by reaſon their territories were ſo long and grieuouſly by their enemies waſted: yet need admitting no law, Andronicus the old Emperour was glad to ſend to Crales Prince of SERVIA his ſonne in law, to pray his aid. But in the meane time he making no haſte (as men in relieuing others commonly doe) and the miſerie more and more increaſing, it pleaſed God to ſtir vp the heart of one Philes Paleologus the Emperors neere kinſman, to vndertake the protection and deliuerance of his Prince and countrey; and was afterward for his great valour by the Emperour worthily made Lord great Martiall of the empire. This Philes of whom we now ſpeake, had all his life time beene brought vp in the court; and was for his vpright dealing and integritie of life beloued of all men, but eſpecially of the old Emperor his kinſman, whom he with like affection honoured; but was a man altogether vnskilfull of the wars, as being by nature of a weake conſtitution of bodie, and ſo very ſickly; and withall more giuen to deuotion and the ſeruice of God than the affaires of the world, oftentimes ſpending moſt part of the day at his praiers in the church. H I

Philes Paleologus requeſteth of the Emperor, that he might goe againſt the Turks.

He now grieued to ſee the perplexed Emperour, and the miſerie of his countrey, requeſted of him that he might with ſome ſmall power, and ſome few captaines of his owne choice, go out againſt theſe proud Turks: hoping (as he ſaid) by the grace of God to reuenge the wrong by them done, and to returne vnto him againe with victorie. Vnto which his requeſt, the Emperour eaſily yeelded, ſaying, that God was iuſt, which delighted not in any mans legs, either in the greatneſſe of any mans ſtrength, but in a contrite heart & humble minde; not ſo giuing his helpe vnto Michael the Emperour, his ſonne, for the offences of his parents: as happily he might vnto this ſo vpright & deuout a man, regarding more his integritie of life, than his skil in armes: For turning me about, I haue ſeene in this world (ſaid he) I haue ſeene, the ſwift not to gaine the prize; neither the valiant the victorie; wiſe men to want bread; and men of vnderſtanding, wealth; the ſimple to gaine fauour; and the ſubtill to fall into diſgrace: ſuch alteration worldly things in time finde. So the Emperor (as is aforeſaid) yeelding to his requeſt, furniſhed him with money, horſes, and armour, and ſuch a conuenient power as he himſelfe deſired. Which he hauing receiued, firſt of all encouraged his captains and ſouldiers with all manner of courteſie and kindneſſe, giuing vnto them money, horſes, armour, iewels, yea ſometime he gaue vnto one his purſe, vnto another his cloke, his rapier, or ſome other ſuch thing as he had about him, to encourage them in their forwardneſſe: after that he perſwaded them to an honeſt temperate courſe of life, and valiantly to play the men, promiſing according to their deſerts to reward euery one of them, the war once happily ended: & before his ſetting forth, vnderſtanding by his eſpials, that Chalel with a thouſand foot and two hundred horſe was forraging the countrey about BYZIA, he haſted his departure, that ſo he might by the way encounter the, laded with the ſpoile of the country: and ſo ſetting forward, came the third day vnto a little riuer, which the inhabitants call XEROGIPSVM, and there in a great plaine neere vnto the ſame, encamped. Where after he had ſet all things in oder fit for battell, he with cheerefull ſpeeches, as a great commander, encouraged his captaines and ſouldiers; leauing nothing vnſaid or vndone, that might ſerue for the animating of them to fight. But he had not ſo lien two dayes, but that his ſcouts about midnight comming in, brought him tidings, that the enemie laden with ſpoile, was euen faſt by at hand: who by the riſing of the Sunne were come within ſight, and had themſelues a far off alſo diſcouered the Chriſtian armie, all gliſtering in bright armour. Wherefore ſtaying a while to prepare K L M

A themſelues for battell: and firſt of all, compaſſing themſelues round with their waggons and other carriages, they beſtowed in them all their captiues faſt bound together, with the bootie they had taken: and afterwards as their manner was, caſting duſt vpon their heads, and their hands vp towards heauen, they came on. And now the Chriſtian armie came on forward alſo, Philes ſtill encouraging both the horſemen and footmen, and right well conducting them, as the time and place required. So it fortuned, that he that had the leading of the right wing of the armie, gaue the firſt charge vpon a ſquadron of the enemies, and at the firſt onſet vnhorſed one of the enemies, and by and by after him, another. But hauing his horſe ſore wounded vnder him, he haſtily retired out of the battell, which ſomewhat troubled the Chriſtians, and encouraged
B the Turks, who now with a barbarous outcrie began moſt fiercely to preſſe vpon the retiring Chriſtians. Philes in the meane time with many cheerefull words and comfortable perſwaſions ſtill encouraging them to play the men; and with his eyes oftentimes caſt vp to heauen, with teares running downe his face, moſt heartily beſought God, the giuer of all victorie, no longer to ſuffer thoſe his enemies, and the miniſters of his wrath, to triumph ouer his people: as did alſo the poore captiues that lay bound, doubtfully betwixt feare and hope, expecting the euent of the battell. The Chriſtian footmen at the ſame time encountering hand to hand with the Barbarians, aſſailed them, and were aſſailed; ſlew of them, and were themſelues of them ſlaine; ſo that there was a cruell fight made on both ſides. Bnt Philes with the multitude of his men hauing almoſt compaſſed in the Barbarian horſemen, with a companie of his moſt valiant
C ſouldiers broke in vpon the ſide of the enemies battell, and ſo made way thorow the middeſt of it: and ſo troubled the Turks, as that they well knew not how to ſtay or what to doe. So being on euery ſide circumuented and hardly charged, moſt of them there fell, excepting ſome few horſemen, whom the Greeke horſemen purſued vnto the entrance of CHERSONESVS, with purpoſe there to ſhut them vp. Philes comming thither alſo, there vpon thoſe ſtraits encamped: at which time the Emperour preſently ſent out fiue gallies to keepe the ſtraits of HELLESPONTVS, ſo that no aid might be brought vnto theſe Turks out of ASIA. Whileſt things thus went, two thouſand choice horſemen came to the aid of Philes out of SERVIA, and the poteſtate of PERA came by ſea alſo with eight gallies moe into HELLESPONTVS to the aid of the other Chriſtians: wherefore when the Grecians and the Seruians had thus on the one
D ſide ſhut them vp by land, and they that were in the gallies on the other by ſea; Philes with all his power came and encamped about the towne and the trenches wherein the Turks lay, planting his batterie againſt the caſtle, wherwith he greatly ſhooke the ſame, & made great ſlaughter of the Turks, and of their horſes, and that not onely by day, but by night alſo. But the Turks ſeeing death now preſent before their eyes, and no way left for them to eſcape, for that they were ſo on euery ſide both by ſea & land encloſed, thought good thus to aduenture their liues, reſoluing by night to ſet vpon the Grecians rather than vpon the Seruians, whom they had hitherto accuſtomed to ouercome, and whom they had with often ſlaughters terrified; that ſo the reſt by them alſo happily diſcouraged, they might ſo delay the aſſault: but in attempting the ſame, they perceiued themſelues much deceiued, finding them euen at their firſt ſallying
E out, readie in armes to receiue them: wherefore hauing in vaine giuen the attempt (as againſt a ſtrong fortreſſe) they were ſhamefully enforced to retire. Yet were they not therewith ſo diſcouraged, but that the ſtraight ſiege ſtill continuing, they gaue the like attempt vpon the Seruians; but being alſo by them in like manner with loſſe repulſed, they began now vtterly to deſpaire. Wherefore the next day, about midnight caſting away their armes, they with their boſomes and pockets full of coine ran downe vnto the ſea ſide, towards the gallies, with purpoſe to yeeld themſelues vnto the Genowaies that were therein; as fearing of them leſſe harme, as of men whom they had neuer hurt. But the night being darke and miſtie, and the Moone giuing no light, many of them vnawares came vnto the Greeke gallies, and there, flying the ſmoke, fell into the fire: for being lightened of their money, they were by them forthwith without any pitie
F ſlaine alſo. But the Genowaies ſlew not all their priſoners, but onely ſuch as had brought with them the greateſt ſtore of coine; leſt afterwards bewraying the ſame, it ſhould haue been ſought after by the Greekes: the reſt they caſt into bonds, of whom, ſome they ſent vnto the Emperor, otherſome they kept to themſelues as their owne priſoners. Thus by the valour and good conduct of this worthie deuout captaine, the Turks were for that time againe chaſed out of EVROPE, and the countrey of THRACIA deliuered of a great feare.

The battell betwixt Philes and the Turks.

The Turks ouerthrowne.

The causes of the decay of the Greeke empire.

Now by that we haue already written, is easily to be seene, the chiefe causes of the decay and G ruine of the Greeke Empire, to haue been, First, the innouation and change of their antient Religion and ceremonies by Michael Paleologus, wherof ensued a world of woes; then by Couetousnes, coloured with the name of good husbandry, the vtter destruction of the chiefe strength of the empire; next vnto that, by Enuie, the ruine of the great; false suspect, the looser of friends; Ambition, honours ouerthrow; Distrust, the great minds torment; and Forrein aid, the empires vnfaithful porter, opening the gate euen vnto the enemy himself: wherunto foule Discord joyned (as shall be foorthwith declared) what wanted that the barbarous enemy could desire, for the helping of them in the supplanting of so great an empire? But againe to our purpose: Michael, companion with his father Andronicus in the empire, had by his wife Mary two sonnes, H Andronicus who was afterward emperour, and Manuel surnamed the Despot; and two daughters, Anne maried vnto Thomas prince of EPIRVS, and Theodora married to the prince of BVLGARIA: of all these, the old emperour Andronicus their grandfather, so entirely loued Andronicus his nephew, as that in comparison of him he little seemed to regard either his owne children, or the rest of his nephewes, wishing them all rather to perish than him: which many supposed him to doe, as purposing by him the better to establish the succession of the empire in his house; as also for his excellency of wit, and comelinesse of person; the likenesse of name also happily furthering his kind affection. For which reasons, he caused him to be alwaies honorably brought vp in his court, as not willing to spare him out of his sight either day or night. But when he was out of his childhood, and grown to be a lustie youth (at which time mens hot de- I sires are commonly most vehement) he began to contemne all chastisement and gouernment; especially in so high a calling, and in the prime of his youth. Besides that, his companions became vnto him the ministers and perswaders of all those vaine delights which vntaied youth most desireth: and at the first began to lead him foorth to walke the streets, to hawke, to hunt, and to haunt plaies, and afterwards to night walkes also, not well beseeming his state: which riotous course of life, when as it required great expence, and his aged grandfather gaue him but a certaine spare allowance for his conuenient maintenance; hee acquainted himself with the rich marchants of GENOVVAY, which dwelt at PERA. Heereof rose hard taking vp of money, great debt, fine deuises how to come by coine, with secret consultations and purposes of flight. For when he saw his grandfather old Andronicus long to liue, and his father Michael K like to succeed him, hee had no hope of aspiring to the empire; whereupon his ambitious thoughts, and impotent desires, long time tormenting his haughty heart, suggested vnto him such purposes. For when as hee would not obey his grandfather as his tutor, nor follow other mens counsels, as a child, he sought after the emperiall liberty, and abundance of wealth; that he might haue that was sufficient for himself, and wherewith to reward others, as the followers of an emperour. Which seeing he could not doe, his grandfather yet liuing, and his father raigning; he sought after the soueraignity of other principalities and countries: one while after ARMENIA, as belonging vnto him in the right of his mother, the king of ARMENIA his daughter; another while after PELOPONESVS, and sometime hee dreamed of LESBOS and LEMNVS, and other the fruitfull Islands of the Ægean sea: which when it was secretly tolde L sometime to his father, and sometime to his grandfather, he was now crossed and reproued of the one, and afterwards of the other. And to passe ouer many other his youthfull prancks, hee vsed in his night walks secretly to repaire vnto a certaine gentlewomans house, more honourably borne, than honestly quallified: which woman, a certaine gallant and another Adonis, no lesse affected than himself; wherwith he highly offended, as with his riuall, appointed certaine ruffians and fencers to watch her house. But vpon a certaine time about midnight, Manuel the Despot (his yoonger brother) seeking after him, chanced to passe that way where these watchmen lay: who seeing him hasten by, and not knowing him in the darke, and supposing him to haue been the man they looked for, the gentlewomans best beloued, set vpon him, and so wounded him that he fell downe for dead from his horse: but being by and by after known by others M comming in, hee was taken vp, and so halfe dead carried vnto the court. Which outrage in the morning being knowne vnto the emperour, cast him into a great heauinesse, as beholding not the time present onely, but wisely considering what was like to ensue in the time to come also. But Manuel the Despot being dead of the wounds there receiued, and the report therof brought vnto Michael the yoong emperour his father, then lying at THESSALONICA, strooke him

A to the heart with ſo great a griefe, that falling ſicke with the conceit thereof, he ſhortly after died.

Andronicus the vnſtaied youth neuertheleſſe holding on his wonted courſe, with a ſecret purpoſe to haue fled, became thereby ſtill more and more ſuſpicious vnto his aged grandfather, not a little carefull vnto what end thoſe his violent paſſions would at length tend. And therefore appointed one Syrgiannes (a man of great credit and authoritie in the court, in whom as in a reconciled enemie he had moſt vnaduiſedly repoſed too much truſt) to inſinuate himſelfe into the youthfull Princes acquaintance and fauour; that ſo ſounding him, and his ſecret deſignes, he ſhould not poſſibly be able without his knowledge to ſtep aſide; which of all things the old
B Emperor feared moſt, as the beginning of greater troubles. This Syrgiannes being a man of great place, and of a ſubtill wit, was ſometime himſelfe ſuſpected of aſpiring; and therefore as vpon the miſpriſion of treaſon, was by the old Emperour impriſoned: but afterwards by him againe inlarged and receiued into fauour, was now put in truſt warily to obſerue the doings of the young Prince. But he not vnmindfull of the wrong before done vnto him, and in hope by troubling the ſtate, either to aſpire vnto the empire himſelfe, or at leaſtwiſe to ſome good part thereof; thought now a fit occaſion to be miniſtred vnto him for him to worke vpon, both for the one and the other, by ſetting the old Emperour and his ambitious nephew together by the eares: which opportunitie he not minding to let ſlip, taking the young Prince one day aſide, diſcouered vnto him all his grandfathers deuice in briefe, as followeth:

Your grandfather noble Prince (ſaid he) hath ſet me as a watch ouer your actions, or more truly to ſay, as a bloud-hound, to ſeeke after not your doings onely, but if it were poſſible euen after your moſt ſecret thoughts alſo: and ſo whileſt he malicioufly prepareth for you ſnares and fetters, you not aware thereof, fooliſhly follow your ſhallow and childiſh conceits. For what ſhall it auaile you ſecretly to flie away? whereas (if the beſt chance) yet muſt you (as the common ſaying is) put your feet vnder another mans table, and liue of his charge; if it fall not out worſe, that you be ſlaine or made away by them you flie vnto for reliefe, or elſe fall into the ſnares by your grandfather laid for you. But if ſo be that caſting behinde you theſe your fond deuices, you will hearken vnto my counſell, I will ſhew you a readie way how you ſhall in ſhort time and without any danger, aſpire vnto the imperiall ſeat and dignitie; the onely
D way whereunto is this, if you leauing the citie of Constantinople, ſhall flie out into the cities and prouinces of Thracia. For ſeeing men are moſt commonly by nature deſirous of change, and the miſerable Thracians are with often exactions grieuouſly vexed; if you ſhall but once proclaime a redreſſe of their grieuances, with immunitie for euer, they will all with one accord follow you whitherſoeuer you will, your grandfathers long and heauie yoke being caſt off, as if it were Siſiphus his heauie ſtone, which they had long rolled and neuer the neere. If you like of this aduice, I will be vnto you both the authour and the leader of this exploit, and will eaſily bring to good effect the whole matter: ſo that you againe on the other ſide promiſe vnto mee vpon your faith, to reward this my trauell according to my deſert therein. But what rewards ſhall theſe be? Honourable preferments, large poſſeſſions, great reuenues, the firſt place in your fauour, and that no great matter be done or concluded without my conſent and E knowledge. For you ſee how willingly I make my ſelfe partaker of your calamitie, and companion of your dangers, no neceſſitie enforcing me thereunto; forgetting euen my very faith, in compariſon of the loue and zeale I beare towards you, wherein if any miſhap ſhall by the mutabilitie of fortune betide mee, I haue ſet downe my ſelfe with patience to endure it. All which conſidered, you need not to grudge to yeeld vnto my requeſts, if you tender your owne ſafetie. And foraſmuch as the ſhortneſſe of the time will ſuffer no long conſultations, and that delay bringeth extreme danger; let vs without longer ſtay impart the matter vnto ſuch others, as for the hatred of the Emperour are like to keepe our counſell, and may yet much further our deſignes.

Syrgiannes his craftie ſeditious ſpeech vnto young Andronicus.

The young Prince moued with this ſpeech, as if it had beene with a charme, eaſily granted
F to his deſire, confirming the ſame by his oath conceiued in writing: at which time were preſent ſuch as were eſpecially to be acquainted with the plot of the conſpiracie, namely Iohn Cataczene, and Theodorus Synadenus (both men of great honour, and the old Emperours ancient ſuppoſed friends, and of him beloued, much of like age vnto himſelfe) and Alexius Apocautus the third (not of like honour with the other, yet a man of great place, and of a moſt ſubtill and deepe wit:) who all vnderſtanding the matter, ſhewed themſelues not as miniſters, but as ringleaders and captaines of the intended rebellion. This conſpiracie with moſt ſolemne oaths and promiſes on euery part confirmed, they began right cunningly to attempt the matter: and to begin withall, Syrgiannes and Catacuzenus, by corrupting diuers of the great and moſt gratious courtiers, procured to themſelues the gouernment of ſuch cities and prouinces in THRACIA, as they thought fitteſt for them to begin their rebellion in. Syrgiannes hauing the gouernment of the ſea coaſt, and the inland countrey euen from the ſea ſide vnto the top of mount RHODOPE; and Catacuzenus the gouernment of the countrey about ORESTIAS. In all which places they muſtred ſouldiers, prouided armour, entertaining alſo ſtrangers, and other vagrant & maſterleſſe men, as for ſome great war: beſides that, in the cities for the gouernment thereof, they placed their moſt truſtie friends, remouing ſuch others as they had in ſuſpect. All which they coloured by rumours falſly raiſed, one while of the comming of the Europian Tartars from DANVBIVS, and another while by the comming of the Turks out of ASIA: againſt whoſe inuaſions theſe preparations were giuen out to be made, for auoiding of ſuſpition; and the traitours for their prouident care highly cõmended euen by the Emperour himſelfe, againſt whom they were intended. All which things Syrgiannes notably diſſembled, oftentimes withall certifying the young Prince what he had done, and what was likewiſe of him to be performed.

But the old Emperor, ſeeing his youthfull nephew not to hearken to his graue aduice, but ſtill to proceed in his diſſolute kinde of life, was about ſolemnly to haue reproued him before the Patriarch and ſome others of the chiefe nobilitie: if happily ſuch open reproofe might haue wrought in him ſome change of manners; if not, then to haue committed him to priſon: & like enough he was to haue ſo done, had he not beene otherwiſe perſwaded by Theodorus Metochita (who of all others was able to doe moſt with him) by reaſon of the libertie of the time; for then it was vpon the point of Shrouetide, when as the people diſtempered with exceſſe of meat and drinke, were of all other times moſt fit, vpon any light occaſion, to be drawne into a tumult or vprore: for feare whereof, he was contented for that time to let him alone. But Shrouetide paſt, and a good part of Lent alſo, the old Emperour ſeeing no amendment in his nephew, calling vnto him Geraſimus the Patriarch, and the reſt of the reuerend Biſhops then preſent in the citie, ſent for his nephew, openly before them all to chide him, and to ſchoole him for his diſordered life, but eſpecially for his purpoſed flight; that aſhamed of ſuch open reproofe before ſuch reuerend fathers, he might either amend his life, or at leaſtwiſe of all men be thought iuſtly puniſhed for the ſame, if he ſhould ſtill proceed therein. So the young Prince being ſent for, came accompanied with a number of his fauourites & followers, moſt of them being ſecretly armed, and he himſelfe not altogether vnprouided: for it was agreed amongſt them, that if the Emperor ſhould vſe gentle and fatherly admonition towards him, that then they ſhould keepe themſelues quiet, without any ſhew of inſolencie or diſcontentment; but if he ſhould in anger reproue him, or threaten to puniſh him, then vpon a ſigne giuen, forcibly with their ſwords drawne, to breake in vpon him and to kill him in the imperiall ſeat, and without more adoe to place young Andronicus his nephew in his ſtead. But comming in, and (as his manner was) taking his place next vnto his aged grandfather, his deſperat followers attending without, he was indeed of him grieuouſly blamed and reproued for his former follies and euill courſe of life; yet with ſuch moderation and grauitie, as that all ſeemed (as it did) to come of a moſt fatherly care & regard: ſo that at that time no ſuch outrage was committed, as was by diuers his followers wiſhed, but the aſſemblie quietly diſmiſſed, & a ſolemne oath taken on both ſides: of the grandfather, That he ſhould not appoint any other to ſucceed him in the empire but his nephew; & of the young Prince, That he ſhould neuer go about or attempt any thing, to the ſhortning or hurt of his grandfathers life or empire. But the conſpirators thronging about him at his comming out, fretted & fumed at him, as if he had broken his faith and oath before giuen them, ſaying, What greater wrong couldeſt thou do to vs, than being by vs made ſtrong & become dreadfull vnto thine enemies, to diſpoſe of thine affaires at thy pleaſure to thine owne ſafetie, and to leaue vs thy moſt faithfull friends and ſeruants in the deuils mouth to be deuoured? For now they both doubted, and feared, leſt their conſpiracie was diſcouered. With which ſpeeches he both diſcouraged, and aſhamed, ſent for Theodorus Metochita his grandfathers chiefe counſeller, requeſting him to deale with his grandfather, for the pardoning of al his followers, as he had done for himſelfe: of which motion he diſliking, told him, That he was to giue God thanks that he had himſelfe eſcaped ſo great a danger, and to him alſo, as a meane for the ſafegard of his life; although he intreated not for ſuch traiterous

A traiterous persons; with whom, if he were well aduised, he would haue nothing to doe, either thinke that they would euer be faithfull vnto him, that respecting neither God nor man, had so fouly broken their faith before giuen vnto the Emperour his grandfather. With which vnexpected answer of so great and graue a counsellor, the Prince not a little troubled, and withall discontented, stood a while as in a muse all silent, reasoning as it were with his owne passions: but afterwards commanding him without further replie to depart, and the old companions of his follies resorting vnto him, he by their perswasion entertained againe his former disloyall thoughts & designements: which his grandfather vehemently suspecting, and therewith not a little grieued, would, as if it had beene by inspiration, oftentimes in his heauinesse say vnto them
B that were about him, In our time is lost the maiestie of our empire, and the deuotion of the Church. Yet to preuent the worst, he thought it good betime to lay hands vpon his suspected nephew, and so to detaine him in safe keeping: acquainting none therewith but Gerasimus the Patriarch & his ghostly father, who straightway acquainted the Prince therewith, and was the cause that he hastened his flight, flying himselfe before. For he now certainly vnderstanding the danger he was in, the night before he should haue beene apprehended, with all the rest of the conspirators his complices, in the dead time of the night fled out of the citie, by the gate called GYROLIMNIA, which gate (all the rest being shut) was still at his command, for that he vsed commonly thereby at his pleasure very early to goe out on hunting, as he now pretended to doe; but the next day after came to Syrgiannes and Catacuzenus campe, who then both lay with a great power at HA-
C DRIANOPLE, expecting his comming. The old Emperour, before the rising of the Sunne, aduertised of the flight of his nephew, the same day commanded him to be proclaimed traitor, and proscribed, with all his conspirators, and whosoeuer else should take his part. And for the more suretie, euery man in the citie was sworne to be loyall and faithfull vnto the old Emperour, and enemies vnto his nephew and his adherents. But he on the other side, proclaiming libertie and immunitie abroad in all the cities and villages in THRACIA, so won the hearts of the countrey people in generall, that they resorted vnto him from all places in great numbers, ready armed to doe whatsoeuer he should command them. And to begin withall, they first laid hands vpon the collectors of the Emperors mony, then abroad in the country, whom they fouly intreated, taking from them their mony. After that, and yet seuen daies not expired, almost an incredible D number of horsmen, footmen, archers, and others, departed from HADRIANOPLE towards CONSTANTINOPLE, vnder the leading of Syrgiannes, in good hope at their first comming to take the citie, being a discord in it selfe; and most part of the meaner sort, in hope of gaine, fauouring their rebellious proceedings, such as the seditious finde in such rebellious tumults. So hauing marched foure daies, they came and encamped at SELYBRIA: but as they were about to haue gone on farther, the old Emperour doubting lest the citizens, seeing so great an armie before the citie, should therein raise some tumult or stirre, to the endangering thereof; thought good before to send embassadours vnto his nephew, to proue if happily these so dangerous troubles, might by their meanes in some good sort be appeased. The chiefe of these em-E bassadours was one Theoleptus Bishop of PHILADELPHIA, a man no lesse famous for his vertue than his wisdome, and yet for both of all men honoured; and with them also was sent Syrgiannes his mother, as of all others most fit to appease her sonne, and to perswade him not to approch the citie, for that thereof might ensue much bloudshed, and the destruction of the citie, or at least wise the vtter vndoing of many; whereof if he should be the author, how could he euer after liue in conscience quiet, but that the torment thereof would follow him euen into his graue; and therefore to request him to retire a little, and so to come to talke, and to demand what he pleased. Syrgiannes moued as well with the presence of the reuerend Bishop, as with the praiers of his mother, retired to the young Prince, which then lay about ORESTIAS; whither the Emperors embassadours came also: with whom (after long debating) it was agreed, That
F the young Prince should in all royall manner, hold all THRACIA, from CHRISTOPOLIS vnto RHEGIVM, and the suburbs of CONSTANTINOPLE: and withall, That such lands as the young Prince had already giuen vnto his followers in MACEDONIA, should still remaine vnto them (which were such as yeerely yeelded vnto them a right great reuenue:) And that the old Emperour should hold vnto himselfe the imperiall citie, with all the cities and prouinces of MACEDONIA beyond CHRISTOPOLIS: and that he alone should haue the honour to heare the embassadours sent from forraine Princes, & to giue them their dispatch; for that the young Prince

tooke no pleasure in those waightie affaires; as by nature more delighted in hawking, hunting, G and his other youthfull pleasures. Vpon which conditions a peace was concluded, better liked of the young Prince, than of the old Emperour; who although he was desirous otherwise to haue redressed so great wrongs, yet wanting power, was glad to yeeld to whatsoeuer his nephew would request. Thus was the Greeke empire in EVROPE (as then all or the most part inclosed within the bounds of MACEDONIA and THRACIA) now diuided betwixt the grandfather and his nephew: ASIA in the meane time (wherein the Greeke Emperours their predecessours sometime held great kingdomes) being left for a prey to the greedie Turks. Othoman on the one side euen in the heat of these troubles laying the foundation of his empire in PHRYGIA and BYTHINIA: and the other the Turks Princes, the successors of Sultan Aladin, encroching H as fast vpon the Emperours territories and countries on this side the riuer MEANDER. And not so contented, at the same time also built great store of gallies, wherewith they robbed the Christian merchants trading to CONSTANTINOPLE, and spoiled the coasts of MACEDONIA and THRACIA, and the Islands of the ÆGEVM; and amongst others tooke the famous Island of the RHODES: which they held not long, before they were againe driuen out of the same by the Knights Hospitallers, vnder the conduct of William Willaret, aided by the Genowaies, and the King of SICILIA, which they from that time held (to the great honour and benefit of the Christian common weale) by the space of 214 yeeres, knowne by the name of The Knights of the RHODES: vntill that in the memorie of our fathers it was (I say no more, but grieue therfore) shamefully lost vnto the Turke, for want of reliefe; neuer place being more honourably defen- I ded, as in the processe of this Historie shall appeare: euer since which time, those honourable men (the flower of chiualrie) haue seated themselues in the Isle of MALTA; which they to their immortall glorie, and the comfort of all good Christians, haue most notably defended against the mightie Sultan Solyman, and all the furie of the Turks, as shall be also in due place declared.

The Greeke empire in Europe diuided.

Whilest the Greekes are at discord among themselues, Othoman layeth the foundation of the Turks empire, and the other Turks encroch vpon them also.

The Island of the Rhodes was by the Knights Hospitallers recouered from the Turks in the yeere 1308.

But to returne againe vnto the troubled estate of the Greeke empire. Syrgiannes the great captaine, and author of all the aforesaid stirs betwixt the old Emperour and his nephew, had euen from the beginning thought, as a companion to the young Prince, to haue ruled all with him at his pleasure, and that nothing either great or little should haue beene done without him: but seeing it now to fall out far otherwise than he had before expected, and the Prince to be wholly ruled by Catacuzenus, and himselfe of all others least regarded, and not so much as called to any K counsell; inwardly tormented with griefe and enuie, he began secretly with himselfe to deuise how he might be reuenged of the vngratefull Prince, which vnmindfull of his former promises, had so vnthankfully cast him off. Wherefore he resolued againe to reuolt vnto the old Emperor, not doubting but so in short time to ouerthrow all the counsels & deuices of the young Prince, together with his state also, by himselfe before raised. For he as a worldly wise man, excluding God from his counsels, had such an opinion of himselfe, that which way soeuer he went, thither must al things follow also. Wherfore by one of his most trustie friends, he secretly made the old Emperour acquainted with his purposed reuolt, and how all things stood: for the greater credit thereof, alleadging, That he could not abide the sight of him that sought to corrupt his wife, meaning the young Prince. This newes from Syrgiannes was vnto the old Emperour most wel- L come: for it grieued him, as an old man of a great spirit, to see himselfe so contemned and deluded by his nephew, his empire rent, and his old seruitours, of all sorts, by him spoiled of their lands and possessions in MACEDONIA and THRACIA. So a solemne oath in secret passed from the one to the other, Syrgiannes without longer stay secretly fled to CONSTANTINOPLE: which there bruited abroad, reioyced many, now well hoping the whole gouernment would againe come vnto the old Emperour, and that so they should againe recouer their possessions wrongfully taken from them by his nephew. But God not seeing it so good, all this hope was but vaine, as ere long it appeared: for the young Prince, who of long knew how much he was beloued of the Constantinopolitanes, and by them secretly sent for; taking occasion vpon the flight of Syrgiannes, with all the power he could make, marched towards the citie: and being M come within sight therof, encamped, laying ambushes vpon euery way and passage thereabout, for to haue intercepted Syrgiannes; who was then at PERINTHVS, and the third night after, with three hundred select souldiers, deceiuing them that lay in wait for him, as if they had been all asleepe, before the rising of the Sun came to CONSTANTINOPLE: and if the old Emperour would haue giuen him leaue, had suddenly charged them that lay in wait for him, before they were

A were aware of his comming. But as soone as it was day, the Prince hearing of the escape of Syrgiannes, and no such tumult in the citie as he had expected, presently without more adoe retired with his armie the same way he came, backe againe into THRACIA.

By and by after, Constantine the Despot was by the old Emperour his brother sent by sea to THESSALONICA, to take vpon him the gouernment of MACEDONIA, and by the way to apprehend Xene the Empresse, the young Princes mother; and after with all the power he could make to inuade the young Prince in THRACIA: that so setting vpon him on the one side out of MACEDONIA, and Syrgiannes with the Turks (for the Emperour in this ciuill discord was glad to vse their helpe also) and the Bythinian souldiers on the other, they might so shut him vp
B betwixt them and take him. According to which resolution, the Despot comming to THESSALONICA, there tooke the Empresse, whom with all her familie he thrust into a gallie, and so sent her to CONSTANTINOPLE, where she was in the palace kept close, as too much fauouring the proceedings of the Prince. And afterward raising all the power he could in MACEDONIA, inuaded the Prince in THRACIA, breaking by force thorow the wall of CHRISTOPOLIS.

The young Prince seeing himselfe by this meanes, now like to be driuen to a great strait, sent Synadenus with his Thracian armie, to defend the frontiers of his empire towards CONSTANTINOPLE, against Syrgiannes with his Turks and Bythinians: in hope himselfe by many subtle deuices & slights, to be able to encounter his vncle the Despot. And first he caused diuers edicts and proscriptions to be written in haste, wherin great rewards and preferments were with great
C solemnitie of words promised to whomsoeuer could bring vnto him the Despot either quicke or dead: which were of purpose giuen vnto the country people passing to and fro, to be dispersed abroad in the high waies, & about in the country neere vnto the Despots campe. And after that, he caused the death of the Emperour his grandfather to be euery where proclaimed, and how that he was by the Constantinopolitans in a tumult slaine: which the deuisers thereof, in euery place reported. Yea some there were, that swore they were themselues present at his woefull death, and saw it with their eies: othersome, more certainly to perswade the matter, shewed long white goats haires, or such like gathered out of white wool, as if they had beene by the furious people pluckt from the old Emperors head or beard, at such time as he was slaine. Which things being commonly reported in euery towne and village, but especially in the Despots
D campe, wonderfully filled mens heads with diuers strange and doubtfull thoughts: then diuers also of the dispersed edicts being found, & brought vnto the Despot, strucke him (and not without cause) into a great feare; insomuch, that by the perswasion of his best friends, he without longer stay retired in haste to THESSALONICA. Whither shortly after came a gallie from CONSTANTINOPLE, with secret letters from the Emperour to the Despot, for the apprehension of fiue and twentie of the chiefe citizens, vehemently suspected for the stirring vp of the people to rebellion, and so to haue deliuered the citie vnto the Prince: all whom the Despot should haue sent bound in that gallie to CONSTANTINOPLE: but they in good time perceiuing the danger they were in, secretly stirring vp the people, and by and by after ringing out the bels (the signall appointed for the beginning of the rebellion) had in a very short time raised a wonderfull tu-E mult in the citie; insomuch, that all the citizens were vp in armes, who running headlong vnto the house of the Despot, found not him (for he forewarned of their comming, was fled into the castle) but slew all they met of his, or else robbing them, cast them in prison. As for the Despots house, they tooke what they found therein, and afterwards pulled it downe to the ground. Then comming to the castle, they fired the gates: which the Despot seeing, and not able to defend the place, tooke horse & fled vnto a monasterie not far off, where being taken by them that pursued him, he ful sore against his will, for the safegard of his life, tooke vpon him the habit of a Monke: neuertheless, he was from thence caried prisoner to the young Prince his nephew, who shewed himselfe much more courteous vnto him, than al the rest of his nobilitie & waiters: for they, as if they would haue eaten him vp, were euen forthwith ready to haue torne him in peeces, had not F the Prince embracing him in his armes, saued his life. Yet the next day after, by the perswasion of his counsell, he sent him to DIDIMOTICHVM, where he was cast into a most loathsome prison, being very deepe and straight, in manner of a well, no bodie to attend vpon him but one boy, where he lay in miserable darknesse and stinke; they which drew vp his ordure from him and the boy, whether by chance or of purpose, pouring it oftentimes vpon his head. Where after he had lien a great while in most extreme miserie, wishing to die and could not; he was at length by the Princes commandement (entreated thereunto by certaine religious men) remoued into a more easie prison, where we will for euer leaue him. G Andronicus the old Emperour seeketh for counsell of the Psalter, as of an heauenly Oracle, and so seeketh to make peace with his nephew. Psal. 68. vers. 14.

length

Things falling out crosse with the old Emperour, and although they were neuer so well deuised, still sorting out vnto the worst, he became very pensiue and doubtfull what to doe. So it fortuned, that one day in his melancholie mood hauing a Psalter in his hand, to resolue his doubtfull minde, he opened the same, as if it were of that heauenly Oracle to aske counsell: where in the first verse that he light vpon was, Dum cœlestis dissociat reges, niue conspergentur in Salmon: When the Almightie scattered Kings (for their sakes) then were they as white as snow in Salmon. Which he applying to himselfe, as if all those troubles, and whatsoeuer else had happened in them, proceeded from the will of God, although for causes to him vnknowne: he H by and by sought to reconcile himselfe vnto his nephew; contrary to the minde of Syrgiannes, desiring nothing but trouble. For (as we haue before said) the young Prince although he was desirous of the power and libertie of an Emperour, yet he left the ornaments and care thereof vnto his grandfather: and had he not oftentimes and earnestly beene egged forward by his companions to affect the whole empire, happily could and would haue contented himselfe with the former pacification: for being now sent for, he came first to RHEGIVM, and there visited his mother (now set at libertie, and sent thither for the furtherance of the desired pacification) where he with her and by her counsell did whatsoeuer was there done. So within a few daies the matter was brought into so good tearmes, that an attonement was made, and he himselfe went and met the Emperour his grandfather before the gates of the citie: the old Emperour sitting then vpon his horse, and the Prince lighting from his, a good furlong before he I came at him: and although his grandfather was very vnwilling, and forbade him so to doe, yet he came to him on foot, and kissed his hand and foot as he sate on horsebacke; and afterward taking horse, embraced him, and there kissed one another, to the great contentment of the beholders: and so hauing talked some few words, departed, the old man into the citie, and the young man into his campe, which then lay neere vnto PEGA: where staying certaine daies, he came diuers times into CONSTANTINOPLE, and so went out againe; for as then his mother, partly for her health, partly for the loue of her sonne, lay at PEGA.

But Syrgiannes nothing glad of the agreement made betwixt the Emperour and his nephew, walked vp and downe sicke in minde, with a heauie countenance, especially for that in time of K peace his busie head stood the common weale in no stead. Wherefore in all meetings & assemblies, he willingly conuersed with them which most disliked of the present state, and spake hardly as well of the Emperour as of his nephew, wronged as he thought by them both; whereas in the time of their greatest distresse he had (as he said) stood them in good stead. But seeing one Asanes Andronicus walking melancholie vp and downe, as a man with heauinesse oppressed; who hauing done good seruice for the young Prince, & not of him regarded, had fled vnto the old Emperour, and there found no such thing as he expected for the ease of his griefe, although he were a man honourably borne, and otherwaies endued with many good parts: with him Syrgiannes acquainted himselfe, as grieued with the like griefe that he himselfe was: with whom as with his friend, without any dissimulation he plainly discoursed of all such things as his griefe L desired. But Asanes handling him with great wisedome, did himselfe with like words speake hardly both of the Emperour and his nephew; but yet curiously noted whatsoeuer Syrgiannes said, for he had before hated him for his ambition, and as then tooke it in displeasure, that he was enemie vnto Catacuzenus, his son in law, who was all in all with the young Prince, and did oftentimes comfort him. But the song being throughly set, Asanes came secretly vnto the old Emperour, and told him the whole matter; and in fine, that except he betime laid hold vpon Syrgiannes, affecting the empire, he should in short time be by him brought to his end. Whereupon Syrgiannes was forthwith clapped fast in prison: whose house, with all his wealth, the common people tooke the spoile of; and not contented to haue rased it downe to the ground, conuerted the site thereof, together with the pleasant vineyards adioyning vnto the same, into a place to M feed goats & sheepe in: a worthie reward for his manifold trecheries. The young Prince shortly after going to CONSTANTINOPLE, was there crowned Emperour, as fellow in the empire with his grandfather: vnto which solemnitie in the great temple of Sophia, both the Emperors riding, it fortuned the old Emperour by the stumbling of his horse to be ouerthrowne, and foulely beraied in the mire, the streets being then very foule by reason of the great raine but a little before fallen:

A fallen: which many tooke as ominous, and portending the euill fortune which ſhortly after befell him. During the time of this peace, it fortuned that as the young Prince was a hunting in CHERSONESVS, ſeuentie Turks, aduenturers, were by force of weather driuen on ſhore: who before they would yeeld themſelues priſoners, made a great fight with the Emperors men, and ſlew diuers of them; in which conflict the young Emperor himſelfe was wounded in the foot, wherewith he was a great while after exceedingly tormented.

Andronicus the late Prince, and now fellow in the empire with his aged grandfather, held not himſelfe long ſo contented, but after the manner of ambitious men (and continually prickt forward by his aſpiring fauourites) longed to haue the whole gouernment vnto himſelfe, which
B hardly brooketh any partner: and therefore wearie to ſee his grandfather liue ſo long, reſolued no longer to expect his naturall death, (although it could not by courſe of nature be farre off) but by one deuice or other to thruſt him frō the gouernment; or if that might not be wrought, at once to diſpatch him both of life and ſtate together. And the ſurer to lay the plot whereon ſo foule and horrible a treaſon was to be built, he by the counſell of his mother and others, by whom he was moſt directed, ſent for Michael the Prince of BVLGARIA, his brother in law (though before to him vnknowne, as was his wife his ſiſter alſo) to make with him a firme league, to the intent by him to prouide, that if the Prince of SERVIA (who had but lately married the old Emperours nigh kinſwoman, and ſo to him much deuoted) ſhould take part with him, he ſhould by the Bulgarian his neighbour be intangled. Who ſo ſent for, with his wife,
C the old Emperours daughter, came to DIDYMOTICHVM, where they were many dayes moſt honourably entertained both by the young Emperour and his mother: for why, this meeting plotted vpon great treaſon, was finely coloured, with the deſire the young Emperour had to ſee his ſiſter and her huſband, as before vnto him vnknowne; and the Empreſſe, her daughter, whom ſhe had not ſeene in three and twentie yeeres before. But the ſecret concluſion betwixt them was, that the Bulgarian Prince ſhould to the vttermoſt of his power aid the young Emperour againſt his grandfather, and he likewiſe him againſt the Seruian, as he ſhould haue need: and further, that if his grandfather being depoſed, he ſhould recouer the whole empire, then to giue him a great ſumme of mony, with certaine ſpeciall cities and prouinces confining vpon him, as in dowrie vnto his kind brother in law, and companion in his labours. So Michael D the Bulgarian Prince honourably entertained by the young Emperor and the old Empreſſe his mother in law, loaded with rewards, and promiſes of greater, returned home into his countrey.

A treacherous meeting.

This matter thus diſpatched, the young Emperour therewith encouraged, and knowing alſo the Conſtantinopolitans, beſides the other cities of THRACIA, exceedingly to fauour him and his proceedings; by whom alſo he was ſecretly inuited to haſten his comming thither (as wearie of the long life & lazineſſe, as he tearmed it, of his grandfather) thought it beſt cunningly to goe about the matter; that ſo his grandfather being with as little ſtir as might be depoſed, he himſelfe might alone enioy the empire. But needing mony for the effecting of ſo great matters, he by force tooke all the money from the collectors, whom the old Emperour had ſent into THRACIA for the taking vp of money there; telling them, that he was an Emperour alſo, and in E need of money, and that the common charge was likewiſe by the common purſe to be diſcharged. After that he tooke his way towards CONSTANTINOPLE, pretending that vpon ſpeciall cauſes he had occaſion to ſend embaſſadours vnto the Sultan of ÆGYPT: for the tranſporting of whom he was there to take order for the ſetting forth of a great ſhip, and other things neceſſarie for the iourney. Neither went he ſlenderly appointed, but with a great power; and the cities of THRACIA before well aſſured vnto him, ſuch as he ſuſpected being thruſt out of office, & others more aſſured vnto him placed in their ſteads But whilſt he thus beſtirreth himſelfe, one of thoſe that were moſt inward with him, deteſting ſo foule a treaſon, ſecretly fled from him vnto his grandfather, from point to point diſcouering vnto him all the intended treacheries; and withall, how that his nephew had determined to depoſe him from his empire, or F otherwiſe to bereaue him of his life if he ſhould ſtand vpon his guard: but if in the attempt he ſhould finde eaſie ſucceſſe, then to ſpare his life; and depriuing him of the imperiall dignitie, to thruſt him as a Monke into a monaſterie: and therefore aduiſed him to beware how he ſuffered him after his wonted manner to come into the citie, for feare of a generall reuolt, but rather by force to keepe him out. Which the Emperour hearing, and comparing with other things which he had heard of others, yet ſounding in his eares, deeming it to be true, ſtood vp, and in the anguiſh guiſh of his ſoule thus complained vnto God: Reuenge my quarrell, O God, vpon them that doe me C wrong, and let them be aſhamed that riſe vp againſt me: and preſerue thou vnto me the imperiall power, which by thee giuen vnto me, he commeth to take from me whom I my ſelfe begot and aduanced. After, he began to conſider what courſe to take for the aſſurance of himſelfe and his ſtate in ſo great a danger. And firſt he ſent vnto his nephew (come halfe way) to forbid him from entring the citie, and to tell him, that it was a great follie for him, being ſo manifeſt a traitour, both vnto his grandfather and the ſtate, to thinke his traiterous purpoſes to be vnknowne vnto the world: and beſide, in way of reproofe to rehearſe vnto him, how many occaſions he had giuen for the breaking of the league with his grandfather: firſt, in taking away the mony from the collectors, whereof the ſtate neuer ſtood in more need, by reaſon of the diuiſion of the empire, which re- H quired double charge; then, in that he had in the citie euery where diſplaced ſuch gouernours and magiſtrates as his grandfather had ſent thither, and placed others at his pleaſure; with many other like facts, declaring his trecherous aſpiring minde, for which he was not without cauſe by his grandfather forbidden to enter the citie. After that, the old Emperor by ſecret letters craued aid of Crales Prince of SERVIA, and Demetrius the Deſpot his ſonne, who was then gouernour of THESSALONICA and the countries adioyning; commanding him, with Andronicus and Michael his nephewes (gouernours of MACEDONIA) with all the forces they were able to raiſe, and ſuch aid as ſhould be ſent vnto them out of SERVIA, with all ſpeed to ioyne together and to goe againſt the young Emperour. But theſe letters thus written vnto the Prince of SERVIA, the Deſpot, and others, (as is before ſaid) were for the moſt part intercepted, by ſuch as the I young Emperour had for that purpoſe placed vpon the ſtraits of CHRISTOPOLIS, and the other paſſages; eſpecially ſuch as were written in paper, yet ſome others in fine white linnen cloth, & ſecretly ſowed in the garments of ſuch as caried them, eſcaped for all their ſtrait ſearch, and ſo were deliuered. And in truth nothing was done, or about to be done in CONSTANTINOPLE, but that the young Emperour was by one or other aduertiſed thereof: whereas the old Emperor on the other ſide, vnderſtood nothing what his nephew did abroad, or intended. For all men of their owne accord inclined vnto him, ſome openly both bodie and ſoule (as they ſay) and ſuch as could not be with him in perſon, yet in minde and good will were euen preſent with him; and that not onely the common ſort of the citizens of CONSTANTINOPLE, but the chiefe Senatours, the great courtiers, yea and many other of the Emperours neereſt kinſmen K alſo: who curiouſly obſeruing whatſoeuer was done in the citie, forthwith certified him thereof. Amongſt whom was alſo Theodorus the Marqueſſe, one of the old Emperors owne ſons: who many yeeres before by the Empreſſe his mother ſent into ITALY, and there honorably married, was by his prodigall courſe of life there, growne far in debt; ſo that leauing his wife & children behind him, he was glad after the deceaſe of his mother, to flie vnto his father at CONSTANTINOPLE, and there now liued; who beſide that he moſt honourably maintained him in the court, and beſtowed many great things vpon him, paid alſo all his debts, which were very great. All which fatherly kindnes he forgetting, went about moſt Iudas like to haue betraied his aged father. For he alſo dreaming after the empire, and for many cauſes (but eſpecially for that he was in mind, religion, manners, and habit, become a Latine) by him reiected, thought he could L not doe him a greater deſpight than by reuolting vnto the young Emperour: ſo that the neerer he was in bloud, the more he was his fathers vnnaturall enemie. Shortly after, Demetrius the Deſpot hauing receiued the Emperours letters at THESSALONICA, called vnto him Andronicus and Michael his nephewes, the gouernours of MACEDONIA; with whom ioyning all his forces, and daily expecting more aid out of SERVIA, he firſt ſpoiled the young Emperors friends and fauourites in MACEDONIA, giuing the ſpoile of them in all the cities and townes of MACEDONIA vnto their ſouldiers, who made hauocke of whatſoeuer they light vpon: and whoſoeuer ſeemed any way to withſtand them or diſlike of their proceedings, their goods and lands they confiſcated, and draue the men themſelues into exile. Neither was the young Empe- M rour Andronicus in the meane time idle, but ſecretly ſent out his edicts into all parts of the empire, yea into the very cities of CONSTANTINOPLE and THESSALONICA, and ouer all MACEDONIA: whereby he proclaimed vnto the people in generall, a releaſement of them from all tributes, impoſitions, and paiments; and frankly promiſed vnto the ſouldiers and men of war, the augmenting of their penſions and pay: which were no ſooner bruited, but that moſt men were therewith moued, both in word and deed to fauour his proceedings, doing what

A they could to further the ſame, and by ſecret letters inuiting him to haſten his comming into the citie: who thereupon comming to RHEGIVM, by his embaſſadours ſent from thence, requeſted the old Emperour, either to giue him leaue according to the league betwixt them, to come into the citie, or elſe to ſend him certaine of the chiefe of the nobilitie and cleargie, with ſome of the better and more vnderſtanding ſort of the Burgers and citizens alſo, vnto whom he might frankly ſpeake his minde: for them faithfully to deliuer the ſame againe vnto the Emperour his grandfather, and the people. Which requeſts the old Emperour perceiuing to be full of deceit and trecherie, for a good ſpace anſwered thereunto nothing at all, but ſtood all ſilent, as doubting which to grant: for, to ſuffer his nephew to come into the citie, he ſaw was dangerous,
B the citizens (as he well knew) being for the moſt part inclined to reuolt vnto him ſo ſoone as they ſhould once ſee him within the gates; and to ſend any forth vnto him, as he deſired, might be (as he feared) an occaſion of ſome tumult to be after raiſed in the citie: for he knew that his nephewes drift therein was, openly by faire words, and ſecretly with great gifts and large promiſes, firſt to gaine them, and by them the reſt of the citizens. Both which things being dangerous, he made choice of the eaſier, and ſent forth vnto him two of the moſt noble Senators, two of the moſt reuerend Biſhops, two other graue Prelates, and foure of the chiefe Burgeſſes of the citie: vnto whom, at their comming vnto him, he in the open hearing of all men deliuered this premeditated and craftie ſpeech:

C It is not vnknowne vnto the world, you my ſubiects to haue alwayes beene vnto mee more deare than I haue beene vnto my ſelfe: and how that I haue not vpon any ambitious conceit, or deſire of the ſole gouernment, againſt my grandfathers good will, gone out. For you ſee how that I neither ſpare mine owne life, or attend my pleaſure, for the care I haue of you: I come not vnto you compaſſed about with a guard of armed men, as is the manner not of Kings onely, for the enuie of their high place, but of others alſo of farre meaner calling, whom diſaſter fortune, baniſhed from their parents and kinred, hath enforced to wander here and there, with death alwayes before their eyes. Let any man tell me how I came by theſe wounds which I yet beare in my bodie, but in fight with the enemies of my countrey which paſſe ouer out of ASIA into THRACIA; or elſe dwelling neere vnto ISTER, doe with their incurſions from thence miſerably waſte that ſide of THRACIA which is next vnto them? For I (to D tell you the very truth) ſeeing the old Emperour by reaſon of his great yeeres to become ſlothfull and blockiſh, and not poſſibly to be awaked out of his drowſie ſleepe, neither any whit to grieue, when as the poore Chriſtians his ſubiects were both by day and night, ſome as ſacrifices ſlaine by the barbarous enemies, ſome carried away into moſt miſerable captiuitie, and the reſt poore and naked to be driuen out of their houſes and cities; not to ſpeake in the meane time of the greater miſchiefes in ASIA, and how many cities haue beene there loſt through the old Emperours ſloth and negligence: when I ſaw theſe things (I ſay) ſtrucken with a piercing griefe, which my heart could not endure, I went out for two cauſes, either by ſome kinde of honourable death to end my griefe together with my life, or elſe to the vttermoſt of my power to ſtand my countrey in ſome ſtead. For by no meanes it can come to paſſe, but that a man, and he that hath of long time reigned, muſt at length become loathſome vnto his ſubiects, E and incurre their deadly hatred. For why, God hath made nothing in this life immutable and firme: whereby it commeth to paſſe, as we ſee, that all worldly things ioy and delight in change. But if a man will as it were force fortune to his deſire, and ſtriue to binde things vnto a certaine firme and conſtant courſe, he ſhall but loſe his labour, and in vaine ſtriue againſt nature. But whatſoeuer is contrary vnto nature, or exceedeth the iuſt bounds thereof, hath in it neither comfort nor delight. This was it that cauſed the wiſe men to ſay, and to leaue vnto vs as rules: Not to dwell too long vpon any thing; and a meaſure to be the faireſt vertue. For you ſee how that my grandfather being growne to great yeeres, and hauing raigned ſo long (I may almoſt ſay) as neuer did any but he, is become hatefull vnto all his people; and yet regardeth not either how to diſcharge himſelfe of ſo great a burthen, or how to releeue the declining ſtate of the empire, or ſo much as greeueth to ſee the ſucceſſours of the empire to F die before him: for my father is dead without any fruit of the empire, except the bare title onely; and others alſo neereſt to him of bloud, and farre younger than he, are dead likewiſe: and happily I my ſelfe may die alſo before I ſhall receiue any profit thereof: for what can more eaſily happen, eſpecially vnto a man that ſhunneth no danger, and regardeth not his life? But ſome perhaps will ſuſpect me of ambition, for departing from the Emperour my grandfather, and for refuſing to be ruled by him. Which thing I neither flatly denie, nor altogether confeſſe: for might I ſee the empire increaſe, and the bounds

bounds thereof enlarged, I could willingly content my ſelfe, and at my eaſe take my reſt ; cheering my G ſelfe vp with ſuch hope as doe they that beare with their cookes, making them to ſtay long for their dinner, in hope thereby to fare the better. But ſeeing the ſtate of the empire daily to decline from euill to worſe, and the miſerable people carried away captiues, or ſlaine by their enemies euen at the gates and vnder the wals of the imperiall citie : what deeme you mee then to thinke ? For moſt men eaſe their preſent griefe, with the hope of future good, although the ſame be but vaine : but vnto mee is not left euen ſuch vaine hope vnto my falſe comfort. And can you marueil at the impotent affection of the Great Alexander of Macedon, grieued and diſpleaſed to ſee his father to heape victorie vpon victorie, and to cut off all the hope of his ſonnes glorie, by leauing him ſo few occaſions of warre ; and not thinke me (to whom you ſee the quite contrarie is chanced, and from whom not only the hope of the H empire is cut off, for the waſting thereof, but euen the courſe of a quiet life) to fret and grieue thereat ?
Moued herewith, and not able longer to endure it, at length I riſe vp, and requeſted of the Emperour my grandfather, but a thouſand men at armes, promiſing him by the power of God with them to pre-ſerue the cities in Bythinia, and to driue his enemies farther off, before that hauing them, they ſhould paſſe ouer the ſtrait, and beſiege the imperiall citie of Constantinople : which ſo ſmall a requeſt he not onely denied me, but hath euer ſince taken me for his mortall enemie. But this and many other things elſe let paſſe : I haue now another requeſt vnto him by you, which is, That he would giue me eight thouſand duckats to content my ſouldiers withall, who now of long haue from place to place romed vp and downe with mee, following mine vncertaine fortune : which granted, I will no more be vnto my grandfather troubleſome, but diſmiſſing my forces, hold my ſelfe right well I contented.

Hauing thus ſaid, he riſe out of his ſeat, and taking them apart one after another, courteouſly diſcourſed with them, and ſo filling them with great hopes, ſent them away : who departing from him and comming into the citie, became as it were the open proclaimers of his praiſes, enflaming the people with a greater deſire of him than before. Which the old Emperour hearing, and perceiuing almoſt all his friends in the citie to be in heart reuolted from him ; and withall fearing to be of them in ſome ſudden concourſe ſlaine, was therewith exceedingly vexed. Yet he thought it beſt before any ſuch thing ſhould happen, to proue their minds, and to heare the counſell of the Patriarch, and Aſanes, and the other Biſhops alſo : vnto whom be- K ing by one of the Senators called together, he declared his mind as followeth :

The ſpeech of the old Emperour vnto the Patriarch and the reſt of the Biſhops and Nobilitie, concerning the young Emperour his nephew.

Were I aſſured, that hauing depoſed my ſelfe of the imperiall dignitie, I ſhould my ſelfe liue in ſafetie, and ſee my people well gouerned, I would I ſhould neuer be of the companie of the faithfull, if I did not by much prefer a pleaſant quiet contented life before an empire. For if a man would ſeeke for the pleaſure of the mind, what can be more pleaſant, than be diſburdened of all cares, and free from ſuch dangers as attend high eſtates ? But if for my ſinne and the ſins of my people, as alſo for the ſinne of mine anceſtors, the vengeance of God in manner of a violent tempeſt raging againſt vs, ſubuerteth our Empire : and I yet but a youth, by the helpe of God reformed and quieted the ſtate of the Empire, grieuouſly troubled with diſcord in the Church, and the often inuaſion of the enemie ; and taught by long experience, L know not now in ſo great a hurle and tempeſt which way to turne my ſelfe : how can I with ſafetie commit vnto my nephew ſo great a charge, who as yet is both an vnſtayed youth, and ſo careleſſe of his owne good as that hee knoweth not how well to gouerne his owne priuat affaires ? For giuing ouer his power vnto young vnskilfull men, and hauing flung away his imperiall poſſeſſions amongſt them, hee himſelfe liueth in penurie and want ; neither regardeth any thing more than his dogges and kites, of whom hee keepeth few leſſe than a thouſand curres, and as many hawkes, and not much fewer men to looke vnto them. Wherefore vnto ſuch a man, how may I ſafely commit either my life, or the adminiſtration of mine Empire, by God committed vnto mee ? But I will neuer witting and willingly caſt away either my ſubiects or my ſelfe. For my nephew I haue loued, not onely more than my wife and children, but (to ſay the truth) more than my ſelfe alſo ; as you all know how tenderly I M haue brought him vp, how carefully I haue inſtructed and aduiſed him, as purpoſing to haue left him the heire and ſucceſſour both of my wiſedome and mine empire, that ſo hee might the better pleaſe both God and man. But he, contemning my good counſell, hath ſpent whole nights in banquet-ting, and riot, and brothelhouſes ; wherein hee hath alſo ſlaine his owne brother : and to bee breefe, hee hath riſen and lifted vp his hand againſt mee his grandfather, and a grandfather that had

A had of him ſo well deſerued, attempting ſuch a villanie as the Sunne neuer ſaw. Wherefore you ought alſo to hate and deteſt his wickedneſſe, and to riſe vp to reſtraine his impudent diſloyaltie, and by your eccleſiaſticall cenſure to denounce him vnworthie of the empire and the communion of the faithfull, as one ſeparated from God, that ſo aſhamed and corrected, he may louingly thither returne from whence he is ſhamefully departed, and againe be made heire both of mine empire and ſtaiedneſſe: for there is no man aliue whom I had rather haue promoted vnto the empire, ſo that he would heare my precepts, and obey my counſell. As for the concluſion he vſed in his former ſpeech, it was altogether fained, craftie, and malicious: for you haue heard how many reproches he hath giuen me in all that ſpeech, wherewith his concluſion agreeth not: but the more to ſtir vp the hearers thereof againſt me, did of purpoſe ſo con-
B clude his ſpeech.

Vpon this, moſt of the foreſaid graue and learned Biſhops agreed that the young Emperour ſhould no more be named in the praiers of the Church, vntill he had better conformed himſelfe. Howbeit the Patriarch and ſome others ſecretly fauouring both him and his proceedings, liked not thereof, and therefore ſaying nothing thereunto, returned home vnto their owne houſes. But meeting once or twiſe afterwards in the Patriarch his houſe, they there conſpired together againſt the old Emperour; with whom alſo diuers of the nobilitie conſented: and thereupon an oath was conceiued in writing, whereby they bound themſelues, to continue conſtant in that their wicked reſolution. Whereupon, about three dayes after, the Patriarch cauſing the
C bels to be rung; and a great number of the vulgar people flocking together, pronounced the ſentence of excommunication againſt all ſuch as ſhould in their publike praiers omit the name of the young Emperour, or refuſe to doe him all honour due vnto an Emperour. Which thing not a little grieued the old Emperour, as appeared by his ſpeech, in ſaying, If the Doctor of peace be ſo mad againſt vs, in hope of reward promiſed by my nephew, that caſting off all ſhame and grauitie, he doubteth not to be the authour of ſedition; who ſhall repreſſe the raſh attempts of the vulgar people againſt vs, if we reſpect but mans helpe? For the Patriarch ſo much as in him lieth is, I ſee, the murtherer of vs. So the Biſhops of the contrary faction, moued with the notable impudencie of the Patriarch, excommunicated him likewiſe, as he had done them, with his mad followers, as the authours of ſedition and faction, and incited with bribes to the troubling of the ſtate: for D which cauſe alſo he was by the Emperors commandement committed vnto ſafe keeping in the monaſterie called MANGANIVM. But about two daies after, the young Emperor came to the wals of CONSTANTINOPLE, to know how his grandfather had accepted the meſſengers ſent vnto him; earneſtly requeſting that it might be lawfull for him alone to enter into the citie, to doe his dutie to his grandfather. But neither he, neither his words were at all regarded, but was by ſuch as ſtood vpon the wals himſelfe with ſtones driuen away; who could not abide to heare him ſpeake, but ſhamefully railed at him, ſaying all his talke to be nothing elſe but deceit and fraud: and ſo for that time he retired a little from the wals. But night being come, certaine buſie heads amongſt the common people (and they not few) ſecretly meeting together, gaue him knowledge, That about midnight when as all the citizens were aſleepe, and the watchmen
E in ſecuritie, he ſhould come vnto the wals, where they would be readie with ropes to draw him vp vnto the top of the bulwarkes, which done, the matter (as they ſaid) were as good as diſpatched: for that they were perſwaded, that the citizens ſo ſoone as they ſhould once ſee him in the middeſt of the citie amongſt them, would forthwith all reuolt vnto him. So he according vnto this appointment, about midnight approching the wals, found there no ſuch matter as he had well hoped, for the receiuing of him into the citie; but contrariwiſe, the watchmen carefully watching all alongſt the wall, and calling one vnto another. Wherefore finding there no hope, he with Catacuzenus and Synadenus, his chiefe counſellors, leauing the South ſide of the citie, in a little boat rowed ſoftly all along the wall that is towards the ſea, if happily they might there finde their friends, and ſo be receiued in: but there the watchmen alſo deſcrying them
F from the wals, and calling vnto them, but receiuing no anſwere, began to caſt ſtones at them, and to make a noiſe: ſo that deceiued of their purpoſe, and out of hope, they were glad to get them farther off, and to depart as they came.

The Patriarch with diuers of the Biſhops conſpire againſt the old Emperour.

But the euill ſucceſſe of this exploit was ſhortly after with his better fortune recompenced: for by and by after, ſecret letters were ſent vnto him from THESSALONICA, requeſting him with all ſpeed to come thither, aſſuring him in the name of the Biſhop with diuers of the nobili-tie, and the good liking of the people in generall, at his comming to open the gates of the citie G vnto him: whereupon he leauing a great part of his armie with Synadenus, to keepe short the Constantinopolitanes, he himselfe with the rest of his power set forward towards THESSALONICA, where he in the habit of a plaine countrey man entred the citie vnsuspected: but being got within the gate, & there casting off that simple attire wherewith he had couered his rich and royall garments, and presently knowne to be the young Emperour, the people came flocking about him, and with many ioyfull acclamations receiued him as their Lord and Soueraigne: yet some few, more fauouring the old Emperor, fled into the castle, & there stood vpon their guard; which after they had for a space notably defended, was at length taken from them.

THESSALONICA thus yeelded, Demetrius, Andronicus, and Asan Michael, the old Empe- H rours chiefe captaines, then lying with his armie not far off, and not well trusting one another, fled; most of whose souldiers presently went ouer vnto the young Emperour: who departing from THESSALONICA, came to SERRE, which by composition was deliuered vnto him also, but not the castle: for that was by Basilicus Nicephorus (the captaine thereof) still holden for the old Emperor. This Basilicus was a man honourably descended, but of no great capacitie or wit, as the finer sort supposed, and therfore not of them much regarded or thought fit for the taking in hand of any great matter: whom yet the old Emperour for his plaine sinceritie, more than for any thing else, had made captaine of that castle and gouernour of the countrey thereabouts; which he yet still held, and in these most troublesome times shewed himselfe wiser than them all that had so thought of him: of whom some died in despaire, some fled, some were taken I prisoners, and so suffered a thousand euils, the rest with the losse of their honour traiterously reuolting from the old Emperor to the young: whereas he alone, looking but euen forward vpon his allegeance, with his trust in God, so long as the old Emperor liued, opposed himselfe against these troubles, and stood fast for him, and was not to be moued with any faire promises or cruel threats of the young aspiring Emperor, whereof he lacked none. But hauing strongly fortified the castle committed to his charge, there kept himselfe, vntill that hearing of the death of the old Emperor, he then reconciling himselfe vnto the young, as vnto his right Soueraigne, deliuered vp vnto him the castle: who in reward of his fidelitie, gaue it him againe to hold for him, in as ample manner as he had before held it from his grandfather: for wise men honour vertue euen in their enemies, as did King Philip in Demosthenes, when as he said, If any Athenian liuing in K Athens, doth say that he preferreth me before his countrey, him verily would I buy with much money, but not thinke him worthie my friendship. But if any for his countries sake shall hate me, him will I impugne as a castle, a strong wall, or a bulwarke; and yet admire his vertue, and reckon the citie happie in hauing such a man. And so in few words to conclude a long discourse, the young Emperor in short time hauing romed thorow all MACEDONIA, and without resistance taken all the strong townes and cities therein, he there tooke also Demetrius the Despots wife and children, with all his treasure, as also the wiues of Andronicus and Asanes, and of all the Senators that followed them: after whom the great commanders their husbands were also for the most part taken & cast in prison, some at THESSALONICA, some at DIDIMOTICHVM, some of the rest afterwards most miserably perishing in exile. Wherewith the old Emperour discouraged, was about to haue sent his L embassadours vnto his nephew for peace, whilest he was yet thus busied in MACEDONIA: and had indeed so done, had not another hope arising in the meane time, quite altered that his better purpose. It fortuned at the same time, whilest the old Emperour was thus thinking of peace, that Michael the Bulgarian Prince, in hope of great profit thereof to arise, secretly offered his aid vnto him against the young Emperour his nephew: of which his offer, the old Emperour gladly accepted, and embassadours were sent to and fro about the full conclusion of the matter, no man being acquainted therewith more than two or three of the Emperour his most secret friends and trustie counsellors. Yet in the meane time, disdaining to be so coupt vp as he was by Synadenus, one of his nephewes captaines, euen in the imperiall citie; sent out one Constantinus Assan, with the greatest part of his strength against him: who encountring him M at the riuer MAVRVS, was there by him in plaine battell ouerthrowne and taken prisoner, the rest of his discomfited armie flying headlong backe againe to CONSTANTINOPLE. All things thus prosperously proceeding with the young Emperour, and the countries of MACEDONIA and THRACIA now almost all at his command, he returned in haste with all his power to CONSTANTINOPLE, to preuent the comming of the Bulgarians thither: as fearing left

A left that they finding the citie weakly manned, ſhould trecherouſly kill the old Emperour with ſuch as were about him, and ſo ſeize vpon the citie themſelues: or at leaſtwiſe giue him ſuch aid as might keepe him out, and ſo cut off all his hope for obtaining of the ſame. At which time alſo there was great want of victuall in the citie, he with his armie hauing ſhut it vp on the one ſide by land, and the Venetians with their gallies on the other ſide by ſea: who then at ods with the Genowaies dwelling at PERA, kept all that ſtrait ſea betwixt EVROPE and ASIA, in ſuch ſort, as that neither victuals nor marchandiſe could be brought that way, either to CONSTANTINOPLE or PERA. The young Emperour comming to CONSTANTINOPLE, attempted at his firſt comming to haue entred the citie, in hope without any great reſiſtance to haue beene re-
B ceiued; but repulſed by the defendants, was glad to get him further off. About this time came alſo vnto the citie three thouſand horſemen, the promiſed aid of the Bulgarian Prince vnto the old Emperor: who although he wanted men, and was right glad of their comming, yet remembring the harmes he had before receiued by forraine aid, and not now daring to truſt them too far, ſuffered not them to come into the citie, more than their Generall and ſome few others of their commanders with him. Now the young Emperour vpon the comming of this aid, leſt ſome great harme might betide either the old Emperour, or himſelfe, to the vtter ſubuerſion of their ſtate; ſecretly ſent vnto his grandfather, requeſting him to be well aduiſed how he truſted thoſe forraine people too far; offering himſelfe to doe whatſoeuer he ſhould command, rather than ſo great a harme ſhould happen vnto either of them, as was from them to be feared. But
C the truſt the old Emperour had conceiued of this Bulgarian aid, had ſo confirmed his minde, as that he little liſtened vnto his nephewes requeſt: beſides that, how could he well truſt him that had ſo oftentimes deceiued him? Wherewith the young Emperour much grieued, and now againe almoſt deſpairing of his farther ſucceſſe, diſlodged and drew neere vnto the place where theſe Bulgarian horſemen lay encamped: from whence he ſent certaine embaſſadours with great gifts and preſents vnto the Generall, and the reſt of the chiefe commanders, promiſing them farre greater, if they would without further troubling themſelues returne home againe: whereunto they willingly granted, and ſo were of him honourably feaſted, and the next day after conducted vpon their way homewards.

Conſtantinople betraied vnto the young Emperour.

It fortuned, that the young Emperour returning backe againe from the Bulgarians, and en-D camped in the ſame place where he before lay; two of the watchmen of the citie, the one called Camaris, and the other Caſtellanus, both ſmiths, fled ſecretly vnto him: who admitted to his preſence and all others commanded to depart, excepting Catacuzenus, offered to betray the citie vnto him, ſo that he would vnder his hand writing aſſure them of ſuch a ſumme of money, and ſuch poſſeſſions as they required: which he eaſily granting, and the houre and manner of performing of the ſame, being by them declared, and agreed vpon; they by and by without longer ſtay, for feare of ſuſpition, returned againe into the citie. But the Emperor ſtaying foure daies in the ſame place, cauſed certaine ladders to be made of great ropes, ſuch as they vſe in great ſhips: But the appointed night being come, the two traitours hauing before prouided great ſtore of good wine, liberally gaue the ſame by way of courteſie vnto the watchmen their companions
E neere vnto them; who drunke ſo plentifully thereof, that not able any longer to hold vp their heads, they fell into ſo ſound a ſleep, as that but for breathing, they differed not much from dead men. About midnight came certaine ſouldiers of the young Emperours, with the aforeſaid ladders; which the traitours by and by drawing vnto them by a rope caſt downe, and making them faſt vnto the top of the wall, receiued by the ſame eighteene armed men: who being got into the citie, without more adoe brake open the Romane gate, whereby the young Emperour with his armie preſently entred, no man letting him. But it is worth the marking, how things appointed to befall vs, are by no meanes to be auoided, although we be thereof before neuer ſo plainly forewarned: For the ſame night the citie was ſurprized, immediatly after the ſetting of the Sunne, the gates being ſhut, a certaine country man came running in all haſte from out of a F village there by, & knocking hard at the gate called GIROLIMNA, required to ſpeake with ſome of the ſouldiers; who being come, he told them how that a little before he had ſeene a great number of the young Emperors men marching towards the citie, by the way that leadeth vnto the Romane gate: which being told vnto the old Emperour, did not a little trouble him. And therefore thought it good to ſend out certaine ſcouts, to ſee if all were cleere along the wals toward the land, from ſea to ſea: which his purpoſe Metochita his great counſellor letted, ſaying, it not to beſeeme a couragious minde to be vpon ſo light an occaſion ſo much moued; for that G either the rumour was falſe, or the endeuour of ſo few vaine, the wals and gates of the citie being ſo filled with armed men: which happily he ſaid not ſo much vpon ignorance of martiall affaires, as blinded by a certaine commanding power, that the ſupernall decree giuen by God himſelfe againſt the old Emperour, might at length take place. And againe, the third part of that night yet ſcant paſt, diuers other countreymen came running vnto the ſaid gate GYROLIMNA, and told the watchmen vpon the wals, that a great number of men were met together at the Romane gate: whereof the Emperor hearing, was therewith much more troubled than before; in ſo much that ſharply rebuking Metochita, he ſaid vnto him, Thou ſeemeſt to beſtrangely me-tamorphoſed into a man of yron, which art become ſo ſecure, as not to haue any feeling of the H danger wherewith we are encloſed: Seeſt thou not that the matter requireth not that we ſhould thus ſit ſtill and take our reſt? For the noiſe of my nephew ſoundeth in mines eares as the ſound of a great drum, and diſquieteth my minde. I feele a ſea of calamitie broken out againſt mee, which ouerwhelmeth and drowneth my heart and courage. Neuertheleſſe he, firme in his former opinion, made no reckoning of thoſe reports: and therefore roſe to goe to bed, to ſhew indeed that he accounted nothing of them, but as falſe alarmes. But the Emperour left alone, and no bodie with him vnto whom he might breake his griefe, laid him downe vpon a pallet, not putting off his clothes; but as if he had together with them put on extreame deſperation, lay tumbling to and fro as a man in minde troubled with many and diuers heauie thoughts. In the meane time he heard a great noiſe at the court gate, and the report of the entring of the young I Emperour his nephew, with a great clattering of armour; for there were aboue eight hundred ſouldiers entred with him, and withall they of the citie on euery ſide ſaluted him with moſt ioyfull acclamations. But the old Emperour hearing the great tumult and outcrie, roſe from his pallet, exceedingly troubled; and deſtitute of all the helpe of his captaines and ſouldiers, (for why, his palace was altogether deſolate, except of ſuch as were his ordinarie waiters) betooke himſelfe vnto his praiers, beſeeching God not to forſake him in ſo great a danger, but in his mercie to defend him from the furie of thoſe wicked men. Who preſently heard him, and ſent him preſent reliefe: for whileſt he was thus praying in the palace, the young Emperour without, calling together all his captaines and lieutenants, ſtraightly charged them vpon paine of death, neither by word nor deed to violate the maieſtie of the old Emperour his grandfather, nor any K other about him: for this victorie (ſaid he) God hath giuen vs, and not we our ſelues; his will ordereth all things, whereunto all things obey, the ſtars, the aire, the ſea, the earth, men, flouds, tempeſts, plagues, earthquakes, ſhoures, dearth, and ſuch like, ſometimes to our bliſſe, and ſome-time to our correction and deſtruction: wherefore vſing vs as the inſtruments of his chaſtiſement, he hath giuen vnto vs this preſent victorie, which peraduenture to morrow he will giue to others to vſe againſt vs, and then as we haue beene vnto them we haue ouercome, ſuch will they alſo ſhew themſelues vnto vs againe: wherefore, if neither nighneſſe of bloud, neither that we be all of one countrey, may moue vs, yet in reſpect of our ſelues let vs vſe mercie, that wee feele not the hand of God vpon vs in like caſe. In the meane time a courtier opened a wicket vnto the young Emperour, with this meſſage from his grandfather: L

The pitifull ſup-plication of the old Emperour vnto his nephew

Foraſmuch as God this day (my ſonne) hath giuen vnto thee the imperiall ſcepter, taken from mee, I requeſt of thee this one good turne; For many which I haue euen from thy birth beſtowed vpon thee, (for in this my hard eſtate I let paſſe, that I next vnto God haue beene the authour of thy natiuitie and increaſe) giue mee my life, ſpare thy fathers head, and with violent weapon ſpill not that bloud from which thou thy ſelfe haſt taken the fountaine of life. Man truly beholdeth heauen and earth, and hea-uen and earth behold mens actions: wherefore make not the heauens and the earth beholders of ſo wic-ked an outrage as neuer man euer committed. If brothers bloud long agoe cried out vnto the Lord againſt Cain, how much louder ſhall the fathers bloud crie vnto the Lord, and declare ſo great a wic-kedneſſe vnto the earth, the ſunne, and ſtars, and make it abhorred of all the Princes of the world? Re- M gard my miſerable old age, which of it ſelfe promiſeth vnto me ſhortly death, but vnto thee a reſt after long cares. Reuerence the hands which haue oftentimes moſt louingly embraced thee, yet crying in thy ſwathing clouts: Reuerence thoſe lips which haue oftentimes moſt louingly kiſſed thee, and called thee my other ſoule: Haue pitie vpon a bruiſed reed, caſt downe by fortune, and doe not thou againe tread vp-on it. And ſeeing thou art thy ſelfe a man, be not too proud of thy preſent fortune, but conſider the vn-

certaintie

A certaintie and varietie of worldly things, taking by me example: ſee in mee the end of long life, and maruell, how one night hauing receiued mee an Emperour of many yeeres, leaueth me now ſubiect vnto another mans power for euer.

The young Emperour Andronicus moued with this ſpeech, and taking great care of his grandfathers ſafetie; ſcarce abſtaining from teares, entred the palace, and comming to his grandfather, humbly ſaluted him, embraced him, and with cheerefull words comforted him. Straight way after, he went vnto the monaſterie MANGANIVM, where (as is aforeſaid) the Patriarch Eſaius was by the old Emperours commandement, kept in ſafe keeping, whom the B young Emperor now tooke from thence,& carrying him away in one of the Emperors richeſt chariots, reſtored him againe vnto his Patriarchall dignitie; wherein he afterwards ſpared not to reuenge himſelfe to the full,& moſt cruelly to perſecute the old Emperors friends. That day from morning vnto night,a man might haue ſeene all the riches & wealth of ſuch noble men as had taken part with the old Emperor, carried away,and their goodly houſes ouerthrowne and made the ſcorne of the baſe common people: but eſpecially the houſe and wealth of Theodorus Metochita, a man but the day before in greateſt fauour with his Prince, & of all others next vnto the Emperor himſelfe,of greateſt authoritie & credit,whoſe whole wealth(not that only which was found in his houſe,but that alſo which he had laid vp in truſt with his friends,diſcouered by notes found in his ſtudie) became moſt part a prey vnto the common people,and the reſt con-C fiſcated vnto the Prince. Thus he which earſt of all others next vnto the Emperor,was accounted moſt fortunate,was now vpon the ſudden, with his wife & children, brought vnto extreme beggerie; and after many yeeres felicitie,in one day caſt into the bottome of deſpaire and miſerie, where a man might haue heard many complaining,ſay, All that wealth and treaſure to haue beene the bloud and teares of the poore oppreſſed ſubiects, brought vnto him by them whom he had made rulers and gouernours of the prouinces and cities of the empire; to the intent that when they had dealt cruelly with the people, as with their ſlaues, he might ſtop them for comming to complaine of their griefes vnto the Emperor: and that the eie of the Reuenger had not alwaies ſlept,but was now at length awaked, & had of him yet ſcarcely taken ſufficient puniſhment: which euery where to heare,increaſed not a little his griefe. As for himſelfe,he was
D confined vnto DIDYMOTICHVM, as the place of his exile and baniſhment; where after he had a certaine time poorely liued, he was ſent for backe againe to CONSTANTINOPLE: where hauing nothing left to relieue himſelfe (for his houſe at the comming of the young Emperor, was in the furie of the people pluckt downe to the ground, & the very pauement thereof digged vp) he went vnto the monaſterie of CHORA there by, which long before built by the Emperor Iuſtinian and become ruinous, he in the time of his proſperitie had with great charge repaired, and therein now (hauing made ſhipwracke of all that he had) quietly ſhrouded himſelfe, to the great comfort both of his bodie and afflicted minde,where he not long after died.

But to returne againe vnto the old Emperour, as yet in doubt what ſhould become of him- Niphon inceuſeth the young emperor againſt his grandfather
E ſelfe: it fortuned that the ſame day that the citie was taken,the young Emperour at night returning to the palace, by the way met with Niphon ſometime Patriarch, who asked him how they meant to deale with his grandfather. Whereunto the young Emperor anſwering,that he would deale with him honourably and Emperour like; he was by him therefore blamed and reproued. For this Niphon being of a craftie ſubtile wit and malicious nature, beſides that he ſecretly hated all them vpon whom fortune greatly either fauned or frowned, bare an eſpeciall grudge againſt the old Emperour: firſt, for that at ſuch time as he was right worthily for his ſhamefull couetouſneſſe and extortion, by the reſt of the Biſhops and clergie thruſt out of his Patriarchſhip, he was not by him as he looked for defended: and ſecondly,for that dreaming again after the Patriarchall dignitie,he thought it one good ſtep thereunto to haue him (as his greateſt enemie) taken out of the way. Wherefore he ſaid now vnto the young Emperour: If thou deſire to F raigne without feare, giue not thine honour vnto another; but taking all the ornaments of the empire from the old man, caſt haire cloth vpon him, and ſo clap him faſt in priſon, or thruſt him out into exile. This miſchieuous counſell, this wicked man gaue againſt the poore old diſtreſſed Emperour, not remembring how vnworthily he had by him beene before preferred vnto the higheſt degrees both of honour and wealth, if he could there haue kept himſelfe: vnto which vngratious counſell, diuers others of the nobilitie alſo conſenting, ſo wrought the matter amongſt them, that although they could not quite draw the young Emperours minde from his grandfather, G yet they much changed the ſame: ſo that he could no longer endure to take him for his companion in the empire. Whereupon after many meetings and conſultations had, it was decreed, That the old man ſhould ſtill retaine the name and ornaments of an Emperour, as before, but not to meddle in any matters, nor to come abroad, but to ſit ſtill quietly in his chamber, with the yeerely allowance of ten thouſand duckats, for the maintenance of himſelfe and ſuch as attended vpon him; to be raiſed of the fiſhing before the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE: a poore penſion for the maintenance of ſo great an Emperour. Of which ſo ſhamefull a decree, Eſaias the Patriarch was alſo a furtherer: who ſeeing an Emperour that had raigned ſo long, caſt downe, and ſhut vp as it were in priſon, was ſo far from grieuing thereat, that fooliſhly reioy- H cing, he in token thereof abſurdly wreſted this text of Scripture, ſaying in his merriment, Lætabitur iuſtus, cum viderit vltionem; The iuſt ſhall reioyce, when he ſeeth the reuenge: calling himſelfe iuſt, and the Emperours caſting downe, reuenge. But the old Emperour thus ſhut vp in his chamber (differing nothing but in name, from a priſon) not long after, the ſtate of his bodie

The old Emperour becommeth blinde. ouerthrowne with griefe and corrupt humors diſtilling out of his head, firſt loſt one of his eyes, and ſhortly after the other alſo: and ſo oppreſſed with eternall darkneſſe, mingled (as ſaith the Scripture) his drinke with teares, and eat the bread of ſorrow, being oftentimes (to his great griefe) moſt bitterly mocked and derided, not of them onely which were by his enemies ſet to guard him, but of his owne ſeruants alſo. Not long after, the young Emperour falling ſicke, in ſuch ſort as that it was thought he would not recouer, Catacuzenus and the reſt of his greateſt I fauourites and followers carefull of their owne eſtate, and yet doubtfull of the old blinde Emperour, deuiſed many things againſt him, but all tending to one purpoſe for the ſhortening of his daies. But in the end all other deuices ſet apart, they put him to the choice, either to put on the habit of a religious, and ſo for euer to bid the world farewell, or elſe to take what ſhould otherwiſe enſue; the beſt whereof was either death, exile, or perpetuall impriſonment in the loathſome caſtle of forgetfulneſſe: For the putting whereof in execution, Synadenus (of all others to him moſt hatefull) was appointed. At which hard choice, the old Emperour as with a world of woes ſuddenly oppreſſed, lay a great while vpon his bed as a man ſpeechleſſe: for what could he doe elſe, except he had an heart of ſteele or adamant? being then compaſſed about with many barbarous and mercileſſe ſouldiers, and his domeſticall ſeruants kept from K him, and no man left, that would vouchſafe to direct him (being blinde) whither to goe or Andronicus the old emperour againſt his will made a Monke, and called Anthonie. where to ſtand. But to make the matter ſhort, would he, would he not, they made choice for him themſelues, polling and ſhauing him, and caſting a Monks habit vpon him, changed his name, after the manner of the religious, and called him by the name of Anthonie the Monke. Glad was Eſaias the falſe Patriarch of this the hard eſtate of the old Emperour: for that now that he was profeſſed a religious, there was left no hope for him to recouer againe the empire, either cauſe for himſelfe to feare. Yet he thought it good to be aduiſed, in what ſort remembrance ſhould be made of him in the church praiers, if any were at all from thenceforth to be made. Whereof to be by the old Emperour himſelfe reſolued, he (ſeeming to be very ſorie for that which was done, but purpoſing indeed therein to deride him) ſent vnto him two Biſhops, L to know what his pleaſure was to haue done therein. Vnto which their demand, he oppreſſed with heauineſſe, and fetching a great ſigh euen from the bottome of his heart, anſwered:

The notable anſwere of the old emperour to the catching queſtion of the proud Patriarch.

As in poore Lazarus appeared a double miracle, That being dead, he riſe; and being bound, walked: euen ſo was it to be done in me, though in quite contrary manner: for loe, being aliue, I am dead, as ouerwhelmed with the waues of calamitie and woe; and being looſe, am bound, not my hands and feet onely, but my tongue alſo; wherewith vnable to doe any thing elſe, I might yet at leaſt bewaile my woes and wrongs vnto the aire, and ſuch as by chance ſhould heare me, and vnto this moſt wofull darkneſſe wherein I muſt for euer ſit. But ſhame hath cloſed my mouth, my brethren abhorre me, and my mothers ſons account me for a ſtranger vnto them, and the very light of mine eyes is not with me, my friends and neigh- M bours ſtood vp againſt me, and all that ſaw me laughed me to ſcorne: my feet had almoſt ſlipped, and my footſteps were almoſt ouerthrowne: for I fretted againſt the wicked when I ſaw the peace of the vngodly. The Emperors long agoe gaue great priuiledges vnto the Church, euen thoſe which it at this day enioyeth: and the Church gaue to them againe power to chuſe whom they would to be Patriarchs. Now concerning him that ſent you, I not onely nominated him vnto the Patriarchſhip, but I my ſelfe made choice of him,

A and preferred him before many other right worthie and moſt famous men, being himſelfe a man growne old in a poore priuate life, neuer before preferred, or for any other thing famous: I will not ſay how often I haue holpen him and done him good. But now when he ſhould againe haue relieued me in my calamitie; he ioyneth hands with mine enemies againſt me, more cruell vpon me than any other bloudie handed executioner; not aſhamed to aske me how I would be remembred in the Church: faigning himſelfe to be ignorant and ſorie for mine eſtate, much like vnto the Aegyptian crocodile of NILE, which hauing killed ſome liuing beaſt, lieth vpon the dead bodie and waſheth the head thereof with her warme teares, which ſhe afterwards deuoureth together with the bodie. But what to anſwere him vnto this his catching queſtion, I know not: for if I ſhall ſay, As an Emperour; I ſhall forthwith be ſlaine by them which for that
B purpoſe haue me in hold: but if I ſay, As Anthonie the Monke; it ſhall be taken as the franke confeſſion of mine eſtate, by them which haue craftily contriued mine ouerthrow; as if I had not by compulſion, but euen of mine owne free will put on this monaſticall habit, which God knoweth was neuer in my thought.

Hauing thus ſaid, he ſent them away without any other anſwere vnto their demand: but ſitting downe vpon his bed ſide, ſaid, My ſoule returne againe into thy reſt, for the Lord hath dealt well with thee: neither ſpoke any one word more in declaration of his griefe, his tongue there ſtaied by his ſingular wiſdome, or elſe with the greatneſſe of his griefe; & ſo againſt his will, in ſilence paſſing ouer his ſorrow, his minde with the greatneſſe of his woes ouercome, and as it were aſtoniſhed, before the humors gathered into the braine could be diſſolued into teares: for as the Sun
C ſending forth his moderate beames, draweth vnto it many exhalations and vapours, but caſting the ſame forth more plentifully, doth with his immoderate heat conſume the ſame before they can be drawne vp, ſo the moderate affections of the mind may haue their griefes by words and teares expreſſed; but ſuch as exceed all meaſure, and with their vehemencie as it were ouerthrow the minde, commonly make men to ſtand ſtill mute and ſilent, or if they ſpeake at all, to ſpeake idly, & nothing to the purpoſe, as men beſide themſelues, or in an extaſie. But for the reſolution of the queſtion by the Biſhops demanded, the deuout Patriarch decreed, That in the Church-praiers he ſhould be remembred before the Emperor his nephew, by the name of The moſt religious & zealous Monke Anthonie: which was done (God wot) for no good zeale to the poore
D blinde man, but the better to colour the matter with the common people, as if he wearie of the world, had voluntarily taken vpon him that ſilly profeſſion. Neuertheleſſe, within foure daies after, Synadenus vnderſtanding them in euery place to whiſper among themſelues, & ſecretly to mutter againſt the hard dealing with the old Emperor, who had long raigned ouer them, and ſo by right was againe to doe, if his nephew ſhould chance to die; and that the eccleſiaſticall lawes enforced no man againſt his will to enter into religious orders: he therewith enraged, ſent vnto him certain of his owne confederacie, to exact of him an oath in writing, That he ſhould neuer more after that time ſeeke after the empire, or yet accept of the ſame if it were offred him, neither to ſubſtitute any other: which if he ſhould refuſe to doe, to put him in feare of his life. And the more to terrifie him, ſet a guard of inſolent barbarous ſouldiers ouer him; for feare of whom, he
E yeelded to doe whatſoeuer they required: and ſo his oath being ſolemnly conceiued into writing (another man leading his hand, becauſe he was blinde) he ſigned the ſame with a red croſſe aboue, and a blacke croſſe beneath, after the manner of the religious. Hauing thus liued in darknes, diſgraced, ſhut vp in his chamber as a man forſaken of the world, with an vnſure guard euer to attend him, by the ſpace of two yeeres, it fortuned that the twelft of Februarie towards night, The death of the old Emperour. (a day in the Greeke Church dedicated to the vigill of S. Anthonie, whoſe name they had giuen him) certaine of his friends that were ſuffered to haue acceſſe vnto him, going as their manner was, once in three or foure daies to viſit him (amongſt whom was his daughter, ſometime the Prince of SERVIA his wife, but as then a widow, and Nicephorus Gregoras, author of this Hiſtorie) he entred with them, as with his friends, into a familiar diſcourſe of many matters, wherin he ſo deceiued the time, that it was paſt midnight before they perceiued how the time paſſed. But
F the cocks crowing, he brake off the talke, and bidding them farewell, gaue them leaue to depart; pleaſantly ſaying, That to morrow they would make an end of their diſcourſe; who all thereupon tooke their leaue & departed, no ſigne of any ſickneſſe as then appearing vpon him. And after they were gone, called for meat & did eat: the meat he eat, was certaine ſhell-fiſh, for it was with them a faſting day, and he had not eaten any thing: after which, when as he ſhould haue drunke a cup of wine, for the comforting of his old ſtomacke & diſgeſting of that ſo hard meat, he

he drunke cold water, as his manner was, when he felt any inward heat, to drinke the same im- G moderatly: which hurtfull manner of diet he then vsing also, began by and by to feele a great paine in his stomacke, and so presently after became very sicke, falling withal into a great loosenesse of bodie, so that in the space of one quarter of an houre he was glad oftentimes to arise, & to go vnto an homely house of office in an inner chamber thereby, to discharge natures burdens where after many euacuations, sitting downe vpon an homely bed fast by, and not able to recouer his owne bed, hauing as then none to helpe him; there before it was day, died, after hee had raigned 43 yeares. His death was by many strange signes and accidents as it were foretold: first, a great eclipse of the Sunne appeared, just so many daies before his death as hee had liued yeares: and after that, another eclipse of the Moone; and with it an earthquake, the day before H he died at night, being S. Anthonie his euen, whose name his enemies had thrust vpon him: at which time also, the sea with a great tempest rising aboue the wonted bounds, made diuers breaches in the wals of the citie towards the sea, as if it had beene some violent enemie, and ouerflowed also diuers houses in the citie. Manie crosses and pinacles were then also from the tops of churches and other high buildings ouerthrowne; and with them a great pillar, sometime one of the ornaments of the citie, standing before the church, commonly called The Church of the fortie martyrs: which being verie high, and below burnt and worne away with time, had put manie in feare as they passed by it, least it should haue fallen vpon them; insomuch that the Emperor vpon a time passing that way, was requested by some of the nobilitie there present, to ride farther off from it, for feare of falling vpon him: who smiling at their vaine feare, by chance answered, O I would to God I might liue so long as this piller will stand: which now falling out according to his speech, gaue many of them that had heard him so say, occasion to maruell. His dead bodie was honorablie buried in the monasterie of LIBE, which his mother Theodora the empresse had not long before new built, and his obsequies there (after the maner of that time) yeerely solemnlie kept by the space of nine daies.

The Turkish kingdome founded by Othoman in Asia, at such time as the Greeke Emperors were at variance betwixt themselues in Europe.

Thus at length hauing passed through the troubled state of the Greeke empire, during the long raigne of the old emperour Andronicus, the considerat Reader may easily see the causes of the declining, and ruine also of this famous empire; and how that the Greeke Emperours, troubled with their tempestuous affaires neerer home in EVROPE, yea in the verie imperiall citie it selfe, and in their owne pallaces, were not at leasure to looke ouer the strait into ASIA, but K glad to leaue their territories there vnto the weake defence of themselues. At which time, and euen in the middest of the aforesaid trouble, Othoman, on the one side, with great industrie laid the foundation of his Empire in PHRIGIA and BYTHINIA, now the greatest terrour of the world: and then did those things which we now haue of him written. The other princes of the Turkes also, the successours of Sultan Aladin, at the same time on the other side, alongst the riuer MEANDER encroching on as fast: vntill that at last amongst them they had thrust the Greeke Emperours quite out of ASIA, and in fine became themselues, together with the Greeke Empire, a prey vnto the Othoman kings, as in the processe of this historie shall more at large appeare.

Prusa yeelded vnto the Turkes.

But againe to returne vnto Othoman himselfe, who all this while (that old Andronicus the L Greeke Emperour was thus troubled) had with his sonne Orchanes sought by all meanes on euerie side to inlarge his kingdome: the garrisons by him left in the two late built castles neere vnto the great citie of PRVSA, vnder the charge of the two valiant captains Acthemur & Balabanzuck (as is before declared) hauing now continued there certaine yeares, had by shutting vp the passages, and spoiling of the countrie, brought the citie into such distresse and penurie, that many of the citizens and other the poore Christians fled into the citie, there died of famine. The rest now out of all hope to bee relieued by the Greeke Emperour, not then able to relieue himselfe, came to composition with Orchanes (for Othoman was then sicke of his old disease the gout) couenanting with him, that they might in safetie with life and libertie depart, and so much of their goods as they themselues could carie: and so yeelded to him the citie. Which conditi- M ons (as most write) were on the Turks behalfe well and faithfullie performed: yet some there be that report them to haue beene in most part by Orchanes broken. Thus was PRVSA, one of the greatest cities of that part of ASIA, yeelded vnto the Turks, in the yeere of our Lord 1327: and was afterwards by Orchanes made the royall seat of the Othoman kings.

Aboue this time, or verie shortly after, Othoman in the eight and twentith yeare of his raigne died,

A died, at the age of 69, in the yeere of our Lord 1328, and lieth buried at PRVSA, where his tombe is yet at this day to be ſeene, in a certaine chapell of an old monaſterie in the caſtle, ſtanding in the middeſt of the citie; couered with a mantle of greene chamlet, and a little Tulipant or Turkiſh hat (ſuch as he vſed to weare) lying ouer his head, far differing from thoſe which the Turks now weare, eſpecially the better ſort of them, ſo great that they can therewith ſcarcely come in at a doore. There is alſo another monument of him to be ſeene at SVGVTA, faſt by the ſepulchre of his father Ertogrull, there made by his ſonnes in remembrance of him; whereof ſome haue reported him to haue beene there buried. Howbeit the Turks themſelues generally ſuppoſe the true monument wherein he is interred to be at PRVSA, as is aforeſaid. He was wiſe, B politicke, valiant, and fortunate, but full of diſſimulation, and ambitious aboue meaſure; not raſh in his attempts, and yet very reſolute; what he tooke in hand, he commonly brought to good effect: to all men he was bountifull and liberall, but eſpecially to his men of warre, and the poore, whom he would many times feed and cloath with his owne hands. Of a poore lordſhip he left a great kingdome, hauing ſubdued a great part of the leſſer ASIA: and is worthily accounted the firſt founder of the Turks great kingdome and empire. Of him, the Turkiſh Kings and Emperours euer ſince haue beene called the Othoman Kings and Emperours, as lineally of him deſcended: and the Turks themſelues Oſmanidæ, as the people or ſubiects of Othoman, or Oſman, for ſo he is of the Turks commonly called.

The death of Othoman.

Othoman buried at Pruſa.

NOte, that in the reckoning vp of certaine of the great Chriſtian Princes and Prelates of the ſame time, at the end of euery the Turkiſh Kings and Emperors liues, the firſt and greateſt number following their names, ſheweth the yeere of our Lord, wherein ſuch an Emperour, King, or Biſhop began to raigne, or ſit: and the number following, how long he raigned or ſate. As for example: Andronicus the elder began to raigne in the Eaſt in the yeere of grace 1282, and raigned 43 yeeres: and ſo of the reſt. Wherein wee ſeeke not the exact computation vnto a moneth or day (as not much materiall to our Hiſtorie, or any part of our purpoſe) but onely the reaſonable view of the great Princes of the forepaſſed times, as they liued in ages together.

Suſcipit Orchanes defuncti ſceptra parentis: Maior vt ingenio, ſic magis arte valens.
Bithynos, Phrygiamque domat, Pruſamque ſuperbam:
Et populos late (Marte fauente) premit.
Sic latus tantis Aſiam turbaſſe ruinis; Tranſit in Europam, Callipolimque capit.
Rident interea Graci ſua damna: ſed ecce, Dum ſua contemnunt, in ſua fata ruunt.

RICH. KNOLLEVS.

His father dead, Orchanes takes his ſcepter vp in hand:
As one of deeper wit and reach, his foes for to withſtand.
The Phrygians and Bythinians he by force of armes brought low:
Proud PRVSA, with faire NICOMEDE, and many cities moe.
And glad in ASIA to haue made ſuch hauocke and ſuch ſpoile;
His forces into EVROPE ſends, the Grecians there to foile.
Who meane while laughing at their loſſe, did make thereof a game:
Not thinking what a world of woe was to enſue the ſame.

THE LIFE OF ORCHANES, OR VRCHAN, SECOND KING OF THE TVRKES.

AFTER the death of Othoman, his two ſonnes, Orchanes (whom the Turks call Vrchan) and Aladin his brother, hauing with great ſolemnitie enterred their father at PRVSA, immediatly ſummoned a Parlament, whereunto both the brethren came accompanied with the chiefe of their nobilitie. This Parlament was called eſpecially, for the eſtabliſhing of the ſucceſſion in this new kingdome, and for the diuiſion of Othomans treaſure and goods, betwixt them two, his ſonnes. But vpon view taken, there was no money, plate, or iewels found in the Kings coffers, for that he had in his life time moſt bountifully beſtowed it vpon his men of warre : ſo that all the wealth he left vnto them his ſonnes, was, the honourable remembrance of his life for them to imitate, large dominions for their poſſeſſions, ſtore of readie horſes and armour fit for ſeruice, with great heards of beaſts and cattell for houſhold prouiſion. Whereupon Orchanes demanded of his brother Aladin, what order he thought was beſt to be taken with thoſe things by their father ſo left. To whom Aladin anſwered, That it was moſt requiſite firſt to eſtabliſh a King in their fathers kingdome ; which like a good ſhepheard might gouerne and defend his ſubiects, rule and maintaine his men of warre, prouiding all things meet for defence of his kingdome : And that vnto him of right belonged all theſe other things by their father left, as the patrimonie of his ſucceſſour, for the common good and maintenance of his eſtate. As for mine owne part (ſaid Aladin) I claime no intereſt therein, you being my elder brother, and ſo vnto me in ſtead of a father: by whom alſo you haue beene theſe two yeeres, as it were alreadie put in poſſeſſion of the kingdome, all things being committed to your gouernment, during the time of his late ſickneſſe. This modeſtie of Aladin was greatly commended of all the ancient counſellors ; by meanes whereof, the kingdome in all peaceable manner deſcended to Orchanes. In regard of which courteſie, Orchanes would gladly haue made Aladin his brother Preſident of his counſell: which honour he would in no wiſe accept, but requeſted rather that he would giue him the lordſhip of FODORE in Tekences countrey; which Orchanes frankly granted. In which lordſhip of FODORE, Aladin moſt part liued a priuate and quiet life, and afterwards built two Mahometan churches, and an abbey at PRVSA, there yet at this day to be ſeene.

Some Latine Hiſtoriographers otherwiſe report this beginning of Orchanes his raigne ; as that Othoman ſhould haue three ſonnes, and that Orchanes the youngeſt obtained the kingdome by murthering of his other brethren. A practiſe of late much vſed amongſt the Turkiſh Princes, but not before the time of Baiazet the firſt of that name, who firſt of the Turkiſh Monarchs embrued his hands with his brothers bloud : where before, they vſed all brotherly loue one to another, as the moſt probable hiſtories collected out of the Turks owne Chronicles affirme.

When that barbarous manner of murthering their brethren firſt began among the Turkiſh Sultans.

The

The citie of Nice with diuers other castles recouered from the Turks after the death of Othoman.

The Christian Princes and captaines, presently vpon the death of Othoman recouered the ci- G tie of NICE, with diuers other castles and forts, out of the hands of the Turks: as it commonly chanceth, that dominions lately won with great perill, are soone againe lost, the conquerour dying before there be a firme gouernment established. Amongst other forts by the Christians repossessed, the castle of TZVPRICHISER, situate vpon the passages of the riuer SANGARIVS, most grieued the Turks, for thereby their passage into that part of BYTHINIA was much impeached. Wherfore Orchanes desirous to recouer this castle, disguised himselfe with a few other of his best souldiers, in the apparell of Christian marchants, & came to the castle, crauing leaue to passe as marchants: the warders of the castle verily supposing them by their attire to be marchants, opened the gates, and let them into the castle: who presently drew their swords, slew the H warders, and so by force possessed the castle, to the great benefit of the Turks, and the hurt of the poore Christians yet left in the countrey of BYTHINIA. For they now hauing opened a way ouer the riuer SANGARIVS, and as it were broken downe the strongest defence of that side of the Greeke empire, at their pleasure forraged the countrey in such sort, as that the great citie of NICE (for want of victuals to relieue so great a multitude as for feare of the Turks was fled out of the countrey into it) was brought to great extremitie and want. For the reliefe whereof, and for the repulsing againe of the Turks, Andronicus the young Emperour, who then all commanded, with such an armie as he was then able to raise, passed himselfe in person ouer the strait of CONSTANTINOPLE into ASIA: the greatest strength of his armie consisting in two thousand choice horsemen; the rest as well horse as foot, being for the most part artificers taken vp in the I citie, men altogether vnacquainted with armes (who in token of their cowardise, and that they were more mindfull of flight than of fight, carried ouer with them almost as many long boats, and such other small vessels, as they were men, to be readie to receiue them at such time as they should flie) or else abiect rascals, taken vp here & there, men of whom no great thing was to be expected, and of all others most vnfit for so great a Prince (as was the Emperour) to commit the defence of his person & honour vnto. But Orchanes hearing of his comming, sent certaine of his most expert captaines, to forelay the strait passages of the countrey whereby the Emperor was to passe; following also himselfe after with his armie, of purpose to encounter the Emperour. Who in three daies march after his landing in ASIA, being come to PHILOCRENE, a little towne in BYTHINIA, and vnderstanding that Orchanes hauing before taken the straits, lay not K far off encamped with his armie; he there at PHILOCRENE pitched his tents, and staied that night also. But the next morning, the Sunne as yet scarcely risen, he seeing diuers companies of the Turks comming downe from the mountains fast by, put his armie into order of battell, and so set forward to meet them. Where to begin the fight, the Turks archers freely bestowed their piercing shot amongst the Christians, still keeping themselues aloofe off, so to doe the more harme. Which the Emperor mistaking, and supposing that their keeping off to haue proceeded of feare, encouraged therewith, commanded certaine loose companies disorderly to march forward, & to skirmish with them: which his more expert captaines not liking, would haue otherwise perswaded him, as to haue kept his strength together against the danger of the battell. Neuertheless, such was his youthfull heat, as that he could by no meanes be otherwise intreated, L but that forward needs they must. But all the forenoone spent in this light & tumultuarie kinde of skirmishing, and the Sunne at the highest now shining very hot, Orchanes from the top of the mountaines perceiuing the Christians well wearied with the heat of the day and long skirmishing, came downe from the hils with a world of men following him; who with a most hideous crie charged the Christians on euery side, some a far off with their arrowes, & some hand to hand with their swords and other weapons: whose assault the Christians at the first most valiantly receiued, and a great while right worthily defended themselues, hauing wounded and slaine a number of their enemies. Which hard fight was on both sides couragiously maintained, vntill the approching of the night, with great slaughter on both sides: at which time, the Christians wearie of the long fight, and oppressed with the multitude of their enemies, disorderly retiring M toward their trenches, and hardly pursued by the Turks, receiued there a great losse, as well of their horsemen, as of their foot: but by the comming on of the night, the battell was at length ended with vncertaine victorie. Amongst others there hurt, the Emperor himselfe was wounded in the foot with an arrow. That night happened a wofull mishap, and a manifest token of God his wrath: for Orchanes hauing to his cost made proofe of the strength and valour of the Christians,

The Emperour wounded.

A ſtians,and doubting they would the next day come on farther into the country, left three hundred horſemen, as ſcouts, to attend the enemies remouing: and himſelfe with his armie retired beforehand to take the aduantage of ſuch places as the Chriſtians were to paſſe by. But the Emperour in the euening leauing his campe, and going to PHILOGRENE, a little towne faſt by, the better to haue his wound dreſſed; the reſt of the armie vnderſtanding of his departure, and ſuppoſing him to haue fled for feare (as if Orchanes with a great armie would that night haue ſlaine them all) fled themſelues alſo out of the campe, euery mothers ſonne, ſome to their long boats and other little veſſels they had for that purpoſe brought ouer the ſtrait; ſome haſting towards the towne gates, were by the multitude of others running headlong after them, ouerborne, and
B troden to death; otherſome hanging one at anothers taile, like a chaine, got ſome part of them vp to the top of the rampiers of the towne; otherſome drawne backe by them that hung vpon them, falling downe together by heapes, and trod vpon by others, there periſhed; ſome (as is reported) died there for very feare, no man either chaſing or hurting them; ſo weake is mans courage when God withdraweth from him his ſtrength. But in the morning the Sunne ariſing, the three hundred Turks, left for ſcouts, perceiuing the flight of the Chriſtians, entred the forſaken campe, where they found horſes, armour, and emptie tents, yea the Emperours owne furniture and his horſes readie ſadled: of all which, two hundred of theſe Turks tooke the ſpoile at their pleaſure; and the other hundred purſuing the diſperſed Chriſtians, like heartleſſe men, wandring here and there, ſlew a great number of them. The Emperour himſelfe ſeeing his ar-
C mie (thus as it were by the hand of God) ouerthrowne and diſperſed, tooke ſhipping alſo, and ſo returned to CONSTANTINOPLE. After whoſe departure, the Turks ſeizing vpon many ſea townes alongſt the coaſt of BYTHINIA, and there ſeating themſelues, laid heauie tributes vpon the other countrey townes and villages; for the benefit whereof, they ſpared to deſtroy them, together with the inhabitants, which they might at their pleaſure full eaſily haue done.

Now lay the great citie of NICE in the ſuds, the enemie commanding all the countrey about it, liuing as ſicke men doe by hope, and holding out onely vpon hope of a thouſand horſemen which the Emperour (notwithſtanding his late diſcomfiture) had promiſed forthwith to ſend, there to lie in garriſon for the repreſſing of the Turks. Of which aid ſo promiſed, Orchanes vnderſtanding, furniſhed eight hundred of his owne horſemen, after the manner of the Chriſtians:
D and fetching a great compaſſe about, came at length into the high way that leadeth from CONSTANTINOPLE to NICE, and ſo trouped directly towards the citie, as if they had come from CONSTANTINOPLE. At the ſame time he ſent three hundred of his other horſemen, in the habit of Turks, to forrage and ſpoile the countrey, as much as they could within the view of the citie (now for want of victuals brought into great extremitie) which whileſt they were a doing, the other eight hundred horſemen in the attire of Chriſtians, following vpon them, as if it had beene by chance, charged them, and in the ſight of the citizens put them to flight: which done, theſe counterfeit horſemen returned directly againe towards NICE. The citizens which with great pleaſure had in the meane time from the wals ſeene the moſt part of the skirmiſh, and how they had put the Turks to flight, ſuppoſing them to be the Conſtantinopolitan horſmen whom they
E daily expected, with great ioy opened the gates of the citie to receiue them as their friends. But they being entred the gates, preſently ſet vpon the Chriſtians, fearing no ſuch matter: and being ſeconded with the other three hundred, which in diſſembling manner had fled before, and were now ſpeedily returned, bringing alſo with them other companies of Turks, before laid in ſecret ambuſh not farre off, they won the great and famous citie of NICE, which they haue euer ſince vntill this day poſſeſſed: the ſpoile wherof was giuen vnto the ſouldiers for a prey, and the citizens all led away into miſerable captiuitie and thraldome. Whileſt Orchanes was thus buſied, his other captains did with great courage and ſucceſſe enlarge his dominions on all ſides, daily encroching vpon their weake neighbors the Chriſtians. Cunger-Alpes, one of his warlike captaines, ſubdued the countrey of MVDVRN, or MODRIN, in PHRYGIA; and BOLLI in PAPHLAGONIA:
F appointing one Abdurachman, a man of great valour, to gouerne the countrey. And at the ſame time another of his old captaines called Acteccozza, brought CANDARA in PAPHLAGONIA, and ERMENIE, a country neere vnto the mountaine HORMINIVS, into the Turkiſh ſubiection: placing garriſons in all the caſtles & forts which he had won, of whom ſome part of thoſe countries was after his name called Cozza Ilini, that is to ſay, The old mans countrey. So that Orchanes his kingdome grew daily greater & greater, as well by the induſtrie of his chieftaines, as of himſelfe.

The citie of Nice ſurpriſed by the Turks.

About this time, it fortuned the captaines ſonne of SCAMANDRIA (a towne not farre from the ruines of the ancient citie of TROY, and about a dayes iourney from the renowmed caſtle of ABYDVS) to depart out of this world: vnto whoſe funerals, being kept in the countrey, whileſt his wofull father the captaine with his friends out of SCAMANDRIA reſorted, the old craftie Turke Acceccozza lying alwayes in wait, as a fox for his prey, ſuddenly ſet vpon thoſe heauie Chriſtians, whereof he ſlew the moſt part, and tooke the reſt priſoners. Amongſt whom he alſo tooke the captaine of SCAMANDRIA, with his caſtle and countrey: whom he afterwards led priſoner vnto the caſtle of ABYDVS, which is one of the moſt famous caſtles ſituate vpon the ſea coaſt of ASIA, ouer againſt SESTVS in EVROPE, where the ſea of HELLESPONTVS by the narrow ſtrait falleth into the ſea ÆGEVM: two caſtles much renowmed, by reaſon of their nigh ſituation, and yet placed in diuers parts of the world; eternized alſo by the euer liuing wits of Poets, for the aduenturous paſſage of Leander ouer that fret of the ſea, to his loue Hero: which caſtles are now called DARDANELLY. Acceccozza hauing brought the captiue captaine of SCAMANDRIA (lately a man of great account in that countrey) ſo neere as he could vnto the caſtle of ABYDVS, offred to ſet him at libertie if they would ſurrender their caſtle, otherwiſe they ſhould ſee him cruelly ſlaine before their faces. Theſe Turkiſh threats nothing moued them of ABYDVS, more than to ſay, That they might if they would cut off his head, ſeeth him, and eat him, but the caſtle they intended not to deliuer. The ſame captaine was afterward by the commandement of Orchanes profered to the Emperor of CONSTANTINOPLE, to be redeemed, which he refuſed. Yet at the laſt he was ranſomed by the gouernour of NICOMEDIA, and againe ſet at libertie. Acceccozza of long time held the caſtle of SCAMANDRIA: yet ſo continually moleſted with the garriſon of ABYDVS, and men of warre ſent from CONSTANTINOPLE, that he with his followers were glad for the moſt part to liue on horſebacke, to be alwayes in more readineſſe againſt the attempt of their enemies. The captaine of the caſtle of ABYDVS had at that time a faire young gentlewoman to his daughter, who (as ſhe ſaid) chanced to dreame (what ſhe had happily waking, for the moſt part wiſhed) That being fallen into a deepe mirie ditch, out of which ſhe could by no meanes helpe her ſelfe, a luſtie young gallant comming by, did not only helpe her out, but alſo in friendly manner, made her cleane, and afterwards apparelled her in rich and coſtly attire. The danger of this dreame much troubled the tender gentlewoman, but the image of the yong gentleman was ſo well phantazied in her brain, that waking, ſhe thought ſhe ſtill ſaw him, and ſleeping longed ſore for what ſhe ſaw not. Thus whileſt this yong gentlewoman with great deuotion entertained this imaginarie man; the old gray headed Turke Acceccozza came, & with a ſtrong companie beſieged her fathers caſtle of ABYDVS. During which ſiege, this gentlewoman oftentimes went vp into the high turret of the caſtle, from whence ſhe might at pleaſure ſee the marſhall deeds on both ſides, and take full view of all the enemies campe. But ſee the chance, as Abdurachman with great courage and no leſſe brauerie, approched neere to the ſiege of the caſtle, ſhe thought (vpon the firſt ſight of him) that he was the very man whom ſhe had before dreamed of, and whoſe Idea was in her heart ſo deeply imprinted: wherefore ſhe fully reſolued to performe what ſhe had without witneſſe with her ſelfe determined. And waiting another time, when Abdurachman approched the caſtle, ſhe caſt down to his feet a letter written in Greeke, and made faſt vnto a ſtone: which letter he taking vp, deliuered the ſame to the Generall Acceccozza. Wherein after ſhe had diſcouered her paſſionate affection, ſhe promiſed to deliuer the caſtle into Abdurachmans power, if the Turks would raiſe their ſiege, and Abdurachman himſelfe with ſome few would ſecretly returne to the caſtle in the dead time of the night, and then follow her direction. Acceccozza like an old fox, which is ſeldome taken in the trap, gaue ſmall credit to theſe louing lines, for feare of treaſon: yet for ſo much as you are the man (ſaid he to Abdurachman) whom ſhe vpon ſpeciall liking hath made choice of for the purpoſe, will you aduenture your perſon? And he, armed with a manly courage, a ſurer defence than any armour of proofe, incited alſo with hope of honour, riches, and beautie, all worthie priſes for marſhall minds; ſaid he would vndertake the atchieuement of that exploit, if it were his pleaſure ſo. Whereupon Acceccozza, becauſe nothing ſhould be ſuſpected by his ſudden departure, gaue a ſharpe aſſault to the caſtle, as if he would haue taken it by fine force, yet in the end retired, and preſently brake vp his ſiege, as deſpairing of the winning thereof. The defendants of the caſtle thinking themſelues deliuered from a great danger, greatly reioyced: and as in like caſe it oftentimes falleth out, in their great iolitie ſurcharged themſelues that night with exceſſe

A exceſſe both of meat and drinke. But Abdurachman at the time in the letter appointed, put himſelfe vpon the way, with certaine ſelect ſouldiers, and about midnight came to the appointed place of the caſtle, where the young gentlewoman was attending his comming: and he by her meanes was conueyed into the caſtle, and ſo by her directed to the porters lodge: where he ſlew the porter, being faſt aſleepe, and opening the gates, let in his followers: which went directly to the captaines lodging, and there tooke him priſoner, being before their comming ouertaken with wine, and faſt aſleepe. Thus was the caſtle of ABYDVS ſurpriſed by the Turks, from whence they had a faire proſpect out of ASIA into EVROPE. The captaine with his faire daughter and the greateſt part of the rich ſpoile of the caſtle was deliuered to Abdurachman, to B be preſented to Orchanes at his court, then lying at NEAPOLIS. Who wonderfull glad of ſo good newes, gaue the faire gentlewoman with the greateſt part of the prey in reward to Abdurachman. The poſteritie of this man (as they ſay) yet remaine among the Turks. Amongſt others of the warlike captaines, there was alſo one Cararachman, whoſe name was ſo dreadfull to them of CONSTANTINOPLE, that when their children cried, they would terrifie them to make them hold their peace, by ſaying, Cararachman comes. Not long after, the two valiant aforenamed worthie captaines Cunger-Alpes and Acecozza died: after whoſe death, Orchanes made his ſons, Solyman and Amurath, lords and gouernours of thoſe countries and prouinces. And intending (by the perſwaſion of Abdurachman) to beſiege NICOMEDIA, he leuied a great armie, wherewith he tooke diuers ſmall caſtles and forts as he marched towards the citie. NICOME-
C DIA was at that time gouerned by an honourable ladie, kinſwoman vnto Andronicus the Emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE: but ſhe ſeeing her citie beſieged by the Turks, and doubting her owne forces not to be able to hold out the ſiege, by a truſtie meſſenger offred to yeeld the citie vnto Orchanes, vpon condition, That ſhe with ſo many of the citizens as would, might in ſafetie depart with their liues, libertie, and goods: which being granted, ſhe with ſo many as would follow her, departed out of the citie by night, taking ſhipping for CONSTANTINOPLE.

Nicomedia yeelded vnto Orchanes.

Orchanes hauing taken NICOMEDIA, made his ſonne Solyman gouernour of the ſame. The Churches of the Chriſtians he conuerted into Turkiſh Meſchitas or Temples. The greateſt Church (being of wonderfull beautie) he conuerted into a colledge or ſchoole, for the learned profeſſors & ſtudents of Mahomets law, which is yet called in NICOMEDIA, Orchanes his ſchoole
D or colledge. And becauſe the countrey neere vnto NICOMEDIA, lying open vpon the ſea, was euer in danger to be ſpoiled by the gallies of CONSTANTINOPLE; he placed in thoſe countries diuers of his moſt experienced ſouldiers to defend the ſame, appointing to euery of them poſſeſſions and penſions, according to their degrees and merits. After this, Orchanes by the counſell of his brother Aladin, commanded all his men of warre to weare white caps, thereby to be knowne from others, which commonly wore red. Such manner of caps the Ianizaries vſe at this day. The Turks alſo in Orchanes raigne, and long time after, vſed not to cut or ſhaue their beards, but did weare them long: ſo that if the King would diſgrace any man, he would in his diſpleaſure command his beard to be cut or ſhauen. The manner of cutting and ſhauing their beards, which they now vſe, they learned of the Italians: of whom they haue alſo borrowed ma-E ny other faſhions, not onely differing, but quite contrary to their ancient manners & cuſtomes. Orchanes about this time remoued his court to NICE, where he lay long time after. There he built a ſumptuous church, appointing a Preacher to preach vnto the people euery friday: he erected in NICE alſo two faire abbeyes, in the one of which, he with his own hands ſerued the ſtrangers & poore the firſt dinner. He was the firſt that builded abbeyes or monaſteries among the Turks, whoſe example moſt of his ſucceſſours haue imitated, and is amongſt them vſed vnto this day.

Orchanes remoueth his court to Nice.

The gouernment of NICOMEDIA, Orchanes committed to his eldeſt ſonne Solyman (as is before ſaid) a Prince of great towardlineſſe, giuing him in great charge, to haue a vigilant eye vnto the townes of TARAXA, GOVINVCA, and MVDVRNE, which were nigh vnto NICOMEDIA, yet in poſſeſſion of the Chriſtians: all which townes, with the countries adioyning, Solyman in ſhort F time got without force, by compoſition. This Solyman was of a princely diſpoſition, ſo tempering iuſtice with clemencie in his gouernment, that many Chriſtians (allured with his vertues) became of his religion, & gladly put themſelues vnder his ſubiection: the politicke lawes of the country he neither abrogated nor changed, but maintained as they had been of ancient time accuſtomed, whereby he greatly won the hearts of the people. Amurath his younger ſonne, Orchanes made lord and gouernour of PRVSA, after he had remoued his court to NICE. And the castle of CHARA-CHIZAR, with the seignorie thereto belonging, he gaue to his cousin Artemure, the sonne of his vncle Iundus. G

Orchanes inuadeth the country of Carasina.

There was at this time in Orchanes court, a noble young gentleman called Turson-beg, the son of Dharasis, King of CHARASIA; by whose persuasion Orchanes in person himselfe with a strong armie, made an expedition into that countrey: for that his fathers subiects after the death of the King his father, denied their obedience to his elder brother, wishing rather to haue Turson for their soueraigne. In whose behalfe Orchanes taking that iourney, surprised by the way many castles and townes to his owne vse. Orchanes was no sooner entred the countrey of CHARASIA, but Tursons elder brother fled to PERGAMVM, whither the Turks shortly pursued him: where Turson desirous to speake with his brother, vnwarily approching the citie, was wounded H with an arrow shot from the wals, and there slaine. With whose death Orchanes was so greatly offended, that he threatned to destroy the whole countrey with fire and sword, if they did not by a day prefixed generally submit themselues to his mercie. The people terrified with this proclamation of so great a Prince alreadie in armes, yeelded themselues vnto his subiection. The Kings sonne also that was fled into PERGAMVM, vpon reasonable conditions yeelded himselfe vnto Orchanes, who sent him to PRVSA, where after he had there lined two yeeres, he died of the plague: after whose death, Orchanes made his sonne Solyman Prince of CARASINA. Neither is this taking in of the countrey of CARASINA to be accounted a small conquest; one of the greatest houses of the Turks the successours of the Iconian Sultan Aladin, now thereby taking end, and their dominions, which were not small (as containing almost all LYDIA, with some I good parts of MISIA, TROAS, and the lesser PHRYGIA) now vnited vnto the Othoman kingdome. Orchanes vpon his returne, for the good successe of this iourney, built a church and monasterie at PRVSA, placing therein religious men, with all diligence sought for out of all his kingdome: of which religious, the Turks write many fables, better worth the smiling at than the serious reporting. Hitherto the kingdome of Othoman and Orchanes his sonne, was contained within the bounds of the lesser ASIA, which the Turks call ANATOLIA.

Now it resteth to be shewed, vpon what occasion Orchanes, or rather his sonne Solyman Bassa, as it were fatally, with a small power first passed ouer HELLESPONTVS into EVROPE; where they and their successors haue by little and little so enlarged their dominions, that they haue now long agoe quite ouerthrown the Grecian empire, with many other great kingdomes, K and are at this present a terrour to all Christian Princes bordering vpon them: to the perpetuall infamie of the Greekes, who for want of courage, and busied with ciuill discord, neuer sought in time to impeach their greatnesse.

Orchanes hauing now so augmented his kingdome, that he might from many parts therof out of ASIA, take view of the pleasant borders of EVROPE, from whence he was excluded only by the narrow sea of HELLESPONTVS; and continually incited with the vnsatiable and restlesse desire of soueraigntie, began to deuise how he might possibly passe that strait sea, and set foot into EVROPE, another part of the world. Which his conceit one day he imparted to his sonne Solyman: who presently answered his father, That if it would please him to giue him leaue, he would not doubt to passe the strait of HELLESPONTVS, and in time to plant the Mahometane L religion in those countries of EVROPE, possessed by the Christians. Which answer of Solymans, much pleased his father, who gaue him leaue to depart into his countrey, and in that matter to proceed further, as he thought best, & as occasion should best serue. Solyman taking leaue of his father, tooke his iourney into CARASINA, where riding vp & downe the country, as it had beene for his pleasure only, he made his way to the place where it is thought the famous citie of TROY sometime stood; where yet (as the Turks and some others say) are to be seene the wonderfull ruines of that vnfortunate citie by the sea side. In this place Solyman stood still a great while as it were in a study, forecasting (as it seemed) some great matter, without speking one word to any of his followers. When one of his chieftaines called Ezes-beg, to put him out of his deep thoughts, boldly said vnto him: My Lord and great Soueraigne, what strange thing is this, that you are so M deeply drowned in these your melancholie thoughts? vndoubtedly it is some great matter that you are studying vpon. Truth it is, said Solyman, for I was thinking how it were possible to passe ouer this sea of HELLESPONTVS into the borders of EVROPE, and to take view of that countrey, and so to returne vndiscouered. If this be the matter, said Ezes-beg (ioyning vnto him one Fazil-beg, a man of no lesse valour than himselfe) we two will by the power of God performe

A vnto you this enterpriſe. Then was Solyman deſirous to know of them, about what place they would paſſe ouer: which they well knowing the ſea coaſt, ſhewed him not far off. Wherfore Solyman giuing them leaue, they departed: and ſhortly after making a little boat, or rather as ſome ſuppoſe a raffe, paſſed ouer HELLESPONTVS by night, and arriued in EVROPE ſide, neere vnto a caſtle of the Turkes, called ZEMBENIC or ZEMBENIC, but of the Greekes Coiridocaſtron, that is to ſay, The hogs caſtle, not farre from SESTVS: where going aſhore, they tooke priſoner a Greeke in a vineyard neere vnto the caſtle, whom they finding to be a good ſenſible fellow, without delay put him into their boat or raffe, and returning backe againe, preſented him to Solyman. This Chriſtian captiue Solyman entertained courteouſly, giuing him great gifts and rich
B apparrell, to diſcouer vnto him the eſtate of his countrey: and in fine, learned of him a meanes to take the caſtle ZEMBENIC, before the Chriſtians ſhould thereof be aware. For atchieuement whereof, certaine boats were ſpeedily made readie by Solymans commandement, and he with eightie choſen ſouldiors eaſily paſſed ouer in them by night, with their Chriſtian guide the Greeke: for in that place, the ſtrait betwixt ASIA and EVROPE is not paſt an Italian mile ouer. This guide brought Solyman directly to the aforeſaid caſtle, where was a great dunghill, ſo high, that from the top thereof Solyman with his ſouldiors eaſily got into the caſtle, which they woon without any great reſiſtance; for it was then harueſt time, and moſt part of the people were in the vineyards, or treading out of their corne all night, as the vſe of thoſe coũtries is. Solyman thus poſſeſſed of the caſtle of ZEMBENIC, vſed no extremitie againſt the inhabitants thereof, ſeeking
C rather by courteſie to gaine their good wils, than by extremitie to force them to his: yet ſuch gentlemen as he tooke, with ſome others alſo of the better ſort, hee ſent by ſhipping into ASIA, and by the ſame ſhips returned ſouldiors as faſt as he could into EVROPE: ſo that he had in one day two hundred ſouldiors more brought ouer vnto him. And manning ſuch ſmall veſſels as he had left about the caſtle, ſent Ezes-beg alongſt the coaſt on EVROPE ſide, to burne ſuch ſhipping or veſſels as he could find, leaſt the Chriſtians ſhould by them hinder his paſſage vpon the ſtrait of HELLESPONTVS. So in a few daies Solyman had tranſported into EVROPE two thouſand good ſouldiers of the Turks, whom he ſo gouerned, that they did not in any violent ſort injurie the vulgar Chriſtians, by reaſon whereof the common people began to like reaſonable well of the Turks, and to conuerſe with them without feare. This was the firſt comming ouer of the D Turks into EVROPE, with purpoſe there to conquer and inhabit, vnder the fortune of the Othoman kings. For albeit that ſome of that nation had at ſundrie times before come ouer, as men ſeeking after ſpoile, or otherwiſe ſent for, yea ſometimes by the Greeke Emperours themſelues; yet neuer ſtayed they long, but hauing done that they came for, or els loſt themſelues, returned backe againe into ASIA: vntill that now conducted by Solyman, and poſſeſſed of the little caſtle of ZEMBENIC (as is aforeſaid) they there tooke ſo faſt footing, as that they and their poſteritie after them, were neuer thence to be ſince that time remoued: but ſtil more and more encroching vpon the Chriſtians, haue vnto their Aſian kingdome joyned a great part of EVROPE alſo, to the terrour of the reſt that yet remaineth, as in the proceſſe of this Hiſtorie ſhall (if God will) at large appeare.

E About two miles from ZEMBENIC in CHERSONESVS was another caſtle called MAITO, or more truely MADITVS, which Solyman alſo tooke: ſo that now he had gotten two caſtles in EVROPE, both which he ſtrongly manned, After which time, the Turkes in great numbers came out of ASIA into EVROPE ouer that narrow ſtrait of HELLESPONTVS, to dwell in CHERSONESVS: and Solyman inſtead of them, to make roome for his Turkes, ſent Chriſtians out of EVROPE to be placed amongſt the Turkes in ASIA. The report of this comming ouer of the Turks into CHERSONESVS, and of the taking of the caſtle of ZEMBENIC carried in poſt to CONSTANTINOPLE, was ſufficient to haue ſtirred vp any prouident or carefull men, preſently to haue taken vp armes for the recouerie of the loſt caſtle, and the driuing out againe of the barbarous enemies out of EVROPE, before they had gathered any greater F ſtrength, or ſetled themſelues in thoſe places: but ſuch was the careleſſe negligence and great ſecuritie of the proud Greekes, that in ſtead thereof they to extenuate the greatneſſe of the loſſe, commonly ſayd, That there was but an hogſtie loſt; alluding vnto the name of the caſtle; and vainely (as ſayth a graue Father of their own) jeaſting at that was not to be jeaſted at, and laughing at that was not to bee laughed, but lamented for, as in few yeares it prooued, their fooliſh laughter being not without good cauſe conuerted into moſt bitter teares.

The caſtle of Maditus taken by the Turks.

Callipolis taken by the Turks.

Solyman his ſtrength ſo ſtill increaſing by the daily comming ouer of the Turks, he proceeded G farther to ſpoile the countrey of CHERSONESVS, almoſt as farre as CALLIPOLIS, diſtant from the caſtle ZEMBENIC about two and twentie miles: after which pleaſant citie the proud Turke began now to long. Which the gouernour thereof perceiuing by the Turks continuall encroaching vpon him, raiſed what power he was able to make, and ſo went out againſt them; all the reſt of the Greekes in the meane time lying ſtill as if they had beene aſleepe, or that the matter had not concerned them: but meeting the Turks, he was by them (after a great conflict) ouerthrowne, and for ſauegard of his life glad to flie into his citie: after whom the Turks following, ſpoiled the countrey round about, and in their returne by plaine force tooke the citie, together with the caſtle alſo: which hapned in the yeere of our Lord 1358. Where the mad- H neſſe of the Greekes was againe more than before to be wondred at; for the newes of the loſſe of CALLIPOLIS being brought to CONSTANTINOPLE, the people there made ſmall account thereof, although it was indeed a right great loſſe, and much concerned the ſtate: but to extenuate the matter, when they had any talke thereof, in ieſting wiſe commonly ſaid, That the Turks had but taken from them a pottell of wine. But by taking of ſuch hogſtyes and pottels of wine (as they termed it) the Turks in a few yeeres after had gone ſo farre in THRACIA, that Amurath (this ſame Solyman his nephew which now tooke from the Greekes the citie of CALLIPOLIS) euen in the heart (as it were) of the Greeke empire, placed his royall ſeat at HADRIANOPLE: and immediately after him Baiazet his ſonne (hauing ſubdued all the countrey, euen to the wals of CONSTANTINOPLE) for certaine yeeres laid hard ſiege vnto I the imperiall citie it ſelfe; and had no doubt then carried it, had not the great expedition of the mightie Tartar Prince Tamerlaine (vnto Baiazet fatall) in the meane time hapned: whereby (God ſo appointing it) the proſperous ſucceedings of the Turks were for a ſpace well ſtaied, that they ſhould not before the time by him prefined, deuoure the reliques of the Greeke empire. And it were to be wiſhed that the Chriſtians of our time alſo (by their example warned) would at length awake out of their dead ſleepe: who of late haue loſt vnto the ſame enemie, not the caſtle of ZEMBENIC, or the citie of CALLIPOLIS, but whole kingdomes, as HVNGARIE, and CYPRVS: and are ſtill faire in the way; I ſay no more for griefe, and foreboding of euill fortune. But againe to our purpoſe: Solyman hauing made this proſperous entrance into EVROPE, and there got ſtrong footing, by ſpeedie meſſengers certified his father what he K had done, and that it was expedient for him with all ſpeed to ſend vnto him a great ſupplie of men of warre, as well for the ſure defence and keeping of the caſtles and forts by him alreadie gotten, as for the further inuaſion of the countrey. This meſſage was wonderfull welcome vnto Orchanes, and whereas many families of the Sarazins, at that preſent were come into the countrey of CARASINA, to poſſeſſe the dwellings and places of them, which in hope to better their eſtate were before gone ouer into EVROPE; all theſe Sarazins he commanded to paſſe ouer into EVROPE likewiſe: which they did accordingly, ſeating themſelues for a time in the countrey neere to CALLIPOLIS. In the meane time, Solyman omitted no oportunitie to enter further into the countrey, winning ſmall forts and holds, and ſtill peopling the ſame with his Turks: And on the other ſide, they of CARASINA paſſed ouer into EVROPE, pla- L cing themſelues as it were in a new world. For which cauſe, and for the great deſire they had to extend the Turkiſh dominion and religion, they refuſed no paines of warre: ſo that all things at that time proſpered with the Turks, and went backward with the Chriſtians.

In the time of theſe wars, not farre from CALLIPOLIS, was a little caſtle called CONGERE, the captaine whereof was by a Greeke name called Calo Ioannes, a valiant and painfull man: this captaine continually moleſted and troubled the Turks which lay on that ſide of CALLIPOLIS, vnder the leading of Ezes-beg, many of whom he ſlew and tooke priſoners, as he could finde them at any aduantage. Solyman much angred herewith, by craftie and ſecret eſpials learned a certaine time when he was gone out of his caſtle to doe ſome exploit vpon the Turks: whereupon he preſently ſo beſet the caſtle with ſouldiers, that he could by no meanes M returne thither, but he muſt firſt fall into their hands; and for more aſſurance placed others alſo in by-waies, leſt he ſhould by any way eſcape. The captaine ignorant of all this, proſecuted his enterpriſe, and hauing taken a Turke priſoner, thinking to returne to his caſtle, was haſtily purſued by Fazill-Beg: for which cauſe, making the more haſte, he ſuddenly fell into the danger of the Turks laid in ambuſh: where his men were all ſlaine, and he himſelfe taken and brought before

A before his owne caſtle, and had there his head preſently ſtrucke off: whereupon the caſtle was forthwith by them that were therein (hauing now loſt their captaine) ſurrendred, and Chazi Ili Beg, a valiant captaine of the Turks, placed in the ſame: who from thence neuer ceaſed to trouble the countrey, euen to the wals of DIDYMOTICHVM, as did Solyman alſo out of CALLIPOLIS.

Thus in the ſpace of one yeere the Turks got ſtrong footing in EVROPE, poſſeſſing diuers caſtles and townes, with the countrey about them, which Solyman gaue in reward vnto his captaines and ſouldiers, as appeareth by the graues and tombes of Ezes-beg and Faſill-beg, the two which firſt came ouer into EVROPE, which are there yet well knowne.

B About this time it fortuned, that as this martiall Prince Solyman was for his diſport hawking in the fields of BOLAYRE, on EVROPE ſide, galloping in to his faulcon, was with his horſe ouerthrowne in a ditch, of which fall he being ſore bruſed, ſhortly after died. The newes of his death being brought to Orchanes his father, gaue vnto him (then being ſicke) iuſt occaſion of great ſorrow: ſo that within two moneths after he died alſo, being foureſcore yeeres old, when he had thereof raigned 31 yeeres; and died about the yeere of our Lord 1359. Some hiſtories report otherwiſe, both of his death, and of the time wherein he liued: as that he ſhould be ſlaine in a battell againſt the Tartars, or as others write, with an arrow at the ſiege of PRVSA, in the yeere of our Lord 1349. But Ioannes Leunclauius in his hiſtorie collected out of the Turks owne chronicles, whom we follow as moſt probable, reporteth it as before.

The death of Solyman Baſſa, Orchanes his eldeſt ſonne.

The death of Orchanes.

C This Orchanes was wiſe, courteous, and bountifull, more ingenious than his father in deuiſing warlike engines. He built diuers princely Churches, Abbies, Colledges, and Cels, and was in his ſuperſtitious religion very zealous: inſomuch, that he appointed penſions to all ſuch as could in the Church ſay the booke of Mahomets law by heart: and appointed competent maintenance for all Iudges of his courts, becauſe they ſhould not take any thing in reward of his ſubiects, for the peruerting of iuſtice. He greatly inlarged his kingdome in ASIA, and not content to be incloſed with the ſeas of EVXINVM and HELLESPONTVS, ſet faſt footing in EVROPE; which ſome attribute to his ſonne Amurath. He was vnto the Chriſtians alwaies a moſt mortall enemie, and ſo died.

THE LIFE OF AMVRATH, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, THIRD KING OF THE TVRKS, AND THE GREAT AVGMENTOR OF THEIR KINGDOME.

Amurath the younger ſonne of Orchanes ſucceeded his father in the Turkiſh kingdome, his elder brother Solyman being dead a little before his father. This Amurath with greater zeale than any one of the Turkiſh Kings, aduanced the Mahometane religion, and had therein wonderfull ſucceſſe. In the beginning of his raigne, he gathered a great armie out of all parts of his kingdome, to PRVSA; purpoſing to paſſe ouer HELLESPONTVS, to inuade the Chriſtians in THRACIA. But vnderſtanding, that the other Mahometane Princes in ASIA had combined themſelues againſt him, he was thereby enforced to leaue his former determination for EVROPE, and to turne his forces vpon them. In which wars he mightily preuailed againſt them, and returned with victorie to PRVSA. But hauing ſo ſubdued thoſe confederate Princes, he the next yeere after proſecuted his warres before intended againſt the Chriſtians in EVROPE. For which purpoſe hauing leuied a ſtrong armie in ASIA, he paſſed ouer to CALLIPOLIS, accompanied with his tutor, whom the Turks call Lala Schahin: whoſe graue aduice and counſell he moſt followed in all his waightie affaires, being at that time one of his chiefe counſellors. From CALLIPOLIS he marched to the caſtle of BENVTVM, which was by compoſition yeelded vnto him. From thence he went to TZVRVLVS, where the Chriſtians gaue him a ſharpe encounter: but in the end he wan the towne, and carried away the victorie. And ſo proceeding farther, tooke diuers other ſmall caſtles and townes in that part of THRACIA, which of the ancient Romane colonies was then called ROMANIA, and now of the Turks RVMILIA, namely MESINE, BVRGOS, and others; whereof ſome he vtterly raſed, and into the reſt put ſtrong garriſons. At this time alſo, Chaſi-Ilbeg and Eurenoſes, two of his moſt valiant captaines, tooke certaine forts ſtanding vpon the riuer MERITZA, in ancient time called HEBRVS. Whereby they much troubled the inhabitants of the country thereabouts. Wherewith the captaine of DIDYMOTICHVM offended, gathered his ſouldiers together, intending to haue intercepted the great captaine Chaſi-Ilbeg: in which attempt he loſt moſt of his followers, and was himſelfe there taken priſoner. For whoſe ranſome and certaine other conditions, the citizens of DIDYMOTICHVM yeelded the citie vnto the Turks.

Shortly after Amurath ſent his tutor Lala Schahin to beſiege HADRIANOPLE, now called ANDRINOPLE, but in ancient time ORESTIAS: of whoſe cõming the Chriſtians hearing, encountred him vpon the way, and fought with him a great battell, wherin many were on both ſides loſt: but in the end, the Chriſtians being put to the worſt, retired againe to the citie. Of this victorie Schahin ſent newes vnto Amurath, with certaine of the heads of the ſlaine Chriſtians: who thereupon ſending Chaſis and Eurenoſes before, he himſelfe with a great armie followed after to the ſiege of HADRIANOPLE: of whoſe comming, the gouernour of HADRIANOPLE vnderſtanding, fled ſecretly out of the citie by night to ÆNVS. The citizens ſeeing themſelues ſo forſaken of their gouernour, yeelded their citie vnto Amurath, in the yeere of our Lord 1362.

Hadrianople yeelded vnto the Turks.

The taking of theſe ſtrong cities in THRACIA, eſpecially of DIDYMOTICHVM and HADRIANOPLE, is (by ſome of the Turks owne hiſtories) otherwiſe reported: which, becauſe it is neither improbable nor diſagreeing from the ſubtill dealings of the Turks, and of themſelues alſo receiued, receiued, I haue thought good to ſet downe as their owne Hiſtoriographers report the ſame. G

The Turkiſh King Amurath had(as they ſay,and as truth was) in the beginning of his raigne concluded a peace with the Chriſtians of THRACIA: during which peace,the gouernour of DIDYMOTICHVM intending to fortifie his citie with new and ſtronger fortifications againſt the aſſaults of the Turks, entertained all the maſons, carpenters, and other workmen he could by any meanes get: which Amurath vnderſtanding, ſecretly cauſed two hundred good and luſtie workmen and labourers to come out of ASIA, to offer their ſeruice vnto the gouernour; who gladly entertained them,vſing their helpe in that his great and haſtie worke. Which thing ſome of the wiſer ſort of the citizens diſliking, wiſhed the gouernour to beware of thoſe Aſian workmen, as by them ſuſpected. But he preſuming vpon the peace made with Amurath, and conſi- H dering they were but baſe workmen, and no ſouldiers, had the leſſe care of them: neuertheleſſe (vſing their worke all day) he commanded them to lodge without the wals of the citie euery night. Amurath vnderſtanding that theſe workmen were thus by the gouernour entertained, ſent for the valiant captaine Chaſis-Ilbeg, and requeſted him with thirtie other good ſouldiers diſguiſed as poore labourers to goe to DIDYMOTICHVM to ſeeke for worke, and in doing thereof to eſpie if any oportunitie might be found for the ſurpriſing of the citie. Chaſis with theſe thirtie according to Amurath his direction, comming as poore men lacking worke,found entertainment at DIDYMOTICHVM, where they carried ſtones,morter, and ſuch like things, euer ſhewing themſelues very diligent in their worke: Chaſis with vigilant eye ſtill awaiting what might beſt ſerue his turne for the ſurpriſing of the citie. When night was come, the Tur- I kiſh workmen and labourers after their accuſtomed manner, and as they were by the gouernour appointed, went out of the citie into the ſuburbs to their lodgings: from whence Chaſis ſecretly departing in the night, came to Amurath and ſhewed him how one of the gates of the citie might vpon the ſudden be taken, if it would pleaſe him to place a ſufficient number of Turks in ambuſh neere vnto the citie, to ioyne with him and the other Turkiſh labourers when occaſion ſhould ſerue. Which being reſolued vpon, Amurath ſent him backe againe to put this his deuice in execution: ſo Chaſis returning to DIDYMOTICHVM, brake the matter to ſo many of the Aſian workmen as he thought conuenient, fully inſtructing them what was to be done. The next day (according to his appointment) the Chriſtians being then at dinner,theſe Turkiſh workmen and labourers fell at words among themſelues, and from words to fained K blowes: in which counterfeit brawle and tumult, they ſuddenly ran to one of the gates of the citie faſt by (as was before appointed) and there laying hands vpon the warders weapons, as if it had beene to defend themſelues againſt their fellowes, ſuddenly ſet vpon thoſe warders, being in number but few, and then at dinner alſo, and ſo preſently ſlew them: which done, they opened the gate of the citie,and let in the other Turks which lay in wait not farre off: who with great celeritie entring the citie, preſently tooke the ſame, and there put the chiefeſt of the citizens to the ſword, ſparing the reſt of the meaner ſort.

Rhodeſtum ſurpriſed by the Turks.

The citie of RHODESTVM (of the old writers called RHŒDESTVM) was by Amurath his commandement, in this time of peace, by ſudden aſſault giuen in the night by the Lord Eurenoſes, taken alſo. L

With this foule dealing & breach of league, yet in force,the Chriſtians hardly charged Amurath; who turned it ouer to the vnrulineſſe of his captaines and men of warre, whom he threatned with great ſeueritie to puniſh:and to giue the better colour that it was done without his priuitie,he had fained himſelfe ſicke all the while theſe things were in doing.But being requeſted to reſtore theſe cities ſo wrongfully taken from the Chriſtians, he vtterly refuſed ſo to doe, ſaying, That it was againſt the law of his great Prophet Mahomet, to deliuer againe vnto the Chriſtians, any towne or citie wherin the Mahometan religion had been once openly taught. Whereupon wars began againe to ariſe on freſh betwixt the Chriſtians and him, wherein ſometime the one preuailed,and ſometime the other: in ſuch ſort,as that thoſe wars at length became vnto them both very tedious. Wherefore Amurath made peace againe with the Chriſtians of HADRIANO- M
PLE, SELYBRIA, and CONSTANTINOPLE: yet deſiring nothing more in heart, than to take the citie of HADRIANOPLE: which the better to bring to paſſe, he cauſed Chaſis-Ilbeg as a diſcontented captaine to flie to HADRIANOPLE, pretending himſelfe to haue beene hardly vſed by the tyrant his maſter: where hauing in his companie other ſuch diſſembling fugitiues as was himſelfe,he oftentimes iſſued out of the citie and valiantly skirmiſhed with the Turks,which ſo greatly

A greatly pleased the gouernour of HADRIANOPLE, that he therby grew into his great fauour. Many other Turkes also vnder pretence of like discontentment, resorted vnto Chasis: wherewith finding himselfe well strengthned, he writ letters secretly vnto Amurath, That he would deliuer one of the gates of HADRIANOPLE vnto him at a certaine appointed time, if he would against the same time be readie to send him present succors. All things being agreed vpon, Chasis at the appointed time came in the dawning of the day to one of the gates of the citie, accompanied but with ten of his followers, as if he would haue gone forth to hunt, as he had before accustomed. But so soone as the gates were opened, he with the other ten well appointed for the purpose, furiously set vpon the warders, whom they slew; and being aided by the rest of the fugitiue
B Turks (which with all speed by appointment before made, resorted vnto them) they possessed the gate; vntill a great power of the Turks, whom Amurath the night before had placed in ambush neere vnto the citie, hauing knowledge what was done, and hearing the alarme, speedily came on, and by that gate entred the citie: where was fought a cruell fight all that day, euen from morning vntill night. But in the end the Turks preuailing, tooke the citie, which they haue euer since possessed vnto this day.

These great cities of THRACIA thus take, or otherwise as aforesaid (for that I leaue for the Reader to thinke of as he pleaseth) Amurath appointed the seat of his royall Court at HADRIANOPLE, as a place of all others most fit for the further inuasion of the Christians, and enlarging of his kingdom in EVROPE: from whence such a world of mischiefs & woe hath since that time
C ouerflowed a great part of Christendome & drowned so many goodly kingdoms in EVROPE, as that both they, and most part of the rest that yet remaine (dayly in dread of like destruction) might iustly accurse and detest the wofull careles nesse & degenerate cowardise of the Greekes, were not they themselues together with the glorie of their church and empire, swallowed vp in the same gulfe of calamitie and woe, and so become of all others most miserable: but what auaile vaine complaints, but to encrease old griefes? wherefore againe to that we haue in hand.

The proud Sultan Amurath (hauing to his great content thus seated himselfe at HADRIANOPLE, in the middest of THRACIA) presently sent out his tutor Lala Schahin with a greater power to inuade the countrey about PHILIPPOPOLIS with the countrey of ZAGORA, which lyeth towards the great mountain HŒMVS, where the best Turkish Scimitars were made; giuing like D charge vnto Eurenoses, for the subduing of the territorie of IPSALA: who both notably performed what he had commanded, & in short time brought all those countreys vnder his subjection, wherein he shortly after placed diuers sanzacks or gouernours, for the better assurance thereof being so lately gayned.

About this time (by the suggestion of Cara Rustemes a doctor of the Mahometan law) Zinderlu Chelil, then Cadilesher or chiefe Iustice amongst the Turks, but afterwards better knowne by the name of Catradin Bassa, by the commaundement of Amurath, tooke order that euerie fifth captiue of the Christians, being aboue fifteen yeeres old, should be taken vp for the king, as by law due vnto him: and if the number were vnder fiue, then to pay vnto the king for euerie head 25 aspers, by way of tribute: appointing officers for collecting both of such captiues and E tribute mony, of whom the aforesaid Cara Rustemes himselfe was chief, as first deuiser of the matter. By which meanes great numbers of Christian youths were brought to the court as the kings captiues, which by the coũsel of the same Zinderlu Chelil, were distributed amongst the Turkish husbandmen in ASIA, there to learne the Turkish language, religion, and manners: where after they had been brought vp in all painefull labour and trauaile by the space of two or three yeres, they were called vnto the court, and choice made of the better sort of them to attend vpon the person of the prince, or to serue him in his warres: where they dayly practising all feats of actiuitie, are called by the name of Ianizars (that is to say, new souldiers.) This was the first beginning of the Ianizars vnder this Sultan Amurath the first, but had great encrease vnder Amurath the second, in so much that Iouius with some other Historiographers, attribute the beginning of this F order vnto him: which neuertheless (as appeareth by the Turks owne histories) had the beginning as is aforesaid: & hath euer since been continued by the Turkish kings & emperors, by the same and some other greater means; so that in processe of time they be grown to that greatnes as that they are oftentimes right dreadful vnto the great Turke himselfe: after whose death, they haue sometimes preferred to the empire such of the emperours sonnes as they best liked, without respect of prerogatiue of age, contrarie to the will of the great Sultan himselfe: & are at this day

the greateſt ſtrength of the Turkiſh empire, and not vnlike in time to be the greateſt cauſe of the G ruine thereof: the finger of the higheſt oftentimes (as we haue before ſaid) turning euen thoſe helps which were by mans wiſedome prouided for the eſtabliſhing of kingdomes, vnto their more ſpeedie deſtruction; and eſpecially theſe continuall gariſons of martiall men, no leſſe to be feared than truſted, as in the courſe of this hiſtorie may appeare.

When Amurath had thus a great while continued at HADRIANOPLE, determing now to returne vnto ASIA, he made Schahin his tutor Beg-Lerbeg or viceroy of ROMANIA; and Eurenoſes lord gouernour of the marches; Zinderlu Chelil he made Vezir Azemes or lord preſident of his counſell, and changing his name called him Cairadin Baſſa, that is to ſay, The Baſſa that had well deſerued, his name witneſſing his good deſert. After this he returned into ASIA, H where he ſpent that winter at PRVSA. Theſe two great men Cairadin Baſſa & Cara Ruſtemes before named, ſometimes two doctors of the Mahometan law, were (as the Turkiſh hiſtories report) the firſt that corrupted the Turkiſh court with couetouſneſſe and briberie, and are therfore of them euen yet much blamed.

Whilſt Amurath thus wintered in ASIA, news was brought vnto him, That the Chriſtians of SERVIA and BVLGARIA had gathered a great armie for the beſieging of HADRIANOPLE: which cauſed him to prepare great forces in ASIA, to aid his captaines in EVROPE. But in returning out of ASIA, he by the way tooke the towne of BOGA; where he put to ſword all the Chriſtians that were therein able to beare armes, leading the reſt into captiuitie, and with the ſpoile rewarded his ſouldiours. This ſtrong towne was not long after againe recouered by the I Chriſtians, who requited the Turkes with like meaſure, and doubting the keeping thereof, raſed it downe to the ground: yet was it afterwards reedified by the Turks, as it is at this preſent to be ſeene: which was done in the yeare of our Lord 1365.

Boga taken by Amurath, and recouered againe and raſed by the Chriſtians.

Boga new built by the Turks.

In the meane time, the Chriſtian armie of SERVIA and BVLGARIA, in number betwixt fortie and fiftie thouſand, marching towards HADRIANOPLE, and now come very neere the ſame, fell in mutinie among themſelues. Whereof the Turks by their eſpials hauing intelligence, ſuddainely in the night ſet vpon them: who blinded with inward hatred, and no leſſe fearing one another, than their enemies, neglected to joyne their forces againſt them, but were readie to turn their weapons one vpon another; and ſo by their own diſcord, more than by the enemies force, were made a prey vnto the Turks, by whō they were put to flight, & ſlain, with ſo great a ſlaughter, K that the place wherin they fell, not far frō GERMIA, is thereof at this day called Zirf Zindugi, that is to ſay, the place wherin the Seruians were ouerthrown. The newes of this ſo notable a victorie, with the fift part of the ſpoile, & a great number of the heads of the ſlaine Chriſtians, were (after the barbarous manner of the Turks) ſent to Amurath into ASIA, being now readie with a great power to haue come ouer to CALLIPOLIS: who joyful therof, & glad to ſee ſuch a preſent, the aſſured witneſſe of the victorie, returned againe to PRVSA. This was done in the yeare 1366. In which yeare alſo Amurath with wonderfull triumph circumciſed his two ſonnes, Baiazet, & Iacup. At which time he alſo built a temple, with a monaſterie, and a colledge, at BILEZGVA: and another faire Church at NEAPOLIS: at PRVSA he alſo built a ſtately pallace in the caſtle, with a great church at the gates thereof: in which citie he alſo founded an abbey and a colledge. L

Germean Ogli, a great Mahometane prince in ASIA (whoſe territorie for the moſt part lay in the greater PHRYGIA, & the countries thereabout, bordering vpon the Othoman kingdome) hauing alwaies enuied at the riſing of the Othoman kings (as did all the reſt of the Mahometane princes of the Selzuccian familie) and fearing that their greatnes might after his death grow dangerous vnto his ſonne Iacup, being now himſelfe very aged; thought good for the more ſafetie of his ſtate, to ioyne in alliance with Amurath. And for that purpoſe ſent Iſaach (a learned doctor of the Mahometane law) embaſſador vnto him, with many rich preſents, and to offer his daughter, the ladie Hatun, in marriage vnto his ſonne Baiazet: promiſing with her in dowrie diuers great cities and townes, with their territories in PHRYGIA and BITHYNIA, adioyning vpon the Othoman kingdome; namely CVTAIE, SIMAV, EGREGIOS, TAVSANLE, and others. Neither M was this a ſmall dowrie, but well beſeeming ſo great a prince: the citie of CVTAIE being at this day the place whereat the Turkiſh emperours great lieutenant or viceroy in ASIA, is alwaies reſiant, as in the heart of his kingdome in the leſſer ASIA. Of which match ſo offered, Amurath liking wel, contracted his ſonne Baiazet vnto the ſaid ladie: and for ſolemnization of the mariage, prepared all things with great magnificence, ſending his embaſſadours to moſt of the Mahometane

A tane kings and princes,both farre and neere,to inuite them thereunto: commanding alſo moſt of the nobilitie of his kingdome,to honour the ſame with their preſence. The time of this marriage drawing neere,embaſſadours came to Amurath his court,from all the princes before inuited: amongſt whom the embaſſadour from the Ægyptian Sultan had the higheſt place. Theſe embaſſadors brought with them many great and rich gifts,ſuch as wel beſeemed the great princes their maſters, which they with all reuerence preſented vnto Amurath. At length amongſt the reſt of his owne nobilitie came the lord Eurenoſes,whom he had before left gouernor of the frontiers of his kingdome in EVROPE: who beſides many other rich gifts, not eaſily to be valued,preſented vnto Amurath an hundred goodly boyes, with as many beautifull young maiB dens, all Chriſtian captiues, ſutably attired in garments richly embrodered with gold & ſiluer, euerie one of them carrying a cup of gold in the one hand, and a cup of ſiluer in the other; the cups of gold hauing in them diuers precious ſtones of great value,and the cups of ſiluer being filled with gold. The richneſſe of this preſent was ſo great, that all the embaſſadours of the forraine princes much wondered thereat. All which rich gift, Amurath moſt bountifully beſtowed vpon the ſtrange embaſſadours: and the preſents which were ſent vnto him from other princes, he liberally gaue to Eurenoſes. The learned and religious which came to that mariage,hee ſo boũtifully rewarded alſo,that none came to the ſame poore, but he went away rich. He had before ſent diuers of his nobilitie, with an hundred ladies and gentlemen, and a guard of three thouſand horſemen,to attend the comming of the bride. One the other ſide,the old prince Germean-Ogli meeting this honourable companie vpon the way, ſaluted euery man of account,acC cording to his degree: and bringing them to one of his cities,in moſt royal maner feaſted them, beſtowing vpon them many rich and princely gifts: all which things with great ſolemnity performed,he deliuered his daughter the bride to two of the moſt antient ladies, whereof the one had beene Baiazet his nurſe; and ſo taking leaue of his daughter,ſent her away, accompanied with his wife Ienſes,and other of his courtiers: who conueying her to PRVSA, ſhe was there in moſt royall manner maried to Baiazet. The cities and townes promiſed in dowrie, were accordingly deliuered into the poſſeſſion of Amurath, who ſhortly after tooke poſſeſſion of the ſame, and furniſhed them with his owne garriſons.

At this marriage Chuſen Beg,prince of AMISVM in GALATIA,by his embaſſador ſold his D territorie of AMISVM vnto Amurath, with many faire cities and townes: doubting as it was thought,how to be able to keep them,now that Amurath was come ſo neere him,whom he ſaw not to let ſlip any occaſion offered vnto him for the enlarging of his kingdome. When Amurath had in this ſort ſpent great time in ASIA, he gathered a ſtrong armie to returne into EVROPE: but before his departure,he committed the gouernment of his kingdom in ASIA (which the Turks call ANATOLIA) vnto his ſonne Baiazet, ioyning with him Temurtaſes, a valiant man of great experience: and hauing ſet all things in order in ASIA, paſſed ouer HELLESPONTVS, to CALLIPOLIS, from whence he marched towards HADRIANOPLE; and becauſe he would take ſome thing in his way,he beſieged MAGALGARA, which hee in ſhort time woon: where Lala Schahin and Eurenoſes with all their forces came to him: which two captaines he ſent to beE ſiege the citie PHERCE, which was by them after a few dayes ſiege taken. But he himſelfe to bee reuenged vpon Lazarus the Deſpot, led his armie into SERVIA: where after he had without reſiſtance forraged the countrey foureteen daies,vnderſtanding by his captaines,that the ſtrong citie of NISSA,being the metropoliticall citie of SERVIA,was as it were the key of that kingdome,he preſently marched thither, and laid ſiege to the ſame, & by the aduice of Iaxis Beg,the ſonne of Temurtaſes,in ſhort time woon it. Which thing ſo daunted Lazarus, Deſpot or lord of SERVIA,that he deſpairing in his owne forces, hauing ſo ſoone loſt one of his ſtrongeſt cities, foorthwith ſent embaſſadours to Amurath, to entreat a peace: offering to pay him a yearely tribute of fiftie thouſand pounds, and to aid him with a thouſand men in his wars, whenſoeuer he ſhould require: vpon which conditions Amurath graunted him peace, and ſo departed out of F SERVIA. In this expedition he alſo with much ado woon the great citie of APPOLONIA, neere vnto the mount ATHOS, and gaue leaue vnto moſt of the Chriſtians with their wiues and children to depart,and ſuch part of their goods as was not in the taking thereof ſpoiled by the ſouldiors. This done, he returned backe to HADRIANOPLE, leauing Eurenoſes vpon the marches, who ſhortly after tooke BERRHEA, with diuers other townes. At which time alſo, Lala Schahin woon ZICHNE and SERES, in the confines of MACEDONIA, with many other ſtrong townes vpon the frontiers of THESSALIA and THRACE. In the citie SERRES Eurenoſes made his abode, G as in a chiefe frontier towne: and becauſe the Chriſtians for feare of the Turks were all fled out of the country about SERRES, great numbers of people were ſent for out of ASIA, to inhabit that country by the Chriſtians forſaken in the confines of MACEDONIA. Amurath had not long continued at HADRIANOPLE, but that he was aduertiſed out of ASIA, that Aladin his ſonne in law, King of CARAMANIA, did with fire and ſword inuade his dominions in ASIA: with which newes he was exceedingly troubled. And for that cauſe ſending for his counſellors and nobilitie to the court, told them, how that Aladin forgetting all the bonds of religion, faith, peace, and alliance, with all hoſtilitie inuaded his prouinces in ASIA, whileſt he with the great danger of his perſon, and greater terrour of his enemies, ſought with honour the increaſe of the Maho- H metane ſincere religion (as he tearmed it) in EVROPE: from which godly wars (ſaid he) I am againſt my will enforced to turn my ſword, in iuſt defence of my ſelfe, againſt men ioyned with vs both in religion & alliance. And hauing thus declared his mind, he appointed Chairadin Baſſa his lieutenant generall in EVROPE, and alſo made his ſon Alis Baſſa, one of his counſel, although he were by ſome thought too young for ſo great a place. And ſo hauing ſet all things in order according to his mind in EVROPE, tooke paſſage from CALLIPOLIS into ASIA, and ſo to his court at PRVSA, where he ſpent that winter. In which time embaſſadours came vnto him from the Sultan of ÆGYPT, for the renewing of their former amitie and friendſhip, which Amurath tooke very thankfully, and ſent them backe againe loden with kind letters & princely rewards.

Amurath and Aladin prepare themſelues for warre.

When the Spring was come in the yeere 1387, he leuied a mightie armie to make warre vp- I on the Caramanian King, his ſonne in law. Whereof Aladin certainly informed, prepared no leſſe power to meet him, aſſociating vnto him all the other leſſe Mahometane Princes of ASIA, which were not vnder Amurath his obeiſance, to whom the Othoman Kings were now growne terrible; which Princes brought with them great ſupplies to ioyne with Aladin.

Aladin thus aided by his friends, thinking himſelfe now ſtrong enough for Amurath his father in law, ſent an embaſſador vnto him, certifying him, That he was nothing in power inferiour to him, and therefore did nothing feare him: yet if it pleaſed him to haue peace, that he could for his part be content to hearken vnto the ſame vpon reaſonable conditions: but if he had rather haue warre, he ſhould finde him readie to dare him battell in the field, whenſoeuer he ſhould come. For anſwere of which embaſſage, Amurath willed the embaſſadour to tell the periured K
King his maſter, That he had of late contrary to his faith before giuen, in moſt cruell manner inuaded his dominions, whileſt he was buſied in moſt godly wars (as he tearmed it) againſt the miſbeleeuing Chriſtians: from proſecuting whereof, he was by his violence (as he ſaid) withdrawne, contrary to the law of their great Prophet: for which outrages and wrongs, he would ſhortly come and take of him ſharpe reuenge; and that therefore he was to expect nothing at his hands but warre, for which he willed him ſo to prouide, as that at his comming he might not find him wanting to himſelfe. Aladin by his embaſſadour hauing receiued this anſwere from Amurath, aſſembled all the confederate Princes, his allies, with great perſwaſions and greater promiſes encouraging them to this warre: and they againe kiſſing the ground at his feet, as the manner of that nation is before great Princes, promiſed with ſolemne oathes neuer to forſake L him, but to doe all things which Princes deſirous of honour and fame, ought by their oath to doe for their Soueraigne, to whom they ought homage and dutie.

The death of Chairadin Baſſa

In this great preparation for wars in ASIA, Chairadin Baſſa, generall gouernour in EVROPE died: which Amurath vnderſtanding, appointed Alis Baſſa his ſonne to goe into EVROPE, there to be gouernour in his fathers ſtead. But he was ſtaied in his iourney by vrgent occaſions, which Amurath vnderſtanding, ſent for him backe againe in poſt.

Aladin forecaſting the great dangers like to enſue of this warre, ſent another embaſſadour to Amurath, with reaſonable conditions of peace: to whom Amurath anſwered, That if Aladin had made that offer one moneth before, he would perhaps haue accepted thereof: but for ſo much as he had done him great wrong, and that he had now to his infinite charge drawne him M into the field ſo farre from home, he would not make any other end, than ſuch as the chance of war ſhould appoint: And whereas he in diſgrace had called me a heardſman or ſhepheard (ſaid he) if he be not ſuch a one himſelfe, as he ſaith me to be, let him meet me in the field, & there trie his valour. Hereunto the embaſſadour replied, ſaying, That the King his maſter made this offer of peace not for any feare, but to ſaue the effuſion of innocent bloud; which conſideration ſet

A apart, he ſhould finde him not inferiour to himſelfe, either in number of moſt expert ſouldiers, or other warlike prouiſion: and that therefore, if he reiected this offer of peace, he needed not to doubt but to meet with men of courage, which would beare themſelues ſo valiantly in the field againſt his Turks, as that he ſhould haue no great cauſe to reioyce of his comming thither. Which words of the embaſſadour ſo netled Amurath, that in great rage he commanded him to depart, and to will his maſter, if he were a man of ſuch courage and valour as he ſaid, to ſhew himſelfe in the field with all his forces, there to make an end of all quarrels; where he doubted not but in ſhort time to chaſtice him according to his due deſerts. So after the embaſſadour was departed, marching forward three daies, Alis Beg came vnto him, of whoſe com-
B ming he not a little reioyced: for why, he loued him deerely, and although he was yet of yeeres but yoùng, relied much vpon his counſell.

The embaſſadour returning, recounted vnto Aladin all that Amurath had ſaid, not omitting his hard ſpeeches and proud threats, and how that he hoped ſhortly to take from him Iconivm and Larenda (the principall cities of Caramania) with many things more, leauing nothing vntold. Which Aladin hearing, ſaid vnto the confederate Princes that were with him, Verily Amurath threatneth to take from vs the cities of Iconivm and Larenda; but let him take heed that we take not from him his faire citie of Prvsa. Then demanding of the embaſſadour, of what ſtrength Amurath might be? it was anſwered by him, that he deemed him to be about ſeuentie thouſand ſtrong. Whereat Aladin not a little reioycing, ſaid: Aſſuredly
C when he ſhall ſee our armie, he will not dare to giue vs battell; or if he doe, he ſhall fight vpon great diſaduantage, his men being both fewer in number than we, and ſore wearied with long and painfull trauell.

In the meane time Amurath held on his way towards Caramania, daily encouraging his ſouldiers with perſwaſions, and gifts bountifully beſtowed vpon them, filling their heads with promiſes of greater, the warres once happily ended. At length he came to the great plaines in Caramania, called the French plaines, becauſe in former time the Chriſtians (whom the Turks for moſt part call Frankes) in thoſe places encamped their great armies, as they went to the winning of Iervsalem (as in the former part of this Hiſtorie is declared.) Into theſe plaines alſo came Aladin with his armie, and was now encamped within one daies march of D Amurath, and ſo reſted that night.

The next morning Amurath put his armie in order of battell, appointing the leading of the right wing, to his youngeſt ſonne Iacup, with whom he ioyned Cutluzes Beg, Eime Beg Subbaſſa, Egridum Subbaſſa, Seraze, and Cuſtendil, two Chriſtian Princes; all captaines of great experience. The left wing was led by Baiazet his eldeſt ſonne, with Ferize and Hozze, both valiant captaines: in which wings were alſo placed the Chriſtian ſouldiers ſent by Lazarus out of Servia, according to the late conuention of peace: in the maine battell he ſtood himſelfe: the vauntgard was conducted by Temurtaſes: and the reareward by the Subbaſſa of Oxyllithvs (called alſo Temurtaſes) and Achmetes. Aladin on the other ſide, with no leſſe care and diligence ſet his men likewiſe in order of battell, placing himſelfe in the maine battell as did Amu-
E rath; and the Princes his Allies, with his other expert captaines, ſome in the right wing and ſome in the left, as he thought moſt conuenient: in ſuch ſort, as that in all mens iudgement he was in force nothing inferiour to his father in law.

The great battell in the plains of Caramania betwixt Amurath & Aladin.

Theſe great enemies thus ranged, with enſignes diſplaid came on couragiouſly, one directly vpon the other: where approching together, the confuſed noiſe of trumpets, drums, fifes, with other inſtruments of warre, the neighing of horſes, and clattering of armour, was ſo great, that whilſt warlike minds thereat reioyced, cowards thought heauen fell. But the ſigne of battell on both ſides giuen, Samagazes, one of the confederate Princes, with exceeding courage firſt charged Temurtaſes in the vauntgard, and broke his rankes: at which time Teberruſes, a Tartar Prince, and Varſacides, another of the confederates, deliuered their arrowes alſo vpon the vaunt-
F gard, as if it had beene a ſhower of haile. Which Baiazet ſeeing, and how hardly Temurtaſes was charged, hauing before obtained leaue of his father, brake in vpon the enemie with ſuch violence, as if it had beene the lightening: whereof he was euer after ſurnamed Gilderun, which is to ſay, the lightening. Ferizes and Hozza, with the other valiant captaines in that wing, following Baiazet, with inuincible courage entred the battell; where for a great ſpace was made a moſt dreadfull and doubtfull fight. A man would haue thought two rough ſeas had met together, ſwaying one againſt the other, doubtfull which way the current would at length fall. In this G conflict many thouſands were on both ſides ſlaine, ſo that the field lay couered with the dead bodies of worthy men and valiant ſouldiers : yet at length theſe confederate Princes, finding themſelues ouermatched by Baiazet and his ſouldiers, reſeruing themſelues to their better fortunes, turned their backs and fled ; when Aladin ſeeing a great part of his armie thus ouerthrowne, and himſelfe now readie to be charged with Amurath his whole power, deſpairing of victorie, ſped himſelfe in all haſte to ICONIVM, his ſtrong citie. The ſpoile which Amurath got in this battell was great, moſt part whereof he gaue in reward to Temortaſes and his ſouldiers, which had endured the greateſt furie of that battell. Amurath after this victorie with all ſpeed marched to ICONIVM, and there beſieged Aladin the Caramanian King, in his ſtrongeſt H citie, giuing out proclamation in the meane time, That none of his ſouldiers vpon paine of death ſhould vſe any violence to any of the countrey people, or take any thing from them : to the intent it might appeare vnto the world, that he made that warre againſt that Mahometan King, rather to propulſe iniurie and wrong, than for deſire of ſoueraignetie or ſpoile. Which his ſo ſtraight a proclamation, the Chriſtians ſent by Lazarus, amongſt others, tranſgreſſed ; and therefore by his commandement ſuffered (many of them) exemplarie puniſhment ; which was the cauſe of the Scruian warre which not long after enſued, fatall both vnto Amurath and Lazarus the Deſpot, as hereafter ſhall appeare.

Aladin ſieth to Iconium.

Iconium beſieged by Amurath.

Aladin now on euery ſide beſieged in ICONIVM, and without all hope of eſcape, ſent vnto the Queene his wife, Amuraths daughter, bewailing vnto her his deſperate eſtate, and requeſting I her by all the loue that ſo honourable a minded Ladie might beare to her miſerable huſband, to aduenture her ſelfe to goe to her angrie father, and to craue pardon for his great treſpaſſe & offence. The Queen forthwith attiring her ſelfe, as was fitteſt for her huſbands preſent eſtate, came vnto her father : where falling downe at his feet vpon her knees, with words wiſely placed, and teares diſtilling downe her faire cheeks from her fairer eies, as if it had been from two fountains, in moſt ſorrowfull maner, craued her huſbands pardon, imputing vnto the heat of youth whatſoeuer he had done : and would not be comforted or taken vp, vntill ſhe had obtained grace.

Amurath moſt entirely loued this his daughter, and therefore for her ſake not onely granted vnto her, her huſbands life (which in ſhort time was like to haue beene in his power to haue ſpilt) but alſo his kingdome, which he as a victorious conquerour might by law of armes haue K of right detained. She now aſſured of her fathers promiſe, ſent vnto her huſband Aladin, wiſhing him the next day without feare to come out of the citie, and in humble ſort to acknowledge his fault before her father. Who the next morning accordingly came out, and proſtrating himſelfe before Amurath, acknowledged his vndutifulneſſe : of whom (for his wiues ſake) he obtained pardon, and reſtitution to his kingdome, with many other great gifts, contrary to his euill deſert. The Latine hiſtories miſtaking the man, report this Caramanian warre, to haue beene fought againſt the King of CARAMANIA, Amurath his owne grandfather by the mothers ſide; and that he was by Amurath then ſpoiled of a great part of his kingdome : but it agreeth not with the Turkiſh hiſtories, which make Amurath to be the ſonne of Orchanes and Lulufer, the daughter of the gouernour of the caſtle of IARCHISER, as is before declared in the life of Othoman ; which Lulufer lieth buried by her huſband Orchanes, in PRVSA. L

This great victorie gotten by Amurath againſt the Caramanian King, and the other confederate Princes, was the true beginning of the greatneſſe of the Othoman kingdome in ASIA : wherewith the other Mahometane Princes of the Selzuccian familie were ſo diſcouraged, that they were glad to ſubmit themſelues thus firſt vnto Amurath, and after that vnto his ſonne Baiazet : vntill that Tamerlane the great Tartarian Prince, ſome few yeeres after, taking Baiazet priſoner in a great battell at mount STELLA, abated the Othoman pride, and reſtored the other oppreſſed Mahometane Princes to their old poſſeſſions and kingdomes.

Amurath returning homewards, by the way tooke the citie of DESPOTOPOLIS, and comming to CVTAIE brake vp his armie, and ſo in triumph returned to his court at PRVSA. M

Lazarus, Deſpot of SERVIA (in old time called MYSIA) had ſent a thouſand armed men to Amurath in this the late Caramanian warre, according to the conuention of the peace not long before made betwixt them : ſome of which ſouldiers, were with great ſeueritie (to the terrour of others) executed in CARAMANIA, for tranſgreſſing Amurath his commandement. This great war being ended, and the armie broken vp at CVTAIE, they with others were licenſed to depart into

A into their owne countrey. Whoſe Generall (whom they call the Vayuod) returning home, reported vnto Lazarus the Deſpot, the ſucceſſe of that warre, and withall in what cruell and tyrannicall manner the men he had ſent were in that ſeruice vſed by the commandement of Amurath. With whom (ſaid this Generall) you without cauſe haue made a moſt diſhonorable peace: firſt by giuing your faith to ſuch a miſcreant, and then in ſending your loyall ſubiects in recompence of their good ſeruice, to be ſo butchered at his pleaſure; beſide the ſhamefull tribute which you yeerely pay vnto him. Whereas if it would pleaſe you in the depth of your wiſdome, but to know your owne ſtrength, you ſhould finde your ſelfe in warlike force and power, nothing inferiour to the tyrant: for we your ſeruants being in number but a handfull,
B were in theſe his late warres a terrour vnto his enemies, and by our valour and not his owne, he got the victorie ouer them. What cauſe is there then, that you ſhould ſubiect your ſelfe vnto your inferiour? I know he cannot of himſelfe bring into the field aboue fiftie thouſand fighting men: but admit he were able to bring a hundred thouſand, are not you (if you ſo pleaſe) able to leuie a farre greater power? and for all other warlike prouiſion, you are ten fold better prouided than he. Beſides that, the mightie Chriſtian Princes will ſend you ſuch aid againſt this hatefull and common enemie, that being vnited with yours, his Barbarian forces will be nothing in compariſon of thoſe which you ſhall then be able to bring into the field againſt him: which no doubt the Chriſtian Princes will the rather doe, as men deſirous to quench this deuouring fire, in another mans houſe rather than in their owne.

C Theſe words of the Vayuod ſo much moued Lazarus, that he determined in himſelfe, to breake that ſeruile league which he before had made with Amurath. And for that cauſe ſent his embaſſadour with ſecret inſtructions to the King of Bosna (in time paſt called Illyria) his neighbour: whereof the chiefe point was, to craue his aid againſt the Turke their common enemie. By whom the King of Bosna returned anſwere, That it had beene much better ſuch conſideration had beene thought vpon, before the foule contract (full of diſgrace both to himſelfe, and all other Chriſtian Princes) was vpon a vaine feare, by him raſhly made with the Turkiſh tyrant: yet for ſo much as things done, could not be vndone, letting that paſſe which was remedileſſe, he promiſed to ioyne with him his whole forces, againſt ſo dangerous an enemie. And thereupon appointing a place for an enteruiew, met accordingly, and there fully concluD ded all the articles of their confederation.

There was in the confines of Bosna a caſtle called Alexandria, the captaine whereof being a Chriſtian, was yet tributarie vnto the Turke; wiſhing vnto him ſuch good, as men oppreſſed vſe to doe to them by whom they are ſo wronged. This captaine vnder the colour of friendſhip went to Amurath, and in great ſecrecie opened vnto him the whole ſtate of the kingdome of Bosna; and withall, that the King thereof intended ſome great matter againſt him: for preuenting whereof, he offered his owne ſeruice, and ſhewed ſome probable meanes, how that kingdome might be brought into his ſubiection, if he would but ſend ſome worthie Generall with a conuenient power for the vndertaking thereof. This wonderfully pleaſed the ambitious old tyrant, who therfore commanded a rich garment to be caſt vpon the captaine (which E amongſt the Turks is taken for a ſure token of the Kings great fauour) and forthwith appointed his tutor Lala Schahin, according to this captains direction, to inuade the kingdome of Bosna. Who ioyning himſelfe with this deceitfull captaine of Alexandria, with an armie of twentie thouſand men entred into Bosna; where ouerrunning a ſide of the countrey, he without reſiſtance tooke great booties: and ſeeing no apparent cauſe of feare, to doe the more harme, by the aduice of the ſame captaine, diuided his armie, which he ſent into diuers parts of the countrey, the more to burne and ſpoile the ſame. Of all whoſe proceedings, the King of Bosna by ſecret meſſengers from the captaine aduertiſed, had in conuenient places laid ſtrong ambuſhes for the intercepting of his enemies. So that as Schahin was returning homeward with a rich booty, hauing then with him but a thouſand men, ſuddenly appeared in his way thirtie thouſand F Chriſtians well armed: which Schahin ſeeing, thinking it follie to oppoſe ſo few againſt ſo many, would haue preſently fled; but the reſt of the gallants that were with him, preſuming of their good fortune, and loth to loſe their rich prey, would needs firſt skirmiſh with the Chriſtians: in which deſperate conflict they were almoſt all ſlaine, and the ſpoile they had taken, all recouered by the Chriſtians. As for Schahin, he was glad by ſhamefull flight to ſaue himſelfe. The like miſhap befell the other Turks in the other parts of Bosna, who for the moſt part were likewiſe wiſe intercepted and ſlaine: ſo that of twentie thouſand, ſcarce fiue thouſand returned home. G

Amurath maried the Emperor of Conſtantinople his daughter

Whileſt theſe things were doing in EVROPE, Amurath with great triumph at NEAPOLIS maried the Emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE his daughter: whoſe two ſiſters were alſo giuen in mariage to his two ſons: at which time he with great ſolemnitie circumciſed three of Baiazet his ſons. At this time alſo returned Iazigi Ogli, whom he had before ſent embaſſadour to the Sultan of ÆGYPT, in requitall of the honourable embaſſage before to him ſent from the ſaid Sultan. Now Amurath vnderſtanding of the loſſe of his men in BOSNA, with the reuolt of Lazarus Deſpot of SERVIA, was therewith much diſquieted. Wherefore he commanded Alis Baſſa his chiefe counſellour, with all ſpeed to ſend forth commiſſions into all parts of his kingdome, for the leuying of a royall armie: which was done in ſuch poſt haſte, that it was thought H he would haue taken the field before the beginning of the Spring. At which time alſo the other Mahometane Kings and Princes of ASIA, Caraman Ogli, Teke Ogli, and the reſt, bound vnto him by homage, with diuers others of ſmaller power, were ſent for, to aid him in this warre: who partly for feare, & partly moued with the zeale of their Mahometane ſuperſtition, brought their forces with great deuotion. Vnto this warre againſt the Chriſtians, came alſo great numbers of the Mahometanes from farre countries, as voluntarie ſouldiers. Baiazet his ſonne alſo, then gouernour of CVTAIE, with a great part of GALATIA, gathering all his forces, came to aid his father in this religious warre (as it was by them tearmed.) The Chriſtian tributarie Princes were not then forgotten: of whom two came, namely, Cuſtendyll and Seratzill: other two forſaking Amurath, came not, which was Saſmenos Prince of BVLGARIA, and the Prince I of VARNA and DOBRITZA: with whom Amurath was highly offended. In the time of this ſo great a preparation, old Lala Schahin, Amurath his tutor and faithfull ſeruitor, died, being a man of great yeeres: and Temurtaſes was appointed gouernour in his place.

The reuolting of the two Chriſtian Princes, Saſmenos and the Prince of VARNA, much grieued Amurath: wherefore he commanded Alis Baſſa, with an armie of thirtie thouſand, to inuade and ſpoile Saſmenos his country, now called BVLGARIA, and in ancient time the lower MYSIA. Alis Baſſa according to that was giuen him in charge, calling vnto him Iaxis Beg, the ſonne of Temurtaſes, Ylu Beg, Suratze Baſſa, with other captaines and commanders of the Turks prouinces in EVROPE, aſſembled an armie of thirtie thouſand, for the inuaſion of BVLGARIA. With this armie the Baſſa tooke many ſtrong townes and caſtles in BVLGARIA, as PIRA- K VADE, VENVZINA, MADRA, SVNI, with others.

In the meane time, whileſt Alis Baſſa had thus begun the wars againſt the Chriſtians in BVLGARIA, Amurath hauing gathered a great armie in ASIA, determined in the beginning of the Spring, to paſſe ouer with the ſame into EVROPE: commending the gouernment of his countries in ASIA to Temurtaſes Baſſa, Ferices Beg, Temurtaces Subbaſſa, Cutlu Beg, and Haza Beg: and ſo all things ſet in order in ASIA, he drew downe his Aſian forces towards HELLESPONTVS, where he was a while ſtaied with contrary winds, but was afterwards tranſported to CALLIPOLIS by Ienitze Beg, Sanzacke there. This was the third time that Amurath brought his armie out of ASIA into EVROPE. But whileſt he ſtaied at CALLIPOLIS, Baiazet his ſonne with a great power came vnto him thither: Alis Baſſa alſo vnderſtanding of Amurath his arri- L uall in EVROPE, retired out of BVLGARIA, and came to him at CALCIDE, recounting vnto him the whole ſucceſſe of his expedition into BVLGARIA.

Saſmenos Prince of BVLGARIA, ſeeing his countrey ſpoiled, his ſtrong cities and caſtles taken by the Turks, and withall hearing of their great preparations for warre; by the aduice of his nobilitie, thought it beſt betimes againe to ſubmit himſelfe vnto Amurath: wherefore tying a winding ſheet about his necke, in token that he had deſerued death (after the manner of the Barbarians) he came to Amurath at CALCIDE, where falling flat vpon the ground, at the horſes feet whereon Amurath ſat, he in moſt humble wiſe craued pardon: offering by a certaine day to deliuer SILISTRIA the chiefe citie of his dominion into Amurath his poſſeſſion, as a pledge of his fidelitie: who thereupon granted him pardon, and to aſſure him of his fauour, commanded M a rich garment to be caſt vpon him, after the manner of the Turks, ſending Alis Baſſa at the time appointed to take poſſeſſion of SILISTRIA. But Saſmenos repenting himſelfe of that he had ſo largely promiſed, would not deliuer his citie, but in ſtrongeſt manner he could preſently fortified the ſame. Wherewith Amurath more offended than before, commanded the Baſſa with fire and ſword againe to ſpoile and waſte his countrey: who according to his commandement

A entred againe into BVLGARIA, and ſtrucke ſuch a terrour of his comming into the hearts of the people, that many ſtrong places were voluntarily yeelded into his power, namely, DIRITZE, COSSOVA, with the citie TERNOVA, the ſeat of the Princes court; TZERNEVI, NOVAKESTRI, ZISTOVA, with diuers others: and proceeding farther, he laid ſiege to NICOPOLIS, the ſtrongeſt citie of BVLGARIA, vpon the ſide of the great riuer DANVBIVS, whither Saſmenos was for feare himſelfe fled. Who finding himſelfe vnable to hold out the ſiege, once againe (with ſhame enough) tying a winding ſheet about his necke, as he had done before, and taking his ſonne with him, went out of the citie, and in moſt abiect manner falling downe at the Baſſa his feet, craued pardon: which the Baſſa, moued with compaſſion to ſee the B miſerie of ſo great a man, and hauing alreadie taken from him the greateſt part of his dominion, and now out of feare of further reſiſtance, eaſily granted. And hauing thus ended the Bulgarian warre, returned to Amurath, of whom he was right ioyfully receiued.

Amurath had now made great preparation for the inuading of SERVIA, for which purpoſe he had drawne ouer into EVROPE the greateſt forces he poſſibly could out of ASIA: ſending alſo for his youngeſt ſonne Iacup, gouernour of CARASIA, who vnderſtanding his fathers pleaſure, repaired vnto him with all the power he could make. This armie by Amurath thus aſſembled, was the greateſt that euer was before that, brought by the Turks into EVROPE. Lazarus not ignorant of this great preparation made by Amurath, had drawne into the ſocietie of this warre, the King of BOSNA (as is aforeſaid) with Vulcus Prince of MACEDONIA, his ſonne in C law, who both brought vnto him great aid: he had alſo by his embaſſadours procured great ſupplies from other Chriſtian Kings and Princes, out of VALACHIA, HVNGARIA, CROATIA, SCLAVONIA, ALBANIA, BVLGARIA, and ITALIE, beſides great numbers of other voluntarie deuout Chriſtians, which all aſſembled and met together, did in number far exceed the great armie of the Turks.

With this armie Lazarus the Deſpot encamped vpon the ſide of the riuer MOROVA the greater, not farre from whence ſtood the ſtrong caſtle of SARKIVE, which Alis Baſſa had of late taken from Saſmenos the Bulgarian Prince, ſtanding as it were betwixt BVLGARIA and SERVIA: this caſtle being now poſſeſſed of the Turks, was thought by Lazarus dangerous to his countrey, who therefore ſent one Demetrius, a right valiant captaine, with certaine compa-
D nies of ſelect men to take in the ſame. The name of this captaine Demetrius, was a generall terrour vnto the Turks, for the harme he had done them: ſo that they in the caſtle hearing that he was come, without further reſiſtance yeelded the ſame vnto him. Whereof Amurath vnderſtanding, ſent Eine and Sarutze Baſſa to recouer the ſame: but Lazarus doubting that the caſtle would hardly be kept in that dangerous warre, ſent Vulcus his ſonne in law with twentie thouſand men, to bring away all that was therein, and in the citie neere vnto it, leſt it ſhould become a prey vnto the greedie Turks; which he accordingly did, and at the ſame time raſed both the caſtle and the citie, before the comming of Iaxis Beg, ſent from Amurath to haue done the ſame exploit; which he comming thither, found alreadie done to his hand by Vulcus.

The caſtle of Sarkius with the citie ioyning vnto it, taken by the Chriſtians, and raſed.

As Amurath was marching towards SERVIA, Seratze and Cuſtendyl, two Chriſtian Princes
E his tributaries, met him with their forces, whom he cauſed to march before him as his guides; and paſſing thorow Cuſtendyl his countrey, was there refreſhed with plentie of all things neceſſarie: vntill at length paſſing the riuer of MOROVA the leſſe, he drew ſo neere to the plaines of COSSOVA (where the Chriſtian armie lay) that he with his ſonne Baiazet from a little hill tooke full view of the Chriſtian campe; which was ſo great, that it couered all thoſe large plains from ſide to ſide, and ſo daunted Amurath, as that returning to his armie, he preſently entered into a great conſultation with his greateſt captaines and commanders, what courſe to take againſt ſuch a puiſſant enemie.

Theſe great armies being now come ſo nigh together, as that they might the one well deſcrie the other, Amurath had purpoſed the ſame day to haue giuen the Chriſtians battell: but being F diſſwaded by Eurenoſes, both for that it was extreame hot, and his ſouldiers wearied with trauell, he reſted that night. The next morning as ſoone as it was day, he put his armie in order of battell, placing his ſonne Baiazet with Eurenoſes and Eine Beg Subbaſſa, in the right wing; his youngeſt ſonne Iacup, with Sarutze Baſſa in the left wing; the maine battell he led himſelfe. Lazarus in the meane time had alſo ſet his armie in good order: giuing the charge of the right wing to Vulcus his ſonne in law; the left wing was led by the King of BOSNA, and his ſonne; in the maine

maine battell ſtood Lazarus himſelfe; the Italians, Valachians, Hungarians, Bohemians, and G Bulgarians, he placed in both wings. It is thought, greater armies than thoſe two had ſildome before met in EVROPE, Lazarus as the Turkiſh hiſtories report (but how truly I know not) hauing in his armie fiue hundred thouſand men; and Amurath ſcarce halfe ſo many.

To begin the battaile, Amurath had drawne a thouſand of his beſt archers, vnder the leading of Malcozzeus, out of the right wing of his armie; and the like number of archers out of the left, vnder the conduct of one Muſtapha: which ſo placed on both ſides of the armie, as he thought beſt, Eurenoſes a man of great experience, told Amurath, That the Chriſtians were for the moſt part well and ſtrongly armed, & ſhouldering cloſe together in their charge, would be like a rock of yron, vnable to be pierced: but if in joyning the battaile, he would a little retire, the Chriſti- H ans following vpon good hope, would ſo looſe their cloſe ſtanding (the cheefe part of their ſtrength) and leaue an entrance for his men. Vpon which reſolution, Amurath commanded the archers to giue the firſt charge: which they courageouſly performed. At which time, the Turks armie gaue ground a little: which the Chriſtians perceiuing, with great force aſſailed the left wing of their armie, and after a hard and cruell fight put the ſame to flight: which Baiazet ſee-ing, with ſuch furie renewed the battaile, that the Turks which before as men diſcouraged fled in the left wing, began now to turne againe vpon their enemies; and the Chriſtians hauing as they thought alreadie got the victorie, were to begin a new battel. In which bloodie fight many thou-ſands fell on both ſides: the brightnes of the armour and weapons, was as it had been the lightning: the multitude of launces and other horſemens ſtaues ſhadowed the light of the ſunne: ar- I rowes and darts fell ſo faſt, that a man would haue thought they had powred downe from heauen, the noiſe of the inſtruments of warre, with the neighing of horſes, and outcries of men was ſo terrible and great, that the wild beaſts in the mountaines ſtood aſtonied therewith: and the Turkiſh hiſtories, to expreſſe the terrour of the day (vainly ſay) that the Angels in heauen ama-ſed with that hidious noiſe, for that time forgot the heauenly hymnes wherewith they alwaies glorifie God. About noone time of the day, the fortune of the Turks preuailing, the Chriſtians began to giue ground, and at length berooke themſelues to plaine flight; whom the Turks with all their force purſued and ſlew them downe right, without number or mercie. In which battell Lazarus ſlaine. Lazarus the Deſpot himſelfe was alſo ſlaine. Howbeit ſome hiſtories report otherwiſe, as that he with his ſon were taken priſons, and by and by afterwards (in reuenge of Amurath his death) K cruelly ſlaine: otherſome alſo reporting that he died in priſon. Amurath after this great victorie, with ſome few of his cheefe captaines taking view of the dead bodies, which without number lay on heapes in the field like mountaines; a Chriſtian ſouldiour, ſore wounded and all bloodie, ſeeing him, in ſtaggering manner aroſe (as if it had bin from death) out of a heape of ſlaine men, and making towards him, for want of ſtrength fell down diuers times by the way as he came, as if he had been a drunken man: at length drawing nigh vnto him, when they which guarded the kings perſon would haue ſtayed him, he was by Amurath himſelfe commaunded to come nee-rer: ſuppoſing, that he would haue craued his life of him. Thus this halfe dead Chriſtian preſſing neere vnto him, as if he would for honour ſake haue kiſſed his feet, ſuddenly ſtabbed him in the Amurath ſlain. bottome of his bellie with a ſhort dagger, which he had vnder his ſoldiors coat: of which wound L that great king and conquerour preſently died. The name of this man (for his courage worthie of eternall memorie) was Miles Cobelitz: who before ſore wounded, was ſhortly after in the preſence of Baiazet cut into ſmall peeces. The Turks in their Annales ſomewhat otherwiſe report of the death of Amurath: as that this Cobelitz, one of the Deſpot his ſeruants, in time of the battaile, comming to Amurath as a fugitiue, offering him his ſeruice, and admitted to his preſence, in humbling himſelfe to haue kiſſed his feete (as the barbarous manner of the Turks is) ſtabbed him into the bellie and ſo ſlew him: being himſelfe therefore ſhortly after (as is aforeſaid) in the preſence of Baiazet moſt cruelly hewen into ſmall peeces. Whereupon euer ſince that time, the manner of the Turks hath beene, and yet is, that when any Embaſſadour or ſtranger is to come to kiſſe the Sultan his hand, or otherwiſe to approach his perſon, hee is as it M were for honours ſake, lead by the armes vnto his preſence, betwixt two of the great courtiers: but indeed by ſo entangling him, to be ſure that he ſhall not offer him the like violence, that did this Cobelitz vnto Amurath.

The dead bodie of Amurath was preſently with all ſecrecie conueied into his tent by the Baſſaes and captaines preſent at his death: whether Baiazet was alſo brought with an enſigne before

A before him, as the ſucceſſour in his fathers kingdome. His younger brother Iacup, ſurnamed Zelebi (or the noble) yet ignorant of that had hapned, was by the great Baſſaes ſent for, as from his father: who caſting no perill, but comming into his fathers tent, was there preſently by them ſtrangled, by the commandement of Baiazet, as moſt hiſtories report: howbeit the Turks annales charge him not therewith. This was the beginning of the moſt vnnaturall and inhumane cuſtome, euer ſince holden for a moſt wholeſome and good policie amongſt the Turkiſh Kings and Emperors, in the beginning of their raigne moſt cruelly to maſſacre their brethren and neereſt kinſmen, ſo at once to rid themſelues of all feare of their competitors.

This Amurath was in his ſuperſtition more zealous than any other of the Turkiſh Kings; a B man of great courage, and in all his attempts fortunate: he made greater ſlaughter of his enemies, than both his father and grandfather: his kingdome in ASIA he greatly enlarged by the ſword, mariage, and purchaſe: and vſing the diſcord and cowardiſe of the Grecian Princes, to his profit, ſubdued a great part of THRACIA, called ROMANIA, with the territories thereto adioyning, leauing vnto the Emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE, little or nothing more in THRACIA, than the imperiall citie it ſelfe, with the bare name of an Emperour, almoſt without an empire: he wan a great part of BVLGARIA, and entred into SERVIA, BOSNA, and MACEDONIA: he was liberall, and withall ſeuere: of his ſubiects both beloued and feared: a man of very few words, and one that could diſſemble deeply. He was ſlaine when he was threeſcore eight yeeres old, and had thereof raigned thirtie one, in the yeere of our Lord 1390.

C His dead bodie was by Baiazet conueied into ASIA, and there royally buried at PRVSA, in a faire chappell at the Weſt end of the citie, neere vnto the Bathes there: where, vpon his tombe lieth his ſouldiers cloake, with a little Turkiſh tulipant, much differing from thoſe great turbants which the Turks now weare. Neere vnto the ſame tombe are placed three launces, with three horſe tailes faſtened at the vpper end of them, which he vſed as guidons in his wars: a thing in ancient time not ſtrange. There ſtandeth a caſtle with a tombe, made in remembrance of him, in the plaines of COSSOVA, where he was ſlaine and his entrailes buried: which giueth occaſion for ſome to report that he was there alſo himſelfe enterred.

Proud Baiazet, moſt falſe of faith, and loathing bleſſed peace;
His warlike troupes like lightening, to ſhake he doth not ceaſe.
Of HADRIANOPLE he makes choice, for his imperiall ſeat,
That EVROPES kingdomes he might ioyne vnto his empire great.
CONSTANTINOPLE he diſtreſt, twice with ſtraight ſiege and long:
And vainly thought to haue poſſeſt the Grecians wealth by wrong.
But ouercome by Tamberlane, faſt bound in fetters ſure, Trod vnder foot, and cloas'd in cage, great ſhame did there endure:

THE LIFE OF BAIAZET, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, THE FOVRTH AND MOST VNFORTVNATE KING OF THE TVRKES.

Aiazet, or as the Turks call him, Baiasit, of his violent and fierce nature ſurnamed Gilderun, or lightening; ſucceeded his father Amurath in the Turkiſh kingdome, his younger brother Iacup being ſtrangled immediatly after his fathers death, as is before declared. He in the firſt yeere of his raigne inuaded SERVIA, and there beſieged CRATOVA, a citie of the Deſpots: whereunto the ſiluer mines of SERVIA (not the leaſt cauſe of that warre) belonged. Which citie was yeelded vnto him, vpon condition, That the Chriſtian inhabitants might with life and libertie depart. Who were no ſooner gone out of the citie, but that by his commandement they were all moſt cruelly ſlaine by his men of warre, for that purpoſe ſent out after them. At this time he alſo won VSCVPIA, with diuers other caſtles in the countrey neere vnto CRATOVA.

Baiazet inuadeth Seruia.

Sigiſmund at the ſame time King of HVNGARIE (a young Prince of great hope, and brother to Wenceſlaus, then Emperour of the Weſt) aduertiſed from the Seruians his allies and confederates, of theſe proud proceedings of Baiazet: by his embaſſadours ſent of purpoſe, requeſted him, That as he was a iuſt Prince, and wiſhed to liue in quiet with his owne, to deſiſt from doing of ſuch open wrong, and from inuading of ſuch countries of his friends and confederates, as he had no right in. Which embaſſadours ſo ſent, Baiazet detained without anſwere, vntill ſuch time as he had ouerrun a great part of the Deſpot his countrey, and therein done what he thought good. Then calling the ſaid embaſſadours vnto him into one of the ſtrong townes, which he had in euery corner filled with his owne ſouldiers, told them that they might there ſee, that his right both vnto that towne and the reſt by him taken, was good enough, for as much as the very wals acknowledged the ſame: and ſo giuing them leaue to depart, willed them ſo to tell their maſter. Which his proud anſwere, by the ſame embaſſadours reported vnto the young King, no leſſe troubled him, than if open warre had by them beene denounced vnto him, ſeeing the tyrant (as it ſhould ſeeme) pretended right vnto whatſoeuer he could by force get: neuertheleſſe, being himſelfe not yet well ſetled in his kingdome, and in doubt of the contrary faction (that altogether liked not of his election into HVNGARIE for their King) he was glad at that time to put it vp, and ſo to hold himſelfe content.

The next yeere, Baiazet by Feriſes Beg, tooke the citie of VIDINA, with many other ſtrong townes & caſtles in SERVIA, and afterwards returned to HADRIANOPLE. But whileſt that he thus raged in EVROPE, the Caramanian King inuaded and ſpoiled the frontiers of his countries in ASIA: which although he was not then at leiſure, he forgot not afterwards to reuenge to the full. At the ſame time Eurenoſes, lord gouernour of the marches of his kingdome in EVROPE towards GRECIA, departing from SERRES (where he then lay) tooke the citie of SITROS in THESSALIA. And Feriſes Beg, not content to haue taken VIDINA (as is aforeſaid) paſſed ouer the great riuer of DANVBIVS, and grieuouſly ſpoiled VALACHIA: from whence he returned loaden with a great prey. This was the firſt time (that I read of) that the Turks euer paſſed Seruia the ſecond time inuaded by Baiazet.

ſed ouer the riuer DANVBIVS. At this time alſo Iegides Baſſa entred the kingdome of BOSNA, from whence he carried a great number of captiues to HADRIANOPLE, where Baiazet ſpent that Winter. G

In the beginning of the next Spring Baiazet paſſed ouer HELLESPONTVS to PRVSA, where he built a faire Mahometan temple, with a colledge, and an almes-houſe: which works finiſhed, he returned againe into EVROPE, and built a monaſterie at HADRIANOPLE: and ſo returned againe into ASIA, leauing Temurtaſes, Begler-Beg (or his vice-roy) in HADRIANOPLE. After he was come into ASIA, he laid ſiege to the ſtrong citie of PHILADELPHIA in LYDIA, which was at that time the onely citie in the leſſer ASIA, yet holden by the Chriſtians in the middeſt of the Mahometane Princes: for now was the Greeke Emperour by the Othoman Kings and the other Turks quite driuen out of the leſſer ASIA. In the beginning of this ſiege, Baiazet gaue ſtraight commandement to his ſouldiers, That they ſhould not ſpoile or hurt any thing in the countrey belonging to the citizens: hoping by ſuch faigned courteſie to make them the more willing to yeeld themſelues vnto his obedience. But diſappointed of his expectation, and finding them reſolued to hold it out vnto the laſt, he forthwith gaue out contrary commandement, not to ſpare any thing they could waſte or deſtroy: which was accordingly by his greedie ſouldiers performed. After long ſiege, the citizens ſeeing the countrey about them vtterly waſted, and themſelues vnable longer to endure, and out of all hope of reliefe, yeelded their citie vnto the pleaſure of Baiazet. It is written by ſome, that this famous citie was not beſieged without the conſent of the Emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE: and that the Greekes themſelues, moued with enuie to ſee that citie ſo long hold out, did helpe the Turks in the winning thereof. H I

Philadelphia beſieged by Baiazet.

In time of this ſiege Aiden Ogli Prince of CARIA, a Mahometane, came to Baiazet, and yeelded himſelfe into his power as his vaſſale: vnto whom Baiazet reſtored certaine places which he had in this expedition a little before taken from him: yet vpon ſuch condition, as that hee ſhould not from that time coine any mony in his owne name, either be remembred in publicke praiers as a Prince in their Mahometan temples, as he had before beene: but that all ſuch things ſhould be done in the name of Baiazet, as his dread Lord and Soueraigne. With which diſgrace the poore Prince was glad to content himſelfe, and to liue as his vaſſale. From PHILADELPHIA he led his armie into the countrey of SARVCHANIA, in ancient time called IONIA MARITIMA, which he ſubdued vnto himſelfe vpon like conditions. After that he paſſed farther, to MENTESIA, or MENTZ, ſometime called MYNDOS in CARIA; the Prince whereof for feare fled to Cutrun Baiazet, Prince of CASTAMONA and part of PONTVS, leauing his countrey to the pleaſure of the tyrant. And foraſmuch as the young King of CARAMANIA had inuaded his countries whileſt he was buſied in EVROPE, Baiazet in reuenge thereof entred with his armie into CARAMANIA, and tooke CESARIA, with diuers other places there: ſo that the young King diſcouraged with the loſſe of his townes, and fearing Baiazet his greatneſſe, was glad to hold himſelfe content with his loſſe, and to make peace with him as it pleaſed him to grant it. As Baiazet was making this expedition into CARAMANIA, another young Mahometane Prince, the ſonne of Prince Germian, came vnto him with one of his chiefe counſellors, & were both by him ſent priſoners ouer the ſtrait to the caſtle of IPSALA, where they lay in durance many yeeres after. Thus Baiazet hauing oppreſſed and wronged moſt of the Mahometane Princes, the ſucceſſors of Sultan Aladin in the leſſer ASIA, at laſt returned againe himſelfe in triumph to PRVSA. K L

The Prince of MENTESIA, who for feare of Baiazet was fled out of his countrey, as is aforeſaid, had now incited Cutrun Baiazet, Prince of CASTAMONA, with a great power to inuade that ſide of Baiazet his kingdome which bordered vpon him. Which Baiazet vnderſtanding, gathered a great armie to goe againſt this Mahometane Prince. At which very time the Vayuod of VALACHIA, hearing of Baiazet his troubles in ASIA, with a ſtrong armie paſſed ouer DANVBIVS into thoſe parts of SERVIA and BVLGARIA that were by the Turks as then poſſeſſed; where he ſpoiled the countrey, and ſlew great numbers of the Turks, making Mahometane ſaints and martyrs by heapes: for ſo the Turks account all them whom the Chriſtians kill in their warre: which done, he retired backe againe into VALACHIA, carrying with him alſo many of the Turks priſoners. Baiazet thus at once inuaded both in ASIA and EVROPE, deferred his wars purpoſed againſt the Prince of PONTVS, vntill a more conuenient time, conuerting his forces againſt the Valachians. Wherefore paſſing ouer the ſtrait to HADRIANOPLE, he ſent his armie from thence to NICOPOLIS, and there paſſing the riuer of DANVBIVS, entered M into

A into VALACHIA, burning and ſpoiling the countrey before him as he went. Where the Vayuod to repreſſe his furie, met him in the field, & gaue him battell, but was therein ouerthrowne, and many of his people ſlaine; ſo that at laſt he was glad to ſue for peace, which he obtained, by ſubmitting himſelfe to Baiazet, and yeelding to pay him a yeerely tribute.

Theſſalia inuaded by Baiazet.

Whileſt Baiazet was thus buſied in VALACHIA, newes was brought vnto him that the Chriſtians of the Weſt with a fleet of gallies did great harme alongſt the coaſts of his dominions in ASIA. In reuenge whereof, he entred with his armie into THESSALIE, deſtroying all the countrey vnto THESSALONICA: in which expedition he tooke the citie of NEAPOLIS in GREECE, and IOANNINA in ÆTOLIA, and after that returned into ASIA, where he ſpent that Winter.

B In the beginning of the next Spring, he with a great power paſſed the ſtrait of CALLIPOLIS to HADRIANOPLE, intending to haue inuaded HVNGARIE. But as he was vpon the way, it chanced that a Conſtantinopolitane ſpie was by the Turks intercepted, with letters from the Greeke Emperour to the King of HVNGARIE, giuing him warning both of the Turks preparation and comming. By which ſpie Baiazet alſo vnderſtood of another meſſenger before ſent into HVNGARIE, for like purpoſe. Whereupon Temurtaſes (then his great lieutenant in EVROPE) perſwaded him to deſiſt from his intended wars in HVNGARIE, and to beſiege the imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, as a thing of more honour and leſſe danger; the citie being alreadie (as he ſaid, and as in truth it was) ſurrounded with the Turkiſh prouinces: bringing in PHILADELPHIA (but a few yeeres before won) for example of the like exploit. Of whoſe counſell

C Baiazet liking well, returned with his armie, and ſhortly after came and ſate downe therewith before CONSTANTINOPLE: laying hard ſiege thereunto, firſt by land, and after by ſea, with his gallies ſent from CALLIPOLIS. Which hard ſiege continued (as moſt hiſtories report) the ſpace of eight yeeres: in which long time, he draue the Emperour Emanuel Palæologus to that ſtraight, that he was glad to leaue his citie, and himſelfe in perſon to craue aid of Wenceſlaus the Germane Emperour, and Charles the ſixt the French King, and other Chriſtian Princes alſo. At which time the citizens were at length brought to ſuch extremitie, that they were euen at the point to haue yeelded vp the citie: and happily had ſo done, had not Sigiſmund King of HVNGARIE (aſſiſted with a great armie of the French and other voluntarie Chriſtians, almoſt out of euery part of Chriſtendome, to the number of an hundred and thirtie thouſand, vnder the leading of Conſtantinople eight yeeres beſieged by Baiazet.

D Iohn, Countie of NIVERS, and after Duke of BVRGVNDIE) for the reliefe of the beſieged Emperour, paſſed ouer DANVBIVS into the Turkiſh dominions; and there hauing recouered VIDINA, with certaine other ſtrong holds in BVLGARIA, laid ſiege to NICOPOLIS: out of which citie the Turks oftentimes ſallied, and gaue him many an hot skirmiſh. It is reported, that the young King Sigiſmund beholding the greatneſſe of his armie, in his great iollitie hearing of the comming of the Turke, ſhould proudly ſay: What need wee to feare the Turke, who need not at all to feare the falling of the heauens; which if they ſhould fall, yet were we able with our ſpeares and halberts to hold them vp for falling vpon vs. But Baiazet vnderſtanding what ſpoile the Hungarian King had made in his late gained countries, and of the ſiege of NICOPOLIS; commanded the ladders and other great prouiſion now in readineſſe for the skaling and aſſaulting of the citie of

E CONSTANTINOPLE, to be burnt, becauſe they ſhould not come into the hands of the Chriſtians: and ſo raiſing his ſiege, marched with a right puiſſant armie to NICOPOLIS, ſending Eurenoſes before of purpoſe to intercept ſome of the Chriſtians, thereby to learne the ſtate of their campe and armie. But they hearing of his comming, ſo well looked to themſelues, that he with ſhame returned to his maſter as he came, without any one priſoner taken. Which thing much troubled Baiazet, as fearing he ſhould haue to doe with a warie enemie. Sigiſmund vnderſtanding of the approch of Baiazet, leauing a ſufficient power for the continuing of the ſiege, roſe himſelfe, & with the reſt of his armie went to meet his proud enemie. Of whoſe comming and approch Baiazet vnderſtanding, diuided his armie into two parts: and being now come within the ſight of the Chriſtian armie, made ſhew but of the one halfe, keeping himſelfe cloſe in

F ſecret ambuſh not farre off with the other. The Chriſtians deeming themſelues (as they were) farre moe in number than the Turks which they ſaw, diuided their armie alſo into two parts, purpoſing betwixt them to haue incloſed the Turks. Of all the Chriſtians that were there preſent, the French deſired to haue the honour of the firſt charge to be giuen vpon the Turks, and in their heat vpon good hope ſet forward (the Hungarians with a great part of the armie, not yet ſet in order) and ſo began the battell: where betwixt them and the Turks was fought a right cruell fight, and in a little time many thouſands ſlaine. But this fight had not long endured, G when Baiazet with the other halfe of his armie ſuddenly ariſing, came on with ſuch violence, as well became his ſurname of Gilderun or lightning; and ſo hardly charged the French, that they amazed at the ſuddenneſſe of the danger, and oppreſſed with the furie and multitude of the vnexpected enemie, ſtood at the firſt as men diſmaid: but ſeeing no remedie, encouraging one another, valiantly fought it out vntill they were almoſt all either ſlaine or taken priſoners; ſtill in hope to haue beene releeued by the Hungarians and the reſt. In this hard conflict diuers of the French horſemen hauing forſaken their horſes, fought on foot as their manner was: which horſes running backe without their riders, vpon the Hungarians, cauſed them to doubt that the French were quite ouerthrowne; wherewith diſmaied, they without further comming on, all H turned their backs and fled, in ſo great haſte, as that it booted not the King or any other great commander to goe about to ſtay their flight. The French thus by their too much haſte ouer-throwne, the Turks purſuing the Hungarians and the reſt of the Chriſtians, made of them a great ſlaughter: of whom alſo many were drowned in the great riuer DANVBIVS. At which time alſo the Turks tooke ſo many priſoners, that it was thought euery ſeuerall Turke had his priſoner. King Sigiſmund himſelfe, who but a little before had deſpiſed euen the falling of the heauens, had then alſo vndoubtedly fallen into the enemies hands, had he not in a little boat by good hap got ouer DANVBIVS: not vnlike another Xerxes, who hauing couered the ſeas with his ſhips, and with a world of men paſſed ouer into GRECIA, was afterwards by the ſtrange change of fortune, himſelfe alone in a ſmall fiſher boat glad to get backe againe into ASIA. I Sigiſmund being thus got ouer DANVBIVS, and fearing the violence of the Hungarians for the loſſe of the battell, fled by ſea into THRACIA vnto CONSTANTINOPLE; from whence he ſailed vnto the Iſland of the RHODES, and from thence ſailing thorow the Ægean and Ionian ſea, landed at length in DALMATIA: and ſo hauing wandered from place to place, toſſed with many fortunes, after eighteene moneths long and painfull trauell, returned againe into HVNGARIE. Where he found the ſtate of his kingdome in his abſence much troubled, the contrary faction in the meane time hauing made choice of Ladiſlaus King of NAPLES for their King; who was euen then with a great armie going to haue taken poſſeſſion of the kingdome, had not Sigiſmund in good time by the helpe of certaine of the chiefe of the Hungarian nobilitie preuented him. In this battell, called the battell of NICOPOLIS, were of the Chriſtians K twentie thouſand ſlaine, and of the Turks threeſcore thouſand. The Countie of NIVIERS, the French Kings neere kinſman, was there taken priſoner, with three hundred great commanders more: where after he had endured great contumelie and reproch in the preſence of Baiazet, he was commanded to make choice of fiue other of the captiues, ſuch as he liked beſt, all the reſt being preſently cut in peeces before his face, and he with the other fiue left aliue, ſent priſo-ners to PRVSA: from whence they were afterwards ranſomed for two hundred thouſand duckats. This bloudie battell of NICOPOLIS was fought in the yeere of our Lord 1396.

Conſtantinople the ſecond time beſieged by Baiazet.

Baiazet after this great victorie, hauing worthily releeued his beſieged citie, returned againe to the ſiege of CONSTANTINOPLE, laying more hardly vnto it than before, building forts and bulwarkes againſt it on the one ſide towards the land: and paſſing ouer the ſtrait of BOS- L PHORVS, built a ſtrong caſtle vpon that ſtrait ouer againſt CONSTANTINOPLE, to impeach ſo much as was poſſible all paſſage thereunto by ſea. This ſtraight ſiege (as moſt write) continued alſo two yeeres, which I ſuppoſe by the circumſtance of the hiſtorie to haue beene part of the aforeſaid eight yeeres. Emanuel the beſieged Emperor wearied with theſe long wars, ſent an embaſſador to Baiazet to entreat with him a peace: which Baiazet was the more willing to hearken vnto, for that he heard newes that Tamerlane the great Tartarian Prince intended ſhortly to warre vpon him. Yet could this peace not be obtained, but vpon condition that the Emperour ſhould grant free libertie for the Turks to dwell together in one ſtreet of CONSTAN-TINOPLE, with free exerciſe of their owne religion, and lawes, vnder a Iudge of their owne nation; and further, to pay vnto the Turkiſh King a yeerely tribute of ten thouſand duckats. M Which diſhonourable conditions the diſtreſſed Emperour was glad to accept of. So was this long ſiege broken vp, and preſently a great ſort of Turks with their families were ſent out of BITHYNIA to dwell in CONSTANTINOPLE, and a Church there built for them: which not long after was by the Emperour pulled downe to the ground, and the Turks againe driuen out of the citie, at ſuch time as Baiazet was by the mightie Tamerlane ouerthrowne and taken priſoner.

Baiazet

A Baiazet in the beginning of his raigne, preſently after the death of Lazarus the Deſpot ſlaine in the battell of COSSOVA, wan part of SERVIA (as is aforeſaid) the other part being ſtill holden by Lazarus his ſonne, called Stephen the Deſpot; who about this time ſent an honourable embaſſadour to Baiazet with louing letters, and royall preſents: by which embaſſadour alſo the old Princeſſe, Lazarus his widow, offered her faire daughter Deſpina (Stephen his ſiſter) a Ladie of incomparable beautie, in mariage to him, if it ſhould pleaſe him to vouchſafe his handmaid (as ſhe termed her) ſo high a place. This Ladie was long before promiſed vnto him, whilſt his father Amurath yet liued. Of this embaſſadour Baiazet was very glad, but eſpecially for the faire Ladies ſake: which being knowne vnto the Princeſſe her mother, and the Deſpot her bro-
B ther, ſhe was forthwith honourably ſent to Baiazet, and ſo to him with great ſolemnitie and triumph ſhortly after maried. Of all his wiues, he held her deareſt, and for her ſake reſtored vnto her brother Stephen the citie and caſtle of SEMENDRE (otherwiſe called S. ANDREW) and COLVMBARIVM in SERVIA: ſhe allured him to drinke wine, forbidden the Turks by their law; and cauſed him to delight in ſumptuous banquets, which his predeceſſours Othoman, Orchanes, and Amurath neuer vſed.

Baiazet marieth Deſpina the faire daughter of Lazarus the Deſpot.

As the Turkiſh kingdome grew in greatneſſe, ſo corruption the canker of great ſtates and common weales increaſed likewiſe: but eſpecially in the men of law and Iudges of his courts. Wherewith Baiazet grieuouſly offended, commanded diuers of the ſame Iudges to be apprehended, determining (to the terrour of others) to haue executed them; whoſe dangerous eſtate
C was much pitied, & alſo fauoured of Alis Baſſa, and other the King his great counſellors: yet for ſo much as Baiazet was of a furious nature, and in his anger dangerous to be ſpoken vnto, none of them durſt aduenture to intreat him in their behalfe; no not Alis Baſſa, Charadyn Baſſa his ſonne, ſometime Iudge of PRVSA, although he were a man in ſuch ſpeciall fauour with him, that he was therfore of the common people not only reuerenced, but as the King himſelfe honored.

There was at that time in the court an Æthiopian ieaſter, who vnder ſome couert pleaſant ieaſt, would many times bolt out that to the King in his greateſt heat, which his graueſt counſellors durſt not once ſpeake to him of in ſecret: this ieaſter, Alis Baſſa requeſted to deuiſe ſome meanes to intreat with the angrie King in the behalfe of theſe Iudges, promiſing to giue him what he would reaſonably deſire, if he could appeaſe the Kings diſpleaſure. The Æthiopian
D without feare vndertooke the matter: and preſently putting vpon his head a rich hat al wrought ouer with gold after the manner of the Turks embaſſadours, and fitting himſelfe with other apparell better beſeeming an embaſſadour than a ieaſter; thus attired preſented himſelfe before the King with a great counterfet grauitie. Whereat Baiazet maruelling, asked him the cauſe why he was ſo gaie. I haue a requeſt vnto your maieſtie (ſaid he) and wiſh to finde fauour in your ſight. Baiazet more deſirous than before to know the matter, asked what his requeſt was. If it ſtand with your pleaſure (ſaid the ieaſter) I would faine goe as your embaſſadour to the Emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE, in hope whereof, I haue put my ſelfe in this readineſſe. To what purpoſe wouldeſt thou goe, ſaid Baiazet? To craue of the Emperour (ſaid he) ſome fortie or fiftie of his old graue Monkes and Friers, to bring with me hither to the court. And what
E ſhould they doe here, ſaid Baiazet? I would haue them placed (ſaid the ieaſter) in the roomes of the old doting Iudges, whom you intend (as I heare) to put to death. Why (ſaid Baiazet) I can place others of my owne people in their roomes. True (ſaid the Æthiopian) for grauitie of looke and countenance, and ſo would the old Monkes and Friers ſerue as well; but not ſo learned in your lawes and cuſtomes of your kingdome, as are thoſe in your diſpleaſure. If they be learned (ſaid Baiazet) why doe they then contrary to their learning, peruert iuſtice and take bribes? There is a good reaſon for that too, ſaid the ieaſter. What reaſon, ſaid the King? That can he that there ſtandeth by tell better than I (ſaid the ieaſter) pointing to Alis Baſſa: who forthwith commanded by Baiazet to giue the reaſon, with great reuerence before done, ſhewed that thoſe Iudges ſo in diſpleaſure, were not conueniently prouided for, and were therefore en-
F forced many times for their neceſſarie maintenance to take rewards, to the ſtaying of the due courſe of iuſtice. Which Baiazet vnderſtanding to be true, commanded Alis Baſſa to appoint them conuenient ſtipends for their maintenance, and forthwith granted their pardon. Whereupon the Baſſa ſet downe order, That of euery matter in ſuit exceeding one thouſand aſpers, the Iudge ſhould haue twentie aſpers fee for iudgement; and for euery writing and inſtrument out of the court, twelue aſpers: which fees they yet take in thoſe courts at this day.

Not long after, Baiazet in his furie ſent for certaine of his captaines and commanders of his men of warre, with whom he was for ſome ſmall occaſion grieuouſly offended, intending in his rage to haue put them all to death; which was with him no great matter. Theſe captaines being brought before him, the counſellors ſeeing him al in choler, ſat looking vpon the ground, hanging downe their heads (as the manner of the Turks is) not daring too looke him in the face, nor to ſpeake a good word for them. When ſuddenly the aforeſaid Æthiopian ieaſter ſtept forth, earneſtly requeſting the king, not to ſhew them any fauour, but to execute them preſently as villaines and traitours; railing vpon them, as if he had knowne ſome great fault by them. Baiazet (thinking he could haue accuſed thē of ſome great crime, becauſe of his earneſtnes) asked what reaſon he had ſo to exclaime againſt them. Reaſon (quoth the ieaſter) becauſe the knaues be good for nothing, and they ſay that Tamerlane is with a great armie comming againſt vs: if you will but take vp an enſigne in your hand, and I goe before you with a drum, I will ſtrike vp ſuch a terrible march, and you make ſuch a dreadfull ſhew, that we ſhall need none of theſe bad fellowes or their ſouldiers in the field to get the victorie ouer our enemies. This conceit of the ieaſter ſtrucke ſuch a melancholie imagination into Baiazet his head, that he ſtood muſing a great while as it were in a deepe ſtudie: at laſt hauing well conſidered the drift of the ieaſters ſpeech, & his furie now ſomewhat aſſwaged, granted them pardon which they looked not for.

This Æthiopian ieaſter, Baiazet vpon a time ſent vnto the old Queene his mother, to bring her newes of the good ſucceſſe of his wars againſt the Chriſtians, for that ſhe had ſo deſired: who comming vnto her, and by her commanded to ſit downe, ſhe began to demand of him, how the King her ſonne did, and of the ſucceſſe of his wars. Whereunto he anſwered, that he did very well, and had won from the Chriſtians a great countrey, and greatly enriched his ſouldiers. But after a little more talke, the Queene mother deſirous to heare againe the good newes (or elſe after the manner of ſome which thinke nothing ſufficiently told except it be told an hundred times) asked him againe how the King her ſonne did, and how he ſped in his wars. Whereunto he anſwered euery word as before: but asking him the third time the very ſame queſtion, how her ſonne did? Doeſt thou aske me ſo often (ſaid the Æthiopian) how he doth? Bre Cachpe (O whore, ſaid he) thou haſt brought forth a ſonne like a deuill, who roaming vp and downe, doth nothing but burne and deſtroy the world where he commeth. Whereat the Queene crying out; vp ſtart the Æthiopian, and betaking himſelfe to his heeles, was neuer more afterwards ſeene.

In the wars which Baiazet had againſt Sigiſmund, the Vayuod of Valachia had giuen aid vnto the Hungarian King; wherewith Baiazet being offended, determined now at length to be reuenged: and therefore intending to make warre vpon the Valachian Prince, left Temurtaſes his great lieutenant at Ancyra in Asia, & ſo paſſed ouer Hellespontvs himſelfe againſt the Valachian. Vpon whoſe departure, Aladin his ſiſters ſonne, the young King of Caramania, with a great power came ſuddenly in the night to Ancyra, and tooke Temurtaſes priſoner: who then feared nothing leſſe, than in time of peace to haue beene ſo ſurpriſed, and carried away in bonds into Caramania. But when he vnderſtood that Baiazet had ended his wars in Valachia, and was with victorie returned to Prvsa, he fearing his heauie indignation for ſo great an outrage, preſently releaſed Temurtaſes out of priſon, apparelled him richly after the manner of that nation, craued pardon for the wrong he had done him, & ſet him at libertie to go whither he would, & withall ſent one of his noblemen with great gifts and preſents to Baiazet to make his excuſe in beſt manner he could: vnto which embaſſadour Baiazet (yet in choler) would not giue audience, or ſuffer him to come in his ſight: but at the ſame time leuied a great armie to inuade Caramania. Which Aladin vnderſtanding, and now out of all hope to appeaſe this mightie enemie, leuied all the forces he could in his owne kingdome, and withall entertained all the mercenarie ſouldiers he could get, intending to trie his fortune in the field, as a man of valour, rather than to be thruſt out of his kingdome like a coward: & ſo in readineſſe, hearing of the comming of Baiazet, met him vpon the way, & at a place called Aczac gaue him battel: but being too weak, he was ouercome & put to flight; in which flight his horſe ſtumbling, & he ſo falling to the ground, was there before he could recouer himſelfe, taken by his enemies which had him in chaſe, and ſo brought bound to Baiazet: his two ſons, Muhamet Beg & Alis Beg, being taken in that battell alſo, were ſent priſoners to Prvsa. Aladin himſelfe was by Baiazet his cōmandement deliuered to his enemy Temurtaſes: who in reuenge of the wrōg he had before done him, preſently cauſed him to be

A be hanged: which when Baiazet vnderſtood, he ſeemed very ſorrie that he had ſo put him to death, for that he was his owne ſiſters ſonne. Baiazet following the courſe of his victorie, won ICONIVM, LARENDA, NIGDE, with all the reſt of Aladin his kingdome. About this time alſo, AMASIA the great metropoliticall citie of CAPADOCIA, was by the Prince thereof deliuered vnto Baiazet, being too weake himſelfe to defend the ſame againſt the force of Caſi-Burchanidin, Prince of the great and ſtrong citie of SEBASTIA, his enemie; now growne to be a man of great power in that part of ASIA, and had ſolicited the Sultan of ÆGYPT to aid him againſt Baiazet. Whereupon Baiazet returning from the conqueſt of CARAMANIA, led his armie towards SEBASTIA, where the citizens had a little before depriued Caſi-Burchanidin
B of his gouernment, for his crueltie, and placed his ſonne in his ſtead: but in ſhort time no leſſe wearie of the ſonne, than before of the father, they with like inconſtancie ſent word to Baiazet, that if he would come that way, they would yeeld vnto him the citie: vpon whoſe approch, Caſis (his ſonne) for feare fled out of the citie to Prince Naſradin, his brother in law. After whoſe departure, the citizens according to their promiſe deliuered the citie vnto Baiazet at his comming, wherein he left Solyman his eldeſt ſonne gouernour. And ſo hauing in this notable expedition conquered the kingdome of CARAMANIA, and taken the great cities of AMASIA and SEBASTIA, with moſt part of CAPPADOCIA, and all that part of ASIA which the Turks call RVMILIA ASIATICA, he returned to PRVSA, and there wintered.

Amaſia yeelded vnto Baiazet.

Sebaſtia deliuered to Baiazet.

The next Spring Baiazet (hearing that his old enemie Cutrun Baiazet Prince of CASTAMO-C NA and PONTVS, was dead) came to CASTAMONA with a great armie: of whoſe comming, Iſfendiar (Cutrun Baiazet his ſonne, and then Prince of that countrey) hearing, fled out of the citie to SYNOPE, a little citie vpon the coaſt of the Euxine: from whence he ſent an embaſſadour vnto Baiazet, humbly requeſting him, to ſuffer him to haue that little citie, as his ſeruant to liue in, (which he was ſure he would otherwiſe beſtow vpon ſome other of his ſeruants) and not to ſeeke the innocent bloud of the ſonne for the fathers offence. Which his requeſt, Baiazet moued with pitie, granted: yet neuertheleſſe tooke from him CASTAMONA, with the greateſt part of his dominion in PONTVS, which he gaue to his ſonne Solyman. At the ſame time he violently oppreſſed the Prince Germean, and tooke from him the cities of DESPOTO-POLIS and HIERAPOLIS, with all the reſt of his dominion.

Baiazet inuadeth Iſfendiar, Prince of Caſtamona.

D The Prince of MENTESIA long before driuen out of his countrey by Baiazet (as is before declared) and hauing all this while made his abode at CASTAMONA, doubting now of his owne ſafetie after the death of his good friend Cutrun Baiazet, in the habit of an hermit fled to the great Tartarian Prince Tamerlane.

Baiazet returning to PRVSA, there built a magnificent Mahometane temple; during which worke, he with great ſuperſtition forbore drinking of wine, repoſing himſelfe with the companie of graue and learned men, and the adminiſtration of iuſtice: whereby he greatly won the hearts of his ſubiects, and had now ſo enlarged his kingdome, that all Kings and Princes bordering vpon him, ſtood in great feare of him.

It fortuned about this time, that Achmetes King of BAGDAT (or new BABYLON) & EIRACVM, E with Ioſephus Niger King of COLCHIS, enforced with the violent incurſions of Tamerlane and his Tartars, for ſafegard of their liues were glad to flie into SYRIA: where they being diſcouered, were both caſt in priſon by the commandement of the Ægyptian Sultan, who then commanded ouer SYRIA: from whence they afterwards hardly eſcaping, fled to Baiazet his court. Where after Achmetes had ſtaied two moneths, he by the aid of Baiazet recouered the poſſeſſion of EIRACVM, part of his owne inheritance. Ioſephus the other Mahometane King, hauing tarried in Baiazet his court eight moneths, at length procured him to inuade the dominions of the Ægyptian Sultan, in which expedition he mightily preuailed: and hauing ſlaine the Ægyptian Sultans Generall, & diſcomfited his forces, tooke the citie of MALATIE or MELETINE in ARME-NIA, with DIORIGE, DERENDE, and BEXENE, taken from the Turcomans, and ſpoiled all the F countrey thereabouts. From thence marching with his armie towards ERZNITZANE, the Prince thereof, called Tachretin, met him vpon the way, yeelding his citie & countrey into his power; which Baiazet preſently gaue to Ioſephus Niger: who after he had ſix daies enioyed this new gouernment, finding the people vnwilling to be gouerned by him a ſtranger, ſurrendred the ſame againe into the hands of him that gaue it. Whereupon the citizens of ERZNITZANE humbly requeſted of Baiazet, That they might be againe gouerned by their old Prince Tachretin, now his vaſſall. Which thing he at their earneſt requeſt graunted: but taking his wife and children as a pledge of his loyaltie, ſent them away to PRVSA, where they were all not long after made away. G

The Mahometan princes of Aſia oppreſſed by Baiazet, diſguiſed, flye vnto Tamerlane for aid.

When Baiazet had now many yeares thus mightily preuailed againſt the Chriſtian princes in ROMANIA, BVLGARIA, BOZNA, THESALIA, VALACHIA, & other places of EVROPE, as is before declared; and inflamed with inſatiable ambition, had in worſe manner oppreſſed the Mahometan kings & princes of ASIA, of whom ſome were by him ſlaine, ſome driuen out of their dominions into exile, ſome impriſoned, and otherſome brought into ſuch ſubjection that they liued as it were but at his deuotion, and was now growne to that greatneſſe, that in the pride of his heart he ſtood in feare of no man, but was (as he thought) a terrour vnto the world, hauing vnder his obeiſance great and large dominions in EVROPE, but farre greater in ASIA: H It fortuned diuers of theſe miſerable oppreſſed and diſcontented Mahometan princes, by great fortune as if it had been by appointment, to meet together at the court of the great Tartarian prince Tamerlane, whether they were fled for releeſe and ſuccour. The prince Germian Ogli, after long impriſonment in the caſtle of IPSALA in EVROPE, brake priſon, and with Hiſſar-beg his great councellour and priſon-fellow, conſorted themſelues with a companie of loytering companions, roaming frō place to place, delighting the countrey people with their apiſh toies: in which companie he paſſed HELLESPONTVS, as a beareward, and at length with much adoe came to Tamerlane his court: whether the prince of MENTESIA was come before, in the habit of an Hermit (as is aforeſaid) with his head and beard ſhauen: Aidin Ogli paſſing through the countrey as a pedler, with a packe at his backe, came thether alſo: The prince Tachretin as a I ſeruingman, came attending vpon the prince Iſfendiar: who came alſo (but in ſome better ſort than the reſt) as an embaſſadour from ſome other prince. All theſe poore princes, with diuers others in like miſerie, in ſhort time arriued at SAMARCAND (great Tamerlane his court;) euerie one perticularly complaining of his owne priuat greeſe, and all together earneſtly requeſting that mightie prince, to take vpon him their defence, and to reuenge the wrong done vnto them by the Turkiſh tirant Baiazet. Whoſe pitifull complaints much mooued the noble Tartarian: but eſpecially the long & wrongfull impriſonment of Germian Ogli: and the pitifull complaint and moane of Tachretin, who had of late loſt his wife and children, by the crueltie of Baiazet. Yet in this matter of ſo great and important conſequence, Tamerlane made no great ſhew of his forwardneſſe (although he was by nature in nothing more delighted, than in the releeuing of K the diſtreſſed, & chaſtiſing of the proud) but coldly anſwered thoſe princes, That he could not tell, whether all were ſo as they had reported of Baiazet, or not, but that he well knew him to be a verie zealous king in ſetting forth of the Mahometane religion; and that he had therefore made great warres vpon the Chriſtians, in which godly cauſe (he ſaid) perhaps they had refuſed to aſſiſt him, or elſe had giuen him ſome other greater occaſion of offence, to him vnknowne: For I can hardly beleeue (ſaid he) that ſo great and religious a prince as he, would without juſt and ſufficient cauſe, offer ſuch violence as you complaine of, eſpecially vnto you his neighbour princes, and of the ſame religion with himſelfe: neuertheleſſe, whatſoeuer I intend concerning your requeſt (ſaid Tamerlane) I will ſend firſt an Embaſſadour vnto him, to vnderſtand more of him and his proceedings before I reſolue vpon any thing: with which anſwere hee willed L them vntill then to hold themſelues contented. But as Tamerlane was about to haue diſpatched his Embaſſadour to Baiazet, he was aduertiſed that Achmetes late king of new BABILON, and Ioſephus king of COLCHIS, both by him driuen out of their kingdomes, hauing broken out of priſon from the Sultan of EGIPT, were now come to Baiazet his court, to craue his aid and aſſiſtance: wherefore he deferred to ſend his embaſſador, ſuſpecting that Baiazet, incited by theſe two exiled kings, would firſt in their quarrell begin to make warre vpon him. But not long after vnderſtanding, that they were both againe departed from his court (as is before declared) he then diſpatched his embaſſadour to Baiazet, with many rich gifts and preſents, courteouſly requeſting him, the rather for his ſake, to deale kindly with theſe poore Mahometane princes, his friends; as alſo with the Greeke Emperour Emanuel his allie, for whom he was now become an M interceſſour vnto him. Some report alſo, that he beſides this, requeſted to haue the two aforeſaid Mahometan kings of BAGDAT and COLCHIS deliuered vnto him; and withall ſeemed not a little to diſlike of Baiazet his proceedings againſt the Turcomans his friends. But Baiazet being a prince of a great and haughtie ſpirit, and vnaccuſtomed to heare of any thing which fitted not his humor, highly offended with this embaſſage, in great ſcorne reiected the preſents by Tamerlane

A lane ſent vnto him, and eſpecially certaine garments which Tamerlane after the manner of thoſe Eaſterne nations, had in kindneſſe amongſt other things ſent him: willing the embaſſadour to bid his maſter meddle with his owne matters, and to preſcribe lawes vnto his owne ſubiects, and not vnto him, with whom he had nought to doe; & to ſend his raggs for preſents vnto his inferiours, and not vnto Princes of greater power and ſtate than himſelfe. Adding thereunto many other words full of deſpight and diſdaine, affoording him no better ſtile than the plaine name of Tamerlane: calling him the huſband of a whore, if he met him not in the field; and wiſhing vnto himſelfe againe, to take vnto him his thrice diuorced wife, after ſhe had beene polluted by another man (as the greateſt diſhonour that might be) if he failed to meet him where-
B ſoeuer he durſt to dare him battell. Which proud anſwere of the Turks, by the embaſſadour reported vnto Tamerlane, and aggrauated by Axalla (a Chriſtian of the race of the Genowaies, borne at CAPHA, and then one of the greateſt counſellors about him, and the Greeke Emperours great friend) was ſo euill taken by him, that all other things ſet apart, he reſolued to goe againſt the Turke, and to take in hand that warre, as of all other the fitteſt for the increaſe of his honour and glorie. Beſides that, he thought it not in reaſon fit for the greatneſſe of the Tartarian empire, to ſuffer ſuch an vnquiet neighbour to grow great; as ſtill encroching vpon other the weake Princes confining vnto him, and adding conqueſts vnto conqueſts; and yet neuer the more contented, might in the end proue dangerous vnto his owne eſtate and ſoueraignetie: a common care to ſuch as be themſelues great, & mounted vp vnto the higheſt degrees of worldly
C honour, to haue in iealouſie and diſtruſt the ſudden riſing of others neere or farther off, as perillous or diſgracefull to themſelues, or their eſtate: whoſe growing greatneſſe they therfore ſeeke by all meanes to hinder; as did now the mightie Tamerlane the proceedings and increaſing of the great Othoman King, Baiazet: and the rather being continually prickt forward ſo to doe, by the ſolicitation of the Greeke Emperour Emanuel, the other oppreſſed Mahometane Princes, and by the great captaine Axalla (as is aforeſaid) a Chriſtian: of whom for all that Tamerlane himſelfe, a Mahometane, for the great fidelitie, valour, & vertue he found in him, made no ſmall reckoning, but was contented euen in his greateſt and moſt waightie affaires to be by him aduiſed; diſliking of no man for his religion whatſoeuer, ſo as he did worſhip but one onely God, creator of heauen & earth, & of al that therein is. Being himſelfe of opinion, That God in eſſence Tamerlane his opinion concerning the diuerſities of religiõ.
D one, & in himſelfe immutable, without change or diuerſitie: yet for the manifeſting of his omnipotencie & power, as he had created in the world ſundrie kinds of people, much differing both in nature, manners, & condition, and yet al framed to the image of himſelfe: ſo was he alſo contented to be of them diuerſly ſerued, according to the diuerſitie of their natures and manners; ſo that they worſhipped none other ſtrange gods, but him alone, the maker & creator of all things. Which was the cauſe that he permitted the vſe of all religions within the countries ſubiect to his obedience, were they not meere Atheiſts, Idolaters, or worſhippers of ſtrange and vaine gods.

Neither was proud Baiazet as one ignorant of the power or purpoſe of Tamerlane, in the meane time idle, but ſtill proſecuted his good fortune for the enlarging of his empire, and increaſing of his ſtrength: wiſely deeming (as the truth was) whatſoeuer meſſages were ſent vnto
E him from Tamerlane, to be no other than meere threatenings and forewarnings of his more dangerous purpoſes and deſignes againſt him and his ſtate: which he was ſo farre from fearing, as that to prouoke him the more, he ſpared no intemperate ſpeech, which might moue him to wrath; wiſhing (as ſhould ſeeme) for nothing more than to meet him in the field, there to trie the fortune of a battell with him. So weake is our foreſight of our fortunes to come, and the reach of our vnderſtanding for the apprehenſion or declining of the fatall doome euen preſently hanging ouer our heads; as that we oftentimes through ignorance moſt deſirouſly wiſh for thoſe things which are vnto vs the chiefe occaſions of our vtter ruine and deſtruction.

But here before we enter into farther diſcourſe of the mortall warre betwixt theſe two ſo puiſſant Princes, it ſhall not be much from our purpoſe to ſtep a little out of the way, to ſee what F this mightie Tamerlane (of whom ſo many Princes craued aid) was: who liuing, held the Eaſt in ſuch awe, as that he was commonly called, The wrath of God, and Terrour of the world: which he then filled with the glorie of his name. Moſt Hiſtoriographers report him to haue been poorely borne, of baſe and obſcure parents: and ſo himſelfe alſo in his youth to haue liued as a poore ſhepheard or heardſman in the mountaines; where conſorting himſelfe with other ſturdie companions of like qualitie and diſpoſition, ſuch as there liued by robbing of marchants and other paſſengers, The baſe opinion ſome haue, concerning the birth and riſing of Tamerlane.

passengers, he became a masterfull theefe amongst them : vnto whom other such leaud mates G daily still more and more resorting, he in short time grew (as they say) to that greatnesse, that he is reported to haue beene of such power, as neuer man but he euer yet came vnto. A matter almost incredible: for albeit that the Romane empire, yea and this great empire of the Turks also, with some others, had their beginnings not much better or greater, the one vnder Romulus, and the other vnder Othoman; yet grew they not as vpon the sudden, in their times, to any great lustre (neither was it possible for them of so small beginnings so to doe) but by many degrees, and that in long time; euery of the succeeding Princes, according to their fortunes, adding something to their state, before it could be made great: whereas he (by their report) contrary to the course of things both naturall and ciuill (which from their small beginnings grow to no no- H table perfection or greatnesse, but by degrees, and that in the long reuolution of time) taking his beginning of nothing, grew vpon the sudden to be a burden & terrour vnto the world. Wherein our late Historiographers seeme too much to haue followed the report of the Turks, who by him brought low, and their kingdome almost in one battell subuerted, report nothing simply of him; but in what they may, detracting from his worthie praises, wrongfully charge him with many vntruths, not concerning his parentage only, but euen in the course of his whole life also: making him (as they would haue the world to beleeue) first to haue beene a very abiect amongst men; and then for his inhumane crueltie a very monster in nature, or (as it was long before, but more truly said of another great one much like himselfe) a lumpe of earth tempered with bloud. Which incredible reports concerning so great a monarch, I list not to follow, as too full of dis- I honour: especially whereas others of no lesse credit than they, with far more modestie and greater probabilitie report of him the greatest honour that may be. He was (as they and the others also say) borne at SAMERCAND, the chiefe citie of the Zagataian Tartars, pleasantly situated vpon the riuer IAXARTES: his father was called Zain-Cham, or as some others will, Og, Prince of the Zagataian Tartars, and of the countrey of SACHETAY (sometime part of the famous kingdome of PARTHIA) third in descent from Zingis, the great and fortunate leader of the Tartars, before in the former part of this historie remembred. Which Og, as a Prince of a peaceable nature (accounting it no lesse honour quietly to keepe the countries left him by his father, than with much trouble and no lesse danger to seeke how to enlarge the same) long liued in most happie rest with his subiects, no lesse happie than himselfe : not so much seeking after the hoording vp of K gold & siluer (things of that nation not regarded) as contenting himselfe with the increase and profit of his flocks of sheepe, and heards of cattell; then, and yet also, the principall reuenues of the Tartar Kings and Princes: which happily gaue occasion vnto some, ignorant of the manner and custome of those Northerne nations and countries, to account them all for shepheards and heardsmen; and so also to haue reported of this mightie Prince, as of a shepheards sonne, or heardsman himselfe : vainly measuring his nobilitie by the homely manner of his people and subiects, and not by the honour of his house, & heroicall vertues, such as were hardly to be found greater in any Prince of that or other former ages. His peaceable father now well stricken in yeeres, and wearie of the world, deliuered vp vnto him (not yet past fifteene yeeres old) the gouernment of his kingdome, ioyning vnto him two of his most faithfull counsellors, Odmar and L Aly, to assist him in the gouernment of his state (retiring himselfe vnto a solitarie life, the more at quiet to serue God, and so to end his dayes in peace:) which two his trustie seruants and graue counsellors he dearely loued whilest they liued, and much honored the remembrance of them, being dead. The first proofe of his fortune & valour, was against the Moscouit, for spoiling of a citie which had put it selfe vnder his protection; and for entering of his countrey; and for proclaiming of warre against him : whom he in a great battell ouerthrew, hauing slaine fiue and twentie thousand of the Moscouits footmen, and betweene fifteene & sixteene thousand horsemen, with the losse of scarce eight thousand horsemen & foure thousand footmen of his owne. After which battel he beholding so many thousands of men there dead vpon the ground, was so M far from reioicing thereat, that turning himselfe vnto one of his familiars, he lamented the condition of such as commanded ouer great armies, commending his fathers quiet course of life; accounting him happie in seeking for rest, & the other most vnhappie, which by the destruction of their own kind, sought to procure their owne glorie; protesting himselfe euen from his heart to be grieued to see such sorrowfull tokens of his victorie. With this ouerthrow the Moscouit discouraged, sent embassadours to him for peace, which vpon such honourable conditions as pleased Tamerlane honourably descended.

The cause why some haue reported him to haue beene a shepheard or heardsman.

A pleaſed him to ſet downe, was by him granted, and ſo the peace concluded. Now the great Cham of TARTARIA (his fathers brother) being growne old, and out of hope of any moe children, moued with the fame of his nephew, after this victorie ſent vnto him diuers preſents, and withall offering him his onely daughter in mariage, and with her to proclaime him heire apparant vnto his empire; as in right he was, being his brothers ſonne, and the daughters not at all ſucceeding in thoſe empires. Which ſo great an offer Tamerlane gladly accepted, and ſo the mariage was afterwards with great triumph at the old Emperors court ſolemnized; and he proclaimed heire apparant vnto that great empire. Thus was Tamerlane indeed made great, being euer after this mariage by the old Emperour his vncle, and now his father in law, ſo long as he liued, B notably ſupported, and after his death ſucceeding him alſo in that ſo mightie an empire. Yet in the meane time wanted not this worthie Prince the enuious competitours of theſe his ſo great honours: inſomuch, that whileſt by the aduice & perſwaſion of the old Emperor, he was taking in hand to make warre againſt the great King of CHINA (who had as then gone far beyond his bounds) and ſo was now wel onwards on his way, he was by the conſpiracie of Calix (a man of greateſt power & authoritie in the great Cham his court) almoſt thruſt out of his new empire: Calix with a right puiſſant armie hauing alreadie ſeized vpon the great citie of CAMBALV, and the citizens alſo generally fauouring thoſe his traiterous proceedings, as diſdaining to be gouerned by the Zagataian Tartar. For redreſſe whereof, Tamerlane was enforced with the greateſt part of his armie to returne, and meeting with the rebell (who then had in his armie foureſcore
C thouſand horſe, and an hundred thouſand foot) in a great and mortall battell (wherein of the one ſide and of the other were more than fiftie thouſand men ſlaine) ouerthrew him (though not without the great danger of his owne perſon, as being there himſelfe beaten downe to the ground) tooke him priſoner, and afterwards beheaded him. Which ſo dangerous a rebellion, with the death of the traitour, and the chiefe of the conſpiratours repreſſed, and his ſtate in the newneſſe thereof by this victorie well confirmed, he proceeded in his intended war againſt the great King of CHINA; brake downe the ſtrong wall, which the Chinoies had made foure hundred leagues long betwixt the mountaines, for the repreſſing of the incurſions of the Tartars, entered their countrey; and meeting with the King, leading after him three hundred and fiftie thouſand men (whereof there were an hundred and fiftie thouſand horſemen, and the reſt on D foot) in a great and dreadfull battell, with the ſlaughter of 60000 of his men, ouercame him, and tooke him priſoner: whom for all that he (in the courſe of ſo great a victorie wiſely moderating his fortune) ſhortly after ſet againe at libertie; yet ſo, as that hauing before taken from him the one halfe of his kingdome, and therein left Odmar his truſtie lieutenant, with a ſufficient power for the reſtraining of the proud King, if he ſhould againe begin to raiſe any new ſtirres; and withal, impoſed ſuch other conditions as pleaſed himſelfe, with the yeerely tribute of three hundred thouſand crownes, he well prouided for the aſſuring of thoſe his new conqueſts: and ſo in triumph returned with victorie vnto the old Emperour his father in law at CAMBALV, not a little glad to ſee both him and his daughter, who had in all thoſe wars ſtill accompanied him. But leauing him, now thus by birth great, by his fortune greater, but by his vertue greateſt of E all, (as able now to draw after him almoſt the whole power of the Eaſt) let vs againe returne thither from whence we haue for the better knowledge of him, thus with him digreſſed.

Tamerlane mariethe daughter and heire of the great Cham of Tartarie.

The war againſt the Turkiſh Sultan Baiazet (as is aforeſaid) by Tamerlane reſolued vpon, he ſent Axalla the great captaine to his countrey of SACHETAY (called of ſome ZAGATAI) to giue beginning to the aſſembling of his forces frō all parts; to the end, that with the firſt of the Spring he might ſet forward for the releeſe of ſo many diſtreſſed Princes, and the abating of the pride of ſo great and mightie a tyrant as was Baiazet. Now had Tamerlane procured from the great Tartarian Emperor, his vncle and father in law, an hundred thouſand footmen, and foureſcore thouſand horſemen; hoping to haue as many moe from SACHETAY his owne countrey, beſides the Lords that for his honours ſake would accompanie him in that his ſo honourable an expe-F dition, from whom he made account alſo of fiftie thouſand men more which they would bring vnto him, and diuers other great ſupplies which he expected from other places alſo: wherewith he doubted not well to performe what he had ſo honourably determined to take in hand, for the abating of the Othoman pride: for which & other ſuch like, he was (as he would oftentimes ſay) by God himſelfe appointed. So taking his leaue of the old Emperour his father in law, and of the Princeſſe his wife (then left behind him for the comfort of her aged father) he departed from

from CAMBALV towards SAMARCAND, the place of his birth and ſeat of his empire; leauing be- G hind him the forces brought from the great Emperour his vncle, to come after him to OZARA, where he had appointed the generall meeting of his armie. At which time amongſt other Princes that thither brought or ſent their ſupplies, the great Muſcouite being requeſted ſo to do, pro-miſed to ſend him fifteene thouſand horſe, with a certaine ſumme of money, and leaue for his armie to paſſe thorow ſo much of his territories as ſhould be neceſſarie: all which he afterwards performed vnto Tamerlane, being glad that he did ſet vpon others, rather than on himſelfe; and that ſo great a preparation ſhould fall vpon them, whoſe greatneſſe was as dreadfull and dangerous vnto him as to any other. All the earth almoſt at that time being aſtoniſhed at the ſudden greatneſſe of this Othoman King, and the happie ſucceſſe he had in all his wars; not the leaſt cauſe H that moued Tamerlane to oppoſe himſelfe againſt him, deeming it much better to goe and ſet vpon him in his new conqueſts, than to ſtay vntil he therein ſetled, were come neerer vnto him, and ſo ſhould debate the quarrell within his owne empire, to his dammage. A good and ſound reſolution: firſt in that it tended to the deſtruction of the enemies countrey; and then, that if any thing ſhould fall out otherwiſe with him than well, his countrey ſhould not thereby receiue any ſuch aſtoniſhment as if the danger were neerer or within the bowels of the ſame. Now in the meane time that Tamerlane lay at SAMARCAND, Axalla the great captaine & Tamerlane his lieutenant generall, had aſſembled all the armie at OZARA. Whereof Tamerlane vnderſtanding, ſent for him to SAMARCAND, to conferre with him about the ſetting forward of his armie. For although he were ſtil accompanied with great renowned Princes, yet were they no bodie in com- I pariſon of Axalla, whoſe ſound counſell had won him ſuch credit with his Lord and maſter, as by his aduice he did all things, and without him nothing: which his ſo great authoritie and fa-uour with his Prince, wanted not the enuie of the court; but that his great vertues, & rare found courteſie (in ſo great fortune) together with ſo many worthy ſeruices as he had done, ſupported him againſt the malice of the ſame. He by the commandement of Tamerlane, leauing the charge of the armie at OZARA, with the Prince of THANAIS, another of Tamerlane his great captaines, came himſelfe to SAMARCAND, & there at large diſcourſed with him, about the eſtate and order of his armie. And ſhortly after, departing with Axalla and the reſt from SAMARCAND, for to goe to OZARA the place where al his armie met being come thither, entred into a great conſultation with his moſt expert captaines, about the taking of his iourney, & conducting of his armie; as K whether it were better to leade the ſame by the coaſts of the Muſcouite directly towards CAPHA, or elſe on the other ſide of the Caſpian ſea by the skirts of PERSIA. Where after long diſcourſe & ſundrie opinions with their reaſons deliuered, it was in the end reſolued (although the way were the longer) to paſſe by the Muſcouit, ſo to come vnto the Georgians, and to TREBIZONDA, and from thence to enter into the Othoman King his countrey. And ſo ſetting forward from OZARA, he came at length to MARANIS, where he ſtaid three daies looking for the forces which Prince Odmar ſhould ſend him from CHINA, not long before by him conquered: whereof he there re-ceiued newes, and there cauſed his armie to be paid, and a generall muſter thereof to be taken.
He had there alſo newes of the aid the Muſcouit did ſend him: and cauſed an infinite quantitie of victuals, & moſt part of his furniture to be conuaied by the Caſpian ſea; being a great cõmoditie L and eaſe vnto his armie, which marching by land, was of neceſſitie to paſſe ſome twentie leagues thorow places deſtitute both of victuals and water. Tamerlane all the way coaſting alongſt the ſea ſhoare, paſſed the time in hunting, his armie not comming neere him by ten leagues; which was ſo great, that it extended it ſelfe full twentie leagues. Comming to the riuer of EDEL, he ſtaied at ZARAZICH whileſt his armie paſſed the riuer at MECHET, and two other bridges which he had cauſed to be made for that purpoſe. Now the Circaſſians, and Georgians, hearing of the approach of Tamerlane with his huge armie, by their embaſſadours offered him all the helpe and aſſiſtance they could, in his iourney as he paſſed that way. Theſe Georgians were (and yet are) Chriſtians, a great and warlike people, of long time tributaries vnto the Greeke Emperours: and afterwards ſometimes tributaries, & ſometimes confederates vnto the Perſians: but alwaies M enemies vnto the Turks, by whom (of late and in our remembrance) but eſpecially by Amurath the third, they together with ſome part of the Perſian kingdome, haue beene grieuouſly oppreſſed, as in the proceſſe of this hiſtorie may appeare. Of theſe warlike people, glad of Tamerlane his comming, for the repreſſing of the Turke, Axalla drew great numbers vnto the ſeruice of his Prince: who not a little eſteemed of them, being all tall men, very beautifull, of great ſtrength

A and courage, and withall moſt expert ſouldiers; as hauing oftentimes reſiſted the power of the Othoman Kings, by reaſon of the aduantage their country affordeth them, being very rough and hard to come into. By theſe kinde people, Tamerlane was in euery place honourably entertained, and his great armie with all neceſſaries plentifully releeued. In paſſing thorow which countrey and the reſt as he marched, he tooke ſuch order with his ſouldiers, that none of the people whereby he paſſed, were any thing by them iniured; inſomuch that if a ſouldier had taken but an apple, or other thing of like value from any man, he died therefore, ſo ſeuere were his commands. It is reported that one of his ſouldiers, hauing taken a little milke from a countrey woman, and ſhe thereof complaining, he cauſed the ſaid ſouldier to be preſently killed, and his ſto-
B macke to be ript; where the milke that he had of late drunke being found, he contented the woman, and ſo ſent her away, who had otherwiſe vndoubtedly died for her falſe accuſation, had it not ſo appeared. Which his ſo great ſeueritie, and in other like caſes, was of many accounted for extreme crueltie: yet was it indeed the wholſome preſeruation of his armie, being ſo great, as that it was thought almoſt impoſſible to haue found ſufficient victuals for the releefe thereof; whereof for all that, there was no want, either of any thing elſe neceſſarie for the vſe of man, his campe being ſtill as a moſt populous and well gouerned citie, ſtored with all manner of things: whereunto both artificers and marchants, from far countries reſorted with their commodities & marchandiſe, as vnto ſome famous mart; and the countrey people, without feare from euery place brought in their country commodities, for which they receiued preſent money, and ſo in C ſafetie againe departed. So marching on, he at length came to BACHICHICH, where he ſtaied to refreſh his armie eight dayes, and there againe tooke a generall muſter thereof, wherein were found (as moſt write) foure hundred thouſand horſe, and ſix hundred thouſand foot; or as ſome others that were there preſent affirme, three hundred thouſand horſemen, and fiue hundred thouſand foot, of all nations. Vnto whom he there gaue a generall pay, and as his manner was, made vnto them an oration, informing them of ſuch orders as he would haue kept, to the end they might the better obſerue the ſame: with much other militarie diſcipline, whereof he was very curious with his captaines. At which time alſo, it was lawfull for euery common ſouldier to behold him with more boldneſſe than on other dayes, foraſmuch as he did for that time, and ſuch like, lay aſide his imperiall maieſtie, and ſhew himſelfe more familiar vnto them.

The number of Tamerlane his great armie.

D Now could he hardly be perſwaded, that Baiazet hauing ſubdued the moſt part of GRECIA, diſtreſſed the Greeke Emperour, and ſo great meanes to recouer whatſoeuer he ſhould loſe in ASIA, would be ſo aduenturous as to come ouer the ſtraits out of EVROPE, to trie the fortune of a battell with him; but rather warily protract the time, to wearie him at length with wants, that in a ſtrange countrey drew ſuch a world of people after him. Wherein he found himſelfe much deceiued: for hauing paſſed the Georgian countrey, and being come to BVYSABVICH, Axalla (whom he had not ſeene in eight daies before, becauſe he led the head of the armie) came vnto him with ſuch newes as he knew would be right welcome vnto him: which was, that Bauazet had raiſed his ſiege of CONSTANTINOPLE (as indeed he had) for to come and defend his new conqueſts in ASIA; and that he was certainly reſolued, to come to a day of bat-
E tell, not ſo much truſting vnto the multitude of his armie, as to the valour and experience of his ſouldiers, being all men of long well trained vp in the wars. At which vnexpected newes Tamerlane greatly reioiced: yet without inſolencie or vaunting, but rather with the countenance of ſuch an one as iudged the euents of battels to be (as they are) alwayes doubtfull: ſaying ſometimes, that a ſmall number wel conducted, did oftentimes carie away the victorie, from the confuſed multitude. Three dayes he ſtaied at BVYSABVICH, and cauſed his ſouldiers continually to march forward, which at GARGA and CHIVSERIG paſſed ouer the riuer EVPHRATES: which he did the rather to maintaine his armie vpon the ſpoile of the enemie, in attending his comming, than vpon himſelfe, or his allies. All the cities that yeelded vnto him by the way as he marched, he fauorably receiued; the other that refuſed to ſubmit themſelues to his obedience, he vſed with F all extremitie: eſpecially the great and ſtrong citie of SEBASTIA, where certaine of the forerunners of his armie were by the Turks there in garriſon cut off & ſlaine, and the gates of the citie as it were in contempt of him, ſet wide open. Wherewith Tamerlane offended, ſent out certaine of his Tartarian horſemen, commanding them vpon paine of his diſpleaſure ſo to beare themſelues againſt their enemies, as that he might at his comming either finde the citie taken, or the gates thereof ſhut againſt him: for he had his men at ſo great command, that no danger was

vnto them more dreadfull than his displeasure, neither did he punish any thing so seuerely, as cowardise: insomuch, that if in his disport of hunting the wild beast, any did for feare giue way to the Lyon or Beare, and slew him not, was sure to die therefore himselfe; and to turne his backe vpon the enemie, was no lesse danger than to run vpon his owne death. Now the Turks in garrison at SEBASTIA, seeing these Tartarian horsemen marching towards the citie, making little account of them, for that they were not in number many, issued out for to meet them; where they were so furiously charged by these few horsemen, that they were glad to retire, and for hast to shut part of their owne men out of the citie, least the enemie following them at their heeles, should haue entered the gates together with them. Which Turkes so shut out, were by the Tartarians slaine at the gates of the cittie. Shortly after came Tamerlane with all his armie, and sate downe before the citie, where he lay still seuen dayes, not making shew of any violence at all, the defendants because the cittie was of great strength, all that while thinking that he had intended by long siege to distresse the same, and the more because of his long lying still. But about the eight day, the walls and towers of the cittie in many places vndermined, were suddainely ouerthrowne, leauing large breaches for the enemie to enter. Wherewith the Turkes in the cittie dismayed, foorthwith yeelded the cittie to Tamerlane, in hope so to haue saued their liues: but hee (as the Turkes report) being entered the cittie, commaunded a great number of deepe pits to be digged, and all the people of the cittie, without respect of age, sex, or condition, to be throwne into the same, and there buried quicke. Which done, the citie was by his commaundement vtterly rased also. After that, calling vnto him Malcozzius, the gouernour of the cittie, whom he had for that purpose onely spared, he commaunded him to goe and tell his Master what was happened to his strong cittie of SEBASTIA, and what hee had there himselfe seene. Of which tragicall action, Malcozzius hauing made true relation vnto Baiazet, was by him demanded, whether of the two armies he thought bigger or stronger: for now Baiazet had assembled a mightie armie of three hundred thousand men, or as some report of three hundred thousand horsemen, and two hundred thousand foot. Whereunto Malcozzius hauing before craued pardon, answered, That it could not bee, but that Tamerlane might in reason haue the greater number, for that hee was a commaunder of farre greater countries. Wherewith proud Baiazet offended, in great choller replied: Out of doubt, the sight of the Tartarian hath made this coward so afraid, that he thinketh euery enemie to be two.

Sebastia besieged by Tamerlane.

Sebastia yeelded to Tamerlane.

Most of the Latine histories report, that when Tamerlane had taken SEBASTIA, he put all the men to the sword, and bringing the women and children into the fields without the citie there ouer-ran them with his horsemen, excepting some few which were reserued for prisoners. As also that Baiazet there lost his eldest sonne Erthogrul (of some called Orthobules) whose death with the losse of the citie, so much greeued him (as is reported) that marching with his great armie against Tamerlane, and by the way hearing a countrey shepheard merily reposing himselfe with his homely pipe, as he sate vpon the side of a mountaine feeding his poore flocke; standing still a great while listening vnto him, to the great admiration of many, at last fetching a deepe sigh, brake foorth into these words: O happie sheepeheard, which haddest neither Orthobules nor SEBASTIA to loose: bewraying therein his owne discontentment, and yet withall shewing, That worldly blisse consisteth not so much in possessing of much, subject vnto danger, as in joying in a little, contentment deuoid of feare. Howbeit the Turkes themselues reporting the taking of SEBASTIA, speake not of Orthobules at all, but giue him lost six yeares before in the warres against Casi Burchaniden, and lieth buried by his father at PRVSA. In this cittie of SEBASTIA was lost twelue thousand Turkes, men, women, and children, as their histories report. The rest of the cities all the way as Tamerlane marched, warned by the destruction of SEBASTIA, yeelded themselues for feare of like danger: the citizens whereof he courteously vsed, especially the Christians, whom he set at libertie, in respect of Emanuel the Greeke Emperour, whom hee seemed wholly therein to gratifie. But he had not gone farre into the Turkes dominion, but that hee was certainely aduertised, how that Baiazet, with a great armie was comming against him, and now within thirtie leagues of him: which caused him after that time, to march with his armie more closely. Axalla leading the vantgard sent forth Chianson prince of CIARCAN, with foure thousand Parthan horsemen, to get knowledge of the Turkes armie, and where Baiazet lay, as also what countrey that

A was beyond SENNAS; and if he could learne any thing thereof, to make relation of it vnto him. This Prince of CIARCAN was Tamerlane his kinſman, a man of great reputation, and next vnto Axalla, in whoſe abſence he had the commanding of the avantgard, his charge; who alſo ſent before him another Parthian captaine with 500 horſemen. So he had not ridden ten leagues, but that he heard newes of Baiazet his comming, and hauing ſurpriſed SENNAS, vnderſtood there the certaine eſtate of the Turks armie, which was then at TATAIA, and ſo marching forward. Whereof Tamerlane certified, commanded him not to retire from that place, vntill he did ſee the arriuall of the enemie, and thereof to giue him aduertiſement euery houre; being himſelfe reſolued to paſſe on no farther, as come to a faire large plaine, and a country of aduantage for the or-
B der of his battell: for he knew that his armie was farre greater than Baiazets, and therefore made choice of thoſe great plains. Yet for that his armie conſiſted of diuers nations, and withall conſidering that he was not to fight againſt the Chinois, a ſoft effeminate people (as of late) but againſt the Turks, a moſt warlike nation, & well acquainted with all maner of fights & martiall ſtratagemes, he thought it good to be well aduiſed how he proceeded againſt them. Wherefore he preſently ſent for Axalla, with him to view the ſaid place, and to haue his opinion, Whether it would be for his aduantage or not, there to ſtay? who not miſliking of the choice of the place, yet aduiſed him alſo to keepe SENNAS ſo long as he poſſibly could: and ſo ſent word vnto them that were therein, vpon the approch of the enemie to ſet fire vpon the ſame, and ſo to withdraw themſelues from thence, to the end, that the enemie ſhould not haue any deſire to encampe
C there, but come ſtill forward neere vnto thoſe plains where Tamerlane deſired to fight, eſpecially for that he was ſtronger in horſe than Baiazet. Thus the Turks ſtill marching on, thought to haue ſurpriſed ſome of their enemies in SENNAS, who as ſoone as they drew neere, retired all, excepting ſome hundred, left of purpoſe to fire the towne: who hauing performed the ſame, retired of purpoſe in great diſorder. Now the Prince of CIARCAN had diuided his forces into two parts, and giuen commandement to the firſt, that as ſoone as they perceiued the enemies to purſue the hundred horſe, that ſo diſorderly of purpoſe fled, they ſhould receiue them, and ſo retire all together. He in the mean time with the reſt of his power ſtood cloſe in a valley, neere vnto a wood ſide, vnſeene at all. Where hauing ſuffered 2000 of the enemies horſe (the avauntcourriers of the Turks armie) to paſſe by him, he following them in the taile, charged them home, the other
D which before retired, now turning vpon them alſo: ſo that the Turks ſeeing themſelues thus beſet, and hardly laid vnto both before and behind, as men diſcouraged fled: in which flight moſt of them were ſlaine, and the reſt taken priſoners. This was the firſt encounter betwixt the Turks and the Parthians: all the priſoners there taken, were by the Prince as a preſent ſent to Tamerlane, and amongſt the reſt the Baſſa of NATOLIA, who led theſe troopes: of whom Tamerlane earneſtly demanded, what cauſed Baiazet ſo little to eſteeme of him, as to ſhew ſo great contempt of his armie, which he ſhould find ſtrong enough to abate his pride. Whereunto the Baſſa anſwered, That his lord was the Sun vpon earth, which could not endure any equall: and that he rather was aſtonied to ſee, how he from ſo farre, had enterpriſed ſo dangerous a iourney, to hinder the fortune of his lord, in whoſe fauour the heauens (as he ſaid) did bend themſelues, to fur-
E ther his greatneſſe, and vnto whom all the world ſubiected it ſelfe; and that he committed great follie in going about to reſiſt the ſame. Vnto which ſo proud a ſpeech Tamerlane replied, That he was ſent from heauen to puniſh his raſhneſſe, and to teach him, that the proud are hated of God, whoſe promiſe is to plucke downe the mightie, and raiſe vp the lowly. As for thy ſelfe (ſaid he) thou haſt alreadie felt (although I pitie thy miſhap) what the valour of my Parthian horſe is againſt thy Turkiſh: and thy maſter I haue alreadie cauſed to raiſe his ſiege of CONSTANTINOPLE, and to looke to his owne things here in ASIA. Furthermore, Tamerlane changing his ſpeech, demanded of him, If his maſter did come reſolued to bid him battell? Aſſure your ſelfe (ſaid he) there is nothing he more deſireth: & would to God I might acknowledge your greatneſſe, in giuing me leaue to aſſiſt my Lord at that battell. Good leaue haue thou, ſaid Tamerlane, F goe thy wayes, and tell thy lord, that thou haſt ſeene me, and that he ſhall in the battell find me on horſbacke, where he ſhall ſee a greene enſigne diſplaied. The Baſſa thanking him, ſwore that next vnto his lord, he vowed vnto him his ſeruice. And ſo returning, declared vnto Baiazet, how that he had ſeene Tamerlane: and truly reported vnto him all that he had willed him to ſay; not forgetting ouer all to publiſh his courteſie and bountie: who beſides that he had frankly ſet him at libertie, had alſo giuen him a very faire horſe well furniſhed, although he well knew he was to ſerue againſt himſelfe. Whereunto Baiazet anſwered no more, but that he would ſhortly G make triall of him, & that he well hoped, before the march were ended, to make him acknowledge his owne follie. The next day the two armies drew neere together, and encamped within a league the one of the other: where all the night long you might haue heard ſuch noiſe of horſes, as that it ſeemed the heauens were full of voices, the aire did ſo reſound, and euery man thought the night long, to come to the triall of his valour, and the gaining of his deſires. The Scythians (a people no leſſe greedie than needie) talked of nothing but the ſpoile, the proud Parthians of their honour, and the poore Chriſtians of their deliuerance, all to be gained by the next dayes victorie: euery man during the night time ſpeaking according to his owne humour. All which Tamerlane walking this night vp & downe in his campe, heard, and much reioyced to H ſee the hope that his ſouldiers had alreadie in generall conceiued of the victorie. Who after the ſecond watch returned vnto his pauilion, & there caſting himſelfe vpon a carpet, had thought to haue ſlept a while. But his cares not ſuffering him ſo to doe, he then (as his manner was) called for a booke, wherein was contained the liues of his fathers and anceſtors, and of other valiant worthies, the which he vſed ordinarily to read, as he then did: not as therewith vainly to deceiue the time, but to make vſe therof, by the imitation of that which was by them worthily done, and declining of ſuch dangers, as they by their raſhnes or ouerſight fell into. And afterwards hauing a little ſlumbered, he commanded Axalla to be ſent for, who forthwith came vnto him with diuers other great lords & captains, the chiefe commanders of his armie: with whom after he had a while conſulted of the order of the battell, he mounted on horſebacke himſelfe, and ſent euery I one of them vnto their owne charges, to put the ſame in readineſſe. At the which very inſtant he receiued newes, that the enemie marched forward, and came to take his ground for the battell: whoſe order of march Tamerlane was deſirous to ſee, that ſo accordingly he might marſhall his owne. And hauing cauſed three thouſand horſemen to aduance forward, with charge to begin the skirmiſh, himſelfe followed after to lodge euery part of his forces in ſuch places, as he had foreſeene to be fitteſt for his aduantage. Now ſeeing the Ianizaries march in a ſquare battell in the middeſt, and vpon the two fronts, two great ſquadrons of horſemen, which ſeemed to be thirtie thouſand horſe; and another which aduanced & couered the battailion of the Ianizaries: he thought this their order to be very good, and hard to be broken; and thereupon turning himſelfe vnto Axalla, who was neere vnto him, ſaid: I had thought this day to haue fought on K foot, but I ſee that it behoueth me now to fight on horſebacke, to giue courage vnto my ſouldiers to open the great battalion of our enemies. And my will is, that my men come forward vnto me as ſoone as they may, for I will aduance forward with an hundred thouſand footmen, fiftie thouſand vpon each of my two wings, & in the middeſt of them fortie thouſand of my beſt horſemen. My pleaſure is, that after they haue tried the force of theſe men, that they come vnto my avauntguard, of whom I will diſpoſe, and fiftie thouſand horſe more, in three bodies, whom thou ſhalt command: which I will aſſiſt with foureſcore thouſand horſe, wherein ſhall be mine owne perſon; hauing an hundred thouſand footmen behind me, who ſhall march in two ſquadrons: & for my arereward I appoint 40000 horſe, & 50000 footmen, who ſhall not march but to my aid. And I wil make choice of 10000 of my beſt horſe, whom I will ſend into euery place L where I ſhall thinke needfull within mine armie, for to impart my commands. Ouer the firſt fortie thouſand horſe the Prince Ciarcan commanded: ouer the formoſt footmen was the lord Synopes a Genouois, kinſman to Axalla, and his lieutenant ouer the footmen, a captaine of great eſtimation: the Prince Axalla his owne charge conſiſted of fiue ſquadrons of horſemen. Baiazet his armie being alſo both faire, and great, came brauely ſtill on forward towards their enemies, who ſtirred not one whit from the place they had taken for the battell: except certaine light horſemen Scythians, Parthians, and Muſcouites, who ſent out as looſe men, hotly skirmiſhed betwixt the two armies. Now was Tamerlane by an eſpie aduertiſed, that Baiazet, hauing before giuen order for the diſpoſing of his armie, was on foot in the middeſt of thirtie thouſand Ianizaries, his principall men of warre and greateſt ſtrength, wherein he meant that day to fight, and M in whom he had repoſed his greateſt hope. His battell of horſe was very faire, amounting to the number of an hundred and fortie thouſand horſe, all old ſouldiers. The Sultan of ÆGYPT hauing alſo ſent vnto his aid thirtie thouſand Mamalukes, all very good horſemen, with thirtie thouſand foot. So that his armie marching all in one front, in forme of an halfe Moone (but not ſo well knit together as was Tamerlanes, whoſe ſquadrons directly followed one another) ſeemed

The great and mortall battell betwixt Baiazet and Tamerlane.

A ſeemed almoſt as great as his. And ſo with infinite numbers of moſt horrible outcries, ſtill aduanced forward: Tamerlane his ſouldiours all the while ſtanding faſt, with great ſilence.

There was not poſsible to be ſeen a more furious charge, than was by the Turks giuen vpō the prince of CIARCAN, who had commandement not to fight before the enemy came vnto him: neither could haue been choſen a fairer plaine, and where the skilfull choice of the place, was of leſſe aduantage for the one or the other; but that Tamerlane had the riuer on the left hand of his armie, ſeruing him to ſome ſmall aduantage. Now this yong prince of CIARCAN with his forty thouſand horſe, was in this firſt encounter almoſt wholly ouerthrowne: yet hauing fought right valiantly, and entred euen into the middeſt of the Ianizaries (where the perſon of Baiazet was)

B putting them in diſorder, was himſelfe there ſlaine. About which time, Axalla ſet vpon them with the auauntgard, but not with like danger: for hauing ouerthrowne one of the enemies wings, and cut it all to peeces, and his footmen comming to joyne with him as they had been commaunded, he faced the battalion of the Ianizaries, who right valiantly behaued themſelues for the ſafetie of their Prince. This hard fight continued one hower, and yet you could not haue ſeene any ſcattered, but the one ſtill reſolutely fighting againſt the other. You might there haue ſeene the horſemen like mountaines ruſh together, & infinite numbers of men die, crie, lament, and threaten all at one inſtant. Tamerlane had patience all this while, to ſee the euent of this ſo mortall a fight: but perceiuing his men at length to giue ground, he ſent ten thouſand of his horſe to joyne againe with the ten thouſand appointed for the arcareward, and commaunded

C them to aſſiſt him at ſuch time as he ſhould haue need of them: and at the verie ſame time, charged himſelfe, and made them giue him roome; cauſing the footmen to charge alſo, ouer whom the prince of THANAIS commaunded, who gaue a furious onſet vpon the battalion of the Ianizaries, wherein was yet the perſon of Baiazet, who had ſuſtained a great burthen. Now Baiazet had in his armie a great number of mercinarie Tartars, called Deſtenſes, with many thouſands of other ſoldiers takē vp in the countries of the poor exiled Mahometā princes; in whoſe juſt quarell, and the Greeke Emperours, Tamerlane had chiefely vndertaken that war: theſe Tartarians and other ſouldiours, ſeeing ſome their friends, and otherſome their naturall and loning princes in the armie of Tamerlane, ſtroken with the terrour of diſloyaltie, and abhorring the cru-

Who neuertheleſſe with his owne men of warre, eſpecially the Ianizaries, and the helpe of the Chriſtian ſouldiours brought to his aid from SERVIA, and other places of EVROPE, with great courage maintained the fight; but the multitude, and not true valor, preuailed: for, as much as might be done by valiant & couragious men, was by the Ianizaries and the reſt perfourmed, both for the preſeruation of the perſon of their prince, and the gaining of the victorie. But in the end, the horſemen with whom Tamerlane himſelfe was giuing a freſh charge, & his auauntgard wholy knit againe vnto him, reenforcing the charge, he with much adoe obtained the victorie. Baiazet himſelfe wounded, and now mounted on horſebacke thinking to haue eſcaped by flight, fell into the hands of Axalla. E but tooke him for ſome other great commander of the Turks. Muſa (ſurnamed Zelebi, or, The noble) one of Baiazet his ſonnes, with diuers other of Baiazet his great captaines, were there taken alſo: and amongſt the reſt, George the Deſpot of SERVIA, who notwithſtanding this misfortune, had that day gained vnto himſelfe the reputation of a great and worthie captaine, inſomuch that Tamerlane euen in the heat of the battell, maruelling to ſee him, and the Seruians with the other Chriſtians which he had brought to the aid of Baiazet, ſo valiantly to fight, ſaid vnto ſome of the captaines that were neere vnto him, See how couragiouſly yonder religious fight: ſuppoſing them by their ſtrange attire, to haue beene ſome of the Turks ſuperſtitious votaries. But being now taken, and afterwards brought to Tamerlane, he was by him courteouſly welcomed: but yet withall reproued, for that he had fought for Baiazet againſt him, who was

F come in fauour of the Chriſtian Emperour, and the other poore oppreſſed Princes, ſuch as the Deſpot himſelfe was. Who thereunto boldly anſwered, That indeed it was not according to his dutie, but according to the proſperitie of Baiazet, vnto whom it ſeemed that all the world did bend: and that his owne ſafetie had cauſed him, though againſt his will, to take part with him. Whereupon Tamerlane held him excuſed: and ſo without more adoe gaue him leaue at his owne pleaſure to depart.

make triall of him, & that he well hoped, before the march were ended, to make him acknowledge his owne follie. The next day the two armies drew neere together, and encamped within a league the one of the other: where all the night long you might haue heard ſuch noiſe of horſes, as that it ſeemed the heauens were full of voices, the aire did ſo reſound, and euery man thought the night long, to come to the triall of his valour, and the gaining of his deſires. The Scythians (a people no leſſe greedie than needie) talked of nothing but the ſpoile, the proud Parthians of their honour, and the poore Chriſtians of their deliuerance, all to be gained by the next dayes victorie: euery man during the night time ſpeaking according to his owne humour. All which Tamerlane walking this night vp & downe in his campe, heard, and much reioyced to H ſee the hope that his ſouldiers had alreadie in generall conceiued of the victorie. Who after the ſecond watch returned vnto his pauilion, & there caſting himſelfe vpon a carpet, had thought to haue ſlept a while. But his cares not ſuffering him ſo to doe, he then (as his manner was) called for a booke, wherein was contained the liues of his fathers and anceſtors, and of other valiant worthies, the which he vſed ordinarily to read, as he then did: not as therewith vainly to deceiue the time, but to make vſe therof, by the imitation of that which was by them worthily done, and declining of ſuch dangers, as they by their raſhnes or ouerſight fell into. And afterwards hauing a little ſlumbered, he commanded Axalla to be ſent for, who forthwith came vnto him with diuers other great lords & captains, the chiefe commanders of his armie: with whom after he had a while conſulted of the order of the battell, he mounted on horſebacke himſelfe, and ſent euery I
one of them vnto their owne charges, to put the ſame in readineſſe. At the which very inſtant he receiued newes, that the enemie marched forward, and came to take his ground for the battell: whoſe order of march Tamerlane was deſirous to ſee, that ſo accordingly he might marſhall his owne. And hauing cauſed three thouſand horſemen to aduance forward, with charge to begin the skirmiſh, himſelfe followed after to lodge euery part of his forces in ſuch places, as he had foreſeene to be fitteſt for his aduantage. Now ſeeing the Ianizaries march in a ſquare battell in the middeſt, and vpon the two fronts, two great ſquadrons of horſemen, which ſeemed to be thirtie thouſand horſe; and another which aduanced & couered the battailion of the Ianizaries: he thought this their order to be very good, and hard to be broken; and thereupon turning himſelfe vnto Axalla, who was neere vnto him, ſaid: I had thought this day to haue fought on K
foot, but I ſee that it behoueth me now to fight on horſebacke, to giue courage vnto my ſouldiers to open the great battalion of our enemies. And my will is, that my men come forward vnto me as ſoone as they may, for I will aduance forward with an hundred thouſand footmen, fiftie thouſand vpon each of my two wings, & in the middeſt of them fortie thouſand of my beſt horſemen. My pleaſure is, that after they haue tried the force of theſe men, that they come vnto my avauntguard, of whom I will diſpoſe, and fiftie thouſand horſe more, in three bodies, whom thou ſhalt command: which I will aſſiſt with foureſcore thouſand horſe, wherein ſhall be mine owne perſon; hauing an hundred thouſand footmen behind me, who ſhall march in two ſquadrons: & for my arereward I appoint 40000 horſe, & 50000 footmen, who ſhall not march but to my aid. And I wil make choice of 10000 of my beſt horſe, whom I will ſend into euery place L
where I ſhall thinke needfull within mine armie, for to impart my commands. Ouer the firſt fortie thouſand horſe the Prince Ciarcan commanded: ouer the formoſt footmen was the lord Synopes a Genouois, kinſman to Axalla, and his lieutenant ouer the footmen, a captaine of great eſtimation: the Prince Axalla his owne charge conſiſted of fiue ſquadrons of horſemen. Baiazet his armie being alſo both faire, and great, came brauely ſtill on forward towards their enemies, who ſtirred not one whit from the place they had taken for the battell: except certaine light horſemen Scythians, Parthians, and Muſcouites, who ſent out as looſe men, hotly skirmiſhed betwixt the two armies. Now was Tamerlane by an eſpie aduertiſed, that Baiazet, hauing before giuen order for the diſpoſing of his armie, was on foot in the middeſt of thirtie thouſand Ianizaries, his principall men of warre and greateſt ſtrength, wherein he meant that day to fight, and M in whom he had repoſed his greateſt hope. His battell of horſe was very faire, amounting to the number of an hundred and fortie thouſand horſe, all old ſouldiers. The Sultan of ÆGYPT hauing alſo ſent vnto his aid thirtie thouſand Mamalukes, all very good horſemen, with thirtie thouſand foot. So that his armie marching all in one front, in forme of an halfe Moone (but not ſo well knit together as was Tamerlanes, whoſe ſquadrons directly followed one another) ſeemed

The great and mortall battell betwixt Baiazet and Tamerlane.

A seemed almost as great as his. And so with infinite numbers of most horrible outcries, still aduanced forward: Tamerlane his souldiours all the while standing fast, with great silence.

There was not possible to be seen a more furious charge, than was by the Turks giuen vpō the prince of CIARCAN, who had commandement not to fight before the enemy came vnto him: neither could haue been chosen a fairer plaine, and where the skilfull choice of the place, was of lesse aduantage for the one or the other; but that Tamerlane had the riuer on the left hand of his armie, seruing him to some small aduantage. Now this yong prince of CIARCAN with his forty thousand horse, was in this first encounter almost wholly ouerthrowne: yet hauing fought right valiantly, and entred euen into the middest of the Ianizaries (where the person of Baiazet was)

B putting them in disorder, was himselfe there slaine. About which time, Axalla set vpon them with the avauntgard, but not with like danger: for hauing ouerthrowne one of the enemies wings, and cut it all to peeces, and his footmen comming to joyne with him as they had been commaunded, he faced the battalion of the Ianizaries, who right valiantly behaued themselues for the safetie of their Prince. This hard fight continued one hower, and yet you could not haue seene any scattered, but the one still resolutely fighting against the other. You might there haue seene the horsemen like mountaines rush together, & infinite numbers of men die, crie, lament, and threaten all at one instant. Tamerlane had patience all this while, to see the euent of this so mortall a fight: but perceiuing his men at length to giue ground, he sent ten thousand of his horse to joyne againe with the ten thousand appointed for the arcareward, and commaunded

C them to assist him at such time as he should haue need of them: and at the verie same time, charged himselfe, and made them giue him roome; causing the footmen to charge also, ouer whom the prince of THANAIS commaunded, who gaue a furious onset vpon the battalion of the Ianizaries, wherein was yet the person of Baiazet, who had sustained a great burthen. Now Baiazet had in his armie a great number of mercinarie Tartars, called Destenses, with many thousands of other soldiers takē vp in the countries of the poor exiled Mahometā princes; in whose just quarell, and the Greeke Emperours, Tamerlane had chiefely vndertaken that war: these Tartarians and other souldiours, seeing some their friends, and othersome their naturall and loning princes in the armie of Tamerlane, stroken with the terrour of disloyaltie, and abhorring the crueltie of the proud tirant, in the heat of the battaile reuolted from Baiazet to their owne princes:

D which their reuolt, much weakened Baiazet his forces. Who neuertheless with his owne men of warre, especially the Ianizaries, and the helpe of the Christian souldiours brought to his aid from SERVIA, and other places of EVROPE, with great courage maintained the fight; but the multitude, and not true valor, preuailed: for, as much as might be done by valiant & couragious men, was by the Ianizaries and the rest perfourmed, both for the preseruation of the person of their prince, and the gaining of the victorie. But in the end, the horsemen with whom Tamerlane himselfe was giuing a fresh charge, & his avauntgard wholy knit againe vnto him, reenforcing the charge, he with much adoe obtained the victorie. Baiazet himselfe wounded, and now mounted on horseback thinking to haue escaped by flight, fell into the hands of Axalla. Baiazet and his sonne Musa taken prisoners.

Baiazet alſo himſelfe, being afterwards brought vnto Tamerlane as a priſoner, and by him courteouſly entertained, neuer ſhewed any token of ſubmiſſion at all, but according to his proud nature, without reſpect of his preſent ſtate, preſumptuouſly anſwered him vnto whatſoeuer he demanded. Wherewith Tamerlane moued, told him, that it was now in his power to make him to loſe his life. Whereunto he anſwered no more, but, Doe it: for that, that loſſe ſhould be his greateſt happineſſe. Tamerlane afterwards demanding of him, what made him ſo proud as to enterpriſe to bring into his ſubiection ſo noble a Prince as was the Greeke Emperour? he anſwered, Euen the ſame thing that hath moued thee to inuade me, namely the deſire of glorie and ſoueraigntie. But wherefore then (ſaid Tamerlane) doeſt thou vſe ſo great crueltie towards them thou haſt ouercome, without reſpect of age or ſex? That did I (ſaid he) to giue the greater terrour vnto mine enemies. And what wouldeſt thou haue done with me (ſaid Tamerlane) if it had beene my fortune to haue fallen into thy hands, as thou art now in mine? I would (ſaid Baiazet) haue encloſed thee in a cage of iron, and ſo in triumph haue carried thee vp and downe my kingdome. Euen ſo (ſaid Tamerlane) ſhalt thou be ſerued. And ſo cauſing him to be taken out of his preſence, turning vnto his followers, ſaid: Behold a proud and cruell man, he deſerueth to be chaſtiſed accordingly, and to be made an example vnto all the proud and cruell of the world, of the iuſt wrath of God againſt them. I acknowledge that God hath this day deliuered into my hands a great enemie, to whom we muſt therefore giue thanks: which he performed the ſame day. For the battell was won at foure of the clocke, and there was yet fiue houres of day light. The next day Tamerlane commanded the dead to be buried, where amongſt the reſt, they found the bodie of the Prince of CIARCAN dead, in the middeſt of the Ianizaries, where he lay encloſed with their dead bodies, in token he died not vnreuenged: whoſe vntimely death Tamerlane for all that greatly lamented; for he was his kinſman, and like enough one day to haue done him great ſeruice. Whoſe dead bodie Tamerlane cauſed to be embalmed, and with two thouſand horſe, (and diuers of the Turks priſoners, chained and tied together) to be conuaied to SAMERCAND, vntill his comming thither. All the other dead bodies were with all honour that might be, buried at SINNAS.

This great bloodie battell fought in the yeere of our Lord 1397 not farre from the mount STELLA (where ſometime the great King Mithrydates, was by Pompey the Great, in a great battell ouerthrowne) was fought from ſeuen a clocke in the morning, vntill foure in the after noone: victorie all that while as it were with doubtfull wings, houering ouer both armies, as vncertaine where to light; vntill at length the fortune of Tamerlane preuailed. Whoſe wiſdome (next vnto God) gaue that daies victorie vnto his ſouldiers: for that the politique tiring of the ſtrong forces of Baiazet, was the ſafegard of his owne; whereas if he had gone vnto the battell in one front, aſſuredly the multitude finding ſuch ſtrong reſiſtance, had put it ſelfe into confuſion: whereas this ſucceſſiue manner of aiding of his men, made them all vnto him profitable. The number of them that were in this battell ſlaine, is of diuers diuerſly reported: the Turks themſelues reporting, that Baiazet there loſt the noble Muſtapha his ſonne, with two hundred thouſand of his men, and Tamerlane not many fewer: and ſome other ſpeaking of a farre leſſe number, as that there ſhould be ſlaine of the Turks about threeſcore thouſand, and of Tamerlane his armie not paſt twentie thouſand. But leauing the certaintie of the number vnto the credit of the reporters, like enough it is that the ſlaughter was exceeding great in ſo long a fight, betwixt two ſuch armies, as neuer before (as I ſuppoſe) met in field together.

By this one daies euent, is plainly to be ſeene the vncertaintie of worldly things, & what ſmall aſſurance euen the greateſt haue in them. Behold Baiazet the terrour of the world, and as he thought, ſuperiour to fortune, in an inſtant with his ſtate in one battell ouerthrowne into the bottome of miſerie and deſpaire: and that at ſuch time as he thought leaſt, euen in the middeſt of his greateſt ſtrength. It was three daies (as they report) before he could be pacified, but as a deſperate man, ſtil ſeeking after death, & calling for it: neither did Tamerlane after he had once ſpoken with him, at all afterwards courteouſly vſe him, but as of a proud man cauſed ſmall account to be made of him. And to manifeſt that he knew how to puniſh the haughtie, made him to be ſhackled in fetters and chaines of gold, and ſo to be ſhut vp in an iron cage made like a grate, in ſuch ſort, as that he might on euery ſide be ſeene; and ſo carried him vp and downe as he paſſed thorow ASIA, to be of his owne people ſcorned and derided. And to his farther diſgrace, vpon feſtiuall daies vſed him for a footſtoole to tread vpon, when he mounted to horſe: and at other times

A times ſcornfully fed him like a dogge with crums fallen from his table. A rare example of the vncertaintie of worldly honour, that he vnto whoſe ambitious minde, ASIA, and EVROPE, two great parts of the world were too little, ſhould be now carried vp and downe cooped vp in a little iron cage, like ſome perillous wilde beaſt. All which Tamerlane did, not ſo much for the hatred to the man, as to manifeſt the iuſt iudgement of God againſt the arrogant follie of the proud. It is reported that Tamerlane being requeſted by one of his noble men that might be bold to ſpeake vnto him, to remit ſome part of his ſeueritie againſt the perſon of ſo great a Prince; anſwered, That he did not vſe that rigour againſt him as a King, but rather did puniſh him as a proud ambitious tyrant, polluted with the bloud of his owne brother.

B Now this ſo great an ouerthrow, brought ſuch a feare vpon all the countries poſſeſſed by Baiazet in ASIA, that Axalla ſent before by Tamerlane with fortie thouſand horſe, and an hundred thouſand foot, without carriages, to proſecute the victorie, came without reſiſtance to PRVSA; whither al the remainder of Baiazet his armie was retired, with the Baſſa Muſtapha: the countrey as he went, ſtill yeelding vnto him. Yea the great Baſſa, with the reſt, hearing of his comming, and thinking themſelues not now in any ſafetie in ASIA, fled ouer the ſtrait of HELLESPONTVS to CALLIPOLIS, and ſo to HADRIANOPLE; carrying with them out of the battell Solyman, Baiazet his eldeſt ſonne, whom they ſet vp in his fathers place; Mahomet his younger brother preſently vpon the ouerthrow being fled to AMASIA: of whom, and the reſt of Baiazet his children, more ſhall be ſaid hereafter. Axalla comming to PRVSA, had the citie without reſiſtance Solyman ſet vp in his fathers ſtead.

Prusa taken by Axalla.

C yeelded vnto him, which he rifled: and there with other of Baiazet his wiues and concubines, tooke priſoner the faire Deſpina, Baiazet his beſt beloued wife, to the doubling of his griefe.

Emanuel the Greeke Emperour now hearing of Tamerlane his comming to PRVSA, ſent his embaſſadours (the moſt honourable of his court) thither before to Axalla: by whom they were there ſtaied, vntill the comming of Tamerlane; who receiued them with all the honour that might be, ſhewing vnto them all his magnificence, and the order of his campe, to their great admiration. For it reſembled a moſt populous and well gouerned citie, for the order that was therein, which brought vnto it plentie of all kind of victuals, and other marchandiſe, as well for pleaſure as for vſe. By theſe embaſſadours, the Greeke Emperour ſubmitted all his empire together with his perſon, vnto Tamerlane the great conquerour, as his moſt faithfull ſubiect and vaſ-

D ſall: which he was bound (as he ſaid) to doe, for that he was by him deliuered from the moſt cruell tyrant in the world: as alſo for that the long iourney he had paſſed, and the diſcommodities he had endured, with the loſſe of his people, and the danger of his perſon, could not be recompenced, but by the offer of his owne life, and his ſubiects; which he did for euer dedicate to his ſeruice, with all the fidelitie and loyaltie that ſo great a benefit might deſerue: beſides that his ſo many vertues, & rare accompliſhments, which made him famous thorowout the world, did bind him ſo to doe. And that therefore he would attend him in his chiefe citie, to deliuer it into his hands as his owne, with all the empire of GREECE. Now the Greeke embaſſadours looked for no leſſe than to fall into bondage to Tamerlane, thinking that which they offered to be ſo great & delicate a morſell, as that it would not be refuſed, eſpecially of ſuch a conquering

E Prince as was Tamerlane; and that the acceptance thereof in kindneſſe, and friendſhip, was the beſt bargaine they could make therein. But they receiued anſwere from this worthie Prince, farre beyond their expectation. For he with a milde countenance beholding them, anſwered them, That he was not come from ſo farre a countrey, or vndertaken ſo much paines for the enlargement of his dominions alreadie large enough, (too baſe a thing for him to put himſelfe into ſo great danger and trauell for) but rather to winne honour, and thereby to make his name famous vnto all poſteritie for euer: And that therefore it ſhould well appeare vnto the world, that he was come to aid him, being requeſted as his friend and allie: And that his vpright meaning therein, was the greateſt cauſe, that God from aboue had beheld his power, and thereby bruſed the head of the greateſt and fierceſt enemie of mankinde that was vnder heauen: And

F now to get him an immortall name, would make free ſo great and flouriſhing a citie as was CONSTANTINOPLE, gouerned by ſo noble and ancient an houſe as the Emperours: That vnto his courage, he had alwaies faith ioyned, ſuch as ſhould neuer ſuffer him to make ſo great a breach in his reputation, as that it ſhould be reported of him, That in the colour of a friend, he came to inuade the dominions of his allies: That he deſired no more, but that the ſeruice he had done for the Greeke Emperour, might for euer be ingrauen in the memorie of his poſteritie, to the end they might for euer wish well vnto him and his successours, by remembring the good G he had done them; That long might the noble Emperour liue, happily to gouerne his estate.

And that before his returne he would so well consider for the establishing of the same, as that he should not lightly fall againe into the like ieopardie, alwayes assuring himselfe of his good will and fauour towards him. Easie it is to iudge, what ioy these Greeke embassadours receiued, to heare this so kind an answere from the mouth of Tamerlane himselfe: who rather than he would seeme to breake his faith, refused an empire offered vnto him, with one of the most stately and magnificent cities of the world. Few princes (I suppose) would performe such a part: but so there be likewise but few Tamerlanes in the world. These embassadours by the commandement of Tamerlane, were by Axalla royally feasted, and all the honour done them that might be. One of H them being sent backe to carrie these vnexpected newes vnto the Greeke Emperour, filled both him and all the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE with exceeding ioy and gladnesse, which both he and his subiects in generall spared not with bonfires and all other signes of ioy & pleasure to manifest. And the more to shew his thankfulnesse, shortly after by the aduice of his graue counsellors, passed ouer the strait into ASIA to see Tamerlane at PRVSA, and in person himselfe to giue him thankes: who hearing of his comming, and very glad thereof, presently vpon the first dayes iourney sent the Prince Axalla to meet him, and to certifie him of the ioy that he conceiued, to haue the good hap for to see him, as also to conduct him to PRVSA: where those two great Princes, with the greatest magnificence that might be, met, and so spent one whole day together. The Greeke Emperour the next day taking his leaue, was by Tamerlane with much ho- I nour conducted out of the citie. Now had Tamerlane himselfe conceiued a secret desire to see Tamerlane goeth to Constantinople. this so famous a citie as was CONSTANTINOPLE, from which he was not now farre, yet would he not goe thither as a conquerour, but as a priuate person: which by the means of Axalla was accomplished, and he thereinto by the Greeke Emperour priuatly receiued, and with all familiaritie possible, entertained: the Emperour shewing vnto him all the rare & excellent things that were therein to be seene: and the other Greeke Princes deuising all the meanes they could to doe him pleasure, and them which did accompanie him; who were in a manner all apparel-led after the Greeke fashion. At which time the Greeke Emperour himselfe was curious to shew vnto him all the faire gardens alongst the sea coast, a league or two from CONSTANTINOPLE, and so priuatly conducting him, spent fiue or six daies, with al the mirth that might be possible: K Tamerlan much delighted with the pleasurs of Constantinople. Tamerlane by the way oftentimes saying, That he had neuer seene a fairer citie: and that it was indeed the citie (considering the faire and rich situation thereof) of right, worthie to command all the world. He wondered at the costly buildings of the temples, the faire ingrauen pillars, the high pyramides, and the making of the faire gardens, and oftentimes afterwards said, That he nothing repented him of his so long and dangerous a voyage, if it had beene onely but to haue preserued from fire and sword so noble a citie as that was. In the Greeke Emperor he commended greatly his mild nature and courtesie: who knowing him aboue all things to take pleasure in faire seruiceable horses, gaue vnto him thirtie of the faireſt, strongest, and readiest, that were possible to be gotten, all most richly furnished; and sent likewise faire presents vnto all the princes and great commanders of the armie, and bountifully caused to be deliuered vnto them all L things which he thought to be necessarie for the armie. So after many great kindnesses in short time passed, and a strait bond of friendship made, and by solemne oath confirmed betwixt the two great Princes, Tamerlane with great contentment tooke his leaue of the Emperour, and returned againe to his armie at PRVSA. Wherewith he now at his pleasure without resistance wasted and spoiled all Baiazet his dominion in ASIA, no man daring to make head against him.

The yeere being now well spent, and Winter drawing on, Tamerlane dispersed his armie into diuers of the prouinces of the lesser ASIA, expecting still when some of Baiazet his sonnes or other friends should make sute or meanes vnto him for his deliuerance, but none came: some fearing Tamerlane his heauie indignation, and others no lesse dreading the fierce nature of Baiazet himselfe, who if he had beene deliuered, was like enough (as was thought) to haue taken M sharpe reuenge vpon all them which forsooke him in the late battell, and therefore neuer made intercession for him. Whereupon Tamerlane one day passing by him, said vnto him: I maruell that none of thy sonnes or friends either come to see thee or to intreat for thee, it must needs be that thou hast euill deserued of them, as thou hast of others: yet how thinkest thou, If I should set thee at libertie, would they againe receiue thee as their Lord and Soueraigne, or not? To whom

A whom Baiazet boldly anſwered: Were I at libertie, thou ſhouldeſt well ſee, how that I want neither courage nor meanes to reuenge all my wrongs, and to make thoſe diſobedient and forgetfull, to know their duties better. Which his proud anſwere, made Tamerlane to keepe a ſtraighter hand ouer him.

In this great and bloudie warre, wherein the Othoman empire had almoſt taken end, the Sultan of Ægypt had (as is aforeſaid) giuen aid vnto Baiazet: which Tamerlane tooke in ſo euill part, as that he reſolued to be thereof reuenged. For as he was vnto his friends of all others moſt kind and courteous, ſo was he to his enemies no leſſe terrible and dreadful. Yet thinking it good before his departure out of the leſſer Asia, to take ſome good order with theſe his new con-
B queſts: and finding nothing more honourable to reſolue vpon, he reſtored vnto the poore Mahometane Princes (Tachretin, Iſfendiar, Germian, and the reſt before fled vnto him for refuge) all their ancient inheritance, with ſomething more; as he did alſo diuers cities and countries of Natolia vnto the Greeke Emperour, for the yeerely tribute of foure hundred thouſand duckats of gold, and eight hundred thouſand franks of ſiluer, which the Emperour promiſed to pay vnto him yeerely. And ſo hauing enriched his armie with the ſpoiles of the Othoman empire in Asia, he turned his forces againſt the Ægyptian Sultan, and ſo paſſing thorow Caramania, entred into Syria, then part of the Sultans kingdome: where neere vnto Alleppo (being before yeelded vnto him) was fought betwixt them a great and mortall battell, the Sultan hauing in his armie an hundred thouſand foot, and ſeuentie foure thouſand horſe: whereof there were

C thirtie thouſand Mamelukes, accounted the beſt horſemen of the world. In which battell, Axalla the great captaine, with the avauntguard of Tamerlane his armie, was hardly diſtreſſed, and Axalla himſelfe taken: but forthwith againe reſcued by Tamerlane: who had he not by his comming on with new forces, ſpeedily reſtored the battell, cunningly protracted by Axalla, that day was like enough to haue made an end of his good fortune. But the victorie after a long and cruell fight (wherein were foureſcore thouſand men on both ſides ſlaine) inclining to Tamerlane, the Sultan fled, Tamerlane purſuing him by the ſpace of three leagues. After which victorie, Tamerlane diuiding his armie, ſent Axalla with fortie thouſand horſe and fiftie thouſand foot, to purſue the Sultan alongſt the coaſt of Arabia: who oftentimes ſhewed himſelfe, with ſome foure thouſand horſe to haue hindred Axalla, who hauing the ſmalleſt forces, followed
D him the neareſt. Tamerlane himſelfe in the meane time, with threeſcore thouſand horſe, and an hundred thouſand foot, marching alongſt the ſea coaſt, had all the cities as he went yeelded vnto him, as Magata, Aman, otherwiſe called Apamea, Tortosa, Barryto, and Nephthalin: only the ſtrong citie of Damasco refuſed to receiue him, whereinto the Sultan had put Damaſco won by Tamerlane. the Prince Zamadzen, with a ſtrong garriſon, who did what he might to haue defended the ſame. But all in vaine, for Tamerlane hauing by batterie ouerthrowne a great part of the wall, by aſſault won the citie, only the caſtle yet remaining, as being of a wonderfull ſtrength, and almoſt impregnable: whereinto ſuch a multitude had at the taking of the citie retired themſelues, as was not poſſible therein long to liue: who in ſhort time pinched with hunger, and many of them dead, the reſt vpon ſafeguard of their liues offered to yeeld: whom for all that Tamerlane
E would not receiue to mercie, to make them feele what it was to hold out againſt him: ſo that moſt of them dying of famine, the reſt yeelded without condition, and were for their obſtinacie almoſt all ſlaine. Which his ſeueritie towards them of Damasco, cauſed, that thirtie leagues off they brought the keyes of their cities vnto him, in token of their ſubmiſſion: whom he no way moleſted, more than in contributing vnto the charge of his armie. From Damasco he turned directly towards Ierusalem, at which time they of the citie had driuen out the Sultans garriſon, as had almoſt all they of Iudea, ſubmitting themſelues vnto Tamerlane. At Chorazin the Sultan had left ſix thouſand men in garriſon for the defence of the place, who at the firſt ſeemed to ſtand vpon their guard: but afterward diſmaied to ſee ſo great an armie before it, and that Tamerlane hauing approched the wals, was ſet downe to haue it, they ſubmitted them-
F ſelues and found mercie. In which citie Tamerlane left certaine of his men in garriſon, for the better repreſſing of the Mamalukes, who with often incurſions troubled his armie. So marching on, he himſelfe with certaine horſemen for his guard, rode to Ierusalem to viſit the ſepul-chre ſo much reuerenced of all nations, and there to make his oblations: where he was of the inhabitants ioyfully receiued, and hauing ſought out all the antiquities of that ancient citie, would be conducted vnto all the places thereabouts, where Ieſus Chriſt had preached, euen

euen as the pilgrimes doe: and comming to the ſepulchre, gaue therunto, and the deuout there, G many rich and precious gifts, to the great contentment of all men (to ſee him honour thoſe holy places) but of the Iewes onely, who greatly blamed him for ſo doing: of whom of all others Tamerlane made no reckoning, but called them the accurſed of God. There had he newes that the Sultan had gathered all his forces, and being come into ÆGYPT, was there fortifying of his cities, eſpecially the great cities of ALEXANDRIA and CAIER. Tamerlane his armie in the meane time by his commandement came towards ÆGYPT to DAMIATA: which ſtrong citie he thought not good to leaue behind him, although he was by ſome perſwaded ſo to doe, for that it was thought impregnable, as well in reſpect of the caſtle, as of the ſtrong garriſon that the Sultan had put therein to. But he whoſe fortune nothing could hinder, H Damiata taken by Axalla. would needs goe thither: and ſo hauing commanded Axalla to ſet vpon it, followed himſelfe after with the reſt of his armie. Now Axalla hauing ſummoned the citie, and declared vnto the inhabitants (who were moſt of them Chriſtians) the mildneſſe and courteſie of Tamerlane, as alſo who himſelfe was, and what religion he held: cauſing many of the Greeke captaines to ſpeake vnto them, and to tell them of the miſerie they endured vnder the Moores and Mamalukes: ſo farre preuailed with them, that they all determined to aduenture their liues, to put the Mamalukes out of the citie, with all them that fauoured the Sultan. And ſo in the night taking vp armes, made themſelues maſters of one quarter of the citie, and deliuered one of the gates to Axalla: whereby he entering, put all the Mamalukes to the ſword, or tooke them priſoners, and ſo gained the citie. Whereof Tamerlane hearing, being as yet vpon his march, was in good hope I of ſo proſperous a beginning, to find an happie end alſo of his deſignes in ÆGYPT. For be-ſides the good fortune thereof, he knew that this haueh of DAMIATA, might ſerue him with victuals out of all the parts of GREECE, as the Emperour Emanuel had promiſed him, and wherein he nothing failed him. Into which port Tamerlane hauing made his entrie, left there in garriſon two thouſand of the Emperour Emanuel his ſouldiers, with a gouernour, of whom he tooke an oath for their obedience. So hauing ſtaied a ſpace at DAMIATA, he cauſed his vaunt-gard to march towards ALEXANDRIA: and hauing paſſed ouer the riuer, euen in an inſtant Tamerlane marcheth towards Caier. turned directly vnto CAIER; to the great aſtoniſhment of the Sultan, who made prouiſion for the defence of ALEXANDRIA, as the neereſt vnto danger. But vnderſtanding of theſe newes, vſed ſuch diligence, that he entred into the citie with fortie thouſand horſe, and three- K ſcore thouſand foot, euen as Tamerlane his armie approached, purpoſing in perſon himſelfe to defend it. By whoſe comming, the great citie readie before to haue reuolted, was againe in his obedience confirmed, to the great hinderance of Tamerlane his affaires: for to remaine long before it, was impoſſible, for want of victuals for ſo great an armie in the enemies countrey. Yet Caier beſieged by Tamerlane. notwithſtanding all this, did not Tamerlane forbeare to draw neere vnto it, and with all his armie to encampe neere vnto the ſame, hauing cauſed a great trench to be made for to couer his horſemen, and thereby to lodge his armie more ſafely: during which time he cauſed diuers on-ſets to be giuen, as well to trie what confidence the enemie had in himſelfe, as to ſee how the people of the citie, eſpecially the ſlaues (which in that populous citie are infinite) were affected towards him: who certainly informed him of the ſtate of the citie, and the armie; as glad to ſee L the ſame by him ſhut vp, and the proud Mamalukes ſtill put to the worſt. But thus lying ſtill at the ſiege, one day he thought it good to ſhew his armie before the citie, for to trie whether the enemie had a deſire to come to a day of battell or not: as alſo to view what forces he had, and ſo indeed to ſeeke occaſion to fight: In hope alſo, that if the Sultan did come forth with all his armie into the field, ſome reuolt might happen within the citie, as well by the ſlaues (vnto whom libertie was by him promiſed) as by the citizens themſelues (diſcontented with the in-ſolencie of the Mamalukes entered of late into the citie with the Sultan) vnto whom he had made it knowne by certaine ſlaues (for that purpoſe fled as fugitiues out of his armie into the citie) how that he was not come to hurt them, but only for the deſtruction of the Mamalukes, both his and their enemies. But betimes ſtanding ſo in battell array, no man came forth, M neither was there any tumult or ſtirre raiſed in the citie, as he had expected. For the Sultan in ſo great a citie well prouided of all things, was reſolued to wearie him out with lying ſtill, and not to put all to the hazard of a battell. Which Tamerlane perceiuing, and ſet downe not to depart thence, but victorious, reſolued likewiſe to force him euen in his greateſt ſtrength, in the heart of his greateſt citie; although it were not to be done, but with great aduen-

A aduenture: ſuch confidence he had in the ſtrength and multitude of his armie. Now his purpoſe was, firſt to take one of the cities (for CAIRE is diuided into three) & therin encamping himſelf, by litle & litle to aduance forward as he might, ſtil fighting with the enemy. Vpon which reſolution, he commaunded an aſſault to be giuen, and hauing brought his footmen vnto the place where he would haue them to giue the onſet (for the Citie was not walled, but onely fortified with ditches and trenches) he commaunded the Prince of THANAIS with fiftie thouſand footmen, to begin the aſſault, euen in the face of the enemie: which hee moſt valiantly perfourmed, and there began a moſt terrible and cruell fight. Axalla in the meane time, deeming (as the truth was) that the Sultan had drawn his greateſt forces vnto the place where the prince of THANAIS
B ſought to enter, as vnto a place of greateſt danger; fet a compaſſe about, & vpon another quarter of the citie, with ſmall reſiſtance paſſed the trenches; where he preſently left thirtie thouſand men to fill vp the ditches, and to make way for the horſemen to enter: aduancing forward himſelfe, againſt twentie thouſand ſent by the Sultan to haue ſtopped his further paſſage: the prince of THANAIS being at the ſame time almoſt beaten backe by the Mamelukes. But the way being made plaine, by them that were for that purpoſe left by Axalla, and ten thouſand horſe entred, which charged vpon the backs of the Mamelukes, where the Sultan himſelfe was; and they ſeconded by ten thouſand moe ſent in by Tamerlane, following himſelfe after, with all his power: the Sultan retired vnto a ſecond ſtrength, which he had made in the next citie. The fight endured full the ſpace of ſeauen houres, wherein were ſlain of the Sultan his men aboue ſixteene
C thouſand: and of Tamerlanes betwixt ſeauen and eight thouſand. Who contented to haue diſlodged the enemie, and gained a third part of the Citie, cauſed a retrait to be ſounded, in hope the next day to win all the reſt, as indeed he did. For the prince of THANAIS the next day forcing the enemies trenches in one place, and Axalla in another, the Sultan after a great fight finding himſelfe hardly preſſed by the obſtinate enemie, and too weake long to hold out, retired, and ſo forthwith abandoned the citie, and encamped himſelf along the ſide of the riuer NILVS, with purpoſe to paſſe the ſame, and to flye to ALEXANDRIA his ſecond ſtrength and refuge. Which Tamerlane ſuſpecting, followed after him with his horſemen (who onely were in order) and ſome few foot, hardly drawn from the citie, which their fellowes were in ſpoiling; ſo as hee was glad to promiſe them eſpecially, to regard and reward their good ſeruice. Againſt whom
D the Sultan vpon a narrow cawſey, had oppoſed twelue or fifteen thouſand men, whom he called his ſlaues (to fauour his paſſage) but were indeed his beſt ſouldiours, and ſtood faſt, the place ſeruing greatly for their aduantage: who for all that at length forced by their enemies, ſtill increaſing vpon them, (though not without great loſſe) caſt themſelues into the great riuer, and made a moſt honourable retrait: euerie man hauing his weapon in the one hand, and ſwimming with the other to the farther banke. The Sultan flying with ſome eighteene thouſand horſe (for the reſt were ſundrie waies fled or elſe drowned) is reported in his flight, to haue comforted his men, by telling of them, That they were not men that had vanquiſhed them, but gods, there appeared in them ſo great wiſedome, force, and valour: diuers of the Mamelukes taken in the late fight, being brought before Tamerlane, and by him courteouſly vſed, were of him demaunded, E if they could be content to ſerue him, now that their Maſter was fled and gone? which they all vtterly refuſed. Whom notwithſtanding, for their fidelitie, Tamerlane ſet at libertie to goe againe vnto the Sultan: as no leſſe deſirous to be admired of his enemies for his bountie and courteſie, than feared for his force and valour. The wonderfull wealth of this ſo great and famous a citie became a preie vnto his ſouldiers: who for the ſpace of foure and twentie houres had the ſpoile thereof, euerie man being then by open proclamation commaunded to repaire to his quarter. The citizens he ſet all at libertie, not ſuffering any of them to be taken priſoners. And ſo leauing ten thouſand good ſouldiers with a great number of others (whereof he caried a great multitude in his armie, planting euerie where as he paſſed as it were new colonies) and carying away with him ſuch of the inhabitants as he thought might hurt him, and taking order for all things neceſ-
F ſarie for the keeping of ſuch a citie, he cauſed his armie to paſſe ouer the riuer for to follow the Sultan vnto ALEXANDRIA, to the end not to leaue his victorie vnperfect: Axalla hafting before with the avauntgard, for to hinder the Sultan for ioyning his forces againe together; and the reſt of his armie conducted by the prince of THANAIS. He himſelfe with an infinite number of boats, & ſouldiers to attend vpon him, going by water, taking great pleaſure to behold the faire riuer, & his ſwift courſe ſometimes, and in an inſtant to become ſo calme as if it ſcarce mooued.

Caier aſſaulted by Tamerlane.

The

The citizens of ALEXANDRIA hearing of his comming, and fearing what might betide them, G beſought the Sultan to haue compaſſion of their eſtate, and to withdraw himſelfe into LIBIA, whither Tamerlane for the barrenneſſe of the countrey could not with any great power follow him; reſolued for their parts to giue place vnto fortune, and to doe as the time required, and no more to reſiſt ſo great a force, whereof they had alreadie made ſufficient triall: promiſing yet to remaine in heart ſtill his, and vpon the firſt occaſion offered, to make the ſame to him appeare.
The Sultan flieth from Alexandria. Whereupon the Sultan ſeeing all things deſperate, determined for a time to retire, in hope, that time would bring ſome change: as alſo that Tamerlane his populous armie would not long re-maine there. And ſo departing out of ALEXANDRIA with teares ſtanding in his eyes, oftentimes ſaid, That God was angrie with him and his people, and that he muſt of neceſſitie ſuffer H the fatall ouerthrow of his eſtate, himſelfe hauing done as much as in him lay, according to his charge, and the expectation the world had of him: and yet that he hoped at length to returne againe, and deliuer his people from the bondage, whereunto they muſt now needs ſubmit themſelues. Tamerlane comming to ALEXANDRIA (before yeelded to Axalla) there ſtaied a great while, ſending Axalla to purſue the Sultan, exceedingly grieued that he could not get him into his hands: and therefore ſtill fearing ſome innouation to be by him raiſed, which cauſed him to deale the more hardly with them whom he ſuſpected to fauour him. Now the bruit of theſe victories hauing with Axalla paſſed beyond ALEXANDRIA into LYBIA, had brought ſuch a feare, not onely vpon the people adioyning vnto theſe conqueſts, but alſo vpon all AF-FRICA (they ſuppoſing that Tamerlane did follow) that two and twentie of the Moore Kings I ſent their embaſſadours vnto him, to offer vnto him their obedience: the Sultan as a man for-ſaken of fortune, ſtill flying before him. Of the neereſt of which Kings, Tamerlane tooke hoſta-ges: as for the other farther off, he contented himſelfe with their faith giuen, and with the other outward ſignes of their good wils.

Tamerlane deſirous to returne into his countrey. Now after this long trauell and paines taken, was Tamerlane more deſirous than he had before vſed, to ſee the pleaſures of his owne natiue countrey: the rather thereunto moued by the requeſt of his wife, then longing for his returne; and the newes he heard of the ſickneſſe of the old Tartarian Emperour his father in law; beſides that, age it ſelfe began to bring vnto him a deſire of reſt: with whom alſo, the deſires of his ſouldiers well agreed, as men now wearie to haue run ſo many and diuers fortunes. The onely ſtay was, that he expected the comming of K Calibes, an old and faithfull ſeruant of his, whom he for his good deſert had of his owne accord appointed gouernour of all his new conqueſts in ÆGYPT and SYRIA: A great honour no doubt, but not too great for him that had ſo well deſerued. So mindfull was he of the good de-ſerts of his faithfull ſeruants, as that he needed not by others to be of them put in remembrance, were they neuer ſo farre off, as was now Calibes, who at this time was with the third part of his armie making way for him along the great riuer EVPHRATES, for the conqueſt of MESOPO-TAMIA and PERSIA: whoſe comming was now with great deuotion looked for of the whole armie, deſirous to returne. Which their expectation he long delaied not, but being ſent for, came to ALEXANDRIA, whither the whole armie was now by the commandement of Tamerlane againe aſſembled. Vpon whoſe comming, Tamerlane departed from ALEXANDRIA, L hauing there left the Prince Zamalzan (a man of great reputation) with ſix thouſand horſemen and ten thouſand foot, as gouernour of that place, and lieutenant generall vnder Calibes: whom Tamerlane (as I haue ſaid) had now appointed to command ouer all ÆGYPT and SYRIA, together with the countries newly conquered in LYBIA and BARBARIE: and now conducting him vnto the great citie of CAIRE, and there taking the beſt order he could for the preſeruation of his new conqueſt, left him with fortie thouſand horſe and fiftie thouſand foot.
And ſo hauing ſufficiently inſtructed him, how he would haue thoſe kingdomes gouerned, diſmiſſed him, not like a maſter, but as a companion, ſeeming very ſorrie to leaue him deſtitute of his preſence. So ſetting forward with his armie, conducted by the Prince of THANAIS, Tamerlane himſelfe, with a few to guard him, by the way turned aſide vnto IERVSALEM: where M he remained eleuen dayes, daily viſiting the ſepulchre of Chriſt Ieſus (whom he called the God of the Chriſtians) and the ruines of Salomon his Temple: much wondering thereat, and at IERVSALEM, the ſeat of Dauids kingdome, and of that great Salomon; but grieued that he could not ſee them fully in their former beautie. He only deſpiſed the Iewes, which had committed ſo cruell a murder againſt him that came to ſaue them. And to ſhew his deuotion towards

A wards the holy citie, commanded it to be free from all ſubſidies and garriſons of men of warre; and gaue great gifts vnto the Monaſteries, and honoured them ſo long as he remained there. Departing from IERVSALEM, he came to DAMASCO: which great citie, as well for that it was infected with the opinion of Iezides (accounted an arch hereticke among the Mahometanes) as alſo euill affected to his proceedings, he cauſed to be raſed, and the bones of Iezides the falſe prophet to be digged vp and burnt, and his graue before much honoured, in deſpight to be filled with dung. So marching on, and blaſting the world before him as he went (for long it were, and from our purpoſe to recount all his victories) he paſſed ouer the riuer EVPHRATES, and hauing conquered MESOPOTAMIA, with the great citie of BABILON, and all the kingdome of B PERSIA, loaded with the ſpoile of the world, and eternized for euer, he returned at length to SAMERCAND, the famous place of his birth, and glorious ſeat of his Empire.

The miſerable death of Baiazet.

Now had Baiazet (but a little before one of the greateſt Princes on earth, and now the ſcorne of fortune, and a byword to the world) with great impatiencie laine two yeares in moſt miſerable thraldome, for moſt part ſhut vp in an yron cage, as ſome dangerous wild beaſt: and hauing no better meanes to end his loathed life, did violently beat out his braines againſt the barres of the yron grate wherein he was incloſed, and ſo died about the yeare of our Lord 1399. Yet of his death are diuers other reports: ſome ſaying, That hee died of an ague, proceeding of ſorrow and greefe: others, that he poyſoned himſelfe: and the Turks affirming, that he was ſet at libertie by Tamerlane, being by him beforehand poyſoned, whereof hee died three dayes after hee
C was enlarged (a report not like to be true:) but howſoeuer it was, his end appeareth to haue been right miſerable. His dead bodie at the requeſt of his ſonne Mahomet, was by Tamerlane ſent to ASPRAPOLIS, from whence it was afterwards conueyed to PRVSA, and there lieth buried in a Chappell neere vnto the great Mahometane Temple without the Citie Eaſtward: where alſo lieth his beloued Wife Deſpina, with his eldeſt ſonne Erthogrul. And faſt by in a little Chappell lieth buried his brother Iacup, whom he in the beginning of his raigne murthered.

A compariſon betwixt Baiazet and Tamerlane.

Theſe two great and mightie Princes, Tamerlane and Baiazet, (both of them whileſt they liued, a burthen vnto the world) as they tooke their beginning frō the Scythes or Tartars, ſo were they of like honourable progenitors deſcended: Baiazet being the fourth in deſcent from the warlike Othoman, the raiſer of his familie; and Tamerlane in like degree from the great Zingis, the D firſt and moſt fortunate leader of the Tartars (his countreymen) vnto the pleaſures of the Eaſt: both Princes of great power and like ſpirit, wiſe, hardie, painfull, reſolute, and moſt skilfull in martiall affaires; but ambitious aboue meaſure, the ground of all the former troubles by them raiſed, to the aſtoniſhment of the world. Howbeit, the great vertues and other the honourable qualities of Baiazet, were in him by his cholericke and waiward nature much obſcured: which made him to exceed both in crueltie & pride: being alſo much more handfaſt than were his honourable predeceſſors. For which cauſes he was much feared and leſſe beloued of his ſouldiers and men of warre in generall, & of them at his moſt need forſaken. He vſed commonly to ſay, That his treaſures were his childrens meat, and not his ſouldiers pay: which by way of reproch was by a common ſouldier caſt in his teeth, when he raged to ſee himſelfe by them forſaken in E the great battell againſt Tamerlane, telling him as he fled, that he ran not away, but went to ſeeke his pay, wherewith to prouide his children bread. Whereas all the aforeſaid vertues in Tamerlane were graced with diuers other of like nature, no man being vnto his friends more courteous or kinde, either vnto his enemies more dreadfull or terrible. The good ſeruice of his ſeruants he neuer forgot, either left the ſame long vnrewarded: being thereof ſo mindfull, as that he needed not by them or others in their behalfe, to be put in remembrance therof, hauing alwaies by him a catalogue both of their names and good deſerts, which he daily peruſed. Oftentimes ſaying that day to be loſt, wherein he had not giuen them ſomething: and yet neuer beſtowing his preferments vpon ſuch as ambitiouſly ſought the ſame (as deeming them in ſo doing, vnworthie thereof) but vpon ſuch, as whoſe modeſtie or deſert he thought worthie thoſe his great fauours;
F ſo tempering the ſeueritie of his commands with the greatneſſe of his bountie, as that it is hard to ſay, whether he was of his nobilitie and men of war, for the one more feared, or for the other beloued; both, the great ſtaies of Princes ſtates: feare keeping the obſtinat in their obedience, and loue, the dutiful in their deuotion. But with Baiazet it was not ſo, who deeming all done for him, but dutie, and by nature chollericke and proud (after the manner of tyrants) deſired aboue al to be of his ſubiects feared, not much regarding how little he was of them beloued: not the leaſt cauſe

Baiazet in his posteritie more fortunate than Tamerlane.

cauſe of his great fall and miſerie, and that therein he was of his owne ſo ſmally regarded: G wherein for all that he is to be accounted more fortunate than the other great conquerour his enemie, hauing euer ſince in the lineall deſcent of himſelfe, had one of the greateſt Monarchs of the world to ſucceed ſtill in his kingdome and empire: as he hath euen at this day, the great Sultan Mahomet, the third of that name, who now in great maieſtie raigneth in CONSTANTINOPLE. Whereas the glorie of Tamerlane his empire, euen in his owne time growne to the height thereof, and labouring with the greatneſſe of it ſelfe, and by him diuided amongſt his ſonnes, ſhortly after his death decaied, rent in ſunder by ambition and ciuill diſcord; and not long after, together with his poſteritie, rooted out by Vſun-Caſſanes the Perſian King, to the worlds wonder, tooke end: nothing of the huge greatneſſe thereof now or ſince then remai- H ning, more than the fame thereof: as doth alſo the miſerie of the other ſo brought low. But leauing this mirrour of miſhap (Baiazet) vnto his reſt, and Tamerlane for a while to triumph in SAMERCAND; let vs now proceed in the courſe of our Hiſtorie, yet not forgetting by the way to remember ſuch Chriſtian Princes as then liued together with theſe two great Monarchs.

Hath to thine empire, Romulus, brought great calamitie.

THE LIFE OF MAHOMET, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, FIFTH KING OF THE TVRKS, AND RESTORER OF THEIR SORE SHAKEN KINGDOME.

HOw wonderfully the Turkiſh kingdome was by the violence of Tamerlane ſhaken, and the maieſtie thereof defaced, it well appeareth, in that the Hiſtories of that time, as well thoſe of the Greeks, as of the Turks, in nothing more differ, than in the ſucceſſors of Baiazet, their late vnfortunate King. Some writing, that he had two ſons, Orchanes, (otherwiſe called Calepinus) and Mahomet: and that Calepinus in the ſecond yeere of his raigne was ſlaine, and his kingdome poſſeſſed by Mahomet his brother. Others reporting, that Baiazet had two ſons, namely, Calepinus and Muſtapha: and that Calepinus ſucceeding his father in the Turkiſh kingdome, when he had raigned ſix yeeres, died, leauing behind him two ſons, Orchanes and Mahomet: and that Orchanes being young, was ſlaine by his vncle: whom Mahomet in reuenge of his brothers death, afterwards ſlew, and poſſeſſed the kingdome himſelfe. Others reckon vp ſeuen ſons of Baiazet: Ioſua, Muſulmanes, Moſes, Calepinus, Ioſua the younger, Muſtapha, and Halis; with an vncertaine ſucceſſion amongſt them alſo. This diuerſitie of opinions, full of no leſſe vncertaintie; as I meane not to follow in report of this Hiſtorie, ſo will I not ſpend any time in refuting the ſame (although much might be ſaid in the matter) but leaue theſe reports, together with the Hiſtorie following, to ſuch credit, as they ſhall hap to finde with the conſiderate readers.

Diuers opinions concerning the ſucceſſours of Baiazet.

The Greeke Hiſtoriographers (beſt like to know the Turkiſh ſucceſſion, as well by reaſon of their neereneſſe, as in that they were by them as their bad neighbours, ſo much troubled) make no mention at all either of Calepinus or of Orchanes: In like manner, Hiſtoriæ Muſulmanæ Turcorum, diligently gathered out of the Turks owne hiſtories by Io. Leunclauius (a learned Phyſitian, and himſelfe a great traueller amongſt them, and therefore deſeruing the more credit) do not ſo much as name the ſucceſſion of Calepinus or Orchanes, after the captiuitie of Baiazet, but reiecteth them both as counterfets. But in mine opinion (without preiudice to any, that vpon better reaſon may deeme otherwiſe) the great confuſion of the Turkiſh kingdome, in ſhort time wrought by the mightie Tamerlane and his Tartarians, with the ciuill diſcord and warre afterwards ariſing among the ſons of Baiazet, ſtriuing (all as it were at once) for the reſtleſſe roome of ſoueraigntie, which ſuffereth no partners; and euery one of them, according to his hap or power, laying hand vpon ſome one part or other thereof, & bearing himſelfe therein for a time as a King, in countries ſo far diſtant; neuer leauing, vntill they had like the earth-borne brethren, wrought one anothers deſtruction; might giue iuſt occaſion of ſuch diuerſitie of reports as is before ſpoken of, concerning the ſucceſſion of that time, in that troubled and rent kingdome: ſome reckoning one, ſome another: and ſome, ſuch as neuer were, to haue ſucceeded in the gouernment, and ſo vntruly augmenting the number of the Turkiſh Kings. Wherefore leauing Calepinus & Orchanes vnto them that firſt found them, with that little, which without any good ground and leſſe probabilitie is written of their ſuppoſed raigne; I (following the authoritie of the Turkiſh Hiſtorie) reckon this Mahomet, one of the youngeſt ſonnes of Baiazet (of whom we are now to intreat) fifth King of the Turks: who after great and dangerous wars, as well againſt his owne brethren, as his forraine enemies, was at length ſolely inueſted in the Turkiſh kingdome, about ten yeeres after the captiuitie of his father Baiazet, as ſhall hereafter be declared. G

The true poſteritie of Baiazet.

Baiazet after the manner of the Turkiſh Kings, hauing laid vp the hope of his poſteritie in the common treaſure houſe of nature, rather than in the bodie of one lawfull wife, had by diuers wiues and concubines ſeuen ſonnes, Erthogrul, otherwiſe called Orthobules, Emer-Solyman, Muſtapha-Zelebi (that is to ſay, the noble) Iſa-Zelebi, Muſa-Zelebi, Sultan Mahomet, and Caſan-Zelebi. Of whom, Erthogrul the eldeſt was loſt in the wars againſt Caſi Burchaniden, as is beforeſaid in the life of Baiazet. Muſtapha was ſlaine in the great battell againſt Tamerlane, and there buried in the bed of fame. Caſan the youngeſt was a childe in Baiazet his court, when his father was taken, and afterwards with his ſiſter Fatime deliuered as hoſtages, by their brother Solyman, vnto Emanuel the Emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE, where they both happily became Chriſtians, and ſo ſhortly after died. H

Solyman was by Alis Baſſa preſident of Baiazet his counſell, and other great captaines, conueyed out of the battell againſt Tamerlane, into EVROPE: and ſo by them at HADRIANOPLE ſaluted Sultan. Mahomet fled out of the ſame battell to AMASIA in CAPADOCIA, where he was in his fathers time gouernour. Iſa hearing of his fathers captiuitie, after the departing of Tamerlane with his Tartars, ſeized vpon PRVSA, a citie of BYTHINIA, the ancient ſeat of the Turkiſh Kings, with the countrey adioyning, and there raigned as King. Muſa-Zelebi was taken priſoner with Baiazet his father, and afterwards ſet at libertie by Tamerlane. But of their fortunes more ſhall be ſaid in this hiſtorie following. I Mahomet gouernour of Amaſia.

Mahomet was but fifteene yeeres old, when his father Baiazet in the vnfortunate battell at mount STELLA was taken priſoner, and was at the ſame time by his appointment gouernor of AMASIA, with a great part of CAPADOCIA adioyning: which places became ſo troubleſome after the great victorie of Tamerlane, that the Turks in that countrey were glad day and night for the ſafegard of themſelues, their wiues, and children, to keepe continuall watch and ward: inſomuch, that many of them, wearied with thoſe troubles, & deſpairing of better times, went into voluntarie exile, becauſe they would not ſee ſo great miſeries: which thing much grieued young Mahomet. Wherefore calling vnto him his moſt faithfull counſellors, to conſult what courſe to take in the middeſt of ſo many dangers, it was by generall conſent thought beſt (for ſo much as they could not without apparent danger continue neere vnto Tamerlane his forces) to get themſelues farther off into places of more ſtrength: and from thence to expect the departure of their enemies, and in the meane time to content themſelues with ſuch aduantages as occaſion and chance of war might miniſter; cutting them ſhort by policie, whom they were not able to meet in the plaine field: and ſo by little and little to weaken or wearie their mightie ſtragling enemies: For albeit that Tamerlane himſelfe was not neere him, as then lying in CARIA; yet did the captaines of his great and victorious armie, at their pleaſure ſpoile and forrage the countries farre and neere all ouer the leſſer ASIA. Vpon this reſolution, he with all his forces departed from AMASIA, to DERBY in PAPHLAGONIA: where by the way he encountered with Cara Iahia, a nigh kinſman to the Prince Iſfendiar of CASTAMONA, his enemie; whom he put to flight, with great ſlaughter of his men. This was the beginning of Mahomet his good fortune. From thence he went to KEREDEN, and there ſtaying certaine dayes, ſent a ſpie into Tamerlane his campe, to ſee how all things went there: and afterwards entered againe into counſell with his captaines concerning his farther proceedings. In which conſultation, ſome were of opinion, That it was beſt for him to withdraw himſelfe into the mountaines of the leſſer ASIA, as a place of good ſafetie, vntil the departure of Tamerlane, which was ſhortly hoped for: for that it was not to be thought that Tamerlane would with his huge armie purſue him in that mountaine countrey, flying from hill to hill, and as it were from ſtrength to ſtrength. Others better aduiſed, thought thoſe mountaines to be no places to truſt vnto, and therefore that it were more honourable and as free from danger, for him to returne againe to AMASIA, and there to liue amongſt his ſubiects, protecting them in ſuch ſort as he might, & not to leaue them for a prey to euery ſtragling companie of the rude Tartarians: which counſel he followed, as moſt reaſonable: & being ready to ſet forward, the ſpie before by him ſent into Tamerlanes campe, returned, certifying him, that he had ſeen his father Baiazet in good health in the Tartars camp, but could not by any means ſpeake with him by reaſon of the ſtraight guard ſet ouer him: and that all that part of ASIA was by Tamerlane K L M

Mahomet ſendeth ſpies into Tamerlane his campe.

poſſeſſed,

A poſſeſſed, who then with his armie wintred in CARIA and LYSIA: whereupon Mahomet returned backe againe to AMASIA; where he had not long ſtaied, but that newes was brought vnto him, That one of the Tartarian Princes called Cara Duletſchach (that is to ſay, the fortunate blacke King) was with an armie of twentie thouſand comming to ſpoile his countrey, being giuen him by Tamerlane. With which newes he was exceedingly troubled. Wherefore with all ſpeed calling together his forces, for the ſafegard of his countrey, he ſent before a ſpie to diſcouer the enemies doings. This diligent ſpie returning in all haſte, told Mahomet, That Cara Dulet lay at the towne of ÆGIOLVS in GALATIA, in great ſecuritie, hauing about him but a ſmall power; for that he, fearing no danger, had at that time diſperſed his armie, to ſeeke after B pillage abroad in the countrey. Mahomet taking hold of this opportunitie, marched thither with great celeritie, and ſuddenly ſetting vpon Cara Dulet, ouercame him. In which conflict Cara Dulet himſelfe was ſhot thorow the head with an arrow and ſlaine, and his armie vtterly diſcomfited. Mahomet returning backe to AMASIA with victorie, refreſhed and rewarded his ſouldiers, yet no leſſe carefull for the ſafetie of his kingdome than before. Cara Dulet ſlaine.

Shortly after, he was aduertiſed that Cubad Ogli with a great armie laid hard ſiege to the citie of CÆSARIA in CAPADOCIA, and was like in ſhort time to take it, if it were not ſpeedily releeued. By taking of which citie, that Tartar Prince was like to make a great entrance, to the hazarding of the whole countrey. Wherefore Mahomet hauing his armie alwayes in readineſſe, marched day and night with ſuch ſpeed to CÆSARIA, as that he was vpon Cubad Ogli before
C he was aware of his comming, and there ſlew moſt of his ſouldiers, and put him with the reſt to flight. After that, he entred into Cubad Ogli his countrey in PONTVS, and grieuouſly ſpoiled and deſtroied the ſame: at which time, he alſo by force wan the ſtrong caſtle PELTÆ in the confines of PHRYGIA.

Immediatly after that, Inall Ogli another of Tamerlanes captaines (which at their pleaſure without let, forraged all the countries of the leſſer ASIA, during the time that Tamerlane made his abode within the Turks dominions) vpon the ſudden entred into CAPADOCIA with an armie of twentie thouſand fighting men, killing the inhabitants, and ſpoiling the countrey before him: ſo that the people for feare left their dwellings, and fled into the woods and mountaines to hide themſelues from his furie. Whereof Mahomet hearing, was therewith exceedingly D grieued, and wrote vnto him as followeth:

Sultan Mahomet vnto the Prince Inall Ogli.

Whereas without any iuſt or lawfull cauſe, or any warre proclaimed, you haue inuaded our kingdome, and ceaſe not cruelly to kill our ſubiects, by God committed to our protection; and to ſpoile their wealth and labours, to the great diſturbance of the Mahometan common weale; and make no end of your malice and crueltie: you doe therein quite digreſſe from the manners and lawes of the true Mahometans or right beleeuers. For if thou wouldeſt not only be accounted, but indeed be a true Muſul-man, thou ſhouldeſt forthwith depart out of my kingdome with thine armie; thou ſhouldeſt not thus ſhed the innocent bloud, E or without cauſe thus wrong my people: but foraſmuch as thou knoweſt not what beſeemeth thee, neither wilt liſten vnto good counſell, but wilfully proceed in thy wicked purpoſe, falſely perſwading thy ſelfe, this my kingdome to be deſtitute of a lawfull inheritour; and therefore doeſt ſo great wrong and iniurie vnto the defenders of the true Mahometan religion: I would thou ſhouldeſt know, that I with my ſo often victorious armie, will ſhortly by the power of God come againſt thee, and in plaine field according to thy deſerts chaſtiſe thee. Therefore whileſt thou yet maiſt, reclaime thy ſelfe, and proceed not too far in thine obſtinacie: too late repentance did neuer man yet good. Thus much wee thought good to aduertiſe thee, that thou ſhouldeſt not be ignorant of our purpoſe, but mighteſt ſo better conſider and diſpoſe both of thy ſelfe and thine affaires. In the yeere after the departure of the great Prophet Mahomet 806. Mahomet his letters to Inall Ogli the Tartar Prince.

F Vnto which letters Inall Ogli returned this anſwere in writing:

Prince Inall Ogli to Mahomet.

Why doeſt thou Mahomet with ſuch letters prouoke me? why doeſt thou ſo vnciuilly taunt me? being thy ſelfe but a boy, and in truth a very childe. It beſeemeth thee not to haue entred into theſe countries, or Inall Ogli his anſwere to Mahomet.

to lay hands thereon, wrongfully gracing thy ſelfe with the title of a Sultan. Neither is there any cauſe, G why thou ſhouldeſt complain that I ſhould lie in wait or ſeeke after thy life, thy kingdome, or any thing that thine is. I challenge vnto my ſelfe this kingdome, but none of thine: out of which it is reaſon for thee, as a wrongfull intruder of thy ſelfe, to depart; whom otherwiſe I will forthwith thruſt out, and ioyne the ſame vnto the reſt of my territories. Wherfore except thou without delay get thee packing, and ceaſe to oppoſe thy ſelfe againſt my deſignes; I denounce vnto thee all the calamities of war, and wiſh thee with ſpeed to prepare thy ſelfe to battell, for that I meane ſhortly to meet with thee. This yeere of our great Prophet, 806.

Mall Ogli ouerthrowne by Mahomet.

Shortly after, Mahomet according to his promiſe meeting with this Tartar Prince, by plaine force ouerthrew him, and had of him a notable victorie. H

The like good hap he had alſo not long after, againſt Coſter Ogli, and Kinpeck Ogli, two other Tartarian captaines, at the caſtle of CHARA-CHIZAR and the plain of ARTVCK-OVA. And hearing that one Meſites, a Turke, had fortified himſelfe in the ruines of SEBASTIA, and from thence ſpoiled the countrey round about, he ſent Baiazet one of his Baſſaes againſt him; who in ſhort time tooke him and brought him bound vnto him: by whom he was adiudged to die. But ſeeing in the man an inuincible courage, and contempt of death, at ſuch time as he ſhould haue beene executed; moued therewith, he gaue him his pardon: for which he euer after continued vnto him faithfull, and did him great ſeruice.

Mahomet hauing many times thus vanquiſhed the ſtragling Tartarian Princes, which had ſought the ſpoile of his countrey, became thereby famous amongſt the great commanders of I Tamerlane his armie: in ſo much that the bruit of his name came at length to Tamerlanes eare, yet lying in the leſſer ASIA: who as he thought it not worth his greatneſſe and labour, himſelfe in perſon to goe againſt ſo great an enemie; ſo he thought it not good or conuenient quite to neglect him, but by ſome other meanes (if he could) to ouertake him. For which purpoſe he began to ſpeake many times very honourably of him, highly commending his great valour and forwardneſſe in ſo tender yeeres. And calling for Baiazet, told him what great commendation he had heard of his ſonne Mahomet, and that he was therefore very deſirous to ſee him: where if he found that true which was reported of his great vertues, he would beſtow one of his daughters vpon him in mariage, with many other great preferments: and therefore willed Baiazet to write vnto him, Not to doubt to come vnto him, to the great good both of himſelfe, and his fa- K ther. Which thing Baiazet at the firſt doubting the worſt, requeſted Tamerlane not to beleeue that of his ſon, being yet very young, & not worthie of ſo great a fauour. Neuertheleſſe partly perſwaded by Tamerlane his proteſtations, and importuned by him that might now command him; he with an euill will wrote to his ſonne Mahomet to ſuch effect as Tamerlane required. With which letters, and others of like purport from himſelfe, with many rich preſents, Tamerlane ſent Hozza Mahomet (one of his ſecret counſellors) embaſſadour to Mahomet, of whom he was right honourably receiued, and likewiſe entertained. But hauing read the aforeſaid letters, and thereby vnderſtood the cauſe of his comming; he entred into counſell with the great Baſſaes about him, whether he were beſt to goe to Tamerlane or not. Where his counſellours were all cleere of one opinion, That it was not good for him to aduenture his perſon to the dan- L ger of ſuch a iourney, or the mercie of ſo mightie an enemie, of whoſe faith he had no aſſurance. And if ſo be (ſaid they) he therewith offended, will by force ſeeke to haue you, we at his comming will take the refuge of the woods and mountaines, and there ſhroud our ſelues vntill he be departed againe: for that he with his huge armie cannot here long ſtay in this bare countrey, for want of neceſſaries. Neuertheleſſe Mahomet hoping his iourney might be both for the good of his father, and his owne aduancement; contrary to the minde of all his counſellours, reſolued to goe: and ſo hauing prepared all things needfull for the honour and ſafetie of his iourney, ſet forward. But as he was vpon the way in the marches of PONTVS, Cara Iahia whom he had before ouerthrowne, vnderſtanding of his comming that way, thinking now to be reuenged; and hauing got vnto him ſome of the Prince Iſfendiars forces, ſet vpon him by the way: but M with as euill ſucceſſe as before, moſt of his men being there by Mahomet ſlaine, and himſelfe glad ſhamefully to flie. So trauelling on further, he vnderſtood that Alis Beg, a great Lord in thoſe countries, went about to intercept him alſo: which cauſed him in ſuch haſte to goe on, that he was vpon Alis, before he was aware of his comming, or well prouided for him: ſo that for feare he was glad to betake himſelfe to flight. Mahomet conſidering the danger he had eſcaped in that iourney,

A iourney, and that the neerer he came to Tamerlane, the more like he was to fall into greater, although happily without Tamerlane his knowledge: by the aduice of his graue and faithfull counsellours, resolued to goe no further. Wherefore calling vnto him Tamerlanes embassador, he thus spake vnto him:

You see the dangers and iniuries I endure in this my iourney, and my minde forbodeth greater to ensue: for which causes I may not goe any further, but here returne. Commend me therefore I pray you vnto the most mightie Tamerlane, with my father: and tell them what dangers haue happened vnto me vpon the way. Which considered, I hope they will haue me excused. For which purpose I will also send in your companie an embassadour of mine owne.

B Mahomet at that time had with him a graue, wise, and learned man, called Sophis Baiazet, sometime his schoolemaster: whom he sent embassadour to Tamerlane and his father, to haue him vnto them both excused: and so departed, he homewards, leauing the way he came (for feare of further danger) and they towards Tamerlane, who honourably receiued Mahomets embassadours and letters. But taking pleasure in the man sent vnto him, gaue him honourable entertainment, but would neuer after suffer him to returne againe vnto his master. Mahomet his speech to Tamerlanes embassadour.

It was not long after, but that old Baiazet died of impatiencie (as is aforesaid:) whose dead bodie Tamerlane left at APROPOLIS with the Prince Germean, to be deliuered vnto his sonne Mahomet; with Musa his elder brother (who all this while had beene kept prisoner with Tamerlane) if Mahomet should require them. And so the mightie Prince Tamerlane, after he had long

C time wasted PHRYGIA, CARIA, LYDIA, with the most part of the lesser ASIA; and conquered all SYRIA, IVDEA, ÆGYPT, and PERSIA, with many other great countries and prouinces; returned at last into his owne kingdome, vnto the great citie of SAMARCAND, which he wonderfully enlarged, and beautified with the spoiles of a great part of the world, before by him wasted: where he afterwards in great peace and glorie raigned, no lesse honoured than feared of all the Princes of the East. To the terrour of whom, and for the assuring of his estate, he kept alwayes a standing armie of fortie thousand horse, and threescore thousand foot readie at all assaies: beside other his great garrisons which he kept in SYRIA, ÆGYPT, CHINA, and CAMBALV; as also against the Muscouit, and Turks; being commonly in euery place threescore thousand strong, though not still in field, but as occasion required. Vntill that at length The great power Tamerlane continually kept.

D hearing of the rising againe of the Turkish kingdome, vnder the Othoman Princes, the sonnes of Baiazet, with whom the oppressed Mamalukes of ÆGYPT, and the Greeke Emperour (as doubtfull of his estate) had now also for feare of him combined themselues: he by the perswasion of Axalla (then Generall of his imperiall armie) made great preparation for a second expedition to be made for the vtter rooting out of the Othoman familie, and the conquest of the Greeke empire. But hauing now all things in readinesse, and also giuen a good beginning vnto these his intended conquests, (one of the Turks great Bassaes being by Axalla his lieutenant in a great battell ouerthrowne, and thirtie thousand of the Turks slaine) he in the middest of these his great hopes, as also of his greatest power, died of an ague the 27 day of Ianuarie, in the yeere of our Lord 1402. A little before whose death, appeared a great and terrible blasing starre, por- The death of Tamerlane.

In his eyes sate such a rare maiestie, as a man could hardly endure to behold them without closing of his owne: and many in talking with him, and often beholding of him, became dumbe; which caused him oftentimes with a comely modestie to abstaine from looking too earnestly vpon such as spake vnto him, or discoursed with him. All the rest of his visage was amiable and well proportioned: he had but little haire on his chinne; and ware the haire of his head long and curled, contrary to the manner of the Tartars, who shaue their heads, hauing the same alwaies couered: whereas he contrariwise was for the most part bare headed, commanding his sonne also to be so by his tutors brought vp: his haire was of a darke colour, somewhat drawing to- The description of Tamerlane.

In Engliſh thus:

Of Tamerlane a Xerxes new, which did the Eaſt ſubdew,
And in all places where he came, the nations ouerthrew;
That fild the fields with Scythian troupes, brought from thoſe climates cold,
This was the feature and the ſhape which thou doeſt here behold.
At whoſe approch, the ſtrongeſt townes could ſmall reſiſtance make,
The earth it ſelfe vnder his feet ſeeming for feare to quake.
C The mountaines high, mating the skie, and vncouth vallies low, Vnable were the force to beare, where he did come or goe.
All Asia from mount Cavcasvs, vnto the bankes of Nile,
With valiant hand he vanquiſhed and made his force to feele.
Evphrates, Tigris, and the ſwift Orontes gaue him way,
With force, waſte, and deſtruction great, on what he liſt to prey.
And as in tempeſts great oft times, when all things goe to wracke,
The fierie lightning flaſhing forth, out of the clouds ſo blacke, Doth breake downe what it lights vpon, and with a dreadfull fall Ouerthrowes the temples, with their towers, and ſtately buildings all,
D So that the earth diſmaid therewith, doth lower downe deſcend,
And fearfull wights wrapt vp in woe, are brought to their wits end:
In like ſort he with fire and ſword ſeeking all to confound,
The ſtrongeſt caſtles, towers, and townes, laid equall with the ground.
And like an whirlewinde taking vp great Baiazet away, Coupt vp in cage, ſo carried him, for his diſport and play.
But whileſt he rageth thus about, and plotteth in his head
Such hard commands and heauie doomes, as all the world ſhould dread:
A little feauer in three fits, oppreſſed him with woe,
And cloaſing vp his vitall ſpirits, did lay his head full low.
E So that for all the world of wealth and kingdomes he poſſeſt,
The ſmall remainder of himſelfe in ſimple graue doth reſt.

His great empire by himſelfe diuided betwixt his ſons, was by their diſcord, and the ambition of ſome of their diſloyall ſubiects, in ſhort time after brought to great confuſion, and his poſteritie vtterly rooted out by Vſun-Caſſanes, the Armenian Prince, as in the proceſſe of this hiſtorie may appeare. But to returne again vnto our purpoſe, Mahomet deliuered of his greateſt feare, by the departure of Tamerlane out of thoſe countries, determined to goe to Prvsa in Bythinia, where his brother Iſa as then raigned: But vnderſtanding that Iſa had before taken the ſtraits whereby he ſhould paſſe the mount Horminivs, he tooke another way about, & came F to Palæo-Castron, where the valiant captaine Eine-beg Sub-baſſa then remained: who with all honour and gladneſſe receiued him, and there for certaine dayes refreſhed both him and his armie. Afterwards greater forces ſtill repairing vnto him, he marched thence to Vlabad, called in ancient time Lopadivm. Of whoſe comming Iſa before vnderſtanding, and hauing aſſembled his armie, marched thither alſo, & encamped on the other ſide of the towne towards Prvsa, readie to giue him battell. But Mahomet ſeeing his brother ſo forward, conſulted with his captaines, captaines what were beſt to be done: where Eine Sub-baſſa a man of great experience, and of late one of Baiazet his great counſellours and captaines, told him, That it was not for their honours being brethren, to pollute their hands one in the others bloud; but to aſſaie if the quarrell might by ſome other good meanes be compoſed, and they made friends. For which purpoſe Mahomet preſently ſent letters vnto his brother Iſa, concerning the partition of their fathers kingdome in ASIA betwixt them: offering vnto him the prouinces of AIDINIA, SARVCHANIA, GERMEANIA, CHARASIA, CHARAMANIA, with other countries to them belonging: ſo that he might haue PRVSA with all the other prouinces about the ſame. Which letters, when Iſa had read, and ſaw that Mahomet offered him but titles for kingdomes, and ſuch countries as were rather ſometimes tributaries vnto their father Baiazet, than any part of his kingdome, and now of late by Tamerlane againe reſtored vnto their ancient libertie and gouernours; ſharing out the beſt and ſtrongeſt part thereof vnto himſelfe, he brake forth into choler and ſaid:

The anſwere of Iſa to Mahomet his offers.

What? doth not my fathers kingdome of right belong vnto me being the elder brother? Mahomet is yet but a youth, and ſcarce crept out of the ſhell: by what right then can he claime my fathers kingdome as his inheritance? If he can by the ſword win it, let him take it, and ſo hold it.

Mahomet hauing receiued this anſwere, prepared himſelfe to the field, where his brother as readie as himſelfe, ſtood expecting his comming: and hauing ſet his armie in order of battell, gaue the firſt charge: which was the beginning of a moſt cruell and bloudie fight, wherein as it commonly falleth out in doubtfull battels, many were on both ſides ſlaine. At laſt the fortune of Mahomet preuailing, Iſa his armie began to retire: which he ſeeing, left nothing vndone for the encouraging of his fainting ſouldiers, which belonged to a politicke Generall, or valiant ſouldier to doe; but preſſing into the thickeſt of his enemies, there with his owne hand ſlew the ancient and valiant captaine Eine Sub-baſſa, who had many times beene Generall of the footmen in old Baiazet his wars But what preuaileth courage againſt euill fortune? Iſa muſt either flie or die. And therefore hauing done what he could in ſo deſperate a caſe, being himſelfe on euery ſide forſaken, in the end was glad himſelfe to flie to the ſea ſide: where finding a ſhip readie bound for CONSTANTINOPLE, he paſſed ouer thither in ſafetie, and there yeelded himſelfe vnto the protection of the Greeke Emperour Emanuel. In this chaſe Mahomet his ſouldiers tooke the valiant captaine Temurtaſet priſoner, another of Baiazet his great commanders, and brought him to Mahomet: who in reuenge of the death of Eine, commanded his head preſently to be ſmitten off, and his bodie to be hanged vpon a tree by the high way ſide. Of this victorie, Mahomet certified his brother Solyman at HADRIANOPLE, and in token thereof ſent him Temurtaſes his head. This battell was much ſpoken of, both for that it was fought betwixt two brethren; and alſo for the death of the two famous and old captaines Eine and Temurtaſes, who both together as louing friends, had fortunarly fought many great battels vnder Baiazet his enſignes; and now as it were by deſtinie, and againſt their wils, without any priuat grudge, were both drawne into contrary factions and ſlaine: both whilſt they liued wiſhing a good peace betwixt the ambitious brethren. But as the Turks vſe to ſay, What is by God written in a mans forehead before his birth, cannot in his life be auoided.

After this victorie, Mahomet thinking himſelfe now in ſure poſſeſſion of all his fathers dominions in ASIA, led his armie to PRVSA, where he was of the citizens ioyfully receiued as their Sultan: and for his great bountie, of all men highly commended and honoured. From thence he went to NICE, and ſo to NEAPOLIS, and there in both places was likewiſe receiued. Thither reſorted vnto him all the garriſons of CARASINA, SARVCHANIA, and AIDINIA, with other the inhabitants of thoſe countries, with all loyaltie ſubmitting themſelues vnto him, with ſuch honour and reuerence as belonged to their King.

All things thus ſorting according to his deſire in ASIA, he ſent to the Prince Germean for the bodie of his father Baiazet, and for his brother Muſa, which were there left by Tamerlane, as is before declared. This dead bodie was by the ſame Prince at the requeſt of Mahomet, with great ſolemnitie ſent to PRVSA, and there ſumptuouſly buried, with all the Turkiſh obſequies and ceremonies: the Turkiſh Alcoran or booke of their law, being read ſeuen daies vpon his tombe. All which time great cheere was kept for all commers, and much giuen to the poore (vpon the Turkiſh deuotion) for Baiazet his ſoule: but aboue all others, exceeding bountie was extended to the poſteritie of their Prophet Mahomet; which are knowne from others amongſt the Mahometans, by the colour of their apparell, which is all greene, and not lawfull to be worne of any but

A but of them: ſo that they were by the bountie of Mahomet at that time greatly enriched. He alſo endowed the Abbey which his father had there lately built, with great lands and poſſeſſions for the maintenance thereof. All which things done, and the ſolemnitie paſt, he went in progreſſe to all parts of his kingdome, and was in euery place ioyfully receiued, and ſo afterward returned to AMASIA: and there in great pleaſure ſpent that Summer. Where we will for a while leaue him to ſee what Solyman his eldeſt brother in the meane time doth at HADRIANOPLE: whoſe liuely countenance is by the skilfull workmans hand thus expreſſed.

Non malus es niſi te eneruet male ſuada voluptas, Quæque minus bello conuenit ingluuies.
Hoſpitio Mirxi fruitur iam Muſa Valachi:
Ille tuum vigilat pronus in exitium.

IAC. BOISARDVS.

Euill art thou not, except leaud luſt doe haſten on thy fall:
Or riot, which beſeemeth not a martiall man at all.
Thy brother Muſa entertaind by Marke to thine annoy, Doth take no reſt, but waiteth ſtill how he may thee deſtroy.

Solyman

Solyman the eldeſt ſonne of Baiazet (who kept his court at HADRIANOPLE, there peaceably raigning all this while ouer the countries which his father Baiazet ſometime poſſeſſed in EVROPE) hearing what his brother Mahomet had done, and how violently againſt all right he had driuen Iſa out of PRVSA, and made him glad to flie to CONSTANTINOPLE: was with this his outragious dealing much offended, and thereupon calling vnto him his Baſſaes and faithfull counſellers, declared vnto them the vnnaturall proceedings of Mahomet againſt his brother Iſa. Wherein (ſaid he) he doth me alſo great wrong in taking vpon him the ſouer aigntie ouer thoſe great dominions and countries in ASIA, which of right belong to me his eldeſt brother, and not to him the youngeſt of ſix. In reuenge of which iniurie and wrong, I intend in mine owne right, to paſſe ouer into ASIA with a ſtrong armie, and by force of armes to recouer mine inheritance there, if I may not otherwiſe come by it. Vnto which ſpeech one of his graue counſellors replied: That in his opinion it was not the beſt courſe for himſelfe to goe in perſon into thoſe wars. For although (ſaid he) your brother Mahomet be but young, and therefore by your greatneſſe leſſe accounted of, yet is his fortune great, and his experience aboue his yeeres. None haue yet had to doe with him, but they haue had enough of him: yea, it is worth the noting, how politickly he hath borne himſelfe for his owne ſafetie, and the ſafegard of the countries which he gouerned all the while that the great and mightie Tamerlane with his innumerable forces couered the face of the countries faſt by him: moſt part whereof, Mahomet hath now ſince his departure, againe recouered. Wherefore it were beſt for you to ſend for your angrie brother Iſa, to CONSTANTINOPLE, and to make him Generall of the armie you intend to ſend into ASIA againſt Mahomet. In which wars, it is not vnlike, but that one of your brethren will be loſt, whereby you ſhall haue one competitor of your kingdome the leſſe. So ſhall you afterwards with leſſe trouble ſubdue him that is left, or at leaſtwiſe pleaſe him with ſome part of that which they haue ſo mightily ſtriuen for. This counſell was of Solyman and all the reſt well liked of, and approued. So was Iſa preſently ſent for vnto CONSTANTINOPLE, and a great armie leuied. Who being come to HADRIANOPLE, was by Solyman courteouſly welcommed, and made Generall of his armie: and therewith ſhipped ouer the ſtrait of HELLESPONTVS into ASIA. Where at his firſt comming, he poſſeſſed the whole countrey of CARASIA or LYDIA: and paſſing further, in all places where he came, was receiued of the people with great reuerence, they all promiſing him their obedience, if it were his fortune to preuaile againſt his younger brother Mahomet: wherewith he held himſelfe well contented. So comming to the citie of BEG-BAZER, otherwiſe called DESPOTOPOLIS, he there wintered with his armie. In which time, he with many kinde and louing letters ſtill directed to Mahomet as his younger brother, ſeemed to be glad that he was ſo well obeyed and liked of by his ſubiects: and that preſuming of his loue and fauour, he was as his louing brother, and not as an enemie come into ASIA, to entreat with him of ſuch matters as much concerned the good of them both. Whereunto Mahomet with like diſſimulation anſwered, That he was right glad of his comming, for which he needed not (as he ſaid) to make any excuſe, for that he was entred into a kingdome, in part his owne, and the reſt open before him: in token whereof, he commanded a rich garment to be caſt vpon the meſſenger as a fauour, ſending alſo diuers rich preſents vnto his brother, with great prouiſion of victuals, and other neceſſaries for his ſouldiers.

Good counſell.

Iſa with a great armie ſent by his brother Solyman into Aſia againſt Mahomet.

But Winter paſt, and the Spring come, Iſa marched with his armie to PRVSA, & there ſhewed vnto the citizens the louing letters he had at ſundrie times before receiued from Mahomet: and telling them that he was in good hope that they ſhould in ſhort time right well agree; requeſted to haue the caſtle deliuered vnto him, ſometime their ſoueraigne: whereinto the better ſort of the citizens had retired themſelues, and made faſt the gates againſt him: but when he ſaw that he could by no faire words or policie gaine the poſſeſſion of the caſtle, enraged with that repulſe, he ſet fire vpon that goodly citie, and burnt it downe to the ground. Mahomet not ignorant how his brother Iſa romed vp and downe his kingdome, vſing all kindneſſe to ſuch as yeelded vnto him; and exerciſing no leſſe crueltie vpon ſuch as refuſed his obedience: and how that he had raſed the royall citie of PRVSA: hauing gathered a ſtrong armie, marched in ten dayes from AMASIA to PRVSA, and by the way meeting with his brother Iſa, in a great battell ouerthrew him with all his forces. Iſa himſelfe, accompanied with no more but ten perſons, fled vnto CASTAMONA, Prince Iſfendiar his citie: who hearing of his arriuall there, entertained him with all the honour he could, in recompence of the great friendſhip he had before found at his hands, at what time he was an humble ſuter in his father Baiazet his court.

Pruſa burnt by Iſa.

Mahomet

A Mahomet comming to PRVSA, greeued exceedingly to ſee that faire citie ſo deſtroied : yet to comfort the poore citizens, he gaue exceeding ſummes of money to be beſtowed amongſt them, and tooke order for the new building of the citie, and there continued certaine daies himſelfe to ſee the worke begun.

Iſa in the meane time, hauing incited the Prince Iſfendiar in his quarrell to inuade his brother Mahomet, and going thither himſelfe in perſon, was by him now the third time ouerthrowne and put to flight. Neuertheleſſe he with ſome ſmall forces, twice afterwards entred into Mahomets dominion, but finding few or none willing to follow his euill fortune, was glad at laſt to flie to the Prince of SMYRNA, by whom he was both honourably entertained and comforted.

B This Prince of SMYRNA moued with Iſa his pitifull complaints, in ſo manifeſt a wrong, did not only promiſe him what helpe he could of himſelfe, but alſo by his embaſſadours ſolicited the Princes of AIDINIA, SARVCHANIA, and MENTESIA, to giue him aid in ſo iuſt a quarrell, for the releeſe of Iſa againſt his vſurping brother. Theſe Princes pitying the caſe of the diſtreſſed Prince, and moued with the requeſt of the Prince of SMYRNA, and fearing alſo the ambitious ſpirit of Mahomet; amongſt them ſent ſuch aid, that being all aſſembled together, Iſa had now twentie thouſand men in armes. Mahomet vnderſtanding of this great preparation made againſt him, and hauing raiſed a ſtrong armie, thought it not beſt to expect his brothers comming into his countrey (where perhaps many might ioyne themſelues vnto him, being ſo ſtrong in field) but entred the Prince of SMYRNA his countrey, with ſuch ſpeed, that he was
C vpon him and the reſt of his enemies before he was looked for; where after a great and bloudie fight, he obtained of them a notable victorie. Iſa hauing loſt the battell, and therewith his hope alſo, fled into CARAMANIA, and there in ſuch obſcuritie ended his daies, that no man can tell where nor how he died. This was the end of this noble Prince, alwaies of greater courage than fortune. The Prince of SMYRNA the chiefe author of this warre, humbling himſelfe to Mahomet, obtained his fauour. The other confederate Princes which gaue aid to Iſa, were ſhortly after by Mahomet for moſt part ſpoiled of their dominions. Which done, he returned with victorie to the building of PRVSA, hoping now to liue at more quiet.

Iſa flieth into Caramania, and there dieth in obſcuritie.

But whilſt Mahomet after this victorie, dreading no danger, was in the middeſt of his pleaſures at PRVSA, he was certainly aduertiſed, That his eldeſt brother Solyman had raiſed a great armie D in EVROPE, to inuade him in ASIA. Vpon which aduertiſement, he furniſhed the caſtle of PRVSA with a ſtrong garriſon, and all things needfull for the enduring of a long ſiege, and placed Iacup-Beg (the ſonne of Firoſes) captaine therein ; and afterwards departed himſelfe, becauſe that citie lately before burnt by Iſa, was not as yet to be defended, much leſſe to be accounted of as a place to retire vnto, if need ſhould ſo require. From PRVSA he came to ANCYRA, and from thence directed commiſſions for the taking vp of ſouldiers in all parts of his kingdome. At which time he writ letters alſo to Doioran a Tartar Prince (whom he had many times greatly pleaſured) for aid : who preſently came vnto him with certaine troupes of braue horſe, promiſing him his faithfull ſeruice.

Not long after, hearing that his brother Solyman was with a puiſſant armie now come ouer
E HELLESPONTVS, he conſulted with his beſt leaders, what courſe firſt to take ; being himſelfe of opinion, without delay to meet his brother in the field, deeming it great ſhame not to offer him preſent battell. But he was by his more expert captaines aduiſed, to conſider that he was to fight againſt his eldeſt brother, of whoſe good or bad fortune he had as yet no experience : and that many ſecretly fauoured his quarrell, and claime, as the eldeſt ſonne and right heire of his father Baiazet: and that therefore it were better for him to retire farther off into the ſtrength of his kingdome, and ſo temporizing, to await all good opportunities which might chance, as it doth in nothing more than in martiall affaires ; rather than to commit all to the hazard of one battell, wherein if fortune failed him, all were then vtterly loſt. Vpon which reſolution he retired from ANCYRA towards AMASIA. At which time Doioran the falſe Tartarian, F marching out at the other ſide of the citie, fell to robbing and ſpoiling of Mahomets ſubiects as an enemie, burning the country villages as they went · which thing when Mahomet vnderſtood, he with his horſemen purſued him ; and ouertaking him before he was looked for, ſlue moſt part of his men, and recouered all the ſpoile which he had before taken; all which Mahomet gaue to his ſouldiers: Doioran himſelfe hardly eſcaping by flight. And ſo Mahomet hauing reuenged himſelfe vpon his diſſembling friend, held on his way towards AMASIA.

The caſtle of Pruſa beſieged by Solyman.

Solyman being come into ASIA, led his armie towards PRVSA: where the citizens vnderſtanding of his comming, went out of the citie to meet him, and hauing done vnto him ſuch honour and reuerence as belonged to their Sultan, brought him peaceably into the citie. But Iacup-Beg ſtood vpon his guard, and would by no means deliuer vnto him the caſtle which was before by Mahomet committed to his charge: for which cauſe Solyman laid hard ſiege vnto it, and gaue thereunto diuers ſharpe aſſaults, whereby the defendants were greatly weakned, many of them being ſlaine, and the reſt for the moſt part wounded. Whereupon Iacup by letters ſent by one Eine Hozze, certified Mahomet how things ſtood, and that the caſtle could not long be holden againſt the furious aſſaults of Solyman, except it were with ſpeed releeued: vpon which newes, he in all haſte made towards PRVSA, returning the ſame meſſenger before him with letters to the captaine of the caſtle, if happily he could finde meanes to deliuer the ſame: wherein he highly commended him for his faithfull ſeruice, and promiſed him ſpeedie releeſe. This meſſenger with his letters, chanced by Solyman his ſouldiers to be intercepted, and brought to Alis Baſſa, Solyman his chiefe counſellor (a man of a ſharpe conceit) who of nothing could make ſomething, but hauing any thing to worke vpon, could doe wonders: He hauing ſtraightly examined the meſſenger, and peruſed the letters, ſuppreſſed the ſame, and preſently writ others in the name of Mahomet, commending the captaine for that he had alreadie done in his ſeruice; but yet for as much as he could not poſſibly in time releeue him, he willed him therefore to deliuer vp the caſtle, and to prouide for the ſafetie of himſelfe and his garriſon, by ſuch conditions as he could beſt obtaine. Theſe counterfeit letters Alis Baſſa found meanes to be as cunningly deliuered vnto the captaine, as they were craftily indited: who hauing read the ſame, and now out of all hope of releeſe, expecting alſo euery houre to be aſſaulted by the furious enemie; vpon reaſonable conditions yeelded the caſtle to Solyman. The newes whereof being brought vnto Mahomet, now come within one dayes march of PRVSA, exceedingly grieued him: but ſeeing no remedie, he returned backe againe to AMASIA; whither Solyman (now poſſeſſed of the citie and caſtle of PRVSA, and hauing thereby got a great name in ASIA) ſhortly after came with his armie, and hardly beſieged his brother in AMASIA: but ſeeing no hope to win the citie, he retired backe againe to PRVSA, and there after his wonted manner ſpent his time in riot and exceſſe, whereunto he was exceedingly giuen. Iacup Beg for yeelding of the caſtle, was afterward by Mahomet ſtraightly impriſoned, and in danger to haue beene put to death, had not the great Baſſaes become earneſt interceſſours for him.

Mahomet lying at AMASIA, was by his ſecret eſpials aduertiſed, That his brother Solyman hauing diſperſed his armie, lay in great ſecuritie at PRVSA, guarded but with a ſmall power, paſſing his time in all voluptuous pleaſure, his common exerciſe. Whereupon he in all haſte marched with his armie thitherwards, to haue ſurpiſed him, before he ſhould be able to call together his diſperſed forces. But when he was come to the riuer SANGARIVS, he was diſcouered by Solyman Subbaſſa, a great captaine, whom Sultan Solyman had ſent, for the taking vp of men in that ſide of the countrey. Who returning in all haſte, gaue Solyman knowledge of his brothers comming: with which ſudden newes he was ſo diſmaied, being now of ſmall ſtrength, that for the auoiding of the imminent danger, he would preſently haue fled into EVROPE, had not Alis Baſſa otherwiſe perſwaded him: telling him, That if he ſhould ſo cowardly flie away, it would not onely blemiſh and defame his honour, but diſcourage his friends alſo in ASIA, and encourage his enemies to purſue him perhaps vnto the gates of HADRIANOPLE: and that therefore it were better, with ſuch forces as he had, to take the ſtraits about NEAPOLIS, and ſo to ſtay his brothers further paſſage into that countrey, vntill ſuch time as he might aſſemble the reſt of his armie. According to which good counſell, he firſt tooke the beforenamed ſtraits and paſſages, whereby Mahomet was of neceſſitie to paſſe, and there ſtrongly fortified himſelfe. Mahomet comming thither, with great force entered thoſe ſtraits, but was ſtill valiantly by Solyman repulſed. The like attempt he many times valiantly gaue, for that he knew himſelfe to be at that time too ſtrong for his brother: but Solyman hauing the aduantage of the place, with little danger or loſſe fruſtrated thoſe his brothers braue attempts, although he were then a great deale the weaker. Alis Baſſa, whoſe wilie head, fraught with long experience, could (with nothing) effect great matters, in the meane time was not idle, but (making Solyman before acquainted with his doings) ſent a ſecret meſſenger (one of his owne truſtie ſeruauts) to Mahomet with letters, certifying him, That moſt of his nobilitie and great captaines had ſecretly

A conſpired to betray him into the hands of his elder brother Solyman, as the vndoubted heire of his father Baiazet; and ſo with the price of his head, to make their owne peace and attonement with him: and that for the performance thereof, they had bound themſelues firſt vnto Solyman, and afterwards one to another, by ſolemne oath. Which treaſon he diſcouered vnto him, with great proteſtation of his loue and good will, as he that had of long time eaten bread and ſalt (as the Turkes vſe to ſay) in his fathers court; and therefore could not but wiſh well vnto him, being one of his lord and maſters ſonnes. Theſe letters ſomething troubled Mahomet, breeding in his head many a iealous conceit: for all that, he ceaſed not for ſix or ſeauen dayes ſpace, to giue many a hot skirmiſh for the gaining of thoſe ſtraight paſſages, but all in vaine. In which
B time, it chanced one of his ſeruants neere about his perſon, to flie vnto the enemie; which cauſed him the more to ſuſpect all that to be true, whereof Alis Baſſa had forewarned him. Which conſidered, and that by lying there he preuailed nothing, but loſt and wearied his men (for it was all that while exceeding foule weather) and withall doubting to be betraid, returned as he came, to AMASIA. And Solyman glad alſo of his departure, retired to PRVSA, giuing order into all parts of his kingdome, for the aſſembling of a great armie: but vnderſtanding that the King of CARAMANIA had made a league with his brother Mahomet, & that they were agreed to ioyne their forces againſt him for the driuing of him out of ASIA, he forthwith drew all his forces to ANCYRA, as a place of more ſafetie.

Whileſt Solyman thus lay at ANCYRA, it fortuned that Muſa (which had all this while re-C mained with his brother Mahomet, ſince he was ſet at libertie by Tamerlane) though not altogether well pleaſed with his owne eſtate, one day by way of talke, thus ſpake vnto his brother: You ſee (ſaid he) how our elder brother Solyman ceaſeth not to vex and moleſt vs daily, and is not vnlike in the end to preuaile againſt vs, to our vtter deſtruction: Now if it might pleaſe you to giue me leaue, I would goe to Iſtendiar Prince of CASTAMONA and PONTVS, our brothers enemie, and of him procure ſhipping to paſſe ouer the Euxine ſea into EVROPE: where I doubt not to finde opportunitie to make ſome great innouation in that kingdome, now in my brothers abſence: by reaſon whereof, Solyman ſhall of neceſſitie be driuen to leaue ASIA, to be againe by you ſolely poſſeſſed: or elſe be brought in danger, there to loſe his kingdome in EVROPE. Which if it ſhall be my good hap to gaine out of his hands by your ſupportation, I promiſe you faithfully to hold the ſame of you, as of my Lord and Soue-
D raigne. This greatly pleaſed Mahomet, and thereupon not long after they concluded betwixt themſelues, one to ſtand faſt vnto another, and the one to helpe the other in what they could, during life; confirming the ſame with great ſolemnitie of their Turkiſh faith giuen, and taken. Whereupon Mahomet furniſhed his brother Muſa with great ſummes of mony and other needfull things, for the taking in hand of ſo great an enterpriſe.

Muſa thus furniſhed, taking his leaue of his brother, ſet forwards towards the Prince Iſfendiar: who hearing of his comming, met him on the way, and entertained him as a great Prince. But after that Muſa had made him acquainted with his purpoſe for paſſing into EVROPE, and had obtained grant of his helpe therein, he tooke his leaue of him for a time, and went to viſit the King of CARAMANIA; who alſo moſt honourably entertained him, and the rather in de-E ſpight of Solyman. But whileſt Muſa was thus paſſing the time in CARAMANIA, it fortuned that Marke (of ſome called Mirxes) Prince of VALACHIA, hauing his countrey much ſpoiled by Solyman his garriſons; and hearing that Muſa one of Baiazet his ſonnes, was with the Prince Iſfendiar; he writ vnto him, promiſing to beſtow his daughter and heire in mariage vpon Muſa, if he would come ouer into EVROPE, and reuenge the wrong done vnto him by Solyman: whereof Muſa aduertiſed by the Prince Iſfendiar, gladly returned out of CARAMANIA, and was by him tranſported ouer the Euxine or blacke ſea, into EVROPE: where the Prince of VALACHIA glad of his comming, receiued him with great honour, and according to his promiſe gaue him his daughter in mariage.

Muſa marieth the Prince of Valachia his daughter.

The fame of Muſa his comming into EVROPE, and of his mariage, was in ſhort time bru-
F ted thorow all Solyman his kingdome in EVROPE, and wrought ſuch effect in the minds of the mutable vulgar people (alwayes deſirous of noueltie) that they all as it were with one conſent, ſubmitted themſelues vnto him, as vnto their Lord and Soueraigne. In ſo much that comming to the royall citie of HADRIANOPLE, in the abſence of his brother Solyman, he was there receiued as their King.

Muſa in the abſence of Solyman receiued at Hadrianople as King.

Solyman now lying at ANCYRA in ASIA, vnderſtanding of theſe proceedings of Muſa in EVROPE, and that he was poſſeſſed of a great part of his kingdome there, was therewith exceedingly troubled. Wherefore leauing his deputie in ANCYRA, he with all his armie came to the ſtrait of BOSPHORVS, and there of Emannel the Greeke Emperour obtained paſſage, promiſing for the ſame to reſtore vnto him certaine places before taken from him in ASIA: for Muſa had ſo prouided, that he could haue no helpe of the Turkiſh ſhipping, which was by his commandement all before brought ouer vnto EVROPE ſide. Muſa hearing of Solyman his arriuall in EVROPE, made towards him with a great power: but after that both their armies were come the one within view of the other, and now readie to ioyne battell, many of Muſa his captaines forſooke him, and fled to Solyman the elder brother and their vndoubted King: which Muſa beholding, was glad to flie, and to take the ſafegard of the woods and mountaines for his refuge. After which victorie, Solyman returning to HADRIANOPLE, tooke againe poſſeſſion of his kingdome, and there without meaſure gaue himſelfe to riot and exceſſe, according to his wonted manner. G H

After the departure of Solyman out of ASIA, Iacup-Beg (but lately before againe receiued into Mahomet his fauour, and now left as Solyman his deputie) deliuered ANCYRA with the caſtle of PRVSA, and all the reſt that Solyman had gained in ASIA, to Mahomet; who ſhortly after led his armie thorow the countries of CARASIA, AYDINIA, SARVCANIA, TEKENSIS, and GERMEANIA, reducing them once againe vnto his obeyſance: and afterwards returned to PRVSA, where he now the ſecond time tooke poſſeſſion of his fathers kingdome in ASIA.

Muſa goeth againſt Solyman.

Muſa ſtill aided by the Valachian Prince his father in law, gaue many great attempts againſt his brother Solyman: but was ſtill put to the worſe. At length hauing gathered ſome good ſtrength, and diligently attending the leaſt ſmile of better fortune, drew neere vnto the place where Solyman lay, who at that time was (as his manner was) banqueting with great pleaſure in his campe, and full of wine. In ſo much that when newes was brought vnto him, That his brother Muſa was at hand with a great power, he in his drunkenneſſe cauſed the meſſenger that brought the newes to be beaten: and when he with greater earneſtneſſe than was to his liking, affirmed that his report to be true, he commanded him to be ſlaine for troubling his mirth. But not long after, Muſa was come ſo neere, that the vauntcourrours of his armie did skirmiſh with ſome of Solyman his ſouldiers: when as Chaſis Eurenoſes one of his fathers old captaines, preſſing in, told him that Muſa was at hand, and had skirmiſhed with part of his armie. Whereof Solyman (now farre in wine) had no regard, but ſaid: Good tutor doe not trouble me no more, my brother Muſa dares not come ſo nigh me; if I doe but hold vp my cap, he is gone. With which anſwere the old captaine going out diſcontented, ſent in Chaſan, Aga of the Ianizaries: who boldly comming vnto him, told him plainly of the imminent danger, & ſharply reproued him for his intemperance and ſecuritie. With whoſe free ſpeech, Solyman moued, in great rage commanded his beard to be cut off, then no ſmall diſgrace amongſt the Turks. Chaſan preſently comming forth thus diſgraced, ſaid to them that ſtood waiting without: This is the honour wherewith Sultan Solyman in his exceſſe, rewardeth his moſt faithfull ſeruants. Wherefore be it knowne to you all, I will from henceforth (and not without cauſe) ſerue Muſa, a Prince of greater temperance and diſcretion: who ſo will follow me, come and welcome. So mounting to horſe, and accompanied with a number of his Ianizaries, of whom he was greatly beloued, went ouer to Muſa: as did many other great captaines alſo with their companies, moued by his example ſo to doe. But when Solyman vnderſtood that Chaſan with moſt part of the Ianizaries, and many other worthie captaines, with the greateſt ſtrength of his armie, were reuolted to Muſa, then faſt by, and readie to ſet vpon him; it then repented him too late of his diſſolute follie: and finding no other remedie now to eſcape, hid himſelfe vntill it was darke night; then taking horſe, accompanied only with Caratze Beg and Cara Muchill, two of his noblemen, and one countrey Turke (whom they had retained for their guide) thought to haue fled to CONSTANTINOPLE. This malicious clowne, hauing of purpoſe led them by vnknowne wayes all that night to and fro, as it were in a maze, oftentimes miſnaming vnto them the places they paſſed by, as if they had been in the right way, brought them in the morning to a village not farre from the place from whence they departed the euening before: and there riding a little before them, of purpoſe, gaue warning to a ſturdie peaſant or two of his acquaintance, that Solyman was comming after: willing them to make ſtay of him. Theſe rude countrey churles, with ſome others of like breed, running out with bats and ſtaues, and ſuch other homely tooles as firſt came to hand, ſlew Caratze and Cara Muchill, which I K L M would

A would not yeeld vnto them, but ſtood vpon their guard, and tooke Solyman aliue: where, as it commonly falleth out in the vulgar peoples furie, ſome cried out to kill him, and ſo to end the warres; ſome likewiſe to burne him; and ſome to hang him; and ſome few to ſaue him: euery one as his rude affection lead him. In the heat of this countrey vprore came Muſa, who glad to ſee his brother Solyman ſo hardly beſet, cauſed him preſently to be there ſtrangled, when he had raigned in HADRIANOPLE ſix yeeres and ten moneths.

Solyman ſtrangled by his brother Muſa.

This was the miſerable end of Solyman, the eldeſt ſonne that Baiazet left aliue. A man much giuen to exceſſe, otherwiſe endued with many great vertues, being both of great valour and exceeding bountifull. In his time liued the learned Doctor Achmetes, which wrote the hiſtorie of B Alexander the Great, in Turkiſh verſe, and publiſhed it in the name of Solyman himſelfe: for which he was by him bounteouſly rewarded. The dead bodie of Solyman himſelfe, was by the commandement of Muſa conuaied to PRVSA, and there lieth buried faſt by the bodie of his grandfather Amurath. So now of theſe Cadmeian brethren, remained none but Mahomet and Muſa, the one raigning in ASIA, and the other in EVROPE, diuers parts of the world, and well bounded with the ſureſt bounds of nature: yet not ſufficient to content or containe their ambitious minds, vntill that the younger had moſt vnnaturally deuoured the elder: whoſe liuely counterfait, as it is by the skilfull workman expreſſed, you may here behold.

This Solyman is that ſame whō ſome call Celebinus, & other-ſome Calepinus, and reckon him for the fifth King of the Turks.

Quid properas inſane tuum peſſundare fratrem?
Nam ſceleris tanti, præmia digna feres.
Quicquid enim fratri malefeceris, hoc tibi frater Mox referet, nimis hæc in tua fata ruis. RICH. KNOLLEVS.

What haſteſt thou mad foole, thy brother to confound?
The guerdon of ſuch villanie, ſhall to thy ſelfe redound.
For looke what miſchiefe thou haſt wrought, ſhall turne to thee againe:
Why doſt thou therefore fooliſh man ſo haſten on thy paine?

Musa presently after the death of his brother Solyman, tooke vpon him the Turkish kingdome in EVROPE: who in the beginning of his raigne displaced most of them which had born great offices before in the time of his brother Solyman, and had now of late reuolted to him; fearing to be by them betraied or forsaken, as his brother was: and in their roomes placed other his owne creatures. And not so content, proceeded farther, vpon smal causes most vnkindly to imprison and put to death many of them that had of him well deserued. Which cruell dealing so alienated the minds of his nobility, that many of them kept themselues out of the way, doubtfully expecting the euent of such his tyrannicall gouernement: Chasis Eurenoses, that old & renowned captain, to escape his hands, was glad to feigne himself blind, so to absent himself from court. At this time hee also by his Embassadours demaunded of diuers Christian princes his neighbours, such tribute as they had in times past either paied or promised to pay vnto his father Baiazet: and in that quarell inuaded many of them, namely, the princes of SERVIA and BVLGARIA. Amongst other he sent Ibrahim Bassa, a learned man of great experience, and sometimes one of his fathers graue counsellours, vnto Emanuell Palcologus, the Emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE, to demand the like tribute of him. Who so soone as he was come to CONSTANTINOPLE, from thence by letters aduertised Mahomet of the vndiscreet gouernment of his brother Musa in his new gotten kingdome; and what vntimely stirres he began to make, before he was therein well setled, losing the loue both of his subiects and neighbour princes: with much other matter concerning his misgouernment. Which things when Mahomet vnderstood, he sent a messenger with letters back againe to CONSTANTINOPLE, requesting the Bassa to come ouer vnto him into ASIA, and in token of his great fauour sent him diuers rich garments, with many great and princely promises: wherewith the Bassa mooued, and detesting the cruell gouernment of Musa, went ouer vnto him to PRVSA, and there was of him honourably entertained, and sworne one of his priuie councell: in which place of honor he long time afterwards serued him faithfully, and after him his sonne Amurath also.

Mahomet thinking, vpon the aduantage of his brothers euill gouernment, to find meanes to thrust him out of his kingdome, and so to draw the whole gouernment of the Turkish empire vnto himselfe, as well in EVROPE as in ASIA; assembled an armie of fifteen thousand choice souldiors to inuade his brother in EVROPE, before hee were there well established in his kingdome. And so shocking downe towards the straits of BOSPHORVS, by his embassador concluded a league with Emanuell the Greeke Emperour, That one of them should neuer wrong or damnifie the other: and that if Mahomet should hap to obtaine the Turkish kingdome in EVROPE, he should alwaies honour and reuerence the Emperour as his speciall good friend: but if it should chance him to be distressed or ouerthrowne by his brother Musa, that then the Emperor should presently transport him & his armie back againe into ASIA. This league was with great solemnitie of words on both parts confirmed. And shortly after Mahomet with all his armie was by the Emperors shipping at the strait of BOSPHORVS neere vnto CONSTANTINOPLE, transported ouer into EVROPE: for Musa possessed of GALLIPOLIS, had stopped all the other passages.

Musa hauing before knowledge of his brothers comming, was foorthwith in readinesse to meete him with a strong armie. So that Mahomet had not marched farre from the sea side, but that the vauntcourriers of his armie met with his brothers, at a place called INTZVOE, and there began a light skirmish: wherein Musa his forerunners were by Mahomets put to flight, and chased vnto Musa his campe. Whereof such a sudden feare arose in the armie, that they were almost ready to flie, thinking Mahomet had beene vpon them with all his power: but vnderstanding the truth of the matter, both armies rested that night, which as then drew fast on. The next day these two brethren, armed with equal hope, brought their armies into the field, & gaue the signall of the battaile, whereupon began a mortall and bloodie fight: in the furie wherof Michaell Ogli, Bassa of ROMANIA, and certaine other of Musa his great captaines, vpon secret discontentment reuolted to Mahomet: wherewith many of Musa his souldiors discouraged, fled. Which Mahomet his souldiors seeing, pursued the chase with such earnestnesse and furie, that few were left with himselfe: yet with such as were left, in hope of good hap, he set vpon his brother: who although hee was hardly discomfited with the flight of the greater part of his armie, whom the enemies had yet in chace, yet stood he fast himself with seuen thousand Ianizaries, his best souldiors; so taking the vnexpected good hap, presented vnto him by his brothers forwardnesse,

The battaile betwixt the two brethren, Mahomet & Musa.

A neſſe, valiantly receiued his charge. But Mahomet finding there a greater ſtrength than he had before ſuppoſed, and himſelfe too weake to withſtand the furie of the Ianizaries, becauſe moſt of his men alſo were following the chace, was now for ſafegard of his life glad to flie himſelfe to CONSTANTINOPLE: whither he came accompanied ſcarcely with two hundred men: and was from thence, according to the agreement before made betwixt him and the Emperor, ſpeedily ſhipped ouer into ASIA. Muſa hauing thus put his brother to flight, with great ſlaughter of his men, preſently tooke his tents with all that was therein, and there encamped himſelfe. They of Mahomets armie, which followed the chace of ſuch as had fled in the beginning of the battell, not knowing what had happened to Mahomet, returning to the campe,
B doubting no perill, and finding it at their returne poſſeſſed by their enemies, ſtood as men amaſed and vtterly diſcouraged: at which time Muſa would not ſuffer his ſouldiers to put them to the ſword, as they would faine haue done, but commanded them to be deſpoiled of their armes and ſuch other things as they had, and ſo with life ſuffered them to depart.

After this ouerthrow, whileſt Mahomet lay ſtill at PRVSA, the Prince of SMYRNA forcibly entred into AIDINIA, purpoſing to paſſe thorow into SARVCANIA: which thing Mahomet hearing, gathered a great armie, and entering into the Princes countrey, made ſuch ſpoile as he went, and ſo diſtreſſed the Prince himſelfe, that he was glad to ſubmit himſelfe vnto him, and from thenceforth to hold his dominion of him, as of his Lord and Soueraigne, and ſo returned vnto AMASIA.

C Mahomet could not well diſgeſt the loſſe he had ſo lately receiued in EVROPE, and therefore leuied an armie of choice ſouldiers out of all parts of his kingdome, once againe to trie his fortune againſt his elder brother Muſa. For the better ſucceſſe wherein, he by his letters craued aid of the Prince Dulgader Ogli, written to this effect:

Sultan Mahomet vnto the Prince Dulgader Ogli, his father in law.

Mahomet his letters vnto the Prince Dulgader Ogli, his father in law.

D My purpoſe is to lead mine armie into ROMANIA in EVROPE, and there againe to trie my quarrell with my brother Muſa. My hope is, that you will not with your aid be wanting vnto me your ſonne in law, in my ſo great affaires, neither for want of good will to hinder this my purpoſe. Fare you well. In the yeare of our great Prophet Mahomet 814. From AMASIA.

Whereunto the Prince returned this kind anſwere:

Prince Dulgader Ogli vnto the great Sultan Mahomet.

The anſwere of Prince Dulgader Ogli to Mahomet.

E I doubt not moſt mightie Monarch, but that whitherſoeuer your deſires ſhall draw you for the vndertaking of any great exploit, he that ruleth aboue in heauen, will be alwaies your aid, proſper your attempts, miniſter vnto you fit occaſions, and bring all your actions vnto moſt happie end, with moſt aſſured victorie. Wherefore ſeeing (God ſo diſpoſing our affaires) I cannot my ſelfe in perſon come vnto you with my power, and giue you my truſtie helpe in this your intended warre: yet will I in no caſe faile with all ſpeed to ſend my ſonne your ſeruant, to aid you with our forces, in this warre. Fare you well. This ſame yeare of our Prophet 814.

And ſo ſhortly after, the Prince ſent vnto him his ſon, according to his promiſe, with a companie of braue ſouldiers, excellently furniſhed: for the welcomming of whom, Mahomet his brother in law made a great and royall feaſt: and there in his mirth gaue vnto the young Prince the rich apparell he wore himſelfe, with the horſe he rode vpon, and all the rich plate of gold and ſiluer wherein they were ſerued at that feaſt, a matter of great value. And to euery one of his
F noblemen he gaue a rich garment, made for that purpoſe, with ſome other gift, as a fauour: and afterwards gaue them all to vnderſtand, That he intended forthwith to paſſe ouer into EVROPE, and there to recouer all his fathers kingdome, or elſe there to end his daies: As for the ſpoile and prey (ſaid he) it ſhall be theirs that can win it: one horſe, one ſword, one horſemans mace ſhall content my ſelfe. So hauing furniſhed his armie with al things needful for ſo great an enterpriſe, he ſet forward, and came to the ſtrait of BOSPHORVS; and from thence gaue knowledge of his

his comming to the Emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE: who glad thereof (for the displeasure he bare to Musa) transported him and all his armie ouer that strait into EVROPE, and there in one of his countrey palaces royally feasted him. At which time Mahomet requested the Emperour to ioyne with him in that warre against their common enemie: but he excused himselfe by reason of his great age; yet neuertheless, assisted him with certaine companies of valiant Christians, whose seruice afterward stood the Turke in great stead. G

So Mahomet taking his leaue of the Emperour, marched with his armie to the riuer WYZEN in THRACIA, where by the way he receiued letters from the ancient captaine Chasis Eurenoses, aduising him to be very circumspect in his marching, and not to make too much haste to ioyne battell with his brother: counselling him also (if he could by any meanes) to allure Iegides Bassa, Barac Beg, and Sinan Beg, to forsake his brother, and to follow his ensignes; for that in those men consisted Musa his greatest strength: and promised in good time to come vnto him himselfe also, if he were not too hastie. This messenger that brought this newes, Mahomet bountifully rewarded, and so sent him away. Shortly after, as he was marching towards HADRIANOPLE, part of the enemies armie began to shew it selfe vnder the leading of Cara Calile, and was presently charged by Michael Ogli, and put to flight. So holding on his way to HADRIANOPLE, he laid siege to the citie: where the citizens sent out vnto him certaine of their grauest and most substantiall burgesses, to certifie him, That by reason of the garrison there left by Musa, they could not as then deliuer the citie vnto him; but if it should please him to goe and trie his fortune in the field against his brother, who should be the commander thereof, he should find them readie to follow his good fortune, and to yeeld themselues, the citie, and all therein, to his pleasure, if it were his good hap to carrie away the victorie. With which answere Mahomet contenting himselfe, raised his siege, and tooke the way towards ZAGORA. In that place Musa is reported to haue come secretly disguised into Mahomet his campe, and to haue taken full view thereof, but perceiuing himselfe too weake to encounter his brother, withdrew his armie into the safegard of the great woods and strong places: and so from thence retired with his armie towards PHILIPPOPOLIS, and so marched along the riuer MERITZE, called in ancient time HEBRVS: where Iegides Bassa, with Hamza Beg, and Ismir Ogli (three of Musa his great captaines) set vpon the rereward of Mahomets armie, and were by Michael Ogli repulsed. Mahomet holding on his way, came to SOPHIA: where as he went, Musa diuers times from the mountaines made shew of his armie, but durst not come downe into the plaine to giue him battell. Mahomet hauing refreshed his armie at SOPHIA, marched to SARKIVE, where he receiued letters from Iegides Bassa, Barac Beg, and Sinan Beg, all secretly perswaded by old Eurenoses to reuolt vnto him: the tenor whereof in briefe was this. H I K

Hadrianople besieged by Mahomet.

Iegides Bassa, Barac Beg, and Sinan Beg, vnto the great Sultan Mahomet.

We are three young men (most mightie Monarch) and haue with vs three thousand choice souldiers, men of incomparable valour, such as the world hath scarce the like: draw your forces neare vnto vs with as much speed as you can, and you shall finde vs readie to come ouer vnto you. Fare you well. L

Musa his chiefe captaines reuolt to Mahomet.

Whereupon he marched all the next night after, vntill he came to the riuer MORAVA, and there encamped: where the three aforenamed captaines, according to their promise ioyned themselues vnto him with all their souldiers. Thither came also old Eurenoses, of all others the most famous captaine amongst the Turks, and now no longer blind, bringing with him a great companie of most expert souldiers. Marke the Despot of SERVIA (for the displeasure he bare vnto Musa) sent him aid thither also. By which supplies, Mahomets armie was greatly increased: who after he had courteously welcomed all these new come captains, he began againe to march farther vntill he came to COSSOVA, the vnfortunate plaine; where Hamza Beg the Prince of SMYRNA his sonne, hauing forsaken Musa, came vnto him with fiue hundred horse, certifying him that all the nobilitie had forsaken his father: so, as he marched from place to place, his forces still increased by the reuolt of his brothers. Musa seeing his souldiers thus daily fall from him, insomuch that he had almost none now left, but the souldiers of the court (which were indeed his best men of war, and alwaies vnto him faithfull, because he had beene euer vnto them exceeding M

A ding bountifull) thought it beſt to attempt ſomething, before he were left himſelfe alone. Wherefore hauing yet with him ſeuen thouſand of thoſe expert ſouldiers, he drew neerer vnto his brother, ſeeking to haue taken him at ſome aduantage. But Mahomet hauing knowledge of his purpoſe, & contented to be aduiſed by his old expert captaines, had euer a vigilant eye vnto him. Yet at laſt, whether it were vpon good hope, or elſe prickt forward with deſpaire, Muſa vpon the ſudden, valiantly ſet vpon his brothers armie: but his ſouldiers oppreſſed with multitude, rather then ouercome with true valour, after a hard and bloody fight were put to the worſt: which he ſeeing, deſperately brake into the midſt of his enemies, ſeeking there for death amongſt the thickeſt of them. But being knowne by Baiazet Baſſa, Mahomet his lieutenant generall, deſi-
B rous to take him aliue, he was beſet on euery ſide: where ſeeing himſelfe in more danger to be taken than ſlaine, he with great courage brake from amongſt the middeſt of them, and fled. In which flight his horſe falling into a deep muddie ditch (or as ſome others ſay, hoxed by Sarutzes his owne ſeruant, and himſelfe wounded) ouerthrew him, and there before he could againe recouer himſelfe was taken by Baiazet Baſſa (the great leiutenant) Michael Ogli, and Barac Beg, Muſa taken. which had hardly purſued him out of the battaile: and ſo with his handes bound, by them brought through the middeſt of the armie. Which pitifull ſight, greeued not a little the hearts of many; to ſee him but euen now ſo great a King, and one of the ſonnes of great Baiazet, by the ſtrange change of fortune, bound like a captiue ſlaue led forth to execution: yet were moſt part glad thereof, hoping this long ciuill wars would now in him take end. Shortly after came vnto
C him a noble man called Balta Ogli, ſent (as they thought) from Mahomet himſelfe: who after he had in few words bitterly reproued him, for the cruelty by him before ſhewed vnto his brother Solyman in like caſe, cauſed him preſently to be ſtrangled with a bow ſtring. His dead body Muſa ſtrangled. was by & by after, preſented to his brother Mahomet: who ſeeing it, ſhed a few Crocadils teares ouer it. He raigned three yeares and ſeuen moneths, and was afterwards conuayed to PRVSA, and there lieth buried by the body of his brother Solyman, in the ſame chappell with his grandfather Amurath.

Mahomet after the death of Muſa, now free from all competitours, tooke vpon him the ſole gouernment of the Turkiſh kingdome, as well in EVROPE as in ASIA. And here the Turkiſh hiſtories begin the raigne of this Mahomet fifth King of the Turks: accounting the troubleſome
D time from the captiuitie of Baiazet, vnto the death of Muſa, as a time of vacancie or Anarchie, wherein the Turkiſh kingdome was not at any time wholly poſſeſſed by any one of Bazazet his ſons; Iſa poſſeſſing one part, whereof he was by Mahomet diſpoſſeſſed: who afterwards vſurped all that part of the Turkiſh kingdome in ASIA, being the right of his eldeſt brother Solyman: who at that time raigning in EVROPE, was depoſed and ſtrangled by his brother Muſa: who was in like manner ſerued by his youngeſt brother Mahomet, the only ſonne of Baiazet then left, as is before at large declared. Which diuers mutations, and interrupted ſucceſſions, was the cauſe that the Hiſtoriographers doe ſo greatly diſſent vpon the ſucceſſour of Baiazet: ſome reckoning one, ſome another; and ſome more, ſome fewer; and ſome, ſuch as neuer were. But for-
E aſmuch as Mahomet held all or moſt part of the Turkiſh kingdome in ASIA, during this troubleſome time, and in the end poſſeſſed the other part thereof in EVROPE alſo; I reckon him for the fifth King of the Turks, and ſucceſſour to his father Baiazet: including alſo in this hiſtorie of his life, all that inteſtine and ſerpentine-like tragedie, wherein he himſelfe was the principall actor.

Whileſt Mahomet was (as is aforeſaid) thus buſied in his wars in EVROPE, againſt his brother 1415
Muſa; the King of CARAMANIA taking the aduantage of his troubles there, with a great armie inuaded his kingdome ioyning vpon him in ASIA, burning and ſpoiling all before him as he Pruſa burnt by the Caramanian King. went: Einaſes Baſſa, Mahomet his lieutenant, then lying at PRVSA, not able to withſtand him; and fearing his comming thither, becauſe it was the ſeat of the Othoman Kings in ASIA, cauſed the citizens to bring the greateſt part of their wealth into the caſtle: whereinto he alſo receiued ſo many of the citizens as he conueniently could, willing the reſt to ſhift for themſelues as they
F might, in ſuch caſe of extremitie. Shortly after, the King of CARAMANIA (according to his expectation) came to PRVSA, and without reſiſtance tooke the citie, not as yet fully fortified; which he without delay cauſed the ſecond time to be burnt downe to the ground: and afterwards laid ſiege to the caſtle, giuing many great aſſaults thereto by the ſpace of thirtie daies, but was alwaies valiantly repulſed by Einaſes the Baſſa, who ceaſed not continually to encourage his ſouldiers, ſtill putting them in comfort, that Mahomet hauing now ouercome his enemies in

EVROPE, would in few daies vndoubtedly come to their reliefe. It chanced at the ſame time, G that the dead bodie of Muſa, ſent to PRVSA to be buried, was honourably conuayed vpon the way, with much people following it. The Caramanian King hearing of the comming of ſuch a multitude, and fearing it to haue been Mahomet with his power, raiſed his ſiege and with ſpeed departed: whereat the Turkes long time after ieſted, ſaying, If the Caramanian King run away for feare of the dead bodie of the Othoman King; what would he doe if he had come againſt him aliue? but the truth was, he feared Mahomet and his power.

Orchanes the ſonne of Solyman (yet a boy) hauing liued at CONSTANTINOPLE euer ſince the death of his father, about this time departed thence, becauſe of the league but lately made between the Emperour and his vncle Mahomet, purpoſing to haue gone into VALACHIA: but H by the way as hee was trauelling, the Turkiſh voluntarie ſouldiers vnderſtanding that hee was the ſonne of their late King Solyman, reſorted vnto him in great numbers, offering in his quarrel to ſpend their liues. Of which inſurrection Mahomet hearing, marched thither in all haſte, with a great power to ſuppreſſe the ſame: of whoſe cõming the ſouldiers with Orchanes vnderſtanding, diſperced themſelues and fled. As for Orchanes himſelfe, hee was by his vnlawfull tutor Zaganos betraied vnto his vncle Mahomet: who preſently cauſed his eyes to be put out, and ſo ſent him to PRVSA: allowing him great reuenewes to liue vpon, and euer after vſed him with great honour. The ſiſter of this Orchanes he gaue in marriage to one of his noblemen, with a great dowrie. This is that Orchanes, whom ſome Hiſtoriographers reckon vp among the Turkiſh Kings, as one of the ſucceſſors of Baiazet; and that he was betrayed to his vncle Moſes: erring as I ſuppoſe, both in ſucceſſion and the name, miſtaking Moſes for Mahomet. I

Now Mahomet calling to remembrance the iniurie which the Caramanian King had done to him in his abſence, returning to PRVSA, aſſembled a great armie to reuenge himſelfe of that wrong. At which time, he ſent to the Prince Iſfendiar for aid, who ſent him his ſonne Caſſumes. He cõmanded alſo the Prince Germian Ogli, to make prouiſion for the victualing of his campe, as he ſhould paſſe by his countrey: which was accordingly done. And ſo prouided of all things neceſſarie, he with his armie entred into the Caramanian countrey: Where he tooke the cities ASPROPOLIS, DESPOTOPOLIS, HIERAPOLIS, and beſieged ICONIVM: but by reaſon of the imoderate raine which at that time fell, he was glad to make peace with the Caramanian King, called alſo Mahomet. And ſo raiſing his ſiege, departed towards PONTVS, where he had K not long ſtaied, but that newes was brought vnto him, That the Caramanian King renouncing his league, was againe vp in armes. Wherefore returning into CARAMANIA, and ſo to ICONIVM, he there ouerthrew the King in battaile, and tooke both him and his ſon Muſtapha priſoners: who redeemed themſelues by deliuering many of their ſtrong cities and caſtles into his hands: and afterward concluded a peace, they receiuing from him an enſigne (as the Turkiſh manner is) in token they were now become his vaſſals.

1417 Valachia tributarie to the Turke

The Caramanian warre thus happily ended, he went ouer into EVROPE, and paſſing ouer DANVBIVS, foraged the countrie of VALACHIA TRANSALPINA, making there great ſpoile: for redreſſe whereof, the Valachian Prince by his Embaſſadours ſent him ſuch tribute as he demanded, and his ſon alſo to ſerue him in his court. About which time happened a great earth- L quake in PRVSA, and other places of ASIA, whereby many houſes & towres were ouerthrown; after which enſued great troubles in moſt parts of ASIA: howbeit Mahomet going thither, by his preſence kept all his dominions in peace and quietneſſe.

Iſfendiar Prince of CASTAMONA and part of PONTVS, reſeruing vnto himſelfe CASTAMONA, with a little part more of his dominion, gaue the reſt vnto Mahomet, vpon condition that hee ſhould reſtore no part thereof againe vnto his ſonne Caſſumes: who hauing long time ſerued in Mahomet his court and warres, could not be perſwaded to returne againe vnto his father; and therefore was by him thus diſinherited. Which great gift, Mahomet thankefully accepted, and in lieu thereof aſſigned vnto Caſſumes other great and large poſſeſſions within his owne kingdome. M

Mahomet after the death of his brother Muſa, had ſent Scheiches Bedredin (his brothers Cadeleſcher) to NICE in ASIA, as vnto a place of exile, allowing him neuertheleſſe a great penſion whereon to liue. This Bedredin had in his houſe one Burgluzes, Muſtapha his ſteward: theſe two laid their heads together, how to raiſe ſome tumult or rebelliõ to trouble the peaceable gouernment of Mahomet. For which purpoſe, Burgluzes (according to the plot by them laid) took his way

A way into AYDINIA (ſometime called CARIA) and there pretending great zeale of reformed religion, with a wonderfull grauitie began to broach diuers new and ſtrange opinions, farre differing from the Turkiſh ancient ſuperſtition, yet very plauſible and well fitting the humor of the vulgar people. By which means he was in ſhort time reputed for a famous learned deuout man, & had many followers, drawing after him much people, fit to begin ſome great innouation. Bedredin glad of his mans ſucceſſe, fled from NICE into the Prince Iſfendiar his countrey, from whence he tooke ſhipping ouer the Euxine into VALACHIA, and there withdrawing himſelfe into a great forreſt, as if hee had beene ſome deuout and religious man, allured vnto him a great number of outlawes and theeues which there liued. Whom when he had ſufficiently inſtructed
B and framed to his purpoſe, he ſent them in the habit of religious men into the countrey of ZAGORA, and other places in the frontiers of Mahomet his dominions, neere vnto him, as his diſciples: who with great boldneſſe and confidencie, publiſhed Bedredin his doctrine and authority; and how that hee was by God appointed to bee the king of iuſtice, and commander of all the world: whoſe doctrine and manner of gouernment was (as they ſaid) already receiued (as they gaue it out) in ASIA, being ſet forth but by one of his ſchollers, Burgluzes; whoſe fame was now diſperſed throughout all the Turks dominion: and that therefore, if any were deſirous of preferment, they ſhould repaire to Bedredin, who would in ſhort time ſhew himſelfe vnto the world, and promote his followers according to their deſerts. Many of the coũtry people deluded with this phantaſie and practice of theſe ſeditious ſeed-men, reſorted to Bedredin in hope of prefer-
C ment, and with them ſome of good calling alſo. At laſt, out of the forreſt commeth this great Prophet with banner diſplaied, attended vpon with a great multitude of the ſeditious vulgar people, which daily reſorted vnto him more & more. Mahomet for the repreſſing of theſe dangerous tumults, ſent his ſonne Amurath, and Baiazet the great Baſſa, with two thouſand men to apprehend Burgluzes in AYDINIA: but when they came thither, they found him guarded with three thouſand men well appointed, readie to aduenture their liues in defence of their fooliſh Prophet. Neuertheleſſe, Amurath and Baiazet not diſmaied with the multitude of thoſe vplandiſh people, ſet vpon them: where was fought a right bloody battaile, for the number, & many ſlaine on both ſides: yet at laſt the rebels fled; in which flight Burgluzes himſelfe was ſlaine, and Burgluzes ſlain.
hewen all to peeces. After which victory Baiazet from thence hailed to MAGNESIA, and there D executed Torlac Kemal, another ſeditious Turkiſh monke, which with two thouſand, by him ſeduced, did much harme in the country there about. At the ſame time alſo Mahomet ſent another power againſt Bedredin: but moſt of his followers ſeeing in him no ſuch matter, as was by his diſciples and himſelfe promiſed, and as they hoped for, were already fallen from him, ſo that of that great multitude which before followed him, few or none were left with him, whereby hee was eaſily apprehended by them that Mahomet had ſent againſt him: and ſo being brought to Mahomet to SERRAS, was there in the market place before a tauerne doore, faire hanged, without any farther harme. Bedredin hanged.

Mahomet in the ſhort time of his raigne finiſhed the great Mahometane temple at HADRIANOPLE, before begun by his brethren Solyman & Muſa. Where he alſo built a princely pallace, E the ſeat of the Turkiſh Kings in EVROPE, vntill the taking of CONSTANTINOPLE. He alſo built another temple, with a moſt ſumptuous abbey, and a publike ſchoole thereto adioyning, endowing the ſame with great rouenewes, ſuch as had by him and thoſe his brethren of late bin taken from the Chriſtians. He gaue alſo great ſummes of money, yearly to be paid at MEDINA and MECHA, for the releeſe of poore pilgrims trauelling from far to the ſepulchre of their great Prophet Mahomet, at MEDINA, or his temple at MECHA.

Shortly after Mahomet fell ſicke at HADRINOPLE, and perceiuing himſelfe in danger of death, by his laſt will appointed his eldeſt ſonne Amurath to ſucceed him in his kingdome; and Mahomet dieth at Hadrianople ſent Eluan-beg (a man in great fauour with him) in poſt to AMASIA, to will him with all ſpeed to repaire to the court at HADRIANOPLE. But feeling death to approch, and that he could not F poſſibly liue vntill the comming of his ſonne, he ſtraightly charged his Baſſaes with all ſecrecie to conceale his death, vntill his comming, for feare leaſt any trouble ſhould riſe vpon the bruit therof, before his comming thither. And ſo hauing ſet all things in order, he departed out of this world vnto his prophet Mahomet, about the yeere of our Sauiour Chriſt 1422, when hee had raigned ſeuenteen yeares: accounting in his raigne that troubleſome ten yeares next after the captiuitie of Baiazet, in which time the Turkes kingdome was by his ambitious ſonnes rent in ſun-

ſunder (as is aforeſaid) vntill it was at length again by this Mahomet reſtored vnto the former integrity, about 7 years before his death, which the Turks account for the whole time of his raign: & the other troubleſom 10 yeares as a vacancie or Anarchie of their kingdome, as is aforeſaid. G

The death of Mahomet cunningly cõcealed from the Ianizaries, by the three great Baſſaes.

Mahomet being dead, the three great Baſſaes, Eiuaſes, Baiazet, and Ibrahim (to rid themſelues of the feare they had of the Ianizaries, and other ſouldiers of the court) called a Diuano or counſell for the warres, as if the king had been aliue: wherein it was pretended, That Mahomet had determined to make warre vpon the prince of SMYRNA: and that for that ſeruice it was his pleaſure, That the Ianizaries ſhould forthwith paſſe ouer into ASIA, to the caſtle of BAGA. Whereupon preſſe mony was preſently giuen them, & they ſent ouer with letters directed to the viceroy of ANATOLIA, for the aſſembling of an armie for BAGA. In the meane time, the great Baſſaes of H the court ſat daily in counſell, placing and diſplacing, promoting and diſgracing whom they thought good, as if the king had ſo commanded: The kings phyſicians alſo, to countenance the matter, were commanded continually to go too & fro with their potions and receits, after their wonted manner, as if they had had the king ſtill in cure: And letters were ſent in poſt to Eluan Beg, for ſpeedie diſpatch of the buſineſſe for which he was ſent into ASIA. Yet for all this cunning diſsimulation, the pentioners and other ſouldiers of the court, wont to be neere vnto the kings perſon, and ſome of them alwaies of the priuie chamber, began to ſuſpect the matter: and comming to the Baſſaes, ſaid they maruailed that the king in ſo long time did neuer ſhew himſelfe as he had alwaies before done. Whereunto the Baſſaes anſwered, That he had been dangerouſly ſick, and was as yet but a little recouered, and that therefore the phyſicians would not ſuf- I fer him to looke abroad, or take the aire, for feare of caſting him downe againe. Then will wee our ſelues ſaide the pentioners goe and ſee his maieſtie, and with that were ready to force in vpon the Baſſaes. Eiuaſes ſeeing their importunitie, deſired them to hold themſelues contented, and not as then to trouble the king, for that hee had that day, as hee ſaid, taken phyſicke; but to morrow (ſaid he) we will requeſt his maieſty, if he ſo pleaſe to ſhew himſelfe, that you may ſee him: wherewith they for that time held themſelues content. Now amongſt the kings phyſicians there was one Georditon, a Perſian, a man of a quick ſpirit & ſubtill deuiſe, which found meanes to deceiue the pentioners: he deuiſed, that the dead body of the king being apparelled in royall large robes, ſhould be brought betwixt two, as if he had been led into an high open gallerie; and being there ſet, to haue a boy ſo neatly placed behind him vnder his large robes, as that he vn- K perceiued, might moue the kings hand vp to his head, as if he ſhould ſtroke his face or beard, as his manner was. The next day the dead king being accordingly brought forth by the Baſſaes in his rich robes, & wrapped with clothes about his head, as if it had bin for feare of the aire, or of taking cold, & ſo placed in an high open gallerie, as was before deuiſed: ſuddenly the phyſician came running in fuming and raging, as if he had bin halfe mad, ready to teare his clothes for anger; and in great choller caſting his cap againſt the ground, asked the Baſſaes, if they meant to kill the king, by bringing him into the open aire? We (ſaid he) haue with great pains, in long time, a little recouered him, and will you thus fooliſhly caſt him downe again? Pardon vs good doctor (ſaid Eiuaſes) for theſe gentlemen (pointing to the pentioners) were ſo importunat to ſee his ma- L ieſty, that to ſatisfie their deſires, he was content to be led forth of his chamber: wherof we hope ſhall enſue no harme. The pentioners ſeeing the king many times moouing his hand to his face, and as it were ſtroking his beard, held themſelues well contented, ſuppoſing him to haue beene aliue, although but weake, and therfore not willing to ſpeake vnto them. The phyſicians taking him vp amongſt them, carried him into his lodging againe, which was but faſt by, making as if they had carried an extreame ſicke man. Thus was his death cunningly concealed one & forty daies, vntill the comming of Amurath his ſonne.

This Mahomet was both wiſe and valiant, and withall exceeding bountifull, but ambitious aboue meaſure: and may of right be accounted the reſtorer of the Turks kingdome; for he recouered againe all thoſe countries in ASIA which Tamerlane had taken away and giuen vnto other Mahometane Princes, after the ouerthrow of Baiazet. And when as the kingdome of the Turks M was rent in peeces and almoſt brought to naught by ciuile wars, and the ambition of himſelf & his brethren; he at length got poſſeſſion of the whole, & ſo left it to his ſonne Amurath an entire kingdome, in the former greatneſſe, although not ſo much by him augmented. His bodie lieth buried in a faire tomb made of artificiall ſtone, very beautifull to behold, in a chappel at the Eaſt ſide of PRVSA, where we leaue him at his reſt.

Europam luctu & funeſtis cladibus implens, Sæuus Amurathes totus in arma ruit.
Maior at Huniades virtute & fortibus auſis, Cogit eum trepida vertere terga fuga.
Conſilia Eugenij bellum furialia ſuadent, Sacrorum antiſtes Martia ad arma ruit:
(Arma viri tractent, curet ſua templa ſacerdos) Europæ exitium res tulit iſta graue.

Fierce Amurath doth EVROPE fill with bloud and wofull cries:
And wholly giuen to martiall deeds, doth whole in armes ariſe.
But yet Huniades (than he, of greater ſtrength and might) Enforced him right fearfully to turne his backe in flight.
Eugenius his infernall ſpels, ſtirs vp a fatall iarre:
Who hauing charge of ſacred rites, runs headlong into warre.
(Leaue martiall deeds to martiall men, and let the Prieſt goe pray)
Such deuilliſh counſell, worſe receiu'd, wrought EVROPES great decay.

THE LIFE OF AMVRATH, THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, SIXT KING OF THE TVRKS, AND THE GREAT ESTABLISHER OF THEIR KINGDOME.

AFter that the death of Mahomet had beene politiquely concealed one and fortie daies by the three great Baſſaes, Baiazet, Eiuaſes, and Ibrahim; Amurath, or Murat (as the Turks call him) his eldeſt ſonne, at that time comming to PRVSA, was by them placed in his fathers ſeat, and the death of Mahomet at the ſame time publiſhed: whereupon great troubles began on euery ſide to ariſe.

Murat is the ſame that we call Deſpdrim.

The Princes of SMYRNA and MENTESIA roſe vp in armes: and at THESSALONICA an obſcure fellow, crept as it were out of a chimneyes corner, tooke vpon him the name and perſon of Muſtapha, the ſonne of Baiazet, which was ſlaine many yeeres before, in the great battell againſt Tamerlane at mount STELLA, as is before declared in the life of the vnfortunate Sultan Baiazet. This counterfait Muſtapha animated by the Grecian Princes, and going from THESSALONICA to VARDARIVM, ſet ſo good a countenance vpon the matter, with ſuch a grace and maieſtie, that not only the countrey people (apt to beleeue any thing) but men of greater place and calling alſo, as Tzunites Beg, the Prince of SMYRNA his ſonne, with the ſonnes of old Eurenoſes Baſſa, perſwaded that he was the very ſonne of the great Baiazet, repaired vnto him, as vnto their naturall Prince and Soueraigne. From VARDARIVM he went to SERRÆ, and from thence to HADRIANOPLE, (Amurath being as then at PRVSA) where he was receiued as if it had beene that noble Prince Muſtapha, whom he feigned himſelfe to be: ſo that in ſhort time he was honoured as a King in all parts of the Turkiſh kingdome in EVROPE.

Muſtapha the ſuppoſed ſonne of Baiazet raiſeth rebellion againſt Amurath.

Amurath to repreſſe this ſo great and dangerous a rebellion, ſent Baiazet Baſſa, a man of great authoritie in his court, with a ſtrong armie into EVROPE. This great Baſſa paſſing ouer HELLESPONTVS, found all the countrey reuolted vnto their new found King Muſtapha: but marching on towards HADRIANOPLE, with purpoſe to haue giuen him battell, he was firſt forſaken of the Europeian ſouldiers, which he brought out of ASIA, and afterwards of all the reſt alſo: and ſo being left poſt alone, with his brother Hamze Beg, was for ſafegard of his life glad to yeeld himſelfe to Muſtapha; of whom he was gratiouſly entertained, and vpon promiſe of his loyaltie, ſworne one of his priuie counſaile.

Muſtapha thus now poſſeſſed of the Turkiſh kingdome in EVROPE, and entertaining great thoughts, the better to maintaine his credit, leuied a great armie to make war vpon Amurath in ASIA. And as he was vpon his way, at a place which the Turks call SASLIDERE, or the place of willowes, his other counſailors repining at the great honor he gaue to Baiazet Baſſa, aduiſed him to beware that he truſted him not too farre, of whoſe ſmall faith he had ſufficient triall alreadie, and was like enough when occaſion ſhould ſerue, to reuolt from him to Amurath, and to draw after him ſome great part of his armie, to the great perill both of himſelfe and all them his faithfull ſeruants & followers. Vpon which iealous conceit, this great Baſſa Baiazet was there forthwith as a traitour apprehended, and without further triall executed: at which time his brother Hamze was with much adoe ſpared. This done, Muſtapha proceeded on his iourney, and paſſed ouer with his armie at CALLIPOLIS into ASIA. Amurath vnderstanding of the proceedings G of Mustapha in EVROPE, and of his preparation made for his inuasion of ASIA, created three new Bassaes, Omer, Vruge, and Alis, all three the sonnes of Temurtases; these he ioyned with his old Bassaes, Ibrahim and Eiuases. All these fiue he vsed as counsellours for the wars, by whose aduice he sent for Mahomet Beg, surnamed Michael Ogls, who in the time that Musa raigned, was viceroy in EVROPE, and therefore a man well knowne to most principall men in Mustapha his armie, but had beene kept prisoner in the castle of AMASIA, from the time that Musa was deposed and put to death by his brother Mahomet, vntill now that he was after eight yeeres imprisonment, for this speciall purpose inlarged and receiued into fauour.

About the same time that Mustapha set footing in ASIA, Amurath hauing gathered his armie, H set forward from PRVSA to meet him; yet with such distrust in his forces, which were thought to be much inferiour to the Europian souldiers which followed Mustapha, that he was glad vp-on a superstitious opinion or zeale, to prostrate himselfe at the feet of an Emir (one of the false Prophet Mahomets posteritie) to receiue at his hypocriticall hands a graceless blessing for his better speed: by whom he was made to beleeue, that after two repulses, he had with much adoe at the third time, obtained grant of the great Prophet Mahomet, that he should preuaile in that warre: and thereupon had his sword girt vnto him with the Emir his holy hands, with many other vaine and superstitious ceremonies. Yet for all these charmes, he marched on with his armie in feare enough, vntill he came to the riuer of VLIBAD, (otherwise called RINDACVS:) where hauing intelligence of the approch of Mustapha, he for feare caused the bridge ouer the I riuer there to be broken downe, and encamped himselfe on that side the riuer. Not long after came Mustapha, and finding the bridge broken, encamped at the foot thereof on the other side: so that nothing parted the two armies but the breadth of the riuer onely. Whilest they lay thus neere encamped together, that the souldiers might on both sides take the full view one of another, and also talke together: Mahomet-beg, surnamed Michael Ogli, but lately deliuered out of his long imprisonment (as is aforesaid) came to the riuer side, and with a loud voice called by name vpon the great captaines and old souldiers that were in Mustapha his armie; asking by name for many of his old friends and acquaintance: many of them being there present, reioycing to see that honourable man (whom they supposed to haue beene dead in prison many yeeres before) came gladly to the side of the riuer to heare what he could say. K

Then with a loud voice he began to perswade them, that the man whom they followed was not the honourable Mustapha, but some base high minded fellow, set vp by the Grecians, abusing the obscuritie of his birth, as the vaile vnder the couert whereof, he went craftily about to intrude himselfe into the honourable descent of Baiazet; and so masking in the counterfait titles of stollen honour, had misse-led them from their dutie to their naturall King and Soueraigne, to follow him a meere deceiuer. And further assured them, that Mustapha, Baiazet his son, was dead and buried in the bed of fame, two and twentie yeeres before; honourably ending his daies in defence of his countrey, in the great battell of mount STELLA, against Tamerlane: Wherefore they should doe well, to forsake that supposed Mustapha, and againe to yeeld their dutifull obedience vnto their vndoubted Soueraigne Amurath. These words deliuered vnto them by L Mahomet, whom they generally both reuerenced, and trusted; wrought such effect in their minds, that some presently aduentured to swimme ouer the riuer, and ioyned themselues vnto him: and many others that staied still, began now to doubt, lest they had worshipped a wrong Saint. At the same time also, Eiuases Bassa, to terrifie Mustapha, sent vnto him letters as in great secret, aduertising him, That Amurath had the next night purposed with his armie to passe ouer the riuer aboue the broken bridge; at which time the chiefe captaines of his armie being (as he said) corrupted, had promised to deliuer Mustapha into his hands, and with his head to pay the ransome of them all. This he coloured with such faire glosses, that Mustapha partly beleeued the same. So when the dead time of the night was come, Eiuases with certaine troupes of horsemen, passed ouer the riuer, at the very same place he had in his letters named; and that with such a M noise & tumult, as Amurath with his whole armie had beene comming. Mustapha seeing things begin thus to worke, according as Eiuases Bassa had before written: and with this, doubting also to be presently betraied, and carrying about him a guiltie conscience, the mother of feare and Mustapha flieth distrust, tooke horse (slenderly accompanied, but with ten persons of his whole armie) & fled in haste, no man pursuing them, vntill he came to the riuer of BOGA, and there with a great summe
of

A of money obtained passage, by corrupting the captaine that dwelt in the castle vpon the passage of the riuer: and the third day after passing ouer the strait of HELLESPONTVS, landed at CALLIPOLIS. The flight of Mustapha once knowne in his armie, they all yeelded themselues to Einases Bassa: who taking possession of Mustapha his tent, caused the broken bridge to be repaired; whereby Amurath passing with his armie, ioyned himselfe with Einases. The other Bassa (Ibrahim) counselled Amurath to put to sword all those rebels that had followed Mustapha: but by the mediation of Einases, to whom they had yeelded themselues, they were generally pardoned.

Amurath departing from VLIBAD or LOPADIVM, came to BOGA, and there hanged vp B the captaine that had giuen Mustapha passage. From thence he held on his way to LAMPSACVM, intending to pursue Mustapha into EVROPE: but being come to the sea side, he could find no passage, for that Mustapha had caused all the shipping on that side, to be brought ouer into EVROPE. Yet at last Amurath by good fortune chanced vpon a great Genoway ship, which he hired for foure thousand duckats to transport his armie, and so with much adoe, at length landed in EVROPE. Mustapha seeing that Amurath was now come ouer, fled to HADRIANOPLE, where he found such cold welcome, that fearing to be betraied, he was glad to speed himselfe thence, thinking all the world too little to hide himselfe in: and so came to an obscure place in the countrey of the Turks, called KISVL-AGATZ-GENITZE: where, the souldiers sent to pursue him, ouertooke him, and brought him bound to Amurath then being

This Mustapha is of some writers reported to haue beene indeed the sonne of the great Sultan Baiazet, and that he was kept in prison all that long time, and thus at length set vp by the Greeks to trouble the state of the Turkish kingdome: but the Turkish histories report as before, calling him Dusme or counterfait Mustapha. And it is very likely, that if he had beene one of the sonnes of Baiazet, he would haue found some meanes to haue made some great stirre long before that, as all the rest of the vnquiet brood of Baiazet did, which neuer rested vntill they had like the earth borne brethren one destroied the other: besides that, their bloudie natures considered, it is very like that Mahomet his younger brother, who raigned in HADRIANOPLE almost eight
D yeeres, and was in league all that time with the Emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE, would for his more safetie haue got him into his owne power, if he had beene in prison with the Emperour; or else haue dispatched him, if he had beene in prison with himselfe. All which I am the rather perswaded to thinke, for that Orchanes (a child, the sonne of Solyman) could find no safe place of abode at CONSTANTINOPLE in the raigne of Mahomet; but flying, was apprehended and his eyes put out, as is before declared in the life of Mahomet: much lesse is it like that Mustapha, being a warlike Prince, and his elder brother, could haue beene so long preserued and kept in prison from his furie.

It fortuned in these late broiles (as oftentimes it doth with others in like case) diuers of the rebels Asapi, or common souldiers (whom he for his greater countenance had apparelled and E armed like the Ianizaries) to fall into the hands of the true Ianizaries, Amurath his faithfull guard; whose liues indeed they spared, but vsing them with all the despight and indignities possible. Amongst the rest, one of the Ianizaries being an hungred, brought two of these Asapi his prisoners vnto a cookes shop, offering to sell them vnto him for a little victuall: which the cooke refused to giue him, as hauing no vse for such vnnecessarie seruants. Wherewith the proud Ianizarie enraged, swore many a great oath, presently to cut off their heads, and to giue them him for nought, if he would not for a thing of nought redeeme them. And like enough he was to haue so done, had not the cooke, moued with pitie, offered him for them both a sheepes head: which the Ianizarie tooke for them, swearing, that the cooke had giuen for them more than indeed they were worth. Which disgrace, so long since done vnto these Asapi, is yet
F oftentimes by way of reproch in great contempt, by the masterfull and insolent Ianizaries, obiected vnto the whole bodie of the Asapi (the greatest part of the Turks huge armies) of whom for all that the proud Ianizaries make small reckoning, accounting them scarcely for men, and in their rage oftentimes telling them, That two of them are not worth a sodden sheepes head. Two Asapi sold by a Ianizarie for a sheepes head.

Amurath hauing at length with much adoe thus pacified the dangerous rebellion raised by the counterfeit Mustapha, both in EVROPE and ASIA; was yet not a little grieued, to thinke Constantinople in vain besieged by Amurath.

how the ſame had to the great hazard of his eſtate, beene firſt plotted by the Greekes, and afterwards countenanced by the Greeke Emperour, of whom he thought now to be reuenged. And therefore ſending before him Michael Ogli, his lieutenant generall in EVROPE, with his Europeian ſouldiers to inuade the countrey about CONSTANTINOPLE, followed himſelfe after with the Ianizaries and his Aſian forces: and encamping before the citie, filled all that necke of land which lieth before it, from ſea to ſea. And ſo encamped, began right furiouſly to batter the wals, in hope ſo to haue made a breach, and by the ſame to haue entered the citie: but finding the wals of greater ſtrength than he had before ſuppoſed, and the defendants ſtill repairing whatſoeuer the furie of his artillerie had beaten downe or ſhaken, he ceaſed his batterie, and comming on with all his forces, deſperately attempted by aſſault to haue gained the citie: wherein his fortune was not anſwerable to his deſire. For approching the citie, with arrowes, as ſhowers falling vpon the defendants, and ſcaling ladders in the meane time clapt vp to the wals, & the Ianizaries with others of his beſt ſouldiers couragiouſly mounting the ſame; they were by the defendants notably repulſed and beaten downe, loſing ſome their hands, ſome their armes, ſome their heads, but moſt their liues, no ſhot falling in vaine from the wals. Which Amurath beholding, and grieued to ſee (though vnwilling) commanded a retreat to be ſounded, and the aſſault giuen ouer: and ſhortly after ſeeing no hope to preuaile, in great rage raiſed his ſiege and departed. Vnto whom for all that the Greeke Emperour not long after ſent his embaſſadours, to entreat with him for peace; whereof he would by no meanes heare, but proudly threatened to be ere long of all his wrongs reuenged. Which cauſed the Greeke Emperour to deuiſe what he might for the troubling of his eſtate, ſo to keepe him otherwiſe buſied: as he did ſhortly after with the Caramanian King, by countenancing another Muſtapha (ſurnamed Cutzug or the little) Amurath his younger brother, againſt him, to the raiſing of new ſtirres, and Amurath his no ſmall trouble.

Mahomet the late King had fiue ſonnes and ſeuen daughters, whereof Amurath was the eldeſt, and ſucceeded in his fathers kingdome; Muſtapha the ſecond, ſurnamed the little; Achmetes the third, who died before his father: the other two, Ioſephus and Machmutes, both died of the plague, being but children, after the death of their father. Three of their ſiſters were maried to the three ſonnes of the King of CARAMANIA, Ibrahim, Aladin, and Iſa: other two were beſtowed vpon the ſonnes of the Prince Iſfendiar, Ibrahim, and Caſimes: the ſixt was giuen in mariage to Cozza-Beg, viceroy in ANATOLIA; and the ſeuenth to the ſonne of Ibrahim Baſſa, who died at MECHA, whither ſhe went vpon ſuperſtitious deuotion on pilgrimage.

At ſuch time as Amurath was buſied in his warres in EVROPE againſt Muſtapha, the ſuppoſed ſonne of Baiazet: the younger ſonne of Mahomet (called alſo Muſtapha) being but thirteene yeeres old, and Amurath his brother indeed, was ſet vp to raiſe new troubles, by the King of CARAMANIA, and other Princes, as well Mahometans, as the Chriſtian Princes of GRECIA; who thought it good policie, by that meanes to impeach the greatneſſe of Amurath. This young Prince Muſtapha, ſtrengthened with the forces of his friends, entered into his brothers dominions in ASIA, and beſieged NICE, which was at length yeelded vnto him. Amurath aduertiſed of this new rebellion, by great gifts and large promiſes corrupted Ilias Beg, the young Princes tutor, to betray the Prince into his hands. Whereupon Amurath with great celeritie ſet forward with his armie from HADRIANOPLE, and in nine dayes came to NICE, where he entered the citie with ſmall reſiſtance, as was to him before promiſed, where Muſtapha was by his falſe tutor to him preſented: who becauſe he would not ſpill one drop of the ſacred Othoman bloud (as the Turks call it) commanded the executioner preſently to ſtrangle him with a bowſtring; which was done accordingly, and his bodie afterwards buried by his father at PRVSA.

Muſtapha betraied and ſtrangled.

Amurath hauing ſuppreſſed theſe two rebellions, and now out of all feare of any competitor, thought his fiue counſellers too many by three, and therefore remoued the three Baſſaes, Omure, Vrutzi, and Alis (the ſonnes of Temurtaſes) into honourable places; retaining of his counſell, onely the two old Baſſaes, Ibrahim and Eiuaſes. But ſhortly after, Eiuaſes was ſecretly accuſed to Amurath, that he ſought by his fauourites, the ſouldiers of the court, to aſpire vnto the kingdome himſelfe, and to depoſe the King; and that intending ſome ſuch matter, he did vſually weare a priuie coat. This ſuſpicious report troubled the iealous tyrant: wherefore on a time as he rid accompanied with Eiuaſes, he caſt his arme about him, as if it had beene in kindneſſe: but finding him ſecretly armed, would needs know the cauſe thereof: whereunto Eiuaſes anſwered, That it was for feare of ſome enemies he had in the court: but this excuſe could by no

A no meanes ſerue his turne: wherefore he was forthwith apprehended by the commandement of Amurath, and both his eyes burnt out with a hot ſteele glaſſe. Einaſes Baſſa his eies put out.

Whileſt Amurath was thus buſied in ſubduing rebellions at home, Muhamethes the Caramanian King beſieged ATTALIA, a great citie in PAMPHILIA, by the ſpace of ſix moneths, which was valiantly defended by Hamza-beg, Amurath his lieutenant there: at which ſiege the vnfortunate King himſelfe, as he was taking view of the citie, was ſlaine with a great ſhot out of the citie: whereupon Ibrahim, which ſucceeded him in the kingdome, brake vp the ſiege, and returned home to burie his father. At this time alſo, Dracula Prince of VALACHIA, paſſing ouer DANVBIVS, did the Turks much harme about SILISTRA, but was afterwards enforced to ſubmit himſelfe to Amurath, and become his tributarie. The King of Caramania ſlaine.

About this time alſo Tzunites, the Prince of SMYRNA, which had before aided the rebell Muſtapha, did by all meanes he could vex and moleſt Iaxis beg, (Amurath his lieutenant in AIDINIA) and hauing by chance taken his brother priſoner, put him to death. This Prince of SMYRNA was deſcended of the ancient Princes of AIDINIA, and therefore pretended an intereſt in that ſeignorie: which his claime the people of the countrey ſecretly fauoured, ſo farre as they durſt for feare of the Turks. Amurath hearing of the harmes that this Prince of SMYRNA did, commanded Hamze-beg, viceroy of ANATOLIA, with all his power to make warre vpon him. The viceroy without delay aſſembled a great armie, and inuaded the Princes countrey: and the Prince being well prouided for his comming, meeting him vpon the way, gaue him

C battell: wherein Haſan the Princes ſonne, leading a great part of his fathers armie, had put one part of the Turks armie to flight: and purſuing them with too much furie, left his father at the ſame time ſo hardly beſet by the viceroy, that he was glad to flie to his caſtle of HIPSILY faſt by. Haſan returning from the chaſe of the enemie, not knowing what had happened to his father, was by the Turks in his returne ouercome and taken priſoner. After which victorie the viceroy preſently laid ſiege to the caſtle wherein the Prince was. This ſiege continued a great while: at length, the Prince brought to extremitie, was content to yeeld himſelfe vnto the viceroy, vpon condition he ſhould vſe no violence againſt the perſon of himſelfe or his ſonne, but to ſend them priſoners vnto Amurath: which thing the viceroy by ſolemne oath promiſed, whereupon the Prince came out of the caſtle, and yeelded himſelfe priſoner to the viceroy. Iaxis-beg, whoſe

D brother the Prince had before put to death, attended the going of Hamze the viceroy to his tent, where finding Haſan the Princes ſonne ſitting vpon the ground, as the manner of the Turks is, tooke him by the choller with great furie, and drawing him along to the feet of the Prince his father, there moſt cruelly ſtrucke off his head: and in the ſame rage laying his bloudie hands vpon the aged Prince, ſtrucke off his head alſo; to the great diſhonour of the viceroy, who had before giuen his faith for their ſafetie. The heads of the Prince and his ſonne were ſet vpon two launces, within the ſight of the caſtle; which the defendants ſeeing, and now deſpairing of all reſcue, yeelded themſelues, with the caſtle. This infortunate Tzunites was the laſt Prince of SMYRNA, after whoſe death all his territorie was vnited to the Othoman kingdome. After all theſe troubles, Amurath with great triumph maried the daughter of the Prince Iſfendiar.

E Amurath hauing laid vp in the depth of his thoughts the remembrance of that the Grecian Princes had done, in giuing aid to the rebels aforeſaid, thought it now high time to take reuenge of that wrong: and for that purpoſe gathered a great armie, wherewith he ranged at his pleaſure thorow MACEDONIA, vntill he came to THESSALONICA, ſurpriſing by the way diuers cities and caſtles, at that time belonging to the Conſtantinopolitane empire. This famous citie of THESSALONICA, now called SALONICHI, for beautie and wealth ſometime not inferiour to any of the greateſt and moſt renowned cities of GRECIA, is ſituate vpon the borders of MACEDONIA, cloſe vnto a bay of the ARCHIPELAGO or the ſea ÆGEVM: which bay was in ancient time called THERMAICVS-SINVS, and now the bay of SALONICHI. To the Chriſtian congregation there dwelling, S. Paul wrote two Epiſtles, in the latter whereof, he forewarneth them Theſſalonica beſieged.

F of a great defection to come before the latter day. Before this Chriſtian citie, then in the protection of the Venetians, Amurath encamped his great armie of miſbeleeuing Turks; and laid hard ſiege to it, with moſt terrible batterie: at which time he by ſecret meanes corrupted certaine of the wicked citizens, to haue betraied the citie by a ſecret mine, and to haue let him in: which treaſon was by the Venetian gouernours perceiued, and the plotters thereof for ſafegard of their liues glad to leape ouer the wals, and to flie into the Turks campe.

Amurath

Amurath hauing greatly battered the wals of the citie, the more to encourage his souldiers, promised to giue them all the spoile thereof, if they could by force win it. The greedie desire of this rich prey, wherein euery common souldier promised vnto himselfe whatsoeuer his fooliſh fancie or vnbrideled affection could desire, so inflamed the minds of these barbarous souldiers, and especially of the Ianizaries, that giuing a most terrible assault to the citie, they by force entred the same, and wan it. The Venetian souldiers fled to their gallies, lying at anchor in the hauen, and so got to sea: but the infinite miseries which the poore Christian citizens endured in the furie of that barbarous nation, no tongue is able to expresse, or pen describe: death was lesse paine than the ignominious outrages and vnspeakable villanies which many good Christians there suffered, heartily wishing to die, and could not; and yet the furious enemies sword deuoured all the people, without respect of age or sex, except such as for strength of bodie, or comelinesse of person, were reserued for painfull labour or beastly lust; which poore soules were afterwards dispersed into most miserable seruitude and slauerie, thorow all parts of the Turkish kingdome. The infinite riches of that famous citie, became a spoile vnto the barbarous souldiers; the goodly houses were left desolate, void of inhabitants. Thus the beautifull citie of THESSALONICA, sometime one of the most glorious ornaments of GRÆCIA, the late pleasant dwelling place of many rich Christians, was by the tyrant giuen for an habitation to such base Turks, as at their pleasure repaired thither to seat themselues, and so is by them at this day possessed. This calamitie happened to THESSALONICA in the yeere of our Lord 1432.

Thessalonica taken by Amurath.

THESSALONICA being thus taken, Amurath returned to HADRIANOPLE himselfe, and at the same time sent Caratze with the greatest part of his armie into ÆTOLIA. Charles Prince of that countrey, dying a little before the comming of Amurath to THESSALONICA, and hauing no lawfull issue, had diuided the countrey of ACHARNANIA amongst his three base sons, Memnon, Turnus, and Hercules, leauing all the rest of his dominion to his brothers sonne, called also Charles. But shortly after, such discord fell among these brethren, that Amurath sending his Turks to aid one of them against the other, as he was by them requested, in fine brought all that countrey of ÆTOLIA into subiection to himselfe, leauing nothing for the fooliſh brethren to striue for, more than the bare titles of imaginatiue honour. The other Grecian Princes of ATHENS, PHOCIS, BOETIA, and all the rest of GRÆCIA, vnto the strait of CORINTH, terrified by their neighbours harmes, were glad to submit themselues to the barbarian yoke, and to become tributaries vnto the Turkish tyrant; vnder which slauerie they of long time most miserably liued, if intolerable slauerie ioyned with infidelitie may be accounted a life. Thus the Grecians lost their libertie, (which their aunceſtors had many times before, to their immortall praise, worthily defended against the greatest monarchs of the world) and are now so degenerate, by the meanes of the Turkish oppression, that in all GRÆCIA is hardly to be found any small remembrance of the ancient glorie thereof: insomuch that whereas they were wont to account all other nations barbarous in comparison of themselues, they are now become no lesse barbarous than those rude nations whom they before scorned. Which miserie with a thousand more, they may iustly impute to their owne ambition and discord.

At this time, amongst the distressed Princes of MACEDONIA, and GRÆCIA, one Iohn Castriot raigned in EPIRVS: who seeing how mightily the Turke preuailed against the Princes his neighbours, and considering that he was not able by any meanes to withstand so puissant an enemie; to obtaine peace, he was glad to deliuer into Amurath his possession, his foure sonnes, Stanisius, Reposius, Constantine, and George, for hostages: whom Amurath faithfully promised, well and honourably to intreat. But assoone as he had got them within his reach, he falsified his faith, and caused them to be circumcised after the Turkish manner, and to be instructed in the Turkish superstition, to the great griefe of their Christian parents: and afterwards, when he vnderstood of the death of Iohn Castriot their father, he poisoned all the three elder brethren: and by Sebalie (one of his great captaines) seized vpon CROIA, his chiefe citie, and all the rest of his territories, as if they had by good right deuolued vnto him. But George the youngest, whom the Turks named Scander-beg, or lord Alexander, for his excellent feature, and pregnant wit, he alwayes entirely loued, and as some thought, more passionatly than he should haue loued a boy. Him he caused to be diligently instructed in all kind of actiuitie, and feats of warre, wherein he excelled all other his equals in Amurath his court; & rising by many degrees of honour, came at last (being yet but very young) to be a great Sanzack or gouernor of a prouince, and was many times appointed

A appointed by Amurath to be generall of his armies; in which seruice hee so behaued himselfe, that he got the loue of all that knew him, and increased his credit with Amurath: vntill at last he found oportunitie by great policie and courage, to deliuer both himselfe & his natiue countrie, from the horrible slauerie of the Turkish tyranny, as shall be afterwards declared.

Shortly after that Amurath had thus danted the Princes of GRECIA, he turned his forces into SERVIA: but the Prince of SERVIA vnable to withstand so mightie an enemie, to procure his fauour, sent Embassadors, offering to pay him a yearely tribute, and to do further what he should reasonably demand. Amurath beside the yearely tribute, required to haue Marie (this Princes faire daughter) in mariage; and that hee should not suffer the Hungarians to passe through his B countrey to inuade him; and further, not at any time to deny passage vnto the Turkish armie, when he should send forth the same for the inuasion of the kingdome of BOSNA. All which vnreasonable conditions the Prince was glad to agree vnto, and sent his faire daughter by Saratze, who was afterwards maried to Amurath.

About this time, Iosephus and Machmutes, Amurath his brethren, and Orchanes the sonne of Solyman, who had his eyes put out by his vncle Mahomet, with many other men of great account among the Turks, died of the plague at PRVSA. Plague among the Turkes.

Whilest Amurath was thus busied in his wars in EVROPE, the King of CARAMANIA his brother in law, inuaded his dominions in ASIA: for so it was agreed betweene the Christian Princes of EVROPE, and the Mahometan Princes of ASIA, to whom the greatnesse of the Othoman kingdome was now become dreadfull, That whensoeuer he inuaded the Christians in EVROPE, the Mahometan Princes should inuade his countries in ASIA; and that whensoeuer he
C should turne his forces into ASIA, the Christian Princes should spoile his countries in EVROPE. Against this Caramanian King, Amurath transported his armie into ASIA: & as he went, seazed vpon the countries of SARVCANIA, MENTESIA, and other prouinces, which were before but tributaries vnto him, driuing out the poore Princes before him: and so entred into CARAMANIA, and inforced the King so far, that he was glad to agree to such conditions of peace as it pleased him to propound vnto him, and to send his sonne to wait at his court. And at the same time picking a quarrell with Isfendiar prince of CASTAMONA, caused him to become his tributarie, and to send his sonne to his court also. By which meanes the name of Amurath became D terrible to all the Mahometan Princes.

When Amurath had thus quieted all his troubles in ASIA, hee returned to HADRIANOPLE: & vnderstanding that the Hungarians passing ouer DANVBIVS, had in his absence made diuerse incursions into his dominions, he was therewith greatly offended, and in reuenge thereof first sent Alis Bassa the sonne of Eurenosis, with an armie to inuade HVNGARIA; which he performed accordingly by the space of a moneth, and returned from thence with rich bootie. Not long after, he himselfe in person made another road into HVNGARIE, commanding the Prince of SERVIA his father in law, to giue his armie free passage through his countrie, and charging Dracula Prince of VALACHIA to aid him with his forces in that expedition: which his commandement both the Christian Princes (more for fear, than of good will) diligently performed. Hungarie spoiled by Amurath.

E So Amurath hauing inriched his souldiers with the spoile taken in HVNGARIE, returned home and wintred at his court at HADRIANOPLE.

The secret confederation betweene the Hungarians and the Mahometan King of CARAMANIA, was not vnsuspected of Amurath; which he was the rather induced to belieue, for that whēsoeuer he inuaded the one hee was presently set vpon by the other, either in EVROPE or in ASIA: of which plot he doubted not but that George Prince of SERVIA (his father in law) was chiefe author, although in shew hee was therein the least actor. Wherefore Amurath intending to spill the play, sent for the Prince his father in law to come to the court at HADRIANOPLE: but he doubting some Turkish tragedie, pretended great occasions that he could not come; and fearing that which afterwards fel out, fortified and manned all his strong cities and castles by all F meanes he could possibly, especially his chiefe citie SEMENDRE (otherwise called SPENDEROVIA) and left therein his sonne Gregorie (or as some call him, George) as gouernour; for his other sonne Stephan was long before in Amurath his court, with the Queene his sister. The Prince of SERVIA himselfe went into HVNGARIE to procure from thence some aid, hauing there also himselfe certaine territories, which he had in exchange of Sigismundus (late Emperor and King of HVNGARIE) for the citie of BELGRADE. It was not long after, but Amurath forgetting both the

the affinitie and league he had with the Prince his father in law, entered with a great armie into SERVIA, destroying all before him, and hardly besieged SEMENDRE: where, after long siege, the young gouernor (the Princes sonne) doubting to fall into his enemies hands by sudden assault, yeelded himselfe, with the citie: which thing so discouraged the rest of the Seruians, that in short time SOPHIA, NOVOMONT, with al the rest of the cities of SERVIA, were yeelded into the power of Amurath. After which conquest he returned to HADRIANOPLE, and hearing that the Prince of SERVIA with the Hungarians, were making head against him; and that the two young Seruian Princes, Gregorie and Steuen, his wiues brethren, had intelligence with their father, he commanded them both to be cast in prison at DIDYMOTICHVM, and their eyes cruelly to be burnt out with a brasen bason made red hot, a common vnmercifull practise among the Turks.

About this time, Albertus Duke of AVSTRIA hauing before maried Elizabeth the onely daughter of Sigismund the Emperour, and succeeding his father in law both in the empire and kingdome of HVNGARIE (vnto which type of higheſt honour nothing more furthered him than the remembrance of Sigismund) in the second yeere of his raigne, before he was well setled in those new atchieued honours, died of the flix, as he was making great preparation against Amurath the Turkish King: who hauing lately driuen George Prince of SERVIA and RASCIA out of his dominions, had now extended the Turkish kingdome euen vnto the borders of HVNGARIE. This Albertus dying, left his wife great with child. The Hungarians, in whose minds the remembrance of Sigismund was yet fresh, could haue beene contented to haue liued vnder the gouernment of the Queene his daughter, the widow of Albertus (then great with child;) but that the Turkish King was now growne so great, & come so nigh, that it was thought more than needfull by Iohn Huniades, and other of the Hungarian nobilitie, for the defence of that kingdome, not wholly to rest vpon the deuotion of the people toward the Queene, and the expectation of her issue, wherby they should be nothing strengthned: but to make choice of some great Prince, by whose power they might the better defend themselues & the kingdome against their dangerous enemies. Wherupon with consent of the Queene it was resolued vpon, to make choice of Vladislaus, the yong King of POLONIA, then a Prince of great power, but of far greater fame and expectation: and by embassadors to offer vnto him the mariage of the Queene, and with her the kingdome also. This embassage being sent vnto Vladislaus, the matter was to & fro debated in the Polonian court, Whether it were to be accepted of or not? Some began to speake of the inequalitie of the match, considering that the king was but in the prime of his youth, & the queene well stept into yeeres; vrging farther, that nothing was offered in that match but wars; and that the Hungarians therein sought for nothing more, than by the Polonian forces to defend themselues against the Turks. Others of contrary opinion, said, that the vniting of those two mightie kingdomes would be to the great good of them both, & to the great honour of the King, whose very name would therby become terrible vnto the Turks: & that it were greater policie, by the forces of both the kingdomes, to keepe the Turkish King from entring into HVNGARIE, than to leaue that kingdome to him for a prey, & afterward be inforced to fight with the same enemie in the heart of POLONIA: and as for inequalitie of yeeres betwixt the King & the Queene, it was not so great a matter, that in regard thereof so honorable & commodious alliance should be reiected; for as much as Princes doe more regard the vertues of their choice, with the increase of their honour, & wealth of their kingdomes, than the Summer fruit of youth & beautie, which of it selfe in short time doth rot & perish, although it be neuer so carefully kept & preserued: and that for as much as there can be but one King in a kingdome, such choice was to be preferred of Kings as had not therin the greateſt hope of many children. After long deliberation, Vladislaus gaue answer vnto the embassadors, That he would accept of the offers by thē made: whereupon some of them returned to make relation therof vnto the Queene, & some of them staied behind to hasten the King forward. But whileſt these things were a doing, the Queene in the meane time was deliuered of a faire son, whō she caused to be baptized & named Ladislaus. After the birth of this child, the Queen moued with a motherly affection, began to repent her selfe, that she had giuen her consent for the calling in of the Polonian king, to the preiudice of her son. And being animated by some of the Hungarian nobilitie (who presuming of the good grace they were in with the Queen, hoped to grow great themselues, if they might first draw the gouernment of that kingdome to the Queen & her yong son) determined now by all possible means to exclude the Polonian King: but the greater part of the nobilitie better considering what was most expedient for Vladislaus accepteth of the kingdome offered.

A for the present estate, and that they could neither with honour nor safetie flie from that which was before (for the common good) by the embassadours concluded; continued firme in their former resolution, for the bringing in of Vladislaus: so that by this meanes, some taking part with the Queene and her young sonne, and others standing fast for Vladislaus, the kingdome of HVNGARIE was diuided into two factions, and as it were rent in peeces, and so grew to ciuill wars. The Queene with such as fauoured her claime, the more to gaine the minds of the common people, (which are many times no lesse carried away with shewes than matter) caused her sonne Ladislaus (being then but three moneths old) to be solemnly crowned King at ALBA-REGALIS, the vsuall place for the coronation of the Hungarian Kings. But after that the Po-
B lonian King had entred into HVNGARIE with a goodly armie, and ioyned his forces with his friends, most part of them which before followed the Queene and her sonne, reuolted vnto Vladislaus. So that when she had done what she could, she was glad at last to commit the tuition of her sonne, together with the crowne of HVNGARIE, vnto Fredericke the third, then Emperour: neuer ceasing for all that, to the vttermost of her power, to trouble the gouernment of Vladislaus, continually stirring vp great wars against him both at home and abroad, vntill that at the last by her death her quarrell tooke end, together with her life.

In the middest of these ciuill wars, Amurath thought a faire opportunitie presented vnto him, to make an entrance vnto the conquest of HVNGARIE, which kingdome he had in his ambitious mind alreadie deuoured. And therefore gathering a great armie, he marched along the riuer
C DANVBIVS, vntill he came to the strong citie of BELGRADE, called in ancient time TAVRVNVM, and of some ALBA GRÆCA, but now commonly GREICS WEISENBVRG. This citie is enuironed on the East side with the famous riuer DANVBIVS, and on the South with the great riuer of SAVS or SAWE, which there falleth into DANVBIVS; and on the other two sides is defended with strong wals, with deepe and large ditches; and was then accounted the gate or entrance into HVNGARIE. Vnto this citie Amurath at his first comming gaue two terrible assaults, and was in good hope so to haue won the same, but yet was both times valiantly repulsed, with great slaughter of his men. Wherefore finding it to be a matter of more difficultie than was by him at the first supposed, he began to raise mounts against the citie, and high towers of wood to annoy the defendants, and furiously battered the wals. At this time also he caused great num-
D bers of gallies and small pinnaces to be brought into both the riuers of DANVBIVS and SAWE, to assault the citie on those parts where was least feared, and by that meanes also to keepe them of the citie from all succours to be sent that way out of HVNGARIE. Yet for all he could doe or deuise, the citie was still valiantly defended by the Christian souldiers, which vnder the leading and conduct of Ioannes Vranus, a Florentine, gouernour thereof, with often sallies & continuall shot slew great numbers of the Turks. At the time of this siege, Vladislaus, King of POLONIA, & lately elect King of HVNGARIE, was sore troubled by the Queene & her faction in HVNGARIE: which thing the Turkish King knew right well, and thereupon continued his siege, although famine began greatly to increase in his campe, hoping in nothing more, than that the defendants despairing of helpe from the King, would in short time yeeld vp the citie. Vladislaus being so en-
E tangled with ciuill wars, as is aforesaid, that he could not possibly prepare such force as might relieue the besieged citie: yet for as much as the Turkish King had not long before by his embassadour required to ioyne with him in league and amitie, he thought good now to assay if he could raise the siege, by sending vnto him the like embassage. Whereupon he sent Dobrogostius, Ostrorogeus, and Lucas Gorsensis, three of the Polonian nobilitie, embassadours vnto Amurath: declaring vnto him, That for so much as he had first offered by his embassadours, to ioyne with him in league before he came out of POLONIA, the remembrance thereof had taken such deepe impression in his mind, that he would not take vp armes against him, although it were in his owne iust defence, before he had offered him reasonable conditions of peace: wherefore if he would desist from inuading of HVNGARIE, whereof Vladislaus was now by God his permission, E and consent of the people, chosen King, and so raise his siege, that then they should afterwards easily agree vpon the desired peace: in concluding whereof, he should not find Vladislaus inferiour to himselfe in any manner of princely courtesie: but if he had rather to proceed in armes, and to make proofe of his strength, he would then do the best that he could, to make him know, that he was of sufficient power, in so iust a quarrell, to withstand his greatest forces, & to reuenge the wrongs to him done. When Amurath had receiued this embassage, he appointed the embasſadours to withdraw themſelues for a while to SYNDEROVIA (a cittie of SERVIA, not farre off) vntill he might better conſider of their demands: pretending, that he did it for their ſafetie; but as appeared afterward, ſecretly reſoluing with himſelfe, preſently to doe his vttermoſt deuoire for the gaining of the citie, & vpon the ſucceſſe therof to ſhape them anſwer accordingly. Wherefore ſo ſoone as the Embaſſadors were departed to SINDEROVIA, he firſt by his meſſengers aſſaied the minds of the citizens and ſouldiers with magnificall promiſes of large liberties, and infinit rewards and preferments, if they would yeeld vp the citie: and many arrowes with letters made faſt vnto them, full of like promiſes, were at the ſame time ſhot into the citie. But when he ſaw no hope to preuaile by that meanes, he called together the captaines and commanders of his armie, and there in the preſence of them all ſpake vnto them as followeth: G H

The notable ſpeech of Amurath to encourage his ſouldiers to the aſſault of Belgrade.

Although I know it is in mine owne power, to graunt, or not to graunt, the peace whereof our enemies haue made a motion: yet it is my pleaſure (worthie ſouldiers) to know your minds alſo. For ſo much as wee haue that warre in hand, wherein with worldly felicity, (whereof amongſt you I hold the chiefe place) is alſo indangered in our religion, and puritie of life; the defence and care whereof equally belongeth vnto vs all: for although we differ much one from another in the manner of our vocation and liuing here, yet after death we all hope for one and the ſelfeſame felicitie. And therefore I would haue you to vnderſtand, all that I ſhall ſay, as proceeding not of any regard of mine owne priuate, but vpon the conſideration of the common good of you all. For as concerning mine owne eſtate, I poſſeſſe ſo large countries in ASIA, ſuch great dominions in EVROPE, that either part thereof (in good time be it ſaid) might ſeeme a ſufficient kingdome: ſo that perhaps it might better ſtand with my eſtate, to take more care for keeping of that I haue, than to trauell for the gaining of more: but you are to conſider with your ſelues, whether you haue euery man ſufficient to ſuffice himſelfe or not, and how long you thinke your ſelues aſſured of the ſame; and moreouer, that together with theſe worldly things wee ſhall bee driuen at length to forſake our profeſſion and religion, if we ſhall now lay downe armes. For our enemies require, that we ſhould firſt ceaſe from warre, and then afterwards they thinke it meete to talke of peace. I will not ſpeake of the indignitie, that men beſieged, and in euill plight, ſhould propound conditions of peace to them that beſiege them, and are well furniſhed of all things; that feeble and cowardly men ſhould promiſe peace vnto courageous and expert ſouldiers: I omit what labour and paines we haue taken in laying our ſiege, in raiſing of mounts, in making of ſhipping; all which our enemies command vs to forſake, as if they had vs already bound or couped vp in hold, as we haue them. All BVLGARIA, and the greater part of RASCIA is now by vs conquered, and moſt part of SERVIA is at our commaund: all which places are by vs either to be kept, or elſe all the reſt of that wee poſſeſſe in EVROPE, is with them to be quite loſt and forſaken. Whoſoeuer ſhall haue in their power this citie which we beſiege (and that our enemies know right well) ſhall haue not onely as it were a fortreſſe and bulwarke of defence for his owne, but alſo a caſtle and entrance for the ſubduing of others. The kingdome of HVNGARIE is now deuided in it ſelfe, and full of domeſticall ſedition: neither is it ſo much ſtrengthened by the vniting of the kingdome of POLONIA, as it is by ciuill diſſention weakened: and in this motion of peace nothing is ſought for, but to gaine time for the pacifying of their priuate quarrels, that they may afterwards with their double forces ſet vpon vs. For if wee ſhall breake vp our ſiege before we haue won the citie, they will eaſily finde delaies ſo long to protract the concluſion of peace, vntill that either Vladiſlaus his good fortune, or elſe the Hungarians being of themſelues better aduiſed, ſhall make an end of their ciuill wars. What manner and conditions of peace will they then require of vs, when they are at vnitie amongſt themſelues, and in armes againſt vs; ſeeing that now being in danger with mutuall diſcord, and almoſt by vs vanquiſhed, they thinke it reaſonable (as if they had won the field) that we ſhould firſt raiſe our ſiege, and then intreat of peace? Their proud demands for the reſtitution of BVLGARIA and RASCIA, with other countries and cities won by our trauell and danger; alreadie ſound in mine eares: which if we ſhall refuſe to grant, not only the Hungarians being then at vnitie among themſelues, but alſo the Polonians, ioyned vnto them, will bring thoſe wars home to our doores, which we now at great aduantage make vpon them, troubled with diſcord and ciuill broiles. And if for deſire of peace we could be content to yeeld vnto ſuch ſhamefull and miſerable conditions, and reſtore vnto them all they ſhould or in reaſon could deſire; doe you thinke the Prince of SERVIA would reſt contented with his owne? whoſe haughtie minde (I am ſure) being inflate with the combining of two ſuch mightie kingdomes, thinketh not onely of the recouerie of that he hath loſt, but euen now gapeth at all that is ours in EVROPE. He will not thinke himſelfe ſatisfied, before he (hauing I K L M

A uing brought the Hungarian and Polonian forces against vs) shall see the same hauocke and spoile made in our kingdome with fire and sword, which he hath before seene made by vs in his owne. Where if his fortune should answere his designes (which God forbid, but yet it may chance) beside all the miserable and intolerable outrages, which are to be feared of an angrie conquerour, it is accounted with them for a godly and religious worke, to vse all cruell and vnspeakable villanies against our nation, except wee will forsake the faith and religion deliuered vnto vs by our ancestors, and follow their new and incredible ceremonies. Neither doe they thinke they can more easily and effectually procure the fauour of God with any other kinde of sacrifice or seruice, than by ouerthrowing and prophaning our temples, by scoffing at our most sacred and secret rites and ceremonies, by scorning our religion, and Priests: and that

B you may know all the furie wherewith they rage against vs and our religion, they account all them for holy Saints which die in fight against vs. There is no cause (valiant souldiers) that vpon the vaine hope of peace, wee should expect whilest the enemie doth gather and vnite his forces and armes against vs, especially such an enemie as propoundeth not spoile and worldly honours, but immortalitie it selfe, as a reward of his victorie. We haue alreadie taken much more labour than we haue to take, we haue filled the ditches with restlesse labour, we haue cast vp bulwarkes equall with the wals, and part of the wals we haue beaten euen with the ground, so that you see the towne halfe opened: and that towne, by gaining whereof, all that ours is, may be made safe and quiet; and that which our enemie possesseth, subiect to our spoile and prey. If you will but a little inforce your selues, as men mindfull of our good fortune and forwardnesse, you shall find our temples, our sacrifices, our religion, all worldly and heauenly felicitie to be

C then assured vnto vs, when as you shall to morrow ouerthrow the very foundation of the enemies wall. Then (courageous souldiers) we may crie victorie, not for the present, but for euer. If this warre should bring vnto vs nothing else but an assured securitie of our estate, it were sufficient reward: for which we ought cheerefully to aduenture our selues to all dangers, and to challenge in combat euen death it selfe. But as this victorie doth defend all our things as with a deepe trench or sure wall, so doth it lay open and expose all our enemies dominions vnto danger and spoile. Hitherto we haue striuen with nature her selfe in the rough and abrubt mountaines of Bvlgaria and Rascia, where we were to striue with hunger, thirst, labour, and desperation: all them we haue ouercome, allured with no other reward, but that at length we might attaine vnto the wealth of fruitfull Hvngarie, from whence we must fetch the

D guerdon of our victorie, and the ground of our glorie. We are come to the gates, which being laid open, we are not to passe ouer inaccessible rocks, or vncouth desarts, but we shall goe thorow most pleasant places, decked both by nature her selfe, and the industrie of man; where the temperatnesse of the aire, and liuely springs, with the fruitfulnesse of the soile, doth euery where yeeld plentie of all manner of food both for man and beast, not only to serue for natures necessitie, but euen to glut our wanton desires. What thing soeuer curious endeuour hardly bringeth forth in other places, that the fertilitie of this soile yeeldeth plentifully of it selfe: so that it is to be thought, that nature adorned Hvngarie with a certaine extraordinarie care, when as she would set forth a patterne of good husbandrie, for other countries to imitate. Neither hath she in any place beene more bountifull in bestowing her rich gifts: for gold, which other men most painfully dig vp, and that in few places, the Hungarians gather at their ease, as if it were a growing plant.

E It is in your power (worthie souldiers) whether you will to morrow open a way to all these good things for your selues for euer, or else leaue the way open for your enemies vnto all that you hold. I would that you would remember when you goe vnto the breach, that all the store of happie fortune is laid open vnto you for a prey, without any other defence, without any other garrison, without any other keeper; and that behind you are your wiues, children, your houses, your temples, and religion, together with the rewards of all your former victories: ouer whom (except you win this citie) the furie and insolencie of the victorious enemie, will most cruelly and shamefully insult. I, according as I shall see you fight at the breach to morrow, shall easily perceiue how you are set downe to command as conquerours, or else as slaues to be commanded; and also what to answere to the most insolent demands of the proud embassadours. In the meane time make much of your selues, and together with your armour haue all things in readinesse, that to morrow with the dawning of the day we may assault the breach.

The Turkish captaines for that time ioyfully departed, as if they had beene alreadie assured of the victorie, and of all those good things which Amurath had so liuely set before their eyes. The next morning very early, Amurath commanded the assault to be giuen vnto a great breach which he had made in the wall with continuall batterie: the souldiers with great courage assailed the breach, especially the Ianizaries, who vnder the leading of Haly-Bassa valiantly won the

ſame, and were entring the citie with aſſured hope of victorie. The Chriſtians ſeeing all in danger to be loſt, running to the breach from all parts of the citie, ſo forcibly charged the proud Ianizaries on euery ſide, that they were glad to retire with more haſte than they before entred: in which retrait, many of them were ſlaine, and the reſt flying out at the breach, were either ſlaine or burnt to death in the towne ditch with wild fire; whereof the defendants had caſt great ſtore vpon the Turks at the breach, which hauing taken hold vpon the faggots, hurdles, and other light matter, wherewith the Turks had vpon the ſudden made their way ouer the towne ditch, did ſo terribly burne, that the Ianizaries which had entred the breach, being againe repulſed, were in that fierie lake conſumed, or elſe with ſmoke ſtrangled. In this aſſault Amurath is reported to haue loſt eight thouſand of his beſt men, beſide ſeauen thouſand others ouerwhelmed or ſtrangled in the mines, by the countermines of the Chriſtians. The other part of the Turks, which at the ſame time aſſaulted the citie by water, out of their gallies and ſmall ſhips, had as euill or rather worſe ſucceſſe: many of them were ſunke with great ſhot, and ſome burnt by the fire caſt from the wals, and ſo fired one another; and diuers of them in that ſudden feare, for auoiding of that preſent danger, ran a ground vpon the ſhelfes in the riuer, and ſo ſplit. Amurath wonderfully diſcouraged with the ſlaughter of his men, and ſhamefully beaten from the aſſault, returned to his campe with his Turks, much like men which had lately eſcaped from ſome great ſhipwracke. And thus partly by famine, and partly by the defendants force, hauing loſt the greateſt part of his armie, he determined now after ſeauen moneths ſiege to returne home. Yet becauſe he would not encourage his enemies, by ſhewing his feare, he ſent for the embaſſadours into the campe, and with ſterne countenance anſwered them in this ſort:

Belgrade notably defended by the Chriſtians.

Amurath his anſwere to the embaſſadours.

Wee will (ſaid hee) then talke of peace, when Vladiſlaus ſhall deliuer vnto vs all that part of Rascia which he yet holdeth, and alſo th is citie of Belgrade, as a pledge of the league. And for this time I will raiſe my ſiege, to giue Vladiſlaus time to aduiſe himſelfe: yet I would wiſh him, rather to accept of my friendſhip vpon theſe conditions, than by denying that little which is demanded, to hazard the ſtate of both his kingdomes. I aske but that which is mine owne by law of armes, before Vladiſlaus was called into Hvngarie: and the Hungarians cannot transfer vnto him that right which they had not themſelues. Wherefore if he will proceed rather to ſtriue for that which is other mens, than quietly to poſſeſſe his owne, I will in good time repaire hither againe, with my God the beholder and reuenger of wrong.

With this anſwere he diſmiſſed the embaſſadours, and forthwith riſe with his armie, ſore repenting his comming thither: yet becauſe he would take ſomething in his way, he left his nephew Iſa-beg with certaine troupes of horſemen at Scopia in Servia, who ſo troubled the King of Bosna, that he was glad to require peace of Amurath, and to promiſe vnto him a yeerely tribute of fiue and twentie thouſand duckats.

Vladiſlaus newly elected King of Hvngarie, ſeeing that part of his kingdome which is called Transilvania, or Pannodacia, to be much ſubiect to the incurſion of the Turks, (who hauing got into their poſſeſſion all the countrey of Moldavia, and growne inſolent by continuall victories, ceaſed not to inuade and ſpoile the countrey of Transilvania) for remedie of that daily miſchiefe, created Iohn Huniades Vayuod, or his vice-gerent in Transilvania. This Huniades (as ſome write) was Earle of Bistrice, borne in Valachia: others ſay that he was borne but of meane parents, and called Huniades of the village wherein he was borne, and grew to be great by his vertue and proweſſe. Whatſoeuer his parents were, he himſelfe was a moſt politicke, valiant, fortunate, and famous captaine, his victories ſo great, as the like was neuer before by any Chriſtian Prince obtained againſt the Turks: ſo that his name became vnto them ſo dreadfull, that they vſed the ſame to feare their crying children withall. This worthie captaine according to the truſt repoſed in him, began to keepe the Turks ſhort, by cutting them off, whenſoeuer they preſumed to enter into his countrey; and alſo by ſhutting vp the paſſages whereby they were wont to forrage the countrey of Transilvania; and when he had put his owne charge in good ſafetie, he entred into Moldavia, and neuer reſted till he had won it quite out of the Turks hands. And not contented with this, paſſed many times ouer Danvbivs into the Turks dominions, making hauocke of the Turks, and carrying away with him great bootie, with many captiues.

A Now were two great and worthie captaines met together, in places nigh one to another, Huniades, in TRANSILVANIA, and the next part of HVNGARIE; and Iſa in RASCIA, & the vpper part of SERVIA: the one lying at TEMESVVAR, and the other at SINDEROVIA; both men of great ſpirit, and deſirous of honour. Of theſe two, Iſa in great fauour with Amurath, & by him highly preferred, to increaſe his credit with the Sultan his vncle, & to inlarge the bounds of the Turkiſh kingdome committed to his charge, continually forraged the countrey about BELGRADE, to the intent that hauing wearied the inhabitants with the harms he daily did them, and brought the citie into great wants, he might ſo at length gaine the ſame, for the moſt part abandoned the of citizens, which Amurath could not by force obtaine, & ſo to open a way into B HVNGARIE. Thus was the countrie by him ſpoiled, the villages rifled and burnt, and great numbers both of men and cattell daily caried away: yea ſometimes not contented to haue ſpoiled the open countrie, he aſſailed the very ſuburbs of the citie, and was thence hardly repulſed: and finding Huniades the onely man that hindred his further proceedings, to requite him, and prouoke him the more, he brake ſometimes into his countrie, laying in euery corner as he went ſtrong ambuſhes, ſo to haue circumuented that warie captaine, if it had bin poſſible. But he greeued to ſee the countrie thus ſpoiled, & purpoſing to be thereof reuenged, ſecretly raiſed a ſtrong power, both of horſe and foot, and with his companion Nicholas Vilach a right valiant captaine, paſſing ouer DANVBIVS, came and encamped betwixt BELGRADE and SINDEROVIA, being about twentie miles diſtant. Of whoſe comming Iſa-beg vnderſtanding, forthwith ſet for-
C ward with a great armie againſt him, leaſt he ſhould by longer delay ſeeme to ſtand in doubt of his enemie, whom he had by many iniuries ſo often prouoked. So marching on with his armie ranged in order of battaile; hee found Huniades as readie for battaile as himſelfe, who in both wings had placed his light horſemen, and behind them his men at armes, with certaine companies of crosbowes on herſeback: in the middeſt ſtood his armed men with his archers, and other ſouldiers more lightly armed, readie at all aſſaies, all ſtrongly guarded with men at armes: after whom in the reareward followed alſo a ſtrong ſquadron of valiant footmen. The ſignall of battaile being giuen, there began a great and cruell fight, as amongſt men deſirous either to ouercome, or there honourably to end their dayes. At the firſt encounter, the wings of Hunaides his battaile were by the Turks enforced to retire: but comming to the men at armes, their furie was D there ſtaied, and a cruell battaile fought, wherein many fell on both ſides, but of the Turks mo, who truſting to their agilitie and nimbleneſſe of bodie, were not able long to endure the ſhocke and ſtrength of the men at armes, but were there by heapes ouerthrowne, and moſt miſerably ſlaine. Which Iſa-beg beholding, and perceiuing the Hungarians couragiouſly to fight, as men almoſt in poſſeſſion of an aſſured victorie; to ſaue himſelfe turned his backe and fled to SINDEROVIA. The reſt beholding the flight of their Generall, betooke themſelues to flight alſo: after whō the Hungarians fiercely followed, eſpecially Huniades himſelfe, who by his example to animate the reſt, left not the chaſe vntill he was come almoſt to the ſuburbs of SINDEROVIA: few of the Turks eſcaped, the reſt being either taken or ſlaine. Huniades after ſo great a victory with a rich prey and a multitude of priſoners returned to BELGRADE: hauing now ſufficiently reuen-
E ged himſelfe of the wrongs he had before receiued: after which time, Iſa the Turke was more quiet, as hauing ſufficient proofe of his valour. The fame of this victorie increaſed not a little the fame of Huniades, the report whereof comming to BVDA, filled the citie with ioy and gladnes: but moſt of all King Vladiſlaus, who thereupon cauſed publike prayers, with thankſgiuing to be made in euery Church: and by his letters gratulatorie, with many rich preſents, encouraged Huniades to the proſecution of the religious warre, wherein was propounded vnto him not onely the increaſe of his wealth (a baſe regard in the honourable) but the immortalitie of his name, & hope of eternall bliſſe. 1440

Not long after this victorie, Huniades obtained a farre greater in TRANSILVANIA. For Amurath much grieued with the loſſe hee had firſt by himſelfe, and after by his lieutenant Iſa, re- Transiluania inuaded and ſpoiled by Meſites Baſſa.
F ceiued at BELGRADE, and in the countrie thereabout; leaſt he ſhould ſeeme to yeeld vnto the Hungarians, repaired his broken forces with new ſupplies, with purpoſe againe to renew his warres in VALACHIA. And ſo hauing put all things in a readineſſe, ſent one of his Baſſaes called Meſites (his Viceroy in ASIA, a man of great wiſedome, experience, and valour) with a puiſſant armie vpon the ſudden by the way of VALACHIA TRANSALPINA, to inuade TRANSILVANIA. This worthie captaine according to his charge, departing out of SERVIA, & paſ-

euer came in his way, and killing all that he light vpon, man, woman, and child, without respect of age, sex, or condition; filling all the countrey as he went, with tumult & terrour. Whereof Huniades (but lately come into the countrey) vnderstanding, & hauing as then, no sufficient forces to oppose against the furie of so puissant an enemie, either meanes to raise any, in so great a confusion and feare; was wonderfully grieued thereat, and perplexed in mind, as not well knowing Huniades flieth which way to turne himselfe. At length he tooke his flight into ALBA IVLA, vnto his old friend George Lepe, Bishop of that citie, a man of great vertue and grauitie: but whileft he there staieth with his friend, about the raising of a tumultuarie armie, the enemie was now come neere vnto him; who hauing ouer-run the greatest part of the countrey, had scraped together such a bootie, H and taken such a multitude of prisoners, that surcharged as it were with the spoile, he was glad to march softlier: yet still burning the country before him. Which Huniades & the good Bishop beholding out of the citie, so much grieued thereat, that albeit that they both well knew themselues, with an handfull of men taken vp in haste hand ouer head, too weake to encounter with their enemies: yet thought it better with such power as they had, to goe out, and so in defence of their country honourably to die, than longer to behold the most miserable destruction of the Huniades and the Bishop of Alba Iula entrapped by the Turks. same. But whileft they vpon this resolution (caried forth with too hot a desire of reuenge) march vnaduisedly on headlong, without any scouts or espials sent out before them, they fell before they were aware into such ambushes, both of horse and foot, as the craftie enemie had in the se- I cret woods & vallies whereby they were to passe, laid of purpose to intercept them; which now with great force and horrible outcries breaking out vpon them on euery side, dismaied them with a great feare. Huniades and the Bishop, seeing themselues so entrapped and beset with the multitude of their enemies, as that they must needs perish if they should longer stay, fled incontinently backe againe; after whom followed all the rest of their armie, and at their heeles the eager Turks, who spared none of the flying Christians they could ouertake, but put them all to the sword: neuertheleſſe, most part of them escaped backe againe to ALBA IVLA. The Bishop thinking to haue saued himselfe by the swiftnesse of his horse, comming to a riuer, in taking the same was ouerthrowne, & there by the enemie slaine. With whose death the Bassa encouraged, as also with the present victorie, began now more at libertie to range abroad, and at his pleasure with fire & sword to wast that part of the countrey which yet remained vnspoiled: leauing in the K meane time (as a man out of feare) the rich prey he had taken, together with his baggage and cariages, to be caried all together, as a notable testimonie of his victorie, vnto his great lord and master. Huniades in the meane time, with wonderfull celeritie running about the borders of his country, and out of euery towne & village taking such souldiers as he could, perswaded also the Sicilians (or people commonly called Siculi) in defence of their wiues and children to take vp armes: who all, in respect of the present necessitie, cheerefully did whatsoeuer he commanded. With this tumultuarie armie, he followed the Bassa (who then in great pride was returning, laded with the spoile of the whole country) with purpose to set vpon him, as time or place should giue him occasion. In the meane time Mesitis being told, that Huniades with a great power was comming after him, and now euen at hand: is reported to haue made no great reckoning there- L of, but to haue proudly answered vnto him that brought the newes, Let him come, & with the spoile of himselfe enrich our victorie. There was present when he thus said, one Iohn, one of Huniades his espials, who discouered vnto him many of the Turks designes, concerning the ioyning of battell with him; but especially, that the Bassa had commanded thorow his armie, That aboue all things they should in the beginning of the battell assaile the person of Huniades himselfe, for that he being once slaine, the rest would easily be put to flight, as all depending on his direction: and that for the performance thereof, he had appointed certaine companies of his best souldiers, giuing them certaine tokens whereby they might know both him and his horse. There was then in the armie, one Simon Kemene a right valiant & couragious gentleman, not much vnlike vnto Huniades, with whom he changed both his horse and armour, appointing vnto him a strong M troupe of his choice horsemen to attend vpon him: neither was this counterfait Huniades vnwilling to expose himselfe vnto the danger, accounting it honour enough, if by his death he might saue the life of his friend, and preserue so worthie a defender of the common-weale. Huniades following fast after the Bassa marching before him, sought by light skirmishes sometimes on the one side, sometimes on the other, and sometimes in the rereward, to stay him, and at some aduantage,

A uantage, if any ſuch were giuen, to fight with him, before he ſhould get out of the countrey. At length finding ſuch an opportunitie as he thought good to lay hold vpon, he with all his forces, as if it had beene a violent tempeſt, came vpon the Turks ſo ſuddenly, as that they had not time to put themſelues into order of battell, but were glad confuſedly to fight as they might, and without order: in which diſordered fight many fell on both ſides, but farre more of the Turks.
But whileſt both armies with like obſtinacie encounter together, certaine troupes of the moſt valiant Turks deſcrying Simon the counterfeit Huniades, and by the ſignes before deliuered vnto them, both of his horſe and armour, ſuppoſing him to haue beene Huniades indeed; with all their power made towards him, to haue ſlaine him, according as they had in charge: where B meeting with right valiant men, of no leſſe courage than themſelues, there was fought a moſt A great battell betwixt Meſites and Huniades.
terrible and bloudie battell, in ſuch ſort, as if in that very place ſhould haue been tried the whole fortune of the day. But the Turks ſtill bending their forces more and more thither, for the killing of him, of whom they ſtood in more dread than of all the reſt: at length by plaine force made a way vnto him, and hauing ſlaine them that were about him, though not without their owne great loſſe, furiouſly aſſailing him, ſlew him, vainly ſuppoſing it to haue beene the very generall himſelfe: who had he there periſhed (as like enough it was he ſhould, had he not beene before warned of the Baſſaes purpoſe) no doubt, but that the whole countrey had beene with him, or ſhortly after, quite loſt. But Huniades in the meane time riding to and fro in the armie, encouraged his ſouldiers not to forſake the victorie they were now as it were in poſſeſſion of,
C nor leaue vnreuenged ſo many ſlaughters and harmes ſo lately committed by their enemies, but to remember as they were fighting, that they caried in their hands their wiues and children, and were in that one battell to reuenge the wrong by them done both to God & man. Sometime he with new ſupplies encouraged ſuch as were ouercharged & euen now readie to flie; otherſome he with cheerefull words ſtaied, that had alreadie turned their backs; performing in euery place all the parts both of a worthie commander & valiant ſouldier, as the neceſſitie of the time and place required. In the heat of this battell, fortune yet fauouring neither part, but both fighting with all their power, the Tranſiluanian priſoners that in great number were kept in the campe, wiſhing rather there to die than to be caried away in captiuitie, & thinking it now or neuer, time for them to attempt their deliuerance; with one cõſent brake in ſunder their bonds, & with ſuch D weapons as firſt came to hand, ſet vpon their keepers, of whom they ſlew a great number: and ſo deſperatly iſſuing out into the battell, encouraged their countrimen, and diſcouraged their enemies. Yet was the battell hardly fought, though not altogether with like courage, or for like cauſe: for why, the Tranſiluanians fought for their country, their wiues, their children, their liues, their libertie, their religion & altars: but the Turks for the rich prey they had before taken, & that they were by victorie in hope of. But at length the Turks by the breaking out of the pri-ſoners (who laid about them like deſperat men) out of hope of the victorie, began by little & little to retire: and the other on the contrary part, by this vnexpected aid encouraged, and quickly finding the enemies fainting, fought more fiercely than before. Meſites ſeeing his armie thus in euery part wauering, was therwith exceedingly troubled: but preſently after, beholding ſome of E his men retiring, as if they had fled, and otherſome flying outright, & no means to ſtay them, for ſafegard of his life, turned his horſe & fled alſo: after whom the Hungarians followed with moſt terrible executiõ, as men deſirous of the bloud of thẽ that had done them ſo great harme. In this chaſe Meſites himſelf with his ſon, were both ſlain: the report of whoſe death, in the purſuit, added ſwiftnes vnto the Hungarians, to the increaſing of the ſlaughter of the Turks, whõ for the deſire of reuenge, they ceaſed not for certain daies to purſue, vnto the top of the alps. In this battel were ſlain of the Turks 20000, & of the Hungariãs about 3000. Huniades with this victorie recouered al the prey the Turks had taken of the ſpoile of the country, together with their tents & baggage: vnto whõ at his returne into the campe, a wonderfull number of the poore captiues came, and Great reioicing for the victorie.
falling at his feet & kiſſing them, gaue God thanks for their deliuerance by him: ſome called him F the father, ſome the defender of his country; the ſouldiers, their inuincible generall; the captiues, their deliuerer; the women, their protector; the yong men & children, their moſt louing father.
In all which ioyfull acclamations, no honourable additions was heard, which in the iudgement of all men, worthily agreed not with his deſerts. He againe with teares ſtanding in his eies, courteouſly embraced them, reioycing at the publicke good: & himſelfe giuing moſt heartie thanks vnto God, commanded the like to be done in all churches of that prouince. Sometime he commended the souldiers valour, and in generall, the peoples loyaltie. The nobilitie and worthie captaines he extolled by name, according as their deserts had beene in that notable battell, not detracting any thing from any mans worthie praises: part of the spoile of the Turks he appointed vnto deuout vses, and the other part he diuided amongst the souldiers: and willing as it were with the first fruits thereof to gratifie King Vladislaus, and the Despot of SERVIA, then present with him, he sent a great waggon, which ten horses could scarce draw, laded with the Turks ensignes and the chiefe of their heads, where the heads of the Bassa and his sonne stood formost, and aboue them was placed an old Turke, sometime well knowne vnto the Despot: who in this order presented vnto them, is said to haue thus deliuered his message, as followeth: G H

The speech of an old Turke, in deliuering the present vnto the King.

Huniades your maiesties most humble seruant, and the most honourable Despots sonne, sendeth vnto you this part of the spoile gained by this late victorie, lest he should seeme to defraud you of the honour of the battell, happily fought vnder your good fortune. These heads of the Asian nobilitie he sendeth you for a present, that you should not want the assured testimonie of so notable a victorie: these are two Princes heads, the one of Mesites Bassa the Generall, and the other of his sonne. The rest are the heads of the other great commanders and Sanzacks. All these witnesse the greatnesse of the late slaughter, and exhort you to greater atchieuements. What your royall maiestie for the naturall instinct of pietie and religion ingrafted in you, may hope for; and what an occasion of immortalitie and glorie is offered vnto you, Huniades wisheth you hereby to consider: and humbly requesteth, that generall supplications may be commanded, and a great armie prouided, for asmuch as all men suppose, that the Turke will gage his whole forces, and leaue nothing vnattempted, in reuenge of so great a slaughter of his people. I

Hauing ended his speech, he shewed vnto them the grisely mortified heads: which the nobilitie and others there present, earnestly beheld and wondered at, especially the King and the Despot; who by letters farther vnderstanding the whole proceeding of the warre, and fortune of the battell, highly commended the discreet valour of Huniades, together with the glorious victorie, worthie (as they said) of a Romane triumph: for which, Vladislaus commanded publicke supplications to be made in all churches thorow HVNGARIE, and by honourable messengers sent of purpose to Huniades, gaue him great thanks, according to his deserts, with many rich presents also, commending his faithfull and worthie seruice: and requesting him with like courage and care to prosecute the warre so happily begun, promising him, That he should want neither men nor money, or any thing else needfull thereunto. Vpon this victorie, the countries of MOLDAVIA and VALACHIA, before tributaries vnto the Turks, now reuolted againe vnto the Hungarians, to the great griefe of Amurath: and the fame of Huniades was in short time dispersed thorow all EVROPE, and a generall hope conceiued of him, as of one most like to be one of the greatest champions of the Christian common-weale, as in his time vndoubtedly he was. K

The report of this late ouerthrow, with the death of the Bassa Mesites, and the losse of his armie, being brought to HADRIANOPLE, much troubled the Turkish tyrant: but most of all the reuolt of the two countries of MOLDAVIA and VALACHIA. So that full of wrathfull indignation and desire of reuenge, he commanded a great armie to be raised against the next Spring, with intent to haue gone therewith himselfe: but afterward vpon better aduice changing his purpose, he committed the leading thereof vnto one Schech Abedin Bassa (corruptly called Sciabedin Bassa) an eunuch, and yet neuertheless a right valiant and expert captaine, and his viceroy in EVROPE; with charge first to enter into VALACHIA, and there hauing done what harme he could with fire and sword, to doe the like in MOLDAVIA: and after that with all his power to breake into TRANSILVANIA, there to reuenge vnto the full, the losses before receiued, and with the slaughter of the Hungarians to sacrifice vnto the ghosts of their dead friends and companions. The Bassa according to his charge, departing out of MACEDONIA, and marching thorow MYSIA, and so passing ouer DANVBIVS, with an armie of fourescore thousand fighting men, whereof foure thousand were of the best Ianizaries, entred into VALACHIA, filling the country with feare and tumult; the Valachians now altogether in despaire to be able to defend themselues against the furie of the Turks, and sore repenting them of their reuolt from them vnto the Hungarians. Whom for all that, Huniades comforted with cheerefull words, willing them betime to retire themselues vnto the safest places of their country, and not to expose themselues with their too weake forces against the furie of the Barbarians; promising L M

Valachia grieuously spoiled by the Turke.

A miſing in good time to come himſelfe to their reliefe; not doubting by the power of Ieſus Chriſt, to dare them battell in the plaine field, and to haue of them a glorious victorie, although they were in number farre moe than they were reported to be. The Baſſa diuiding his armie into two parts, forraged the countrey farre and neere, burning the countrey townes and villages before them, ſpoiling whatſoeuer came in their way, and killing whoſoeuer they light vpon, men, women, or children, without reſpect of age, ſex, or condition. But the Valachians for the moſt part, had retired themſelues, ſome into the mountaines, ſome into the ſtrong townes, and ſome into places further off; ſo that few fell into the enemies hands, but ſuch as were not able to flie, or not regarding the danger, had negligently ſtaied the enemies comming, and ſo periſhed.

B VALACHIA thus ſpoiled, the Turks paſſing ouer the mountaines, deſcended into TRANSILVANIA, as Amurath had commanded, with purpoſe there to haue done the like or greater harme, if poſſible it had beene to haue ſo done: but there was Huniades with 15000 choſen ſouldiers readie to encounter them. A ſmall power indeed, in compariſon of the multitude the Baſſa led: but all men of great experience & reſolution, in valour counteruailing the great number of their enemies, men reſolued rather to die than to flie. Of whoſe approch the Baſſa (vnto whom the name and fortune of the man was dreadfull) by his eſpials vnderſtanding, ſtaied his intended furie, and as one well aware with whom he had to doe, without farther proceeding, encamped himſelfe with his armie, to ſee what power and courage the enemie had. But certainly informed by his ſcouts, for that purpoſe ſent out, That he was not in number a quarter ſo many as

C the Turks, but lay ſtrongly encamped with his waggons and carriages, as in a ſure fort, in ſuch order, as that he could not without great danger be aſſailed, and yet might at his pleaſure come forth, and ſo if need were retire againe, as into a ſtrong hold: he wondered at his courage and skilfull manner of encamping; yet preſuming of his owne multitude and ſtrength, he doubted not to march forward, and to offer him battell. Being come within halfe a mile the one of the other, although they were on neither ſide vnwilling to fight, yet hoping both for a great victorie, they thought it not beſt to attempt any thing raſhly, but betooke themſelues both vnto the higheſt of their wits, as willing in ſo great a conflict, as wel to ſhew the vttermoſt of their policie and skill, as of their courage and valour. The Turke thought it beſt not to ioyne battell with his enemies in one front, for feare of confounding ſo great a multitude, but to diuide his armie in-

D to certaine battailions, and ſo to fight by degrees and in good order, wherby to make al his men profitable: or if he could not doe ſo, then with his multitude to encloſe the Chriſtians round, and ſo to ouerwhelme them. On the other ſide, Huniades charged his ſouldiers, aboue all things to keepe their order, and in no caſe to ſuffer themſelues to be diuided by their enemies. The next day, being come vnto a place which they call VASCAPE, both the armies by the breake of day began to diſlodge, at which time the Baſſa ſpent a good ſpace in the martialling of his great armie, as did alſo Huniades, ſeeking by prouident foreſight and policie to match the multitude of his enemies. And ſo hauing ſet all things in order, calling vnto him the chiefe captaines and commanders of his armie, with cheerefull countenance encouraged them as followeth:

The moſt Chriſtian ſpeech of Huniades to encourage his ſouldiers againſt the Turks.

E No courage (beleeue me) worthie companions, and fellowes in armes, could haue induced me to encounter ſo great a multitude, did not neceſſitie it ſelfe enforce me, your approued valour perſwade me, and the aſſured hope I haue in Chriſt Ieſus aboue all things confirme me: hauing made choice of vs to fight this his ſacred battell, and by our right hands to reuenge the diſhonour of his holy name. In which his eſpeciall choice we are to conſider how much he hath beloued vs: and for the ſame to praiſe his infinite goodneſſe and mercie. Three ſuch commodities hath God thereby euen this day propounded vnto vs, if we will be the ſame men we haue beene in times paſt, as that the leaſt thereof were ſufficient to encourage men of worth, for the ſame to lay downe their liues, held they them neuer ſo deare: Firſt, you are to fight for the health and welfare of your children, wiues, and countrey, ioyned with your whole eſtate: then, for eternall glorie and renowne in this world: and laſt of all, for immortalitie and a crowne that

F ſhall neuer be taken from you, in the world to come. How many miſeries and calamities we haue in former times, and of late, receiued from the Turks, would to God you had rather heard thereof by report, than ſeene the ſame with your eyes, and endured them in your ſelues. You had long ſince beene bereft of your welbeloued wiues and children, whom moſt miſerable ſeruitude had ouerwhelmed; you had had neither houſe nor church, wherein to dwell or to ſerue God, had not the diuine power of God; and your rare proweſſe beene at hand for preſent reſcue: your countrey, your goods, your honour, your libertie, you could

could not haue kept, had not your valour, confirmed by an assured confidence in the highest, preserued all G these things vnto your selues: The horrible furie of the Turke had now brought all these things into the power of it selfe, had they not beene by your armes defended, and he by so many bloudie ouerthowes repressed. He could not before be staied: the Grecians, the Macedonians (both sometimes the greatest commanders) the bold Thracians, the strong Bulgarians, the valiant Epirots, and Dalmatians, could not abide their force: The Athenians, the Thebans, the Lacedemonians, authors and masters of the ancient discipline of warre, willingly gaue place vnto these. Vnto vs, is this praise and great glorie of this victorie by God assigned, who oftentimes with a small power, yea and that sometime against all hope, haue with a notable slaughter ouerthrowne them, vanquished them, and put them to flight. Neither is there any men in the world whom they more feare and stand in dread of, than you, whom though in number but few, they haue H by their daily slaughter and losses, learned no lesse to feare, than if you were many. And now to trie the vttermost of their power, they are come with their innumerable legions: but are not for that of you any thing the more to be feared than before, seeing that we all beare armes vnder the conduct of the most mightie God; and are by daily victorie, long experience, and approued valour taught, what we are to dare: besides that, the greatest part of their armie is of common souldiers, slaues, or rude countrey pesants, or men by force by them compelled; more than the Ianizaries, are no good souldiers among them, the rest as men enforced, serue them for feare, and against their wils, and they by their cowardise brought into that bondage and slauerie. What Greekes, Macedonians, or Sclauonians soeuer are sent to their aid, for-asmuch as they are not yet reuolted from the Christian faith, deeme them not to stand for them, but for vs:
they long for vs the reuengers of their wrongs, and for you as victorious conquerours: in this warre they I haue giuen vnto the Turks their names, but vnto vs their hearts, and power, and pray heartily for our victorie: wherefore you ought so much the more valiantly and couragiously to fight, by how much greater you see the victorie, the honour, the prey before your eyes. We are not to fight for other mens houses, and altars, but for our owne; so our present necessitie requireth, in such sort, that if we our selues deliuer not our selues, and beare our selues vpon our wonted hope and valour, we shall this day be enforced to endure the greatest miserie that men may possibly: First, the losse of our goods and substance, the captiuitie of our children, the deflouring of our daughters, the rauishing of our wiues, the slaughter of our parents, the burning of our houses, and churches; and that which worse is than all this, the scorne of our Sauiour Christ Iesus, and his Saints, whose images you shall see in despight broken, or dragged in the durt, or moulten and conuerted into other prophane vses; all religion trodden downe, and God himselfe (if it K were possible) with violence and despaire driuen out of our hearts, if we stand not manfully vnto it as becommeth worthie champions. God is able with his little finger, if he so will, forthwith to destroy all the Turks in the world; but seeing he hath committed vnto our right hands the defence of his name, he first maketh proofe of our courage and valour, that finding the same faithfull and readie, he may strengthen and defend it with his owne right hand. He neuer yet forsooke any faithfull or deuout man, neither will our Sauiour Christ be wanting vnto you, if you be not wanting vnto your selues: in the power of his name, which is aboue all names, he shall tread downe his rebellious enemies, and exalt the righteous that put their trust in him. Moreouer, the causes that they and we combat for, are diuers, and our hopes much stronger:
They fight for their Prophet, a most prophane man, author of all impietie, for spoile and prey, for the destruction of nations and countries, for other mens kingdomes, for the enlarging of their dominions and terri- L tories, for worldly praise and glorie: But we contrariwise beare armes for the Sauiour of the world, for our faith and religion, for the Christian common wealth, for our native countrey, for our wiues and children, for our fortune and state; than which nothing can be more excellent, more commendable, or honourable. What reward is laid vp for them in heauen which haue worthily protected or deliuered their countrey, or laid downe their liues in defence of their faith and religion? Neither, hauing often proued, are we ignorant, that God will neuer forsake them that honour, feare, and serue him. Whereby (fellow souldiers) you may plainly perceiue, how farre your hopes are beyond theirs. Beleeue our Sauiour, promising vnto you an eternall reward: and shew your fidelitie and valour vnto God and your countrey together. Wherefore, seeing without the power of God we can doe nothing, before the signall of battell be giuen, I beseech you collonels, captaines, and lieutenants, by your effectuall & Christian exhortations in your regiments & compa- M nies, to encourage your souldiers, valiantly to fight the Lords battell; and for the present, euery man by taking a little earth in his mouth, to prepare himselfe according to the necessitie of the time, as it were to the receiuing of the Lords Supper: so hauing cleansed your soules, embrace you one another, plight your mutu-all faith with your right hand and a kisse; & make a perpetuall couenant among your selues, none of you to forsake one another in this holy battell, but for your religion & countrey valiantly to fight it out, euen vnto
the

A the last man. And a little refreshing your selues with a short repast as you stand, vpon the signall giuen thrice calling aloud vpon the mightie name of Christ Iesus, fight with the like valour and courage so neere as you can, that he in the agonie of death fought for your redemption and libertie: which that you will willingly doe, I request and charge you this for our Sauiours sake, for the loue of our countrey, and for the faith you owe both to God and man. I also pray and beseech you, so to fight, as men resolued either to gaine a most glorious victorie, (whereof I doubt not) or else if it should otherwise chance, this day to purchase vnto your selues a blessed life in the kingdome of heauen: not to sup in hell with the Turks, but with the blessed wights in heauen: for Christ Iesus our Sauiour will be alwaies present with vs, who (beleeue me, B & so hope) will this day not only deliuer vs out of the hands of the Turks, but to our immortall glorie lode vs with the rich spoiles of our enemies, and so in safetie bring all home againe with much ioy and triumph.

The Bassa on the other side likewise encouraged his souldiers, putting them in remembrance of their former victories, exhorting them not to degenerate from their worthie ancestours and themselues, by whose great valour the glorie and empire of the Turks had beene so mightily increased; and vnto whom their great prophet Mahomet, the interpreter of the gods, had foretold the empire of the whole world to be by all the gods allotted; and had by diuine inspiration prophecied, that ancient and stately nation in time to become the terrour of the world, the scourge of the wicked, and commander of all nations. He farther declared vnto them what an increase of kingdomes they had got in that short time, since which they first passed ouer into
C EVROPE: and filled them with the hope of a great spoile; promising vnto them that should in the battell valiantly behaue themselues, not onely the spoile and prey, but whole villages, townes, and cities, and other great preferments, according as they should deserue. As for the victorie, considering the weake power of their enemies, and the great number of themselues, he assured them thereof, if they would but a while valiantly fight it out like men. In conclusion, he told them, that hauing ouercome Huniades, whom onely, as he confessed, he had found to be the most valiant and skilfull captaine of the Christians, nothing should afterward be able to stand in their way, or to hinder their farther conquests: and that if this day they should vtterly ouerthrow him, they should gaine the most honourable victorie that was euer yet got in EV-ROPE. Wherefore he willed them aboue all things, in the battell to seeke after him; promi-
D sing vnto him that should kill him, a great reward, with most honourable preferments. Hauing thus sufficiently, as he thought, encouraged his Turks, he set forward with his armie in order of battell. His horsemen and footmen he diuided into two great wings, betwixt which marched the Ianizaries in a square battell, all men of approued valour: after whom followed the rereward: vnto the wings he had also ioyned certaine loose companies of light horsemen to begin the battell, and to flie about the enemies, and so as occasion should serue, either to charge or retire. Huniades likewise had placed in both wings two square battailions of men at armes, and with them certaine horsemen with crosse-bowes: before these wings he had also placed certaine troupes of light horsemen, to encounter the enemies: in the middest stood two square battailes of men at armes: and betwixt them a strong squadron of armed men, guarded
E behind with a conuenient number of pikemen and archers: both the wings he had compassed about with a multitude of carts and waggons, and they also well manned. So marching forward, and both armies being come within a quarter of a mile together, the signall of battell was on both sides giuen, and the battell begun. Huniades seeing the multitude of his enemies, cast his first battell into the forme of a wedge, the more easily to diuide them: and they on the other side in forme of a paire of sheeres, were readie to receiue him: where on both sides they encountered together with such furie and outcrie, as neuer was thing more terrible to be heard or seene. The Turks trusting vnto the multitude of their nimble light horsemen, first with their light staues, and afterward with their crooked Scimators fiercely assailed the Christians light horsemen, in which first encounter many fell on both sides. But the wedge battell of the Chri-
F stians could not of the Turks be broken, as consisting all of valiant expert souldiers, and they also strongly armed; who, doe the Turks what they could, with a great slaughter cut their armie in sunder, but not without a great fight, and some losse also vnto themselues. In the wings also the light horsemen for a while fought couragiously and with like hope: but the Turks with that kind of fight better acquainted than the Christians, and better appointed for that purpose, and exceeding in number also, put the Christian light horsemen to the worst, and enforced

ced them to retire to the men at armes. Here began the fortune of the Turks to ſtay, where both G parts deſperatly aſſailing the one the other, was made a moſt terrible fight, wherein moſt part of the Turks light horſemen were ſlaine: for why, they were not able to abide the force of the men at armes, although in compariſon of them, but few; but were with their lances & arming ſwords ouerthrowne and ſlaine, no otherwiſe than if they had beene naked men: ſo that in both wings the Turks began now to faint. But the battaile in both the wings yet wauering and the victorie doubtfull, in the maine batailé was fought a moſt cruell fight: the Ianizaries with a ſtrong power of men at armes, & certaine troupes of light horſemen, compaſſed about the men at armes that ſtood (as we ſaid) in the maine battell of the Chriſtians, where the old Ianizaries with their crooked Scimitaries, with great courage cut in ſunder the legs of the horſes of the men at armes; of H whō many fell downe, & lying along vpon the ground, were made ſhorter by the head: as like-wiſe on the other ſide, the Ianizaries whileſt they ſeeke the deſtruction of the men at armes, were themſelues ouerborne & trodden vnder foot. Whereupon ſuch a ſlaughter was made, that the bloud ran like riuers, whileſt they deſperatly fight with furious rage both on the one ſide and the other. In this cruell fight moſt part of the Ianizaries were ſlaine, and many of the Chriſtian men at armes alſo. The Baſſa now perceiuing the Hungarians to haue the better, both in the wings and in the maine battell, and yet in hope that with long fight they would faint (although he ſaw great ſlaughter of his men in euery place) came on with the rereward, & a number of other freſh ſouldiers which he had left for the guarding of his baggage, all yet ſound men, in good hope ſo to ouerwhelme the wearied Hungarians. It was now foure houres that this cruell fight had en- I dured, when as the Baſſa began it afreſh: neither was this by him done without reaſon; for why, he was afraid leſt if his men ſhould turne their backs and flie, the whole armie ſhould follow after: and therefore to make vſe of all the men he had, he brought on his rereward, in hope that his enemies, now ſpent with long fight, would not longer endure a freſh charge. And the more to encourage his men, he commanded them to compaſſe in the Hungarians round, and to diſpatch their wearied enemies, vainly boaſting, That it would be the laſt battell that euer the Hungarians would fight. On the other ſide, Huniades perceiuing the enemies purpoſe, ſuffered his men to be in part enuironed, and by and by cauſed the waggoners with the armed carts & waggons to thruſt in behind them, and ſo to compaſſe them in, diuided in part from the reſt, & afterward with freſh ſupplies renewed the battell with the enemie. The fight was great, and in euery K place right terrible: and albeit that the ſlaughter of the Turks was in many places great, yet by reaſon of their multitude they felt it not much, but fought yet ſtill moſt deſperately: vntill that they in the right wing ſeeing themſelues compaſſed in behind with the waggons, & ſo frō them charged with ſhot, darts, and other ſuch miſſiue weapons; ſtanding in doubt which way to turne themſelues, and beſet with danger on euery ſide, began to faint, and fearing the danger behind them, ſhrunke from the fight. On the other ſide, the Hungarians, now in good hope of victorie, with great & cheerefull outcries, as men inſpired with freſh ſpirits, more furiouſly aſſailed their fainting enemies afront, than before; encouraging thē alſo that aſſailed them behind in the waggons, to approch them neerer: with which double danger the Turks hardly beſet, fought diſor-derly, & doubting to be all incloſed round, firſt retired, and preſently after betooke themſelues L
The Turks flie. to plaine flight. But they which were alreadie ſhut in betwixt the waggons & them that fought before thē, periſhed euery mothers ſon. They which fought in the left wing alſo, diſcoraged with the flight of their fellowes, fled likewiſe: after whō the Hungarians fiercely followed. The Baſſa himſelfe ſeeing both the wings of his battel put to flight, & his own battel ſore broken alſo, ſtrucken with deſpaire fled, with certain cōpanies of the Ianizaries, which he had ſtill kept about him againſt al euēts, for the ſafegard of his perſō: after whō followed alſo ſo many other of the Turks as could; the reſt diſperſedly flying thorow the woods, foreſts, & moūtains, either there periſhed with hunger, or falling into the hands of the Valachians, were by thē ſlaine. Of ſo great an armie as the Baſſa brought into TRANSILVANIA, ſcarce the one halfe returned again ouer DANVBIVS.
It is reported by ſome that were in that battell, that if Huniades hauing thē in chace, had purſued M thē vnto DANVBIVS, ſcarcely one man of thē had eſcaped ouer the riuer. But he contented with ſo great a victorie, & to haue driuen his enemies out of the field, purſued thē not far: but entring into their camp, with the ſpoile therof greatly enriched both himſelfe & his ſouldiers. Beſide the great multitude of the Turks here ſlain, 5000 more were takē priſoners, & 100 of their enſignes.
Long it were to rehearſe and reckon vp the rich ſpoile there taken, the gilt armour, and goodly furniture,

A furniture, both of men and horses, beside the rich pauilions and tents there standing. In briefe, the wealth there found, was so great, as that there was no man in Huniades armie, which was not thereby for euer enriched. Huniades for this so great a victorie, and for his countrey, deliuered from so great a feare, caused generall praiers with thanksgiuing, for the space of three dayes, to be made in all churches of those three prouinces, vnto whom that danger was threatened; and at VASCAPE, where the battell was fought, hanged vp certaine of the Turks ensignes, as trophees of the victorie there gotten. This was the famous battell of VASCAPE, wherein Huniades got the greatest victorie that euer any Christian Prince before that time obtained against the Turkish Kings. The fields thereabouts lay couered with the dead bodies of the slaine Turks,
B whose carrion carkasses so infected the aire, that many of the better sort of the inhabitants of the country were glad for a season to leaue their dwellings, and to get them further off, for feare of infection. Afterwards he in great triumph came to BVDA, and there presented vnto King Vladislaus the enemies ensignes, with such a part of the spoile, as might both well declare the greatnesse of the victorie, and beseeme the greatnesse of so great a Prince, which the King thankfully receiued, highly commending his great valour, the fame whereof had in short time filled euery corner of EVROPE.

Amurath a little before this great ouerthrow of his armie in TRANSILVANIA, assuring himselfe of the victorie, had sent a proud embassage vnto King Vladislaus into HVNGARIE, offering him peace, vpon condition, That he should deliuer vnto him the strong citie of BEL-
C GRADE, or else yeeld to pay him a yeerely tribute: vnto which, vpon the first report of the victorie, answere was giuen by the King, answerable to the proud demand, That according to the issue of matters in TRANSILVANIA, he would shortly in person himselfe come and giue him farther answere. With which short answere the proud embassadours were dismissed and gone, a little before the comming of Huniades to BVDA.

How much this late ouerthrow grieued the great King Amurath, Vladislaus was not ignorant; either of his power and desire of reuenge, as sufficiently warned thereof by the worthie Huniades: for the withstanding whereof, he thought it good not to be vnprouided. Wherefore calling together the states of his kingdome, and with them Iulian the Cardinall of S. Angel, the Popes Legate; at such time as they were all assembled, he propounded vnto them the greatnesse of the D danger threatened by the angrie Turke, leauing it vnto their graue consideration, to determine how the same were by strong hand and plaine force, or otherwise to be auerted. In which most honourable assemblie, Iulian the Cardinall, of purpose sent thither by Pope Vrbane to stirre vp the Hungarians against the Turks, being requested by the King to deliuer his opinion first, spake vnto them as followeth:

The effectuall speech of Iulian the Popes legate in the parliament to perswade the war.

Since the time that the Turkish pestilence began to rage in EVROPE, no newes was euer more welcome vnto the great Bishop, vnto the Apostolicall Senate, and other Princes of ITALIE (most mightie King, and you other most worthie Princes) than when it was told them, That Vladislaus, King of E POLONIA, was by you also chosen King of HVNGARIE. For a fitter gouernour of the Hungarian state, and leader of their power, could not the Hungarians any where haue found: as he in whom iustice, religion, wisedome, valour, and martiall skill, doth so abound, that he seemeth rather for the good of this kingdome by God sent from heauen, than here in earth chosen by men. By this happie and fortunate choice, the minds also of all the Italians, which before lay heauie and discouraged, were lightened and reuiued: and therefore, that this choice might be vnto the Christian common-weale both glorious and fortunate, they made their solemne vowes and praiers. At such time as the most holy Senate vnderstood of the ciuill discord of this kingdome, and the danger of the Turks fast by; it sent me hither to deale with you for the appeasing of those troubles and repressing of that mischiefe (as you haue oftentimes heard mee F say.) The kingdome is by your force and valour, by my mediation, and the death of the Queene, well pacified: but yet the other remaineth full of honour, full of profit, full of safetie, glorie, and immortalitie, best fitting Vladislaus conduct and fortune, and the valour of the Hungarians. The Turkish tyrannie and their proud command (worthie Princes) is to be represt: yea their seruile yoke, hanging euen now ouer our necks, is to be shaken off, and to be driuen away. What you are to dare to doe, the valour and fortune of Huniades foretelleth you: the fortune said I of Huniades, nay the fortune of the Christian common-weale, and present mercie of our blessed Sauiour, which suffereth his people to be vp and downe tossed, but not quite drowned. If so great a armie of the enemies was vanquished and put to slight by the power of one of thy captaines, and that but small: what is to be hoped of thee (most mightie King) if thou shalt lead forth thine armies thy selfe in person, vnder thine owne conduct, and the protection of Christ Iesus? The eyes of all Christian Princes are cast vpon thee, vpon the Hungarian and Poloman forces; vpon thee haue they reposed all their hopes, they all expect that thou shouldest be the reuenger of the Barbarian crueltie, the defender of the faith, and protector of EVROPE: and that is it for which the Pope doth with his letters daily solicite and importune you. And albeit, that the common cause and quarrell of the Christian religion require it, yet doth the necessitie of HVNGARIE and POLONIA no lesse enforce it: of which, the one is most miserably and daily vexed with the Turks forces and furie out of SERVIA and DALMATIA; and the other out of MOLDAVIA and VALACHIA. Now if any there be, whom neither the zeale of religion, the necessitie of the cause, the hope of immortall fame and glorie, can moue, let their owne safetie, the present seruitude of their wiues and children, the safegard of their wealth and substance, the lawfull reuenge of the wrongs done them, stirre them vp to take in hand this sacred expedition. So fit an opportunitie is now giuen vnto you, that at one and the selfe-same time you may set your bodies in perpetuall safetie and happinesse, your soules in quietnesse and rest, and vnto both giue eternall glorie and happinesse. You lacke not (worthie captaines) money, the sinewes of the warre, which shall be brought vnto you from all parts of the Christian common-wealth, not lustie and courageous souldiers, not policie, not fortune, not the propitious heauenly powers, which haue made choice of you for the defence of the true faith and religion: you want nothing (worthie Princes) but will. It is an expedition necessarie, religious, profitable, and honourable: wherein are propounded most ample rewards both in this life, and in the life to come. Wherefore (most mightie Prince, and you right worthie Princes all) I pray and beseech you by the faith of Christ Iesus, by the loue of your children, by the health of your kingdome, and deliuerance from your present destruction, with valiant courage, and one consent to take this sacred warre in hand, and so thereby to enroll your names in the eternall booke of fame. And sith that you are to goe, not so much to a worldly as a spirituall warre, against the enemies of Christ and his truth, take vp your armes with such zeale, courage, and cheerefulnesse, as the expectation and hope of men, as your valour, the present danger, and the mercies of God towards you, seeme of right to require.

The pitifull complaint of the Despot, of the crueltie of the Turks, perswading the Hungarians to take the way against them in hand.

The Legate hauing made an end, forthwith ensued the miserable supplication and teares of the Despot, perswading them, of the necessitie of that expedition to be taken in hand, declaring vnto them the crueltie of the Turks, their torments and strange tortures, his sonnes depriued of their sight, and spoiled of their genitoires, many halfe mangled, and moe cut in sunder with sawes; some slaine quicke, and other buried aliue, with many other strange kinds of death, such as would abhorre any Christian eares to heare. And warning the Hungarians, by his example to beware how much they had need to looke to themselues, told them, That they were but by the riuer SAVVS diuided from the Turks; which in Summer was oftentimes to be waded ouer, and in Winter hard frozen, and so to be passed: that the countrey beyond DANVBIVS lay all open vpon them; and that he, sometime the rich King of SERVIA, was now driuen into exile by the power of the Turke, depriued of his kingdome, of his children, shamefully disgraced, spoiled of his wealth and fortune, glad to flie from place to place, and yet not able to finde any safe place to rest in. First he fled (as he said) to RAGVSIVM, where by and by he was sought after, and endangered by the Turks: then into HVNGARIE, which was also forthwith by them on euery side infested; and whereof the Barbarian King now asked tribute, to haue some colour for the inuasion thereof: which dreadfull enemie was not farre off from it, but still houered euen ouer it: as well witnessed VALACHIA and TRANSILVANIA, two of the greatest and richest prouinces of the Hungarian kingdome; which had not the valour of Huniades, the fortune of the common-weale, and aboue all, the mercie of God, deliuered out of the hands of this filthie nation, the state of HVNGARIE had now beene vtterly forlorne. The euents of warre (he said) were diuers, fortune vncertaine, and that God would not euery day be tempted. Wherefore with many teares abundantly running downe his aged face, he besought King Vladislaus and the rest, not to let slip this faire occasion, neither by cowardise or negligence to breake off the course of their good fortune and victorie: but to make choice rather to become reuengers of other mens harmes than of their owne, and to satisfie the good opinion the world had conceiued of them. He was (as he said) a sufficient example to all men. Besides that, he offred a great summe of mony himselfe towards the defraying of the charges of the war, assuring them also of great supplies both of men & money from diuers other Christian

A Christian Princes. Which opinion of the Legat and Despots, being generally liked and approued, a decree was made by the whole court of parlament there assembled, That the King should himselfe in person with all speed possible entertaine that honourable warre. So that though it were now vpon the approch of winter, yet were men taken vp in euery place, and embassadors sent vnto the Emperour, and the other neighbour Princes, to pray of them aid against the common enemie. Who for the most part excused themselues by their owne particular affaires, but sent no aid at all. Neuertheless many deuout Christians both out of FRANCE and GERMANIE, for the zeale they bare vnto Christ and the Christian religion, forsaking wife and children, and whatsoeuer they had else, came and worthily serued vpon their owne charge. The Spring being
B come, and supplications made in all places for the prosperous successe of that religious warre, King Vladislaus the first of May set forward from BVDA, where passing the riuer DANVBIVS, and marching faire and softly, and comming to the riuer TIBISCVS, he there staied three dayes for the comming of his armie. Departing thence, and marching on alongst the side of DANVBIVS, vntill he came within the sight of BVLGARIA, he there at a place called COBIS, ouer against SYNDEROVIA, passed ouer DANVBIVS with his armie, which was now growne very great: and so marched directly to SOPHIA situate about six daies march from DANVBIVS, in the frontiers of BVLGARIA, so called of a most sumptuous and magnificent temple there built by Iustinian the great Emperour. Which citie being then old and ruinous, and but badly fortified, was ea-
C ment burnt, as were all the other countrey townes and villages thereabouts, to the terrour of the rest. Marching thence, he came vnto the riuer MORAVA, and there encamped: where the plaine countrey easily riseth and falleth in manner of the sea when it is moued with a little wind. Here fiue hundred light horsemen, being sent ouer the riuer, not so much to seeke after prey, as to view the countrey which way the armie might most safely and easily passe, hapned vpon the Turks scouts, of whom they tooke foure: and vnderstanding by them, that two thousand of the Turks were comming at hand, knowing themselues too weake to encounter them, they retired backe againe with all speed they could vnto the riuer: where many of them, for feare, leapt headlong from the high and broken bankes, and so perished in the deepe; the rest terrified with the misfortune of their fellowes, stood still doubtfully expecting what should become of them-
D selues. Beyond the riuer was another hill, vpon the top whereof the King with a great number of horsemen were hunting: whom the Turks a farre off descrying, and doubting to fall into some ambush, of purpose laid for them betwixt them and the riuer, without comming on further, retired. Which they that before fearfully staied on the farre side of the riuer perceiuing, and now encouraged by the comming of the King downe to the riuer, followed a while after, so to increase their feare; and so hauing well feared one another, retired on both sides worse afraid than hurt. The next day the King passed ouer the riuer, sending out his scouts to see if all were cleare before him: by whom he was aduertised that the Turks were at hand, hauing placed certaine ambushes fast by, expecting but a fit time to set vpon him. Whereupon entring into counsell with his best and most expert captaines, what were best to be done; it was resolued vp-
E on, that Huniades the next night with ten thousand choice horsemen, should vpon the sudden set vpon the enemie, then fearing nothing lesse. Who conducted by the espials, was in the first watch of the night brought very neere vnto them. The Moone by chance as fauouring his great attempt, did then shine out, so that he might well discerne how the enemie lay encamped, and which way for to charge them to his most aduantage; which was by the same way they were most like to flie, if they should be put to the worst: vnto which place he led his men, and there with a most hideous outcrie, entred the campe, as then for the most part buried in sleepe and securitie: when as the Turks awaked with the sudden noise as it were out of a dead sleepe, and dismaied with the horrour of the crie, began to betake them some to their weapons, some to their heeles. Of whom such as fled, lighting vpon the enemies troupes standing in their way, ran F as fast backe againe: the other scarce yet well awake, and ouercome with feare, and now scarcely themselues, had much adoe to make themselues readie to fight. Huniades in the meane time riding vp and downe amongst his men, cheered them vp, still crying out and calling vpon them, couragiously to assaile their sleepie, naked, and fearefull enemies, and not to let slip so faire an occasion and so notable a victorie now alreadie in their hands. At the first encounter the Turks rather made a stirre than fought; but after that they heard that Huniades was there, as men dismaied with his name, they turned their backs and fled, finding which way soeuer they tooke, G their fellowes halfe dead or wounded: yea such a confusion was raised amongst them, with the greatnesse of the sudden feare, that thrusting together, with an inconsiderate desire of flight, they trod one another vnder foot, and thrust themselues vpon one anothers weapons: the greatest part of them driuen headlong into the thickets, and other straits, and not able in time to get out thence, were there by the victorious enemie fiercely pursuing of them, slaine. All that night the fearefull Turks were with great slaughter held in chace: but as soone as it was day, the rest that remained of them, ran also the same fortune with their fellowes. A farre greater slaughter was there made, than a man would thinke that so few men could haue made, when as but with ten thousand horse, thirtie thousand Turks were in one night slaine, and foure thousand taken, H with a number of their ensignes. Of Huniades his men were not many lost, for the greatnesse of the slaughter: most report not aboue fiue hundred; for few of them found any enemie to resist them. There was taken all the spoile of a most rich campe, the enemie hauing caried with them nothing out of it. Huniades hauing in so short time gained so notable a victorie, and enriched his armie, returned to the King in great triumph; neither was that day more ioyfull vnto these victorious souldiers, than vnto the rest of the armie, who most ioyfully expected their returne. The King and the Despot, hearing of the approch of Huniades from the slaughter of the Turks, with the great applause and ioyfull acclamation of the other legions went to meet him three miles: and at such time as at their first meeting Huniades was about to haue lighted to haue done him honour, he would in no case suffer him so to doe, but taking him by the right hand, ioyed I with him for the victorie, thanking God in the hearing of the whole armie, that he of his mercie had giuen him such a captaine, as without enuie in all mens iudgements was worthie to rule the Romane empire. In briefe, he shewed how much his countrey, his kingdome, yea the Christian common-weale was bound and indebted vnto him, gaue him his due praises, exhorting all others to imitate his glorie: the like honour did also all the rest of the nobilitie vnto him. As for the common souldiers, they could not be satisfied with beholding of him, but embracing one another, as if they would haue died one in anothers armes, welcommed their victorious friends. So with ioy ioyning their forces together, and sending the rich spoile of the enemie, with the prisoners chained together in long rankes, before them; the King and Huniades in great triumph returned into the campe, where they caused generall praiers, with thanksgiuing vnto almightie K God for so great a victorie, to be made thorowout the armie.

The meeting of Vladislaus and Huniades after the victorie.

The Legate Iulian, Generall of the voluntarie Christians, which for deuotion serued of their owne charge, after so great a victorie most earnestly perswaded the King & the rest of the great commanders of the armie to prosecute their good fortune, and in God his so great fauour not to loiter, but daily to march forward, and to take in the rest of Bvlgaria. Now had Huniades by his espials learned, that from Sophia it was but three dayes iourney to Philippopolis, a great citie of Thracia; and the like distance from thence to Hadrianople, the chiefe seat of the Turkish tyrant; and as much more to Constantinople. The onely difficultie was, how to passe the great and rough mountaine Hæmvs, which running a maruellous way in length, euen vnto the Euxine sea, and mating almost the skie, diuideth the countries of Bvlgaria and Servia, from Macedonia and Thrace: and for the great height and roughnesse L thereof, is not to be passed ouer but in two places; the one made by the great Emperour Traian and the Romanes, where as yet is to be seene a mightie strong gate built of great square stone, whereby the passage that way was opened or shut at the pleasure of them that had the keeping thereof: the other neere vnto a little riuer, which the Bulgarians now call Saltiza. By either of these waies if he should find them open, Huniades, vnto whom the King had committed both the leading and the conduct of the armie, purposed to enter. Wherfore marching forward, they tooke all such towns of Bvlgaria as stood in their way; some by force, some by composition: wherin was no small helpe, the conformitie of the Christian religion, the horrible crueltie of the Turks, and great affinitie of language, the most effectuall meanes to win the loue of strangers: M For the Polonians and the Bulgarians, both descended of the Sclauonians, and vsing the same language, the Polonian horsemen came to no towne, but it presently yeelded. But being come vnto the mountaine Hæmvs, to haue entered into Thracia, the Winter weather being now very cold, they learned by their espials, that the aforesaid passages were both fast shut vp with great stones, timber, and such other like matter, so strongly, as that they were very hardly

A to be forced. Wherefore Huniades leauing the straighter way made by the hand of man (which beside the former fortification at the great gate, the Turks had in many places, with abundance of water poured downe the steepe hill in the night, and hard frozen with the coldnesse of the weather, made so slipperie, as that it was not possible either for man or beast there to stand, or to get vp that way) vpon Christmas euen came to the other, by which the riuer Saltiza runneth, the which he found likewise shut. Here they met with many inconueniences: first, the difficultie of the passage, which old Amurath had not without great reason shut vp, and there placed strong garrisons, so at ease & without danger of battaile (so often by his Bassaes vnfortunatly proued) to defend his kingdome in MACEDONIA and THRACIA from the inuasion of the Hungari-
B ans, whom now of all nations he most dreaded. Beside that, in the armie was such want of all things, as that the souldiers were readie to forsake their ensignes, and to rise vp in a generall mutinie: for the countrey neere vnto the mountaine HEMVS, rising high with broken rockes and inaccessible places, was altogether barren, & victuals failing in the camp, they were glad to liue with a little wheat & flesh boiled together, and that so sparingly, as that the souldiers began now generally to grow weake & faint. Besides that, the Winter was exceeding cold, and the frost so great, that many times they could not goe out of their tents to seeke for forrage or water. So that the armie enforced with hunger & cold, and the difficultie of the passage, began to retire, & had now vndoubtedly beene dissolued, had it not been for the often and earnest persuasions of Huniades: for he daily told them, that the greatest difficulties were alreadie past, that that which re-C mained, was with their wonted valour and courage to be endured, whereunto nothing was high or difficult: that they should forthwith come into the borders of THRACIA, where they should find plentie of all things: that they were now come so farre, that if they would goe back againe, they should in those wast countries, through which they were to passe, find greater difficulties and dangers than in going forward: that these straights once opened, remained no more trauell, but cheerefully to fall to the spoile of a most rich & pleasant country. They were not (as he said) to stay in the middest of their fortunes, for that it was not alwaies permanent: and for that the contempt of God his fauours, caused them to be oftentimes taken from vs: all that was yet done (hee said) was nothing, if they proceeded not farther: for that whatsoeuer they had alreadie woon, was easily by the enemie to be recouered; except that those which yet remained (for that D most part of them, as he said, were slaine with their houses burnt ouer their heads) were driuen out of THRACIA and MACEDONIA, and so quite out of EVROPE. So whilest the souldiers heard Huniades speake, euery man was well encouraged: but when they remembred the miseries wherewith they were enuironed, they cursed all the rash attempts of ambitious princes. In the meane time newes was brought by the scouts, that the Turkes were comming after them: but then began they to reioice, as deeming it much more honor, manfully to die in battell, than to starue with hunger and cold. Against these Turks was Huniades sent, with certaine troups of horsemen: who encountring with them, easily inforced them with losse to retire. Eight times he encountred them (as the souldiers there present reported) and as often put them to flight. In retiring back frō the impregnable mountaine, the king with the greatest part of the armie went be-E fore; after whom followed Huniades and the Despot, a good daies march: when the Turks that kept the passage vpon the mountaine, vnderstanding of their returne, followed them downe the hill, in good hope to be of thē well reuenged, before they should get out of BVLGARIA. Carambey the Bassa of ROMANIA, & brother to Caly-Bassa (a man of all others in greatest fauor with Amurath, & his brother in law, as hauing married his sister) was generall of this armie, and by him appointed for the keeping of these straits; with expresse charge, vpon no occasion whatsoeuer, although it made shew of neuer so assured a victorie, to fight with the enemie: for he thought it victorie ynough, without any losse to haue kept his enemies out of THRACIA. Which the old kings command, Carambey for all that neglected, in good hope by a notable victory easily to answer the contempt of that he was commanded. The Christian armie descending downe the F broken mountains was come to a great mountain, which the Bulgarians call CVNOBIZA, and part of the mountain HEMVS: at whose heeles followed Carambey, with his Turks, still houering ouer their heads, to take them at some aduantage: whom the Christians beholding, could not by their captaines be staied, but that they would many times by companies flie forth vpon them, and desperatly fight with them in places of great disaduantage, saying, That they had rather die in fight like men, then to starue with hunger and cold. Here Carambey, being himselfe a man of great courage,and deſirous of honour,and by the raſhneſſe of his enemies allured to fight; and withall, beſide the aduantage of the ground, perceiuing himſelfe to exceed his enemies both in ſtrength and number of men, could not be ſtaied but would needs giue battaile, with ſuch a deſire. as if he had been alreadie aſſured of the victorie. Huniades and the Deſpot had before perceiued that the Turks,prouoked with the brauing of their men,would aſſuredly fall vpon them, and were therefore much troubled with the abſence of the king, who(as is beforeſaid)was gone a dayes march before they ſaw they could neither ſhun battaile, neither if they could haue ſo done, would their deſperat ſouldiers be ſtayed, for the deſire they had to fight. Yet ſeeing Carambey comming down vpon them,they put themſelues(though vnwillingly)in beſt order they could to receiue him; perſwading their ſouldiers not raſhly in furie to run vpon their enemies, as deſperat men prodigall of their liues,but to keepe their rankes,and orderly to fight,and ſo like valiant men to carie away the victorie, or to leaue vnto their enemies a bloodie remembrance thereof. Now had Carambey ſent his horſemen down the hill,and the battaile was begun,where both the armies met together with great furie,and a cruel fight was made both at the foot of the hill,and amongſt the hils and vallies alſo: in which hard encounter many were ſlaine,as well on the one ſide as the other. The Polonian men at armes(whom the king but a little before had left with Huniades againſt all euents)with the Hungarian light horſemen (of whom the Deſpot had the leading) fought ſo that day,as if they had ſought for nothing more but how honourably to die.And the Turks for a ſpace ſtood hard to it,ſo that many were there ſlaine: yet at length finding themſelues hardly laied to,as by deſperat men,reſolued to ſell their liues deere,they began to faint and to giue ground: when as Carambey comming in behind them with new ſupplies, rated the cowardly,ſtayed them that were flying,and ſometime with rough ſpeeches,ſometime with faire perſwaſion, encouraged the wauering, and reſtored the battaile, before almoſt quite loſt. Neither did Huniades and the Deſpot ceſſe beſtirre them,but as ſoone as they perceiued the enemie a little to faint, by and by cried out Victorie; with cheerefull ſpeech encouraging their men, ſtill calling vpon them, To keepe their rankes ſtrong, and to vrge their preſent good fortune,aſſuring themſelues,that they fought againſt thoſe infidels, vnder the fauour and protection of the Almightie. And forthwith ſent certaine companies of footmen, who climbing vp the hill,amongſt the buſhes,with their halfe pikes and bore-ſpeares paunched the Turks horſes as they paſſed by them. Theſe looſe companies did the Turks horſemen much harme, and here began their battaile to decline; they which were comming downe, for feare of the danger retiring backe againe vnto them that were left aboue, for the keeping of the ſtraits. And the bolder ſort of them, which were come downe into the valleyes, compaſſed about with the men at armes,hardly recouered the riſing of the hill. Carambey in the meane while crying out behind them, one while called backe them that fled, another while releeued them that fainted, and to the vttermoſt of his power reſtoring the battaile, performed all the parts both of a valiant ſouldier and worthie captaine, courageouſly fighting himſelfe in the thickeſt of his enemies, and by his owne valour ſtaied for a time the loſt battaile. At length performing his laſt endeuour, deceiued by the ſnow,he fell into a bogge,where ſticking faſt with his horſe,and not able to helpe himſelfe, hee was taken priſoner by a common ſouldier. The reſt that eſcaped out of this bloodie battaile,retired themſelues vnto them that were left aboue vpon the mountaine for the defence of the paſſage.After whom the Chriſtians followed,through the vntract and rough places, vntill that hindered of their farther purſuit by the approch of the night, and the abruptneſſe of the way, they were glad to ſound a retrait, and ſo retired vnto the campe. Many other great men were taken beſide Carambey, but many moe ſlaine in the battaile, and moſt of all in the flight; few eſcaped,but ſuch as fled backe againe vp into the mountaines. In the retrait Huniades ſeeing ſo gallant a man as was Carambey (though to him altogether vnknowne) vnworthily bound, and led priſoner by a common ſouldier, asked the ſouldier, if he would ſell his priſoner? who ſaid,he would; and asked for him ten duckats(a poore price for ſo great a man:) vnto whom Huniades commaunded to be giuen four hundred,and ſo ſent him to his tent,comforting of him vp with cheereful words,and willing that he ſhould be well vſed. The Deſpot the ſame night comming to Huniades his tent,to conferre with him about the remainder of the war, and ſeeing ſo braue a man ſtanding among the reſt by the fire ſide,began to talke with him in the Turkiſh language, whereof he had ſome knowledge, by reaſon of the neereneſſe of the nation, and ſuch matters as he had ſometimes to do with them;and hauing ſome geſſe by his talke what he

A he was, and pitying his eſtate, asked Huniades, how he would ranſome him? who ſaid, that he coſt him foure hundred duckats, but that he valued him at fortie thouſand, which the Deſpot offered to pay him. Thus by the ſtrange change of fortune was Carambey, of late ſo great a commander, and ſo neere allied vnto the great Turke, valued and prized twice in one day by his enemies, as a mirrour of the vncertaintie of worldly bliſſe & felicitie. The Polonians report ſomewhat otherwiſe of this battell, as that Vladiſlaus ſhould himſelfe therein be preſent, and the chiefe that therein commanded: howbeit the Hungarian writers, whoſe credit herein we follow, report it as before, not to haue beene fought vnder the good fortune of the King then abſent, but vnder the leading of Huniades and the Deſpot.

B Out of this battell (or as ſome others report, a little before out of the battell of MORAVA) fled the great captaine George Caſtriot, otherwiſe of the Turks called Scanderbeg, now ſeeking to deliuer both himſelfe, and his natiue countrey of EPIRVS out of the thraldome of the Turks, as preſently after he did: whoſe vnwonted flight, not a little terrified the reſt of the Turks armie, and much furthered the Chriſtians victorie, whoſe proceedings he alwaies ſecretly fauoured: hauing (as it was thought) ſecret intelligence with the great captaine Huniades, who not without inſtructions from him (as ſome ſay) gaue that great ouerthrow vnto the Turks at MORAVA. But of him and his worthie acts done for the deliuerance and defence of his countrey, more ſhall be ſaid hereafter. Scanderbeg reuolteth from the Turks.

Shortly after this great ouerthrow and diſcomfiture of the Turks, the two great captaines C Huniades, and the Deſpot, together with the King, conſulted for the remouing of the Turks garriſons left aboue for the keeping of the ſtrait paſſages of the mountaine, and the proſecution of the war. Which Vladiſlaus (conſidering the difficultie of the matter, and his ſouldiers neceſſitie) thought it not good further to proſecute, but forthwith to returne. But Huniades and the Deſpot, the one thirſting after honour, and the other in no leſſe hope, by the good ſucceſſe of this warre, to recouer againe his loſt kingdome, ſaid, That the Turks were in any caſe to be remoued, the paſſage opened, and the ſparks that yet remained, for feare of raiſing a greater fire, extinguiſhed: oppoſing againſt the difficultie by the King alleaged, the inuincible courage of his ſouldiers, whereunto they ſaid nothing was impoſſible or difficult. Vnto which opinion the King alſo (leſt he ſhould ſeeme to diſtruſt the valour of his captaines or ſouldiers) eaſily yeelded, and ſo com-

D manded on God his name to ſet forward. The firſt that mounted the hill was the King his battell, which by the roughneſſe and abruptneſſe of the mountaine hindered, oftentimes ſtaied. But Huniades ſtil caried with an earneſt deſire to proſecute the victorie, and leauing nothing vnattempted, in ſearching about found a crooked turning way, whereby he with his men more eaſily & readily got vp to the top of the mountaine euen with their enemies, vndeſcried or moleſted, by reaſon of the broken couert of the place: from whence they were in good hope eaſily to haue come vnto their enemies. But being come vp to the place they deſired, they found ſuch a deepe and wide gaping of the rocke, betwixt them and the enemie, as was neither to be paſſed, or filled vp: yet being come very neere, they attempted by croſbow ſhot, and great ſtones caſt out of ſlings, and other ſuch engines, to haue remoued the Turks from their places: who were Vladiſlaus ſeeketh in vaine to open the paſſage of the mountain Hemus.

E therewith and with their vnexpected approch, at the firſt ſo greatly both annoied and diſcomfited, that they were almoſt at the point to haue forſaken the paſſage, had not Alis Beg (but the night before choſen for their Generall in ſtead of Carambey) encouraged them and taught them, how by ſhrowding themſelues vnder the broken rocks, & parapets with tumultarie labour caſt vp, to ſaue themſelues from the ſhot of their enemies. In the meane time alſo, Huniades by another more high & ſteepe way, whereby the enemie was alſo to be approched, had ſent vp other companies of ſouldiers: who fighting at too much diſaduantage, were by the Turks eaſily reiected. So at length ſeeing the vaine attempt giuen by himſelfe vpon the top of the hill: and the deſperate danger of the other in climing the inacceſſible mountaine, where one might keepe downe an hundred, deſpairing to inforce the enemie, he by the Kings command, cauſed a re-

F trait to be ſounded, and ſo againe retired downe the mountaine, to the great reioycing of the Turks. The next day the winter cold raging, and wants in the armie ſtill more and more increaſing, the King with the reſt of the great commanders entred into conſultation for the haſting of their returne out of that rough and barren countrey, into places of greater plentie, before the armie were brought to any greater extremitie. Whereunto Huniades (giuing place vnto neceſſitie, which alwaies ſuffereth not to be regarded that is ſeemely) now eaſily yeelded: onely the

Deſpot ſpake againſt it, blaming them, that hauing taken the Generall, and put their enemies to flight, and victorie now as it were in their hands, they would not proſecute the ſmall remainder of the warre, but cowardly turne their backs vnto their vanquiſhed enemies: promiſing that he himſelfe would find money enough for the prouiding of all things needfull for the releefe of the armie. So ſaid the Popes Legat alſo. But foraſmuch as the wants in the armie were great, and the ſouldiers preſently pinched with hunger and cold, they could with no hope of any profit, were it neuer ſo great, be perſwaded to ſtay; openly crying out, that it was not their captaines and lieutenants, which wanted nothing, but them the poore ſouldiers that ſtarued for hunger: as for the Deſpot, that he in hope of recouering of his kingdome, perſwaded things impoſſible, and no way to be performed, neither to be any thing moued with the death of their men or cattell. Need (they ſaid) could not be vanquiſhed: but that when Winter was paſt, they would willingly returne againe vnto the ſacred warre: In the meane time, Winter raging, and hunger commanding, let vs giue ouer (ſaid they) and depart into more fruitfull places, there to refreſh our bodies, ſpent with labour, cold, and hunger. For which reaſons, the King ſending before his baggage, retired againe by the ſame way he came. Which the Turks from aboue beholding, and ſtrengthened with new ſupplies, followed after them, as after men that had fled: oftentimes aſſailing them in the rereward, and ſetting vpon them ſometimes on the one ſide, ſometimes on the other, with often skirmiſhes both did and receiued much harme. Whoſe manner of fight was, to retire when they were themſelues charged, and preſently by great troupes to charge againe their enemies, their backs once turned to them; and ſo troubled the armie, that it was conſtrained oftentimes to ſtay; beſides that, loaded with the rich ſpoile of the enemie, and much baggage, it could not of it ſelfe make any great haſte. Now was it by the way come into a great thicke wood, full of deepe bogs and water-courſes, hard to be paſſed thorow: where the reſt of the armie going before, in the rereward, at the entrance of the wood, were left certaine ſtrong companies of men at armes, as a wall againſt the purſuing enemies; whom the Turks with their readie light horſemen fiercely charged: where betwixt them, in the wood, was fought a great fight, and a great tumult raiſed: vnto the noiſe whereof, they which marched before haſtily returning, in skirmiſhing, many of them fell into thoſe deepe bogs and queachie places, out of which they could hardly rid themſelues againe. Beſides that, there were many crooked and troubleſome turnings and windings, with ſudden deſcents, ſo ſteepe, as that in going downe the ſame, their horſes came tumbling heeles ouer head, and there lay ouerthrowne, together with their riders: in ſuch ſort, as that to auoid theſe difficulties, they were oftentimes enforced to fight on foot. In which troubleſome skirmiſh, about foureſcore of the men at armes were loſt; but of the Turks, beſide them which were ſlaine, were taken an hundred and ſeuentie, all whom Huniades cauſed to be preſently ſlaine. In this wood the Chriſtians were more troubled with the difficulties of the place, than the enemies aſſaults. Wherefore wants daily more and more increaſing in the armie, which by reaſon of the multitude of their cariages, abundance of their baggage, and often aſſaults of the Turks, was able to make no way: the King for feare his armie ſhould in ſo long and ſlow a march thorow thoſe troubleſome & barren countries, be conſumed with hunger and other wants, cauſed all the cariages and baggage to be brought into the middeſt of the armie, and of it, all ſuch things as ſerued rather for burthen than vſe, to be there burnt: and the armes as well of ſuch ſouldiers as he had loſt, as of the enemie, to be buried in the ground, and all the weake beaſts that ſerued for burthen, to be killed. So the armie well diſcharged of ſuch vnprofitable burthens, marched much more ſpeedily, neither was ſo much ſubiect vnto the aſſaults of the Turks, as before. And ſo at length by long iournies, Vladiſlaus with his armie arriued at Belgrade, where he was of his ſubiects honourably receiued. And hauing there ſtaied certaine dayes, and well refreſhed his armie, departing thence, and paſſing the riuer Savus, came to the royall citie of Buda: where he was of all his ſubiects ioyfully receiued alſo. The Legat and Huniades going on his right hand, and the Deſpot on the left: after whom followed other colonels, captaines, and lieutenants, with their companies; who at the firſt meeting with the citizens, more than a mile out of the citie, in token of their mutuall ioy, gaue together ſuch ioyfull acclamations and outcries, as that the heauens ſeemed to reſound, and the earth to ſhake with the noiſe thereof. Before the King, at his comming vnto the citie, went a long companie of the notable Turks captiues; and next before him, Carambey, bound in chaines, vpon whom all mens eyes were fixed. With them were alſo caried the enemies enſignes, and ſuch

ſpoiles

A ſpoiles as had beene ſaued. Behind the King came Huniades in a triumphant robe, in the middeſt betwixt the Legate on the right hand, and the Deſpot on the left, as he that next vnto the King had beſt deſerued the honour of the triumph. Next vnto them followed the deuout Chriſtians, that for the zeale of religion had moſt honourably of their owne charges voluntarie ſerued in thoſe wars: and on both ſides of them the ciuill magiſtrates and beſt of the citizens: behind them came the reſt of the legions; and about them both vpon the right hand and the left, the promiſcuous common people, doubling and redoubling the praiſes of the King, and Huniades. Before all theſe went the prelates and prieſts in ſolemne proceſſion, ſinging hymnes and pſalmes of thankſgiuing vnto almightie God. Vladiſlaus comming vnto the gate of the citie, ac-
B knowledging God to haue beene the author of ſo great a victorie, alighting from his horſe, on foot went firſt vnto the cathedrall church of our ladie; and there giuing moſt hartie thanks vnto almightie God, hanged vp the enemies enſignes, & part of the ſpoile, in perpetuall remembrãce of ſo notable a victorie: which he afterward cauſed to be moſt liuely depainted in a faire table of moſt curious worke, and there in the ſame church to be hanged vp: as were alſo the armes of all the noble Chriſtians that ſerued in that moſt famous expedition, which there long time after remained. Which ſolemnities ended, he went to his pallace in the caſtle, and there hauing giuen vnto euerie man, but eſpecially vnto Huniades, his due commendation, gaue them leaue to depart. Thus the Hungarians, with whom alſo the Polonians in moſt part agree, report of this notable expedition of their king Vladiſlaus: howbeit the Turks (notable diſſemblers of their C own loſſes) confeſſing the great ouerthrow, call the Baſſa ſo ouerthrowne not by the name of Carambey, but of Caſſanes; and the noble priſoner that was taken, by the name of Mechmet Beg, Sanzacke of ANCYRA Amurath his ſonne in law, and brother to Cali-Baſſa Amurath his great councellour, of ſome called Carambey after the name of his father.

Out of this late ſlaughter of the Turkes, wherein Carambey was taken, eſcaped that valiant prince and famous warriour George Caſtriot (of the Turks called Scanderbeg) as is before declared: whoſe noble mind had long time deſired to breake out of the golden fetters of the Turkiſh thraldome, and to be reuenged of the intollerable iniuries by Amurath done to his countrey, his parents, his brethren, and himſelfe. Although he had alwaies moſt warily diſſembled the ſame, for feare of the old tirant: being oftentimes ſolicited and animated thereunto by ſecret letters
D and meſſengers from his friends in EPIRVS, knowing right well that the leaſt ouerture thereof, had bin vnto him preſent death. But finding no fit meanes for the accompliſhmẽt therof, wiſely diſſembled the ſame, with all the ſhewes of loue and loyaltie vnto Amurath that might be: vntill that now in this great ouerthrow of the Turks armie, vnder the leading of Carambey, and in ſo great a confuſion, he tooke occaſion to put in practiſe what he had long before in his deep conceit plotted, for the deliuerie both of himſelfe and his countrey from the Turkiſh bondage and ſlauerie. At which time Scanderbeg (for ſo from henceforth we call him) hauing a little before imparted the matter vnto ſome of his truſtie friends and countrey men, no leſſe deſirous of libertie than himſelfe, but eſpecially vnto his nephew Ameſa, the ſonne of his brother Repoſius, E a young man of great courage (in that great confuſion of the Turkiſh armie, when euerie man was glad to ſhift for himſelfe) had euer in his flight a vigilãt eie vpõ the Baſſaes principall ſecretarie; whom accompanied with a few Turks, he with his nephew Ameſa, and other of his faithfull friends cloſely followed, as he fled frõ the ſlaughter: but whẽ he had got the ſecretarie with his few followers in place moſt conueniẽt for his purpoſe, he ſet vpon the Turks and ſlew them euerie one: and carying the ſecretarie away with him faſt bound, when he had brought him whether he thought good, with great threats cõpelled him (ſore againſt his will) to write counterfait letters, as from the Baſſa his maiſter, vnto the gouernour of CROIA, commanding him in Amuraths name, Forthwith to deliuer vnto Scanderbeg, the new choſen Gouernor, the charge of the citie with the garriſon there: cunningly enterlacing many other things in the ſame letters, wherby the matter might ſeeme more probable. Which letters ſo extorted, he preſently ſlew the F Secretary, & as many more of the Turks as came in his way, of purpoſe that his doings might be the longer kept from the knowledge of Amurath, who not hearing what was become of him, might reaſonably cõiecture that he was ſlain by the Hungarians amõgſt the reſt of the Turks.

Whileſt the fame of this great ouerthrow is going to HADRIANOPLE, and there filleth the Turks court with ſorrow and heauineſſe, in the meane time Scanderbeg hauing with him three thouſand Epirot ſouldiers which followed him out of the battaile, as men deſirous rather to fight

Scanderbeg wiſely diſſembleth his deſire for the deliuerie of himſelfe and his countrey.

fight for the libertie of themſelues and of their countrey, than in the quarrell of the Turke, was G with incredible celeritie come into the vpper countrey of DIBRA, in the borders of EPIRVS, about ſeuentie miles from CROIA: into which countrey he was moſt ioyfully receiued, where he ſtaied but one day, and choſe a few of thoſe three hundred which he brought with him, to wait vpon him when he went to CROIA, as if they had beene his domeſticall ſeruants: the reſt, with other three hundred luſtie ſouldiers, which were then come vnto him out of DIBRA, he appointed to be led by ſecret by-waies thorow the woods and mountaines by perfect guides, vntill they came ſo nigh CROIA as was poſſible for them to come, vnperceiued; and there to ſtay vntill he might find opportunitie to conuay them into the citie to oppreſſe the Turkiſh gar-riſon. So he with a ſmall companie of his followers, as if they had beene his priuate retinew, H tooke the way towards CROIA. But when he began to draw neere to the citie, he ſent Ameſa before with two ſeruitors attending vpon him, as if he had beene his Secretarie, to certifie the Go-uernour of his comming. This young gentleman, as he was of a moſt ſharpe wit, and well ſpoken, ſo had he framed his countenance and attire, that he ſeemed to be a naturall Turke: who aſſoone as he was come into the citie, he went vnto the Gouernour, whom after he had ſaluted according to the Turkiſh manner, he deliuered his meſſage as from Scanderbeg his maſter, with ſo good grace and words ſo well placed, that all he ſaid was verily beleeued for truth. But when Scanderbeg himſelfe came, and had deliuered the great commanders letters, the Gouernour made no further queſtion of the matter, but preſently deliuered vnto him the gouernment of the citie, & the next day departed out of CROIA with all his houſhold towards HADRIANOPLE. I Scanderbeg hauing by this policie got the gouernment of the chiefe citie of EPIRVS, the night following found meanes in the dead time of the night, to receiue into the citie the ſouldiers of DIBRA, who were by this time come according as he had before appointed: moſt part of them he placed in moſt conuenient places of the citie, and for the ſpeedie ſuppreſſion of the Turkiſh garriſon, he with the reſt firſt ſet vpon the Turks which kept the watch vpon the wall, and ſlew them; and afterwards breaking into their priuate houſes, ſlew many of them in their beds: the Chriſtian citizens alſo taking vp armes at the ſame time, helped to increaſe the ſlaughter of the Turks, ſo that in the ſpace of a few houres, there was none of the Turkiſh garriſon left aliue, except ſome few, which were content to forſake their Mahometane ſuperſtition, and to become Chriſtians. Many of the Turks might ſo haue ſaued their liues, and would not, chuſing rather K to die, and (as it is reported) alſo to kill themſelues, than to forſake their damnable ſuperſtition: ſo ſmall is the regard of life vnto reſolute minds, in what quarrell ſoeuer.

The citie of CROIA being thus happily by Scanderbeg recouered, wherein appeared both the greateſt difficultie, and hope of his good or bad ſucceſſe in ſo great an attempt; he preſently ſent Ameſa backe againe into DIBRA, and other ſpeedie meſſengers likewiſe into all the parts of EPIRVS, to diſperſe the newes, and to ſtirre vp the people to take vp armes for the recouerie of their loſt libertie: but flying Fame, the ſpeedie poſt, had preuented the meſſengers by him ſent, and alreadie filled euery corner of EPIRVS with report of Scanderbeg his comming, and of all that was done at CROIA. And the oppreſſed Epirots which had long wiſhed to ſee that happie day, were now vp in armes in euery place, wanting nothing but leaders; whoſe comming al- L though they greatly deſired, yet they ſtaied not thereupon, but running together by heapes (as the manner of the common people is in all great tumults) they ſet vpon the Turks garriſons which lay abroad in the countrey, and ſlew moſt part of them: whereby it came to paſſe, that no Turke could ſtirre in the countrey, but that he was ſnatched vp and ſlaine, ſo that in few dayes there was not a Turke to be found in EPIRVS, but ſuch as lay in garriſons in ſtrong townes. In this furie of the people, the Gouernour of CROIA, with all his retinue, was by the countrey people by the way as he went ſet vpon and ſlaine, and all his goods taken as a prey.

When Scanderbeg had thus recouered CROIA, and ſcoured the countrey; yet to remoue the garriſons which Amurath had put in euery ſtrong citie, was thought to be a matter of great importance, and more difficultie. For which purpoſe he commanded thoſe whom he had ap- M pointed for captaines, ſpeedily to repaire vnto CROIA with all the power they could make. At which time alſo, diuers noble men his nigh kinſmen, reſorted vnto him with their followers: ſo that within a few dayes, he had together at CROIA twelue thouſand ſouldiers well appointed.
With this armie he marched from CROIA to PETRELLA, a ſtrong citie 25 miles diſtant from CROIA, and encamped before it. This citie is ſtrongly ſituate vpon the top of a ſteepe rockie mountaine,

Scanderbeg commeth with his armie to Petrella.

A mountaine,as all the reſt of the cities of EPIRVS be,and was by the Turks well furniſhed with men, munition, and other things needfull: yet Scanderbeg was in good hope, that the Turkiſh gariſon there,terrified with the fortune of the garriſon of CROIA,and the ſlaughter of the Turks in the countrey round about, would be glad to hearken vnto reaſonable conditions. Which to make proofe of, as ſoone as he was encamped, he ſent one of thoſe ſouldiers which had followed him out of HVNGARIE (a faithfull and wiſe fellow) vnto PETRELLA, to offer vnto the ſouldiers, That if they would yeeld vp the citie, it ſhould be at their choice, either to continue in ſeruice with Scanderbeg,with whom they ſhould find moſt bountifull entertainement; or elſe to depart in ſafetie with bagge and baggage at their pleaſure, with an honourable reward to bee
B diuided amongſt them. The ſubtile meſſenger comming thether,and framing his tale according to the preſent occaſion,and neceſſitie of the time;firſt declared vnto them,how that Amurath of late vanquiſhed by the Hungarians in a great battaile, and looking euerie day to be ſet vpon by diuers other Chriſtian princes,was ſo buſied that he had no leiſure to looke into EPIRVS,or to ſend them any releeſe: after that, he in the name of Scanderbeg, offered them the conditions before rehearſed, ſetting the ſame forth with many great words; willing them oftentimes by the way to conſider the dreadfull miſerie that but the other day befell to the garriſon at CROIA, and other their fellowes abroad in the countrey,whoſe dead bodies as then lay in euerie corner of EPIRVS for a prey to the hungrie dogs and greedie wolues: which thing was eaſily beleeued of them of the garriſon, for that diuers of the Turks lately fled out of the countrey into the C citie,had themſelues ſeene the ſame to be true. The Gouernour hauing a little conſidered of the matter,was content to giue vp the citie,vpon condition that he with the ſouldiers might in ſafetie depart with ſuch things as they had: not couenanting vpon any further reward, becauſe it ſhould not be ſaid that he had ſould the citie. Which when Scanderbeg had faithfully promiſed to performe,the Turkiſh Gouernour comming forth with all his garriſon, yeelded vp the citie: Petrella yeelded vnto Scanderbeg. and Scanderbeg mindfull of his promiſe,gaue vnto them both meate and money, and ſent them with a ſufficient conuoy of horſemen in ſafetie out of EPIRVS.

When Scanderbeg had thus gained PETRELLA,he placed therein a conuenient garriſon, and ſet all things in order as he thought good;but ſuffered none to enter into the citie,more than the appointed garriſon,although it was then verie cold and froſtie weather. This done,he preſently
D raiſed his campe,and following his good fortune, marched towards PETRA-ALBA in ſuch haſt, as if the citie had been running away from him; well knowing, that though Time be euer more pretious, yet neuer more than in martiall affaires, wherein the leaſt moment is oftentimes of ſuch power as to effect or fruſtrate mens greateſt deſignes. PETRA-ALBA is a citie in the countrey of ÆMATHIA, diſtant from PETRELLA three miles, ſtrongly ſcituat vpon the top of a mountain, neere vnto the riuer ÆMATHVS. Scanderbeg had ſcarcely well encamped himſelfe before this citie, but that the Gouernour thereof, terrified with the fortune of CROIA,and PETRELLA, offered to deliuer vp the citie, vpon the ſame conditions that were graunted at PETRELLA: which being agreed vpon, the citie was forthwith deliuered, and the conditions by Petra-Alba yeelded. Scanderbeg faithfully performed.

E PETRA-ALBA being thus taken,and all things ſet in order,Scanderbeg caried with the courſe of his victorie, without delay came to STELLVSA, which is alſo a ſtrong citie of ÆMATHIA, fiftie miles diſtant from CROIA, pleaſantly (as it were of purpoſe) built vpon the top of an high hill, ſtanding in the middeſt of a pleaſant & fruitfull vallie, with great plaines round about it. There Scanderbeg encamped a little before the going downe of the Sunne, and reſted that night. In the morning he ſent a meſſenger to the citie, with like conditions as were accepted at PETRELLA Stellusa yeelded by the garriſon. and PETRA-ALBA: which moſt part of the garriſon ſouldiers of the Turks would gladly haue accepted,but that Desdrot the Gouernour of the citie,with ſome few others,earneſtly withſtood the reſt; whereupon a great contention aroſe amongſt the garriſon ſouldiers. But the greater part deſirous to yeeld vp the citie,when they could by no meanes perſwade the Gouernour and F thoſe few which tooke his part,to yeeld to their deſires;they violently ſet vpon him,and deliuered him with the reſt to Scanderbeg, faſt bound, and ſo yeelded vp the citie. For which fact, fearing to returne to Amurath, ſome of them remained with Scanderbeg, and afterwards became Chriſtians: the reſt were either honeſtly prouided for, or elſe well rewarded and ſuffered to depart whether they would. All the other weaker places of EPIRVS wherein any of the Turkiſh garriſons lay, hearing that the ſtrongeſt cities were alreadie deliuered vnto Scanderbeg, in ſhort

time yeelded themselues vpon like conditions: onely SPETIGRADE (otherwise called the holy citie) remained in the possession of the Turks: which citie is placed in the vpper countrey of DIBRA, in the frontiers of EPIRVS, vpon the top of an high and steepe hill, as if it were an Eagles nest. Vnto this citie came Scanderbeg with all his armie: and hauing placed his tents, he began first to assay if he could gaine it by composition, as he had done the rest: and the rather to moue them by the examples of others, he caused his embassadours to declare vnto them all that had happened at CROIA, PETRELLA, PETRA-ALBA, and STELLVSA, especially how he had vsed the garrison of STELLVSA, which yeelded vnto him, with all bountie and courtesie; and how that on the contrary part he had the gouernour in bands, with all his wilfull partakers, whom they should presently see executed before their faces, if they forthwith deliuered not the citie. G H This message troubled the minds of all the garrison, but especially of the gouernour, seeing before his eyes in the wofull example of another man, what might by and by happen vnto himselfe. Wherefore fearing to deliuer his owne opinion and to giue answer vnto the embassadour, for offending the inconstant multitude and vnknowne minds of the people, he first entertained the embassadours honourably, and afterwards turning himselfe vnto the citizens and souldiers, said vnto them: Worthie men and most faithfull souldiers, what is your pleasure, or what shall we answere to these our enemies demands? Then one of the souldiers that stood by (a rough bold spirited fellow) vnwilling for his owne part to giue vp the citie, and deeming the gouernour to be of the same mind, in that he had tearmed them worthie and faithfull, and Scanderbeg by the name of an enemie, drawing out his sword, & with his right hand shaking it on high, answered: I

A notable speech of a common souldier to the rest of his fellowes for the holding out of the citie against Scanderbeg.

Most valiant gouernour, this same and the like shall make answer for vs. Nothing was to lesse purpose than with premeditated words to seeke to terrifie valiant minds, first with the diuers fortune of CROIA, and then of STELLVSA; for as the faces and countenances of men are diuers, so also are their minds and dispositions. Euery man wisely directeth his owne actions, according to his owne proper humour, & by the same plaies the foole or bedlam. We prescribe no lawes to them of PETRELLA, nor to them of STELLVSA, neither let them prescribe any vnto vs. Let neuer so base examples of cowardly slaues euer enter into the thoughts of couragious men: braue minds disdaine to imitate other men in their honest actions, much lesse in their cowardise. And why? for euery man liueth after his owne fashion. Wherefore let Scanderbeg proceed, let him kill the gouernour of STELLVSA before our faces, let him sacrifice our fellow souldiers, doe you therefore thinke that we shall die in their bodies? shall our liuing spirits be there extinguished? shall our bloud there be spilt? But O happie bodies, O ghosts of me euer to be reuerenced, which in worthie defence of your libertie and faith haue indifferently contemned gold, siluer, death, and torture, and whatsoeuer else miserable worldlings hold deare or dismall! Wherfore carrie thou backe againe vnto thy master this answer frõ a common souldier, If he seeke to impose these conditions vpon vs, let him once more bare that arme of his, which men of courage feare not so much as he thinketh. He may peraduenture inforce vs to these conditions of his, if God forsake vs: but assuredly, perswade vs vnto them, shall he neuer. And yet for all that, your master Scanderbeg is not the man we haue long since heard him reported to be, of an honourable mind, easie to forgiue, & such a one as will indifferently iudge betwixt the enemie & himselfe: for why then doth he hold in bonds the gouernour of STELLVSA, for that he freely, iustly, and honourably stood in defence of his King, his faith, and libertie? Why doth he threaten him with death, where as he hath not deserued the same, although he hath resolutely offered himselfe thereunto, for defence of his libertie? K L

All they which were present, listened with great attention to the souldiers speech, neither was he interrupted by any, vntill he had said what he would. Then the souldiers thronging about him, and beating their swords and targets together, withall gaue a great shout, in token that they all approued his speech for answere. So the gouernour, encouraged with the cheerefulnesse of his souldiers, returned the embassadour without other answere than that of the common souldiers, and presently appointed euery man to his charge, and with great carefulnesse ordered all things for the better defence of the citie. But when Scanderbeg had heard the answere that was sent him from the citie, deliuered by the mouth of a common souldier, he M

smiled thereat and said: He is vndoubtedly a valiant souldier, if his deeds be answerable to his speeches: but if my force faile me not, I will also make him happie amongst the happie ghosts of them of STELLVSA: and by and by commanded the gouernour of STELLVSA, with the other captiues, to be brought before him, and there caused some of them which were content voluntarily to forsake

A forſake their Mahometane ſuperſtition, to be preſently baptized, to the great griefe of the other Turks. Deſdrot the gouernour, with the reſt, to the terrour of the defendants, were in their ſight put to death: whereupon the garriſon ſouldiers with great indignation gaue a great ſhout from the wall, and bitterly railed vpon the Chriſtians. Deſdrot gouernor of Stelluſa, executed.

Scanderbeg conſidering the ſtrength of the citie, with the time of the yeere, vnfit for ſouldiers to keepe the field, for Winter was now growne on; left Moſes Golemus, a moſt valiant captaine, with a garriſon of three thouſand ſouldiers, to keepe in the Turks garriſon at SPETIGRADE, and to defend the borders of EPIRVS, vntill he might at more conuenient time himſelfe returne againe to the ſiege: and ſo with the reſt of his armie repaired to CROIA, when he had in the B ſpace of little more than one moneth, to his immortall praiſe, recouered his kingdome, and driuen the Turks out of euery corner of EPIRVS, excepting onely SPETIGRADE: which citie alſo not long after was by compoſition deliuered vnto him. During all this time, from his firſt comming into EPIRVS, he neuer ſlept aboue two houres in a night, but with reſtleſſe labour proſecuted his affaires. He euer fought againſt the Turks with his arme bare, and that with ſuch fierceneſſe, that the bloud did oftentimes burſt out of his lips. It is written, that he with his owne hand ſlew three thouſand Turks in the time of his warres againſt them. But of his great and worthie victories obtained againſt the two mightie Turkiſh Kings, Amurath, and Mahomet his ſonne, more ſhall be ſaid hereafter in due time and place.

After that Scanderbeg had thus by great force and policie wrung his inheritance out of Amu-
C raths hands, and ſcoured the Turks out of euery corner of EPIRVS; he proceeded further, and ouer-ran part of MACEDONIA, making ſundrie incurſions into the heart of that countrey, being then in the Turks poſſeſſion, whereby he ſo enriched his ſouldiers, that they deſired of him no better pay. Which was ſo vſuall a thing with this reſtleſſe Prince, as that it began to grow into a prouerbe in moſt Princes courts, That the ſpoile of Amurath his dominions, was Scanderbegs reuenewes. Complaint hereof came daily to Amuraths court, which the craftie aged ſire (being then troubled with the Hungarian warres) ſeemed at the firſt to make no great account of, but as of that he could eaſily and at his pleaſure remedie; although he was therewith inwardly greeued at the heart. But when the certaine report of one miſchiefe as it were in the necke of another, continually ſounded in his eares, and that he ſaw no end to be expected of theſe miſe-
D ries; he ſent Alis Baſſa, one of his greateſt men of warre, with an armie of fortie thouſand ſelect ſouldiers, at once to ſubdue the countrey of EPIRVS, and to bring it againe vnder his obeiſance. The ſetting forth of this great armie, vnder the conduct of ſo famous a captaine, repleniſhed the minds of the Turks with ſuch an aſſured hope of victorie, that a man would haue thought Scanderbeg had beene alreadie taken, and now brought to execution: yea the common ſouldiers before their ſetting forth, were oftentimes at vaine contention for the diuiſion of the ſpoile they were neuer like to haue: So readie are men to promiſe wonders to themſelues, whileſt they conferre but with their owne deſires. And on the other ſide, Fame, the forerunner of great attempts, had filled all the ſmall countrey of EPIRVS, with great terrour & feare of Alis Baſſaes comming. The countrimen with their families fled into the ſtrong cities, & the citizens within their wals fell to forti-
E fying the ſame, and kept continuall watch and ward, as if the enemie had then lien euen faſt by them: the aged men & women commended themſelues and all theirs firſt vnto God by praiers, and then to the courage of the luſtie ſouldiers with teares, as in caſe of extreme perill & danger. Onely Scanderbeg was nothing moued either with the terrible report of the Baſſaes comming, or the vaine feare of his ſubiects; but alwaies kept the ſame cheerefulneſſe both of countenance and ſpeech, as he was wont, being well acquainted with the tumult of the Turkiſh wars, and hauing (as was ſuppoſed) certaine intelligence before from his ſecret friends in the Turks court, of all Amuraths deſignes. So that hauing ſet all things in order for the ſafetie of his countrey, he began to leuie an armie at CROIA: at which time moſt part of his ſubiects of EPIRVS, which were able to beare armes, repaired vnto him: the confederate Chriſtian Princes alſo, his neigh-F bours, and for moſt part his kinſmen, ſent vnto him great ſupplies: beſide other deuout and warlike minded Chriſtians, which voluntarily reſorted vnto him from farre, in great numbers. Out of which multitude of people he choſe onely eight thouſand horſemen & ſeuen thouſand foot, when as he might haue raiſed a far greater armie: and placing ſome few in garriſons in the frontier cities where he thought moſt conuenient, all the reſt he ſent home againe to their dwellings. At which his confidencie, his friends, yea and his enemies alſo much maruelled, that when he might might haue had so many, hee would take the field with so few. With which small armie of fif- G teene thousand, he marched from CROIA, fourscore miles to DYBRA: where hearing by his espials, of the approach of his enemies, after he had with cheerfull speech encouraged his souldiers, he encamped with his armie in the lower countrie of DYBRA, neer vnto a wood side, right in the way where the Bassa must needs passe. In which wood, he placed Gnee Musachee, and A- mesa in ambush with three thousand men: commanding them to stand close, vntill they saw he had throughly ioyned battaile with the Bassa, and then with all their force to breake forth vpon his rereward. The Bassa marching forward, came and encamped neere vnto Scanderbeg, a little before the going downe of the Sunne, and there rested that night, making great shew of mirth and ioy, with great fires in euery corner of the campe, as the Turkish manner of encamping is. H Whereas in Scanderbegs campe, all things were silent, and no shew of any fire at all; for so Scan- derbeg had commanded: which made the Turks the more careless, deeming thereby the Christians as good as already discouraged. The next morning Scanderbeg ranged his armie in order of battaile, placing Tanusius in the left wing, with fifteen hundreth horsemen, and as many foot; and Moses in the right with like number: and leading the maine battaile himselfe: The rereward was committed to Vranacontes a man renowned in those daies, both for his grauitie in counsell, & for his valour in armes, fit to command or be commanded; but afterwards, amongst the rest most famous, for the worthie defending of CROIA against Amurath, being then there himselfe in person. Alis Bassa contemning the smal number of Scanderbeg his armie, seeing nothing therin to be feared more then the good order thereof, gaue the first charge with a small troupe of I horsemen: who at the first encounter retired, as if they had fled, of purpose that the Christians hastily pursuing their vntimely hope, might disorder their battaile, and so giue occasion to their

The battell betwixt Alis Bassa & Scanderbeg. owne ouerthrow. But by the commandement of Scanderbeg (who easily perceiued the Bassaes meaning) their dangerous forwardnesse was warily waied, & all with saftey kept in good order.
So both armies comming on, the wings beganne the battaile a fresh, and Scanderbeg with great courage bringing on his maine battell in the face of the Bassa, valiantly charged him. But by that time that the battailes were throughly ioyned, Musachee and Ameса suddenly issued out of the wood, and fiercely set vpon the rereward of the Turks armie, where they made great slaughter, and forced many of the Turks for feare to flie. Thus was the Bassaes great armie driuen to fight both before and behind, being hardly beset and laied vnto with a small number. The Bassa had K placed his best souldiers neerest vnto himselfe in the maine battaile, as his most assured strength and last refuge: these valiant men stood fast, and renewed the battaile, before almost lost. And here Scanderbegs fortune was euen at a stand: vntill that the well aduised and valiant captaine Vranacontes hauing receiued the wearied souldiers into the rereward, and setting all things there in safetie, accompanied with certain troups of fresh souldiers which he brought out of the rereward, brake through the Bassaes armie with such slaughter of the Turkes, that he made way for A great slaughter of the Turks Scanderbeg and all the rest of his armie. The Turkes discomfited with the inuincible courage of these old souldiers, and the slaughter of their fellowes, which lay by heapes wallowing in their owne blood, betooke themselues to flight; whom the Christians fiercely pursued, and slew of them two and twentie thousand: at which time were also two thousand others taken prisoners, L with foure and twentie of the Turks ensignes: whereas of the Christians were slaine not past an hundreth & twentie. The enemies tents with all their cariages, were at the same time taken also.
After this great victorie, when Scanderbeg had made all his seuen thousand footmen, horsemen, by giuing vnto them the horses of the slaine Turks, he brake into the enemies countrie, and en-tred farre into MACEDONIA, where he filled the desires of his souldiers with the wealth and spoile thereof, sparing nothing that fire and sword could deuoure: and so with victorie returned to CROIA, where he was of his subiects ioyfully receiued. Alis Bassa with the remainder of his discomfited armie, returned to HADRIANOPLE, and there by Amurath was hardly charged of cowardise, & want of discretion, for that he had lost so puissant an armie to so weake an ene-mie. Wherof when he had cleared himselfe by the modest rehearsall of his former victories, and M the testimonie of all the other captaines present with him in that battaile, he was pardoned, and so againe receiued into fauour, and that great ouerthrow imputed to the chance of warre.

Amurath in despaire. Amurath hauing receiued two so great ouerthrowes, first from Hunniades and the Hungarians, and now from Scanderbeg; and seeing himselfe elsewhere beset with so many mischiefes, as that he could not tell which way to turne himselfe; tormented with dispaire, and desire of reuenge,

A uenge, whereof he ſaw ſmall poſſibilitie, fell into ſuch a melancholie paſſion, that ouercome with the darke conceits thereof, he was about to haue become the bloudie executioner of himſelfe, had not Cali Baſſa by his graue aduice comforted vp his dying ſpirits: by whoſe perſwaſion, contrary to his haughtie nature, he yeelded by his embaſſadours ſent for the ſame purpoſe, to deſire peace of Vladiſlaus King of HVNGARIE, vſing the exiled Deſpot of SERVIA (his father in law, then preſent with the King) as a meane therein. Who at the firſt gaue ſmall credit vnto the embaſſadours, or vnto ſuch things as they told him, vntill that at length better perſwaded of the true meaning of the Turke, he ſo wrought the matter both with the King and the reſt of the nobilitie, and eſpecially with Huniades, that there was an honourable peace con-

Amurath by the perſwaſion of Cali Baſſa ſeeketh for peace of King Vladiſlaus.

B cluded. The capitulations whereof were, firſt, That Amurath withdrawing all his forces and garriſons, ſhould clearely depart out of SERVIA, and reſtore the ſame vnto the poſſeſſion of George the Deſpot, the right lord and owner thereof; deliuering alſo freely vnto him his two ſonnes, Stephen and George, who bereft of their ſight, he had long time kept in ſtraight priſon. Alſo, that from thenceforth he ſhould make no claime vnto the kingdome of MOLDAVIA, nor to that part of BVLGARIA which he had in the laſt wars loſt. And finally, that he ſhould not inuade or moleſt the Hungarians, or any part of their kingdome, during the whole time of that peace: and to pay 40000 duckats for the ranſome of Carambey. Vnto which hard conditions, when the Turkiſh tyrant full ſore againſt his will had condeſcended, a peace for ten yeeres was forthwith on both parts concluded, and the ſame by ſolemne oath confirmed: King

The capitulations of the ten yeeres peace concluded betwixt Vladiſlaus and Amurath.

C Vladiſlaus taking his oath vpon the holy Euangeliſts, and Amurath (by his embaſſadours) vpon their Turkiſh Alcoran. This was the moſt honourable peace that euer Chriſtian Prince had before that time made with any of the Turkiſh Kings, and moſt profitable alſo, had it beene with like ſinceritie kept, as it was with ſolemnitie confirmed.

Amurath with this peace deliuered of his greateſt feare, conuerted all his forces againſt the Caramanian King, in reuenge of the iniuries by him done, whileſt he was occupied in the Hungarian warres. This King of CARAMANIA knowing himſelfe vnable to withſtand ſo great an enemie, durſt neither meet him in the field, nor truſt himſelfe to the ſtrength of any his cities or ſtrong caſtles, but fled into the mountaines, there fortifying himſelfe more ſurely than in any other his ſtrong holds. Amurath entring into CARAMANIA, made great ſpoile in the country

Amurath inuadeth Caramania

D as he went, and tooke great booties. At laſt comming to ICONIVM, he laid hard ſiege to the ſame. The poore King ſeeing his kingdome ſpoiled, and his chiefe citie in danger to be loſt, ſent embaſſadours, and with them his wife alſo, which was Amuraths ſiſter, to intreat for peace; offering to pay vnto him yeerely the double tribute which he before paid, and for the performance thereof to giue his ſonne in hoſtage. Vpon which conditions Amurath granted him peace, and ſo returned. In this warre, Aladin, Amuraths eldeſt ſonne, died, to the great griefe of his aged father, being ſlaine with a fall from his horſe, as he was hawking.

Old Amurath thorowly wearied with continuall warres, and other troubles incident vnto reſtleſſe roomes, reſolued now to retire himſelfe to a more priuate and quiet kind of life: and therefore ſent for his ſonne Mahomet, being then but fifteene yeeres old, to whom he voluntarily

E reſigned his kingdome, appointing Cali Baſſa his tutor, with one Choſroe, a learned doctor of their law, to be his truſtie counſellors and chiefe directers. And ſo taking with him Hamze-Beg, one of his noblemen in whom he tooke greateſt pleaſure, departed to MAGNESIA, and there as a man wearie of the world, gaue himſelfe to a ſolitarie and monaſticall kind of life, in the companie of certaine religious Turkiſh monks, as they accounted of them.

Many great Kings and Princes, as well Mahometanes as Chriſtians, glad before of the Hungarian victorie, were now no leſſe ſorrie to heare of the late concluded peace betwixt king Vladiſlaus and the old Sultan Amurath: as being of opinion, That the proſecution of that warre ſo happily begun, would haue beene the vtter ruine and deſtruction of the Turkiſh kingdome. Wherefore they ſought by all poſſible meanes to induce the young king Vladiſlaus to breake

F the league he had ſo lately and ſo ſolemnely made with the Turke: eſpecially Iohn Palæologus the Emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE, did by letters importune the king to remember the confederation he had made with the other Chriſtian princes, for the maintenance of the wars againſt the common enemie of Chriſtianitie: which princes were now preſt and readie (as he ſaid) to aſſiſt him with their promiſed aid: adding moreouer, That whereas Amurath had diuers times ſought to ioine with him in amitie and friendſhip, he had vtterly reiected that offer of peace, preferring the vniuerſall profit (like to enſue to all Chriſtendome by that religious war) G before his owne proper ſecuritie and profit, being for his part in readineſſe to ioyne his forces with the Kings, if he would preſently enter into armes: which he could neuer doe in better time than now, whilſt Amurath, terrified with his late ouerthrow, & ſtill beſet with doubtfull war, had drawne his greateſt forces out of EVROPE into ASIA, in ſuch diſordered haſte, as that it ſhould ſeeme he rather fled for feare of his enemies in EVROPE, than marched to encounter his enemies in ASIA, and now being wearie of all, had betaken himſelfe vnto a priuate kind of life. To conclude, he requeſted the King not to leaue him and the other Chriſtian Princes of ſmall power, as a prey vnto the Turke, who would aſſuredly with all hoſtilitie inuade thē, ſo ſoone as he thought himſelfe ſafe from the danger of the Hungarians. At the ſame time alſo, and vpon the departure H of the Turks embaſſadours, for the performance of ſuch things as they had promiſed, letters came from Francis the Cardinall of FLORENCE, Generall of the Chriſtian fleet, declaring how that Amurath hauing left almoſt none in EVROPE, was with all the power he could make, gone ouer into ASIA againſt the Caramanian King, leauing a moſt faire occaſion for the Chriſtians eaſily to recouer whatſoeuer they had before loſt in EVROPE: & that he was in good time come with his fleet vnto the ſtraits of HELLESPONTVS, according vnto promiſe, and there lay readie to embarre the Turks paſſage backe againe out of ASIA. Both theſe letters being read in the Counſell, ſo much moued the King, with all the reſt of the nobilitie of HVNGARIE there preſent, as that they were neuer more ſorrie or aſhamed for any thing they had done in their liues, than for the league ſo lately with Amurath concluded: for why, they ſaw that all the plot they had I laid, for their immortall glorie, was now by this haſtie peace that they had made with the Turke, without the good liking or knowledge of their confederates, brought to nought; and that they had thereby moſt ſhamefully deceiued the generall expectation that the Chriſtian common-weale had conceiued of them; and that they, of long time called the protectors of the Chriſtian faith, the defenders of true religion, the reuengers of Chriſt his name, and deliuerers of the faith-full nations; ſhould now be accounted the breakers of the Chriſtian league, men forgetfull of their confederation both with the Latines and the Greekes, contemners of immortalitie, and lo-uers of their owne profit only. In this doubtfulnes of minds whilſt they ſtood yet thus wauering, Iulian the Cardinall and Legat, alwaies an enemie vnto the peace, and by reaſon of his place a man in greateſt authoritie next vnto the king, tooke occaſion to diſſwade the ſame as followeth. K

The cunning ſpeech wherewith Iulian the Cardinall perſwadeth King Vladiſlaus to breake the league he had before made with Amurath.

If any of you right worthie (ſaid he) ſhall happily maruell that I ſhould ſpeake of breaking the league, and violating our faith, let him firſt vnderſtand, That I at this preſent am to perſwade you to nothing elſe but the faithfull obſeruing both of the one and the other: led with like repentance with you, repentance I ſay, and not ſorrow, when as I, as from a watch-tower foreſeeing all theſe things which were decreed againſt my will, to ſort alſo contrary to your expectation, am now for the dutie of my legation, & the zeale vnto the Chriſtian religion, enforced with you to doubt: and ſo much the rather, for that at this preſent, the queſtion is of the loſſe and hazard of all our honours and credit in common: which except we by common conſent, and wonted valour, endeuour to amend, O how much it is to be feared, leſt for ſhame neither may you goe out of HVNGARIE, or I returne to ROME, where all things are with moſt deepe iudgement L cenſured. Conſider I pray you into what miſeries this haſtie reſolution hath caſt vs. We haue entred into league with the Turke, an Infidell, to violate our faith with the Chriſtians, and to breake the holy league before made with the great Biſhop, and the other Chriſtian Princes our confederates. And that for what, for what profit I ſay? Forſooth, that ſo we might againe recouer SERVIA, long before deſtroied. Verily a ſmall and wofull profit, which may againe in ſhort time be cut off, and depriueth vs of others farre greater, and of much longer continuance. For what can be more fond or inconſiderate, than in our conſultations to haue regard to our priuate profit only, and not the publicke, without reſpect of religion, honeſtie, or conſcience? It is not demanded of you at this preſent (right honourable) what you owe vnto the periured Turke: but you are by me Iulian, the great Biſhops and the confederate Chriſtian Princes Legat, and Agent, before the tribunall ſeat of your owne conſciences, accuſed of breach of faith, breach of league, and breach of pro- M miſe; and thereof euen by your owne iudgement, rather than by the iudgement of God, or other men, I will condemne you. Anſwere me you noble Worthies: After you had happily ſix moneths made wars againſt the Turks in BVLGARIA and the borders of THRACIA, and after that, triumphantly returning into HVNGARIE, receiued you not honourable embaſſages from almoſt all ITALIE, and from the great Emperour, with common reioycing for your ſo glorious a victorie, and exhortations to continue

A the warre? We receiued them. Did not you in my presence, and I the author thereof, willingly make a most holy league with the Italians and Greekes, That the one should with their aid and power meet you out of THRACIA; and the other with a great fleet should come into the HELLESPONTVS? We made it. If you made it, why breaking this, made you another with the Turks? or by what right can you keepe the same, being made? Wherefore, if the last yeere you made a league with the great Bishop (God his vicar here on earth) if you be men, if you be in your wits, if you be Christians, this second league is to be broken, lest you should violate the first, and that a most Christian league: which except you doe, I feare lest that as Iudas betraied Christ, so you may seeme to betray his vicar; or that God, whom hitherto you haue alwayes found present, propitious, and fauourable, you shall hereafter find him angrie, and an

And now I pray you tell me, what will you answere vnto the Constantinopolitane Emperour; who according to your appointment, hath now with the first taken the field, and in so great an opportunitie expecteth but your comming? what will you answere the great Bishop? what the Venetians and Genowaies, who haue their great fleet readie as was appointed? what the Burgundians, who for their zeale vnto the Christian faith and religion, haue long since passed the Ocean, and so by many dangers of the sea now flote in the* HELLESPONT? Deuise (I pray you) if you can, some excuse and colour, that we may not seeme altogether vnlike our selues: if out of your hidden skill you can coine any thing, shew it. You promised with the first of the Spring, that you would be in the field: and now your souldiers both the Spring and Summer, play, so great and so wholesome occasion passing away, through your wofull sloth and negligence. O the great blindnesse of mens minds! O grosse cowardise! O deteS-

I was present I confesse: but as much as in me was, I intreated it might not be. I disliked it: and as many of you here present can testifie, I vtterly condemned it. I was ouercome by the wisedome and authoritie of* Huniades, and the compassion of the Despot, lest vnhappie man, he should by my intercession seeme longer to want his kingdome and children: and lest any man should call me a contemner or impugner of your good, I full of sorrow, and vnwillingly, gaue way; not ignorant, the health of the Christian common-weale to be therein weakened, the hope of your immortall glorie extinguished, and vs all (by your leaue may I say it) accounted breakers both of diuine and humane leagues, forsworne men, and traitors vnto all good Christians. Wherefore except before the report of our perfidiousnesse be further bruted, we deliuer our selues from this infamie, nothing can be grea-

D ter or more miserable than our shame or villanie: if we will so doe, we may not so easily as iustly and religiously doe it. Hauing made restitution againe of SERVIA and the captiues, what remaineth else for you to doe (noble worthies) but to repaire your armie, to prepare what so is needfull for warre, and to keepe your first league with the Christian Princes? and to say, That King Vladislaus, *after his league made with the Greeke and Latine Princes, could not without the consent of those his confederates and allies, vnder whose good fortune that common warre was vndertaken, conclude any thing, especially with the enemies of the Christian religion? And that therefore, if any thing were agreed vpon betwixt him and the Turke, it was frustrate, and the first league to be stood vpon. E an, than with a Turke; with a beleeuer, than with an infidell? Against a perfidious enemie it is lawfull (as they say) for a man to vse all cunning, force, and deceit, deluding craft with craft, & fraud with fraud. By craft the Turke first passed ouer into EVROPE, by little and little he crept into that kingdome, he neuer kept faith with any, he grew to this height rather by cunning than by strength: and are you become so blind, as to thinke it better to keepe your promise with the Turke, deuoid of all faith and humanitie, rather than with the faithfull Christians, and especially the most holy Bishop? All great things are done by deuice and policie: the Romanes our ancestors vprightly and religiously alwaies kept their leagues with their confederates, but deluded the deceitfull with their cunning. Cæsar was of opinion, that for soueraigntie the law was sometimes to be broken. And Philip, the father and master of him that conquered ASIA, oftentimes vsed cunning and deceit for the desire of rule: yet were not these men called traitors. It is sometime lawfull for the common-weale sake, neither to stand to our leagues, neither to keepe

F our faith with them that be themselues faithlesse. Lawfull it is to breake vnlawfull oathes, and especially such as are thought to be against right, reason, and equitie. Was it lawfull for Diomedes, vowing for to sacrifice vnto the gods whomsoeuer he first met at his returne into his country, to kill his sonne by that his vow and oath? Verily it was a great impietie. Wherefore a iust and lawfull oath is in the iudgement of all men to be religiously kept, but such an oath as tendeth not onely vnto priuate, but publicke destruction, that ought to be vaine and frustrate. Wherefore before our faithlesse dealing be far- ther spread abroad, I beseech you worthie men, and thee especially most glorious King, not in any point to violate your faith, for the good of the Christian common-weale giuen vnto the most holy father and the other Christian Princes. The league you haue made with the Greekes and the Latines, faithfully and religiously keepe; the expedition by common consent taken in hand by the example of your confederates, prosecute; the foundation of immortall glorie by you laid, build vpon. Deliuer the Christian prouinces oppressed with the Turkish seruitude, satisfie the hope conceiued of you, and deceiue not the expectation the world hath now conceiued of you, than which, nothing can be more dishonourable: make no conscience of the league you haue made with the Infidell, but thinke it a great impietie and wickednesse to violate the holy league made with the great Bishop, and the other Christian Princes: thinking, that if you should doe otherwise, God (which he of his mercie forbid) would become of that your falsified faith a most seuere and sharpe reuenger: and that you can doe nothing more acceptable vnto our Sauiour Christ, or more glorious to your selues, than to deliuer the oppressed Christian countries from the cruell slauerie and bondage of the Turke. Suffer not this so fit an occasion to slip away, than which, a fitter can neuer be giuen. EVROPE is vnfurnished of the Turks, busied in the Caramanian warre; their returne is embarred by the Christians fleet, now in the sea of HELLESPONTVS; you need but to goe see, and as it were to take a view of THRACIA, MACEDONIA, GRECIA, and EPIRVS, there is no enemie there left to oppose himselfe against you. Wherefore for God his cause, I request you aboue all things to continue the Christian league, and with your happie and victorious forces, to march forward into MACEDONIA and THRACIA, as is before by you with the other Christian Princes your confederates agreed.

Iulian the Cardinall absolueth king Vladislaus and the rest from their oath before giuen to Amurath.

In conclusion, hauing much spoken of the authoritie and power of the great Bishop, he in his name disanulled the league whatsoeuer, by the King made with the Turke; and absolued him, with the rest whom it might concerne, from the oath they had giuen, and the promises they had made. Which so well contented both the King and the rest, that there was now no more question of the oath, or of the lawfulnesse of the warre, but a decree made for the continuation of the league with the other Christian Princes their confederates (and for the prosecution of the warres against the Turks) as was with them before agreed: whom they could now say, they were not to forsake, and to leaue them as a prey vnto the Turke their greedie enemie; now for nothing more in danger, than for that, at their request they had taken vp armes in their quarrell. Vnto which vnfortunate decree, both the Despot and Huniades, the chiefe authors of the late peace betwixt the King and Amurath, easily consented: the Despot, induced with the great hope he had conceiued of the good successe of the warre; and Huniades, with the desire of the kingdome of BVLGARIA promised vnto him by Vladislaus, and by faire charter also (as some said) assured vnto him.

Of this the Kings resolution for the breach of the peace with the Turke, notice was withall speed giuen vnto the Constantinopolitane Emperour, and Francis the Florentine Cardinall, then lying with a fleet of seuentie gallies at the straits of HELLESPONTVS: for feare lest they hearing of the former concluded peace, should alter also or else quite desist from their former purposes. In the meane time whilest these things were yet in plotting, the Turke ignorant hereof, according to his promise, had withdrawne all his garrisons out of SERVIA, and other places before agreed vpon in the late concluded peace, restoring the same vnto the Despot, and others the lawfull owners, although it was not done at the very prefixed day, at which it should haue beene done. In which time also he set at libertie great numbers of captiues, and amongst the rest, the two blind sonnes of the Prince of SERVIA; faithfully performing whatsoeuer he had before vpon his religion promised in the league with the Christians before concluded, so desirous he was of peace with the Hungarians. Howbeit, Vladislaus by the counsell of Huniades, detained to his owne vse certaine of the strong holds in SERVIA: for which cause, George the Despot euer afterwards bore a secret grudge against Huniades.

Now as King Vladislaus (hauing by the perswasion of Iulian the Cardinall, renounced the league betwixt him and Amurath) was preparing his forces, the fame of the Epirot Prince Scanderbeg was also (by the recouerie of his fathers kingdome of EPIRVS out of the Turks hands, and by the late ouerthrow of Alis Bassa) growne great, euery man speaking of him honour and praise. Wherewith Vladislaus moued, & reasonably perswaded what a furtherance it would be vnto his haughtie designes (aiming at no lesse than the vtter ouerthrow of the Turks kingdome in EVROPE) if he might vnto his owne great preparations ioyne also the strength of that so fortunate

A tunate a Prince, by the conſent of his nobilitie, with all ſpeed diſpatched away his embaſſadours with letters vnto him, certifying him of his honorable purpoſe, for the rooting out of the Turks, and in that common cauſe praying his aid againſt ſuch a dangerous and dreadfull enemie: the purport whereof here followeth.

Vladiſlaus King of Hungarie and Polonia, vnto the noble Scanderbeg, Prince of EPIRVS, greeting.

The letters of King Vladiſlaus to Scanderbeg.

B It may be that ſome good hap hath deferred this our late congratulation vntill this preſent, to the intent we might at this time, together with you, reioyce in the double ſucceſſe of your proſperitie: firſt, for the happie recouerie of your eſtate; and then, for that the ſame hath by your wiſedome and valour beene of late ſo notably defended. Wherefore in this we reioyce, not onely in your behalfe, but in the behalfe of all good Chriſtians, that it hath pleaſed God of his goodneſſe, by your valour to haue giuen ſo great an increaſe and comfort vnto the Chriſtian common-weale: for as much as amongſt other our great euils, the loſſe of the Albanian people hath not beene to be accounted the leaſt, at ſuch time as Iohn Caſtriot, a worthie Prince, your father, oppreſſed by Amurath, and by the vngratefull deſtinies taken out of this world, had neither the meanes to leaue vnto you his kingdome and ſcepter (as vnto his ſonne, then liuing in his enemies power) either was able yet otherwiſe to prouide for his affaires. And would to God this your father, moſt happie in ſuch a ſonne, might haue till now liued: whoſe felicitie had in that ſurmounted all
C others, if he might but haue ſeene you before his death. For as you ſeeme vnto me aboue all other Princes in the world (without offence be it ſaid) moſt accompliſhed with all the good graces and perfections both of bodie and mind, ſo are you endowed alſo with a certaine diuine and wonderfull fortune: vnder the good conduct whereof, not onely the whole kingdome of EPIRVS may thinke it ſelfe in ſecuritie; but all the reſt of the other nations alſo, lately by the deteſtable fraud and violence of the Othoman Kings diſmembred from the realme of MACEDON, may alſo recouer the former beautie of their ancient lawes and liberties. For (to ſay nothing of thoſe things which euen from your childhood hauing continually made you enuied, haue heretofore purchaſed vnto you an immortall fame and glorie euen amongſt the Barbarians themſelues) what can be more glorious than this victorie, which (as we haue heard and beleeue) you to your ſingular admiration, haue obtained by the ouerthrow and vtter diſcomfiture of Alis
D Baſſa, with his ſo great and mightie a power? But now O Scanderbeg (God ſo appointing it, who in his deepe and ſecret wiſedome hath reſerued you vnto theſe ſo dangerous times, for the publicke good and comfort of the Chriſtian common-weale) there offers it ſelfe vnto you an obiect of farre greater glorie, with a moſt faire and fit occaſion for you to reuenge your ſelfe of all the wrongs and iniuries both new and old, by Amurath the Turkiſh Sultan done, not in priuate to the perſon of your ſelfe onely, but vnto the whole ſtate and kingdome of EPIRVS alſo; and not the domeſticall and ciuill miſeries of your owne countrey onely, but the publicke calamities alſo, and thoſe opprobrious diſgraces done againſt the Chriſtian faith and religion in generall, now oppreſſed (I will not ſay extinguiſhed:) and that is, if you with your victorious forces will ſuccour vs in this extremitie of our affaires, not yet altogether deſperate. Hereunto doe all the Princes of HVNGARIE and POLONIA, and all other men of courage inuite you,
E Iulian the Cardinall of S. Angell intreateth you, with all thoſe deuout and courageous Chriſtians, which long ſince here with vs, and readie in armes, wiſh for nothing more than the preſence of your victorious enſignes. Which ſo faire an occaſion (by God himſelfe now offered) if you refuſe not, will in all mens iudgement be a ſure meane to vanquiſh and ouerthrow our common enemie the Turke, and to driue him quite out of EVROPE, wrongfully by him of ſo long time poſſeſſed. I need not therefore (as I ſuppoſe) to vſe any kind of perſwaſion vnto you in this cauſe and quarrell, the defenſe whereof doth purchaſe vnto vs health, light, and libertie: but being neglected, I feare and abhorre to forbode what may enſue thereof. We Chriſtians haue beene too too ſlacke and backward in helping one another: the flame hath now welneere conſumed vs all, whileſt no man thought it would haue come neere himſelfe. What doe we ſee of the Greeke empire? what of the Bulgarians, and Seruians? yea mine owne loſſes and manifold calamities, F alreadie, and yet alſo to be endured, who is able to recount? The braue and moſt valiant Princes, the ſureſt bulwarkes and defences of the kingdome of HVNGARIE, from time to time loſt; and the puiſſant armies with one and the ſame fatall chance of warre conſumed and brought to nothing, who is able to reckon vp? Inſomuch that there is no houſe, wife, or matrone, in all HVNGARIE, which is not in ſome meaſure partaker of this heauineſſe. All this doe the Chriſtian Princes heare of, and yet the miſerable eſtate and condition of their allies can nothing moue any one of them: but ſuffer vs thus as a sacrifice for the rest, to be on all parts exposed to the rage and furie of the common and mercilesse enemie. G Onely Eugenius the most holy Bishop of Rome, and Philip Duke of Burgvndie, haue not refused to beare a part of the burthen of this our afflicted fortune: The one hath sent hither his Legate Iulian the Cardinall, with notable and puissant succours; and the other with his fleet at sea, and come as farre as Hellespontvs, so much as in him lieth doth notably hinder the Turks passage into Evrope. And one other hope there is not now farre from vs, and that is, your helpe, whereof we are so desirous: which we require of you, moued thereunto, partly by your valour so well knowne, and partly in regard of the imminent perill and common danger of vs all. And albeit we are not ignorant, how euill you may be at leisure to take such an expedition in hand, for the late troubled estate of your affaires, and your new recouered kingdome, as yet scarcely well established: yet notwithstanding, let it not with-hold you or keepe H you backe; assuring you, that as this expedition cannot be but vnto you most honourable, euen so this your present desert shall not be bestowed vpon vngratefull or thankelesse men: but that which you shall now first begin and vndertake for our preseruation and dignitie, we will from henceforth and euer continue for your glorie, and for the increase of your greatnesse. Fare you well. From our regall citie of Buda, the fourth of Iuly 1444.

Of this the Kings motion, Scanderbeg liking well, and thinking it farre better now in so fit a time, with his owne forces ioyned vnto the Hungarians his friends, thorowly to busie Amurath, than in short time after, himselfe alone to sustaine his whole power: by the generall consent of the Albanian Princes his confederates and allies, yeelded vnto his request; in liberall tearmes I promising him by his letters, in good time to be present with him with thirtie thousand good souldiers. The copie of which letters I thought it not amisse here to set downe also.

Scanderbeg Prince of the Epirots, vnto Vladislaus King of Hvngarie and Polonia, greeting.

Scanderbeg his answere by letters vnto King Vladislaus.

Your letters most inuincible King, I haue with like ioy and contentment receiued: which I in the generall assemblie of my chiefetaines hauing caused publickly to be read, there was not any one of them which was not of opinion, but that so iust an occasion of warre by you offered, was forthwith to be ioyfully on our behalfe also embraced. And so euery man doth both publickly and priuatly affirme, That nothing K could haue happened vnto them more acceptable from God, than that they might by some notable seruice testifie their gratefull minds, and bind vnto them so excellent a Prince: as also to giue so fit succours vnto the Christian common-weale. In which forwardnesse of my people, I my selfe tooke great contentment and pleasure, both in regard of your selfe, and in the behalfe of the publicke and common cause: seeing my men of warre, and all other my subiects, of what state or dgree soeuer (without any perswasion vsed on my part) to be so cheerefully and couragiously minded in defence of the faith, and of the Christian religion; and so well affectioned towards your most royall maiestie. And to say the truth, who is he (if he be not hatefull vnto God and man) albeit there were no question of religion, or of the common danger, that would refuse so iust and lawfull a warre? for such a King, as vnto whom alone we may L and ought to attribute, That we Christians doe not onely raigne, but euen line, breath, and enioy the libertie of our speech. Who would not willingly take vp armes, and aduenture himselfe into most manifest and certaine danger for the people of Hvngarie; by whom in all ages the Christian common-weale hath with their so many trauels and so much of their bloud, beene so mightily supported and defended? who euen from the very cradle haue beene continuall enemies vnto our enemies, and haue as it were euen vowed themselues for the honour of the Christian religion and name. Would God (most mightie and redoubted Vladislaus) it had beene in my power to haue brought vnto you such forces to this honourable warre, as were answerable vnto my courage and desire: then happily Evrope should not longer lie in this ignominious estate, oppressed by Amurath; neither should the fields of Varna or Basilia so often smoke with the bloud of the Hungarians, nor euery corner of Macedonia with the bloud of the Epirots: both nations being as it were become the expiatorie sacrifices of M other sinnes and offences, we all now by turnes perish, whilest euery man thinketh himselfe borne but for himselfe alone. But why doe I vnto my selfe poure forth these vaine complaints. Truly, it neither repenteth me of my forces, neither as I suppose (if it shall please God, that our forces may once meet and ioyne together in so happie a warre) shall the Christian commonweale haue any cause to sorrow or be agreeued with the issue and euent of our fortune. For vnto those fifteen thousand good souldiers which lately

A ly discomfited Alis Bassa on the borders of MACEDONIA, my purpose is to ioyne as many moe vnto them: with all which strength as soone as conueniently they may, I wil begin to set forward, ready to follow your ensignes to all euents whatsoeuer. And so fare you well, from CROIA the third of August 1444.

These letters being dispatched away vnto the King, Scanderbeg forthwith began to leauy his forces. And first of all he caused with new supplies to be made strong, all those companies wherwith he had ouerthrowne Alis Bassa; not suffering any one of them to absent himselfe from this expedition. Vnto whom being in number fifteene thousand, all men of approoued valour, hee ioyned other fifteene thousand moe, no lesse valiant then they: such a power as hee neuer either
B before or after raised for the recouerie, or defence of his kingdome. And so furnished with all things necessarie for so honourable a warre, chearefully set forward, accompined with the vowes and hope of all his most faithfull and louing subiects. But being come to the borders of SERVIA, hee found the strait and difficult passages of that rough countrey shut vp by George the Despot, (Lord thereof, a man adorned with all the graces of nature, but otherwise a wicked damned Atheist, and a Christian but in name onely) who but lately before restored vnto his kingdome by the helpe of King Vladislaus, hauing changed his minde, did now mightily cleaue vnto the Turk his sonne in law (by whom he had before beene himselfe exiled) and in fauour of his quarell, and despight of the Hungarians, but especially of Huniades, had stoped vp the waies and passages whereby Scanderbeg was with his army to passe: who by his Embassadour sent of C purpose vnto the Despot, complained to him of that wrong, putting him in minde of the periurous dealing of Amurath with him, notwithstanding hee had maried his daughter; and of the great pleasures the Hungarians had done him; of both which hee had good proofe: requesting him if it were but in regard of the common cause of Christianity to giue vnto him (as vnto his friend by whom hee was neuer in any thing wronged) passage; and not to staine himselfe with the perpetuall note of infamie, That hee being a Christian Prince, and of late so mightily oppressed by the Turke, should now to the great hinderance of the Christian common weale take part with him, against his friends and deliuerers. But what auaileth prayers or requests, bee they neuer so reasonable, with a man set downe to mischiefe? Scanderbeg out of hope by any other meanes to open his way, but by plaine force, resolued so to doe: although it much D greeued him to spend those forces vpon a Christian Prince, which hee had prepared against the capitall enemy both of himselfe and all good Christians, old Amurath the Turkish Sultan.

But whilest hee thus discontented, spendeth his time with his armie vpon the borders of SERVIA, beset with many difficulties: Vladislaus prickt forward by the continuall solitation of Iulian the Cardinall, or else drawne on by his owne ineuitable destinie, hauing assembled a great armie of valiant and couragious souldiers out of HVNGARIE and POLONIA (yet in number farre inferiour to that hee had the yeare before, for that most of the volantarie souldiers were returned home) set forward from SEGEDINVM, and in the beginning of Nouember (a time vnfit for warres) passed ouer DANVBIVS, and entring into BVLGARIA,
E came to NICOPOLIS, the Metrapoliticall citie of that kingdome (but then in possession of the Turks) where he burnt the suburbs thereof, and in that fruitfull countrey there abouts refreshed his people three or foure daies, where he also mustered his armie and tooke a view thereof: at what time Dracula Vaiuoid of VALACHIA, a man of great experience in martiall affaires, being then present, & considering the small number of the kings armie, began to perswade him to retire, saying, He had sufficiently learned by his owne harmes, to deeme aright of the power of the Turkish Sultan; who (as hee sayd) was wont many times to carrie more men with him into the fields into his disport of hawking and hunting, then was there in the Kings campe: wherefore hee should doe well, not to expose those his small forces vnto so manifest perill, in such vnseasonable time of the yeare, but to reserue them vnto a more fit opportunitie, when hee
F might with greater power encounter his puissant enemie. This his counsell most men of greatest experience, and not carried away with other priuate respects, thought wholesome: but the Cardinall, author of this fatall warre, extolling with great words the last yeares victorie obtained against the Turke, with glorious promises of great aide, as well by sea from the Pope, and the Venetians, as by land from the Emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE and other Christian Princes; augmenting also the great troubles in ASIA, and promising an easie and happy ſucceſſe vnto theſe wars in EVROPE; perſwaded the King that Dracula his ſpeech proceeded G either of ignorance, vpon a ſuperficiall iudgement which he made of the Kings power there preſent, without regard of further ſtrength from his friends; or elſe of the priuate reſpect of his owne ſecuritie, in regard of a commodious league made a little before betwixt him and the Turke. So that the poore Prince ſeeing his counſell mightily impugned by the Cardinall, and not ſo well taken, as it was meant by him; ſtood in doubt whether to leaue him to his owne fortune, and himſelfe to his quiet peace, or caſting off the Turkiſh league, to ioyne with the King in this chance of warre: but at length reſolued as a martiall minded man, preferring the vncertaine glorie of the field before his owne aſſured reſt, ſaid vnto the King:

Seeing that either your princely fortune, which hath euer hitherto fauoured your high attempts; or H elſe the hope of friends helpe, which I pray God faile you not at your need; or the ſecret deſignement of your deſtinie, vnable to be auoided, doth draw your maieſtie into a different opinion from me: that your reſolution, which I cannot by reaſonable perſwaſion alter, I will as the ſuddenneſſe of time, and my ſmall abilitie will permit, moſt gladly further.

Dracula aideth Vladiſlaus with his ſonne and 4000 horſe.

And therewith preſented vnto the King, his ſonne, with foure thouſand horſemen well appointed, to ſerue him in theſe wars; wiſhing vnto him ſuch good ſucceſſe as he himſelfe deſired. Afterward when he was about to take his leaue of the King, he preferred vnto him two luſtie young men, perfect guides for that countrey, with two horſes of incredible ſwiftneſſe, and with teares ſtanding in his eyes ſaid vnto him:

His laſt farewel vnto the King.

Take this ſmall gift in good part, as a poore refuge to flie vnto, if your fortune hap to faile you, which I I tremble to thinke vpon: I pray God they be giuen in vaine, and ſo they ſhall if my praiers may preuaile. Yet if neceſſitie ſhall inforce you to vſe them, you ſhall find them ſeruiceable at your need.

And ſo taking his laſt farewell of the King, returned into VALACHIA. Vladiſlaus marching on from NICOPOLIS toward THRACIA, tooke many townes and forts by the way, which the Turks for feare yeelded vnto him: at laſt he came to SVMIVM and PEZECHIVM, where the Turkiſh garriſons truſting as much to the ſtrength of the places, as to their owne valour, ſtood vpon their guard: but the King laid ſiege to both the ſaid places, and tooke them by aſſault; where he put to ſword fiue thouſand of the Turks.

The Turks Baſſaes terrified with theſe vnexpected troubles, aduertiſed Amurath thereof, K requeſting him to leaue his obſcure life, and to leuie the greateſt power he could in ASIA, for the defence of the Turkiſh kingdome in EVROPE, which otherwiſe was in ſhort time like to be loſt: blaming alſo his diſcretion, for committing the gouernment of ſo great a kingdome to ſo young a Prince as was Mahomet his ſonne, vnto whom many of the great captaines did halfe ſcorne to yeeld their due obedience. Amurath herewith awaked, as it had beene out of a dead ſleepe, left his cloiſter, and with great ſpeed gathered a ſtrong armie in ASIA, and came to the ſtraits of HELLESPONTVS; where he found the paſſage ſtopped by the Venetian and Popes gallies, and was therefore at his wits end. But marching along the ſea ſide vnto the ſtraits of BOSPHORVS, he there found meanes to conuay ouer his whole armie: vſing therein (as ſome write) the helpe of the Genoway marchants ſhips, paying vnto the Genowayes for the paſſage of euery Turke a duckat, which amounted to the ſumme of an hun- L dred thouſand duckets: or as ſome others affirme, corrupting with great bribes them that were left for the defence of this paſſage. And being now got ouer, ioyned his Aſian armie with ſuch other forces as his Baſſaes had in readineſſe in EVROPE: and ſo marching on ſeuen dayes, encamped within foure miles of VARNA, a citie pleaſantly ſtanding vpon the Euxine ſea ſide in BVLGARIA, where the Chriſtian armie lay: for Vladiſlaus hearing of Amurath his comming with ſo great an armie, had retired thither, hauing but a little before taken the ſame citie of VARNA from the Turks, with CALACRIVM, GALATA, MACROPOLIS, and others vpon the ſea coaſt.

Vpon the firſt report that Amurath was with ſuch a mightie armie come ouer the ſtrait of BOSPHORVS, Vladiſlaus who before was in good hope that he could not poſſibly haue found M any paſſage, entred into counſell with the commanders of his armie, what courſe was now beſt to take: where many which before had beene moſt forward in that action (preſuming that Amurath could by no means haue tranſported his armie) were now ſo diſcoraged with the fame of his comming, that they aduiſed the king in time to retire home, and not to oppoſe ſo ſmal an armie againſt ſuch a world of people as was reported to follow the Turke. But other captaines

A of greater courage, and especially Huniades, said, It was not for the Kings honour, first to inuade his enemies dominions, and presently to turne his backe vpon the first report of their comming; wishing him rather to remember the good fortune of his former wars, and that he was to fight against the same enemie whom he had victoriously ouerthrowne the yeere before: as for the multitude of his enemies, he had learned by experience (as he said) not be moued therewith, for that it was the manner of the Turkish Kings, more to terrifie their enemies with the shew of a huge armie, than with the valour of their souldiers, which were nothing to be accounted of, but as effeminate, in comparison of the Hungarians. Whereupon the King resolued to trie the fortune of the field.

B Vladislaus vnderstanding by his espials, that Amurath the night before encamped within foure miles, was now putting his armie in order of battell; committed the ordering of all his forces vnto the valiant captaine Huniades: who with great care and industrie disposed the same, garding the one side of the battell with a fenne or marrish, and the other side with cariages, and the rereward of his armie with a steepe hill. Therein politiquely prouiding, that the Christian armie, being farre lesse than the Turks in number, could not be compassed about with the multitude of their enemies, neither any way charged but afront. The Turks armie approaching, began to skirmish with the Christians, which manner of fight was long time with great courage maintained, and that with diuers fortune, sometime one partie preuailing, and sometime the other; but with such slaughter on both sides, that the ground was couered and stained with the dead

C bodies and bloud of the slaine. At length the battell being more closely ioyned, the victorie began to incline to the Christians, for Huniades had most valiantly with his Transiluanian and Valachian horsemen, put to flight both the wings of the Turkish armie, and made great slaughter whersoeuer he came. Insomuch, that Amurath dismaied with the flight of his souldiers, was about to haue fled himselfe out of the maine battell, had he not beene staied by a common souldier, who laying hands vpon the raines of his bridle, staied him by force, and sharply reproued him of cowardise. The captaines, and prelates about the King (whom it had better beseemed to haue beene at deuout praiers in their oratories, than in armes at that bloudie battell) encouraged by the prosperous successe of Huniades, and desirous to be partakers of that victorie, foolishly left their safe stations, where they were appointed by him to stand fast, and

D disorderedly pursued the chase, leauing that side of the battell where they stood, open vnto the Turks: but they were not gone farre, before they were hardly encountred by a great part of the Turks armie, for such purpose placed in a vallie fast by. In which fight Lesco one of the most valiant captaines of the Hungarians was slaine; and the Bishop of VERADIVM, a better churchman than souldier, and the first man that disordered the battell, seeking to saue himselfe by flight thorow the fenne, was there filthily strangled in the deepe mud, after he had with his horse therein struggled a great while. The Bishop of AGRIA, a man of greatest authoritie with the King, was at the same time also lost, with many other churchmen more. The Cardinall, with some other of the expert captaines retiring toward their former standings, were hardly assailed by the Turks, who by the comming in of the King and Huniades, were with great slaughter for-

E ced to retire, and euen readie to flie. Amurath seeing the great slaughter of his men, and all brought into extreme danger, beholding the picture of the Crucifix in the displaied ensignes of the voluntarie Christians, pluckt the writing out of his bosome, wherein the late league was compriſed, and holding it vp in his hand with his eyes cast vp to heauen, said:

Amurath praieth vnto Christ.

Behold thou crucified Christ, this is the league thy Christians in thy name made with me: which they haue without cause violated. Now if thou be a God, as they say thou art, and as we dreame, reuenge the wrong now done vnto thy name, and me, and shew thy power vpon thy periurious people, who in their deeds denie thee their God.

The King with Huniades furiously pursued the chased Turks, with bloudie execution a great space: when as the King in his heat hardly perswaded by Huniades to returne againe vnto his

F campe, at his comming thither found the Cardinall Iulian, with Franke, one of his chiefe captaines, and others, ouercharged with the Turks, which had againe made head against that part of the Christian armie: and there yet fought couragiously, by reason of their multitude, being also backt by the Ianizaries, which all this while had stood fast with their old King, as his last and most assured refuge, but were now come in. There began a most cruell and fierce fight: in the successe whereof, the Turks well saw the whole estate of their kingdome in EVROPE to consist,

A cruell fight.

many were there ſlaine on both ſides : the Turks feeling their loſſe leſſe than indeed it was, by reaſon of their multitude; and the Chriſtians, by reaſon of their courage. A great while the victorie ſtood doubtfull, inſomuch, that at length the Turks began to ſhrinke backe, in that part of the battell where the King and Huniades fought. But in the left ſide, they preuailed ſo vpon the Chriſtians, that they were euen readie to haue fled. Which when Huniades (hauing a vigilant eye vnto euery part of the armie) perceiued, he with ſpeed made thither, and there againe with his preſence reſtored the battell almoſt before loſt. Which done, he returned againe towards the King, who in the meane time had moſt valiantly repulſed a great number of the Turks, & now was come vnto the Ianizaries, Amurath his laſt hope. There was to be ſeen a thouſand manners of death, whileſt both the armies fought more like wild beaſts in their rage and furie, than warie and politicke ſouldiers. In this confuſed medly, the young King Vladiſlaus with greater courage than care of himſelfe, brake into the battell of the Ianizaries : at which time, Amurath himſelf was by a valiant Frenchman a Knight of the Roads, firſt wounded with a pike, and after aſſailed with his ſword, and had there ended his daies, but that he was ſpeedily reſcued by his guard, by whom this worthie Knight after great proofe of his valour was there ſlaine in the middeſt of his enemies. Vladiſlaus being got in alſo amongſt them, valiantly performed all the parts of a worthie ſouldier, vntill ſuch time as his horſe being ſlaine vnder him, he was forthwith oppreſſed by the multitude of his enemies and ſlaine : his head being ſtrucke off by Ferizes, one of the old Ianizaries, was by him preſented vnto Amurath; who commanded it preſently to be put vpon the point of a launce, and proclamation to be made, that it was the head of the Chriſtian King : which was afterwards ſo caried thorow the principall cities of Macedonia, and Grecia, as a trophey of the Turks victorie. Huniades after he had in vaine giuen diuers braue attempts, to haue reſcued the kings bodie, retired with a few Valachian horſmen, and ſeeing no hope of better hap (for all the Chriſtians being diſcouraged with the death of the king, had now taken themſelues to flight) gaue place to neceſſitie, and reſeruing himſelfe to his future fortune, fled ouer the mountaines into the thicke woods, from whence with much difficultie he got ouer Danvbivs into Valachia, and was there (as ſome write) by Dracula Prince of that countrey taken priſoner : In reuenge whereof, after he was enlarged by the Hungarians, he ſo aided Danus againſt Dracula, that in fine, Dracula and his ſonne were both ſlaine, and Danus placed in his roome. Iulian the Cardinall flying out of the battell, was found by that worthie man Gregorie Sanoſe, lying in the deſert foreſt by the way ſide, mortally wounded, and halfe ſtripped : by whom he was in few words ſharply reproued, as the wicked authour of that perfidious warre, and there left giuing vp the ghoſt. Many of the Chriſtians which fled out of that battell, fell into the enemies hands, and ſo were ſlaine: but greater was the number of them which were drowned in the fennes, or that by hunger and cold periſhed in the woods, or elſe after long and miſerable trauell, finding no paſſage ouer. Danvbivs, fell at length into the Turkiſh ſlauerie. This great and mortall battell, as it was with diuers fortune fought, ſo was alſo the preſent report thereof moſt vncertaine : for the Turks that were at the firſt put to flight, reported in the townes there by as they fled, that the battell was loſt : & they which had all the day endured the fight, not altogether aſſured of the victorie, and not knowing whether the Hungarians had retired themſelues, whileſt they ſuſpected ſome deceit in the Kings campe, by reaſon of the great ſilence therein, ſtaied two daies before they durſt aduenture to take the ſpoile thereof. The number of them that were ſlaine in this battell, as well on the one ſide as the other, was great ; as the mounts, and little hils, raiſed of the bones and bodies of them that were there buried, doe yet at this day declare. Howbeit, the certaine number was not knowne, ſome reporting moe, ſome fewer. Yet in this moſt agree, that of the Chriſtian armie being not great, ſcarce the third part eſcaped : and that the Turks bought this victorie with a farre greater loſſe, although it was of them leſſe felt, by reaſon of their multitude, made leſſe by that ſlaughter; as they that report leaſt thereof affirme, by thirtie thouſand. Which may well ſeeme rather to be ſo, for that Amurath after this victorie, neither farther proſecuted the ſame, nor ſhewed any tokens of ioy at all, but became very melancholie and ſad, and being of them about him, demanded why after ſo great a victorie, he was no merrier ; anſwered, That he wiſhed not at ſo great a price, to gaine many ſuch victories. Yet in memoriall thereof he erected a great pillar, in the ſame place where the King was ſlaine, with an inſcription of all that was then done: which as they ſay is yet there to be ſeene at this day. This bloudie battell was fought neere vnto Varna (in ancient time called

Dionisio-

A DIONISIOPOLIS (a place fatall vnto many great warriours, and therefore of them euen yet abhorred) the tenth day of Nouember, in the yeere of our Lord Christ 1444.

Some maliciously impute the losse of the battell of VARNA, and the death of the King, to Huniades, who (as they said) fled out of this battell with ten thousand horsemen: but this report agreeth not with the noble disposition of that couragious and valiant captaine, but seemeth rather to haue beene deuised, to excuse the foule dealing of the clergie; who as most histories beare witnesse, were the chiefe authors both of the warre, and of the lamentable calamitie ensuing thereof.

From the battell of VARNA Amurath returned to HADRIANOPLE, hauing lost the great-
B test part of his best souldiers, and there with great solemnitie buried the bodie of Carazia, viceroy of EVROPE, slaine in that battell: and then calling together all his nobilitie, againe resigned vp his kingdome vnto his sonne Mahomet, retiring himselfe vnto MAGNESIA, where he liued a solitarie and priuate life, hauing before vowed so to doe, in the great feare he was in, in the late battell against Vladislaus: but after he had a short time performed these his vowes in that obscure and melancholie life, he wearie thereof, as some suppose, as not a little reuiued with the late victorie, or else solicited by Caly Bassa and other great counsellors, returned againe to HADRIANOPLE, resuming vnto himselfe the gouernment of the kingdome, to the great discontentment of his ambitious sonne Mahomet.

Amurath to performe his vow, resigneth his kingdome to his sonne Mahomet, which he in short time after taketh againe vpon him.

Scanderbeg yet sticking in the borders of SERVIA, and hearing what had happened vnto
C King Vladislaus with the Hungarians, was therewith exceedingly greeued: and hauing now lost the hope whereupon he had vndertaken that so great an expedition, resolued to returne home againe into EPIRVS. Neuertheless, to be in some part reuenged of the wicked Despot, he with his armie forcibly brake into his countrey, and there did exceeding great harme. In his returning homewards, great numbers of Hungarians and Polonians, lately escaped from the slaughter at VARNA, repaired vnto him, whom he (according to the extremitie of their fortune) courteously releeued: and furnishing them with such things as they wanted, prouided them shipping to RAGVSA, from whence they might in safetie returne into their owne countries. Thus by the disloyaltie and trecherie of the faithlesse Despot of SERVIA, was Scanderbeg staied from being present at the bloudie battell of VARNA, to the vnspeakable losse of the D Christian common-weale: for it could not be, but that so many thousands of most resolute and expert souldiers, vnder the leading of so worthie a chiefetaine, must needs haue done much for the gaining of the victorie. And what more glorious sight could a man haue wished for, than to haue seene so puissant an armie in the field against the sworne enemie of Christendome, directed by two such valiant and renowned chiefetaines, as neuer, either before or since their time, was seene the like in one battell against the enemies of Christ and the Christian religion? They were both men of inuincible courage, of exceeding strength and agilitie of bodie, wise, prudent, and subtill; both of long time exercised in the Turks warres, the greatest terrour of that nation, and most worthie champions of the Christian religion, being therein both very zealous. Of the two, Huniades was at that time accounted the better commander, and the more E politicke, as a man of greater experience in martiall affaires, by reason of his greater yeeres: which was well counteruailed by Scanderbeg his perpetuall good fortune, still as it were attending vpon him, and by his experience afterwards gotten, as in the course of his historie well appeareth.

The comparison betwixt Huniades and Scanderbeg.

Amurath aduertised of these proceedings of Scanderbeg, as also of the great harmes by him done in MACEDONIA, and that the frontiers of his dominions bordering vpon EPIRVS, were by his furie vtterly wasted and spoiled, and his people there for most part slaine, and that the rest had for feare forsaken their dwellings, and left the countrey desolate and vnpeopled; was therewith exceedingly moued. Yet for so much as he still stood in dread of the Hungarians, and was now himselfe clogged with yeeres, and therefore more desirous of rest; consid-
F ering also the young yeeres of his eldest sonne Mahomet, as yet vnfit for the gouernment of so great and troublesome a kingdome; with the perpetuall good fortune of Scanderbeg, and malice of Huniades: he thought it not best to conuert all his forces vpon him, but to proue if he could cunningly draw him into some dishonourable peace for a time, that so he might afterwards at leisure be the better reuenged of him. For which cause he writ vnto him letters, mixt with grieuous threats, and some faigned courtesies, as followeth:

Amurath

G

Amurath Ottoman, King of the Turks, and Emperour of the East, to the moſt ingratefull Scanderbeg, wiſheth neither health nor welfare.

The ſullen and craftie letters of Amurath to Scanderbeg.

I neuer wanted honourable preferments to beſtow vpon thee all the while thou diddeſt liue in my court, of all others moſt vnkind Scanderbeg ; but now I want words wherewith to ſpeake vnto thee, thou haſt ſo highly offended my mind, and touched mine honour, that I know not in diſcretion what words to vſe vnto thee, but of late one of my domeſticall ſeruants. For neither will hard ſpeech mollifie the naturall fierceneſſe of thy proud diſpoſition, neither art thou worthie of better, which haſt farre exceeded all hoſtilitie. And becauſe thou wouldeſt omit no occaſion to prouoke me, haſt of late proceeded to that point of follie, that thou haſt had thine owne affaires, and the welfare of thine owne ſubiects, in ſmall regard, by confederating thy ſelfe in armes with the Hungarians, againſt me. It greeueth me to rehearſe other thy vnkindneſſe, and as it were to touch thoſe ſores, if my mind would euer ſuffer me to forget the ſame, or that thy ſo manifold and horrible treaſons, and ſtrange examples of a moſt vnthankfull mind, were to be couered with ſilence. Yet I thought good to aduertiſe thee (although perhaps too late) leſt that thy vnſtaied heat doe vntimely ouerthrow thee, with thy vnluckie kingdome : and then thou wouldeſt make humble confeſſion of thy long tranſgreſſion, when thou haſt loſt thy ſelfe, and left no hope of refuge in thy deſperate eſtate. We haue hitherto ſufficiently ſuffered thy manifold iniuries : thou haſt ſufficiently prouoked the maieſtie of the Othoman empire, with wrong and contumelious deſpight, and I with patience haue borne all theſe thy contempts. Thinkeſt thou that my armie by thee betraied vnto the Hungarians, ſhall be vnreuenged ? Thinkeſt thou that ſo many cities and townes in Epirvs, by thee rent from the bodie of my empire, with my garriſons there ſlaine, ſhall be forgotten ? Or thinkeſt thou with thy late committed outrages to eſcape my reuenging hands ? Remember the deſtruction of mine armie vnder Alis Baſſa ; the waſting and burning of my dominions ; and lately, the Hungarian warres, by thee ſo farre as in thee was, countenanced ; with the territories of George, the Deſpot of Servia, my father in law, by thee ſpoiled. At length amend thou graceleſſe man, and expect not farther, whether my indignation will breake out. Let not theſe trifling allurements of thy good fortune, ſo puffe vp thy fooliſh deſires, and ſharpen thy conceits, that thy miſerable fortunes afterwards may moue euen thy greateſt enemies, or my ſelfe, to compaſſion. I would thou ſhouldeſt at length remember my courteſies (if any ſparke of humanitie remaine in thy ſauage nature) and make me not longer ſorrie, that I haue ſo euill beſtowed the ſame. And although it is not the part of an honourable mind, to rehearſe thoſe things which we haue in bountie beſtowed vpon any man ; yet is it the token of a moſt vnthankfull nature, ſo eaſily to forget all kindneſſe paſt, as to need to be put in remembrance thereof. Wherefore Scanderbeg, I cannot but bewaile thy hap, and lament thine eſtate : For, to let paſſe the health of thy ſoule (which thou a very reprobate, eſteemeſt as nothing) not to ſpeake of the lawes of Mahomet by thee deſpiſed, and the holy Prophet by thee contemned, for the zeale thou haſt vnto the Chriſtian ſuperſtition : what haſt thou (which now holdeſt thy poore and baſe kingdome in ſuch price) euer wanted at my hands of all thoſe things which moſt delight the deſires of men ? Diddeſt thou euer want armour, horſes, a great traine of followers and ſeruants, money, or other ſuperfluities, the allurements of all ages ? Or diddeſt thou want matter to exerciſe thy valour, for increaſe of thine honour ? Waſt thou euer denied preferments, dignities, and honours of all ſorts fit for thine age, both at home and abroad ? Was any man in my court dearer vnto me, than thy ſelfe ? What growing wit, not of ſtrangers onely, but of them that were neereſt vnto my ſelfe, was better welcome vnto me than thine ? With what carefull inſtruction did I cauſe thee to be brought vp ? When thou waſt deliuered vnto me almoſt a child, I daily cheriſhed and increaſed thy hoped towardlineſſe, with learning and nurture : I haue at all times honoured thee with rich rewards, magnificall praiſes, and honours of the field (which of all worldly things is moſt glorious) ſo that in all feats of armes no ſouldier was to me better knowne, or captaine of me more honoured. For all theſe great benefits, Scanderbeg, thou now ſheweſt thy ſelfe ſuch an one, that I may be thought not to haue brought vp ſuch a man as I hoped for, but a very ſerpent in mine owne boſome. But the loue of thy countrey did moue thee : which if thou hadſt asked of me, would I haue denied the ſame vnto thee ? Which (if thou doeſt well remember) I ſo oftentimes voluntarily profered vnto thee ? But thou haddeſt rather to gaine the ſame by trecherie, than to receiue it at my hands of courteſie. So, thine be it therefore on God his name, and that with my very good will. And verily, according to my accuſtomed clemencie towards all them whom I haue once well knowne, and beene familiarly acquainted with,

H I K L M

A with, I now pardon thee all thou hast offended me; not for any thy present deserts, which are none, but because in this publique enmitie, it pleaseth me to remember my former kindnesse in private towards thee, and thy faithfulnesse sometimes in my affaires; especially for that the time was much longer wherein thou seruedst me, than the time wherein thou hast offended me. CROIA and thy fathers kingdome (although thou hast gained the same by foule treacherie) I giue vnto thee, vpon condition thou willingly restore vnto me the other townes of EPIRVS, which by no right belong vnto thee, but are mine by law of armes, by my selfe honourably won. Whatsoeuer thou hast taken from my father in law, the Prince of SERVIA, thou shalt forthwith restore, and make him an honourable recompence for the other harmes thou hast done vnto him; and for euer hereafter, thou shalt as well
B forbeare to offer violence to any our friends, as to aid any our enemies. So shalt thou for euer auoid the displeasure of the Turks, and stand in my good grace and fauour, as thou hast done before: except thou haddest rather (being taught by thine owne harmes) then in vaine crie for mercie, when thy furious outrage shall haue me in person, an implacable reuenger. Thou knowest thy forces, thou knowest the strength of mine armes; thou hast before thine eyes the fresh example of the Hungarian fortune, so that thou needest no further admonitions. Yet I would thou shouldest write at large what thou intendest to doe. Thou maist also conferre with Ayradin our seruant, our trustie and faithfull messenger, of whom thou shalt vnderstand more than are in these letters comprised. Farewell if thou be wise. From HADRIANOPLE.

C To these letters Scanderbeg gaue small credit, and lesse to the messenger, but least of all to the old Fox himselfe, whom he well knew to haue written nothing simply of good meaning, but onely to gaine a cessation from warres, vntill he might at better leisure set vpon him with all his forces: wherefore calling Ayradin the messenger vnto him, whom he rather held for a craftie spie, than an honourable embassadour, after he had many times both publiquely and priuately discoursed with him, so farre forth as was possible to sound the depth of his comming, and had also further entertained him with all honourable courtesies, he shewed him all his campe, with the strength thereof; which he did, because he would not haue the craftie messenger to thinke, that he was any thing afraid of his masters greatnesse. And at last greatly complaining of Amurath his cruell and perfidious dealing against his father, his brethren, and himselfe, he sent him
D away with such answere in writing as followeth.

The souldier of Christ Iesus, George Castriot, surnamed Scanderbeg, Prince of EPIRVS, to Amurath Ottoman King of the Turks sendeth greeting.

Thou hast in times past (as thou writest) exceeded me in many kinds of courtesies, and at this present I will exceed thee in modest and temperate speech: For I thinke there is no greater token of a base mind, than not to be able to forbeare to giue railing and opprobrious words, euen vnto our most mortall enemies. Wherefore we haue with patience receiued and seene, both thy letters and messenger: and to E confesse a truth, they haue ministred vnto me greater occasion of smile, than choller: whilest at the first thou shamest not to accuse me of much ingratitude, and treason: and presently following a milder passion, seemest carefull of my soules health, being ignorant of thine owne miserable estate, as a studious defender of a most damnable errour. And at last, keeping neither law of armes, nor orderly course answering to our affaires, doest most insolently and vnaduisedly, as a valiant conquerour to his vanquished enemie, propound many conditions of peace, of such qualitie and condition, that mine eares scorne to heare the same. Truely Amurath, although thy immoderate rayling might moone a man of greatest patience to intemperat speech: yet I impute the same partly to thy great age, and partly to the waywardnesse of thy nature; and the rest, to thy conceiued griefe, which I know thou canst hardly moderate: and the more, for that I haue not set downe my selfe to contend with thee in foule and vnseemely language; but
F with armes and the iust furie of warre. Yet I pray thee, wherefore dost thou so exclaime against mee before God and man? as though thou hadst first suffered wrong and iniurie from mee, and that thou hadst not in truth first done the same. Doest thou call my necessarie departing, a perfidious treachrie? my native countrey by my policie and valour recouered, doest thou obiect to mee as a villaine? obiect the same still and spare not; charge mee with such crimes for euer, I care not. The long catalogue of thy kindnesse towards me, which thou rehearsest, I could willingly remẽber, if it drew not with it the wofull remẽbrance of my greater miseries. Which if they were to be compared together, the greatnesse of thy good deserts would be ouerwhelmed with the multitude of thy greater tyrannies; which I had rather thou shouldest count with thy selfe, than blush whilest I repeat them. Euery man that knoweth them, may maruell how I had power to endure them, or that thou wast not wearie at last of thy crueltie and secret hatred. Thou tookest away my fathers kingdome by force; thou diddest murther my brethren; and my selfe thou diddest most wickedly vow to death, when I little feared any such crueltie. And doth it now seeme strange to thee, O Amurath, that an inuincible mind, desirous of libertie, should seeke to breake out of the bonds of so great slauerie? How long at length diddest thou thinke I would endure thy proud and insolent bondage? which for all that I many yeeres endured, and refused not thy command. I exposed my selfe to publicke and priuate dangers, both voluntarily and by thy designement: speeches were giuen out daily by thy selfe, and the admonition of my friends concerning thy deepe treacherie, was rife in mine eares: yet for all that, of long time I simply beleeued both thy words and deeds to haue beene deuoid of all fraud, vntill thy cankered malice began too too apparently to shew it selfe, then began I also to glose with thee, wholly metamorphosed into thine owne conceits, vntill I found occasion to recouer my libertie. Wherefore there is no cause thou shouldest now greeue, if thou be well beaten with thine owne rod. But these are but trifles, Amurath, in comparison of those things which I haue laid vp in hope and resolution of mind. Therefore hereafter surcease thine angrie threats, and tell not vs of the Hungarian fortune. Euery man hath his owne resolution, and euery men a particular gouernour of his actions: and so will we with patience endure such fortune as it shall please God to appoint vs. In the meane time, for direction of our affaires, we will not request counsell of our enemies, nor peace of thee, but victorie by the helpe of God. Farewell. From our campe.

When Amurath had read these letters, and further conferred with Arradin, he was filled with wrath and indignation, wondering at the great resolution of so small a Prince, presently casting in his mind (as was thought) the difficultie of that warre. Yet because he would giue no token of feare, oftentimes stroking his white beard, as his manner was when he was throughly angrie, with a dissembled cheerefulnesse of countenance said:

Amurath his passionat speech in his rage against Scanderbeg.

Thou desirest (wicked man) thou desirest the title of some honourable death: wee will giue it thee (beleeue vs) wee will giue it thee. Wee our selues will be present at the buriall of our foster child, and in person (though vnbidden) honour the funerall pompe of the great King of Epirvs; that thou shalt neuer complaine among the damned ghosts, that thou diddest die a base or obscure kind of death.

And for because at that time, by reason of many great occurrents, he could not conuert his whole power into Epirvs, he sent Ferises, one of his best captaines, with nine thousand choice horsemen, to keepe Scanderbeg in doing, and to spoile his countrey so much as he could. Which was with such speed done, that it was thought Ferises would haue beene in the heart of Epirvs, before Scanderbeg could haue had knowledge of his comming. But for all his haste, he could not so preuent the flying fame, but that Scanderbeg hearing thereof, and hauing his men alwayes in readinesse, placed fifteene hundred good footmen in ambush vpon the rough mountaines, leading into the valley of Movea, whereby the Turks must needs passe into Epirvs; placing also two thousand horsemen, as he thought most fit and conuenient for his purpose. Ferises descending from the high mountaines full of woods and bushes, by the broken and stonie wayes leading into the valley, was in that troublesome and intricate passage fiercely set vpon by Scanderbegs readie footmen, suddenly arising out of ambush, where the Turks hauing no vse of their horses, but rather by them encombered, were slaine as Deere enclosed in a toyle. In this conflict seuen hundred and sixtie Turks were taken prisoners, and a greater number slaine, and Ferises himselfe, with the rest, enforced to flie, crying still out as he fled, Better some saued, than all lost. Scanderbeg hauing thus ouerthrowne Ferises, pursued him into Macedonia, and with the spoile there taken, rewarded his souldiers, as he had also many times before done.

Amurath greeued with the ouerthrow of Ferises, presently sent Mustapha a politicke and hardie captaine, with a new supplie of six thousand souldiers to take the charge from Ferises: commanding him in no case, nor vpon any occasion, to enter farre into Epirvs: but onely to burne and spoile the frontiers thereof, saying, That he would account it for good seruice, if he might but vnderstand, that the trees and fruits of that countrey had felt the force of his anger.

Mustapha

A Mustapha hauing receiued his charge, when he began to draw neere the borders of EPIRVS, continually sent out scouts before his armie, to see if the passages were cleere, and so warily entred the vallie of MOCRRA, where Ferises not long before was ouerthrowne. In this fruitfull vallie, being the frontiers of Scanderbegs dominion, Mustapha entrenched his armie, vpon the rising of a hill, and placed espials vpon the tops of the high mountaines round about, by them to discouer the comming of the enemie, and to haue notice thereof by signes into the campe: then reseruing foure thousand horsemen with himselfe, to keepe his campe, he sent forth the rest of his armie, about nine thousand horsemen, to forrage and spoile the countrey; giuing charge before, that euery man vpon paine of death should presently retire to the campe, vpon signe giuen from
B thence, as to a place of safetie and refuge. The Turkish armie ranging ouer that rich and pleasant vallie, burnt the villages, cut downe trees, spoiled the vineyards, and made hauocke of all things that fire and sword could destroy; in that point executing Amuraths command to the full. At length Scanderbeg drawing neere to this vallie, with foure thousand horsemen and a thousand foot, was aduertised of all the enemies doings, by an Epirot souldier, who greeuously wounded, had hardly escaped from the Turks: of him he vnderstood, what number of Turks were burning and destroying the countrey, of the campe also kept by Mustapha, and how espials were placed vpon the mountaines. Scanderbeg hauing well considered Mustapha his warie proceedings, and seeing no policie to be vsed against so carefull an enemie, resolued to vanquish him by plaine force, by assaulting him suddenly in his trenches, before his dispersed souldiers
C could repaire to the campe: and hauing to this purpose, with effectuall perswasions encouraged the minds of his valiant souldiers, readie of themselues to follow him thorow all dangers; when he had set all things in order for assaulting the enemies campe, speedily entred the vallie, and was presently discouered by the enemies espials, from the tops of the high hils, and a signe giuen to the campe, from whence also the appointed signe was giuen for the dispersed souldiers to retire: but most of them being straied from the campe, and busied in taking the spoile of the countrey, heard not or saw not the signe giuen. Those which were within the hearing thereof, retired to the campe, and at their heeles followed Scanderbegs souldiers, terrifying them with calling vpon the name of Scanderbeg. Many of the Turks were by the Christians slaine in the entrance of the campe, with their booties in their hands, and presently the Turks trenches were now by D Scanderbegs souldiers couragiously assaulted, and the Turks beaten from the top of them. They hauing won the trenches, preuailed still vpon the Turks, filling all their campe with feare and slaughter. There was no vse of shot in that medlie, by reason of the straightnesse of the place, for they were now come to pell mell. Mustapha seeing his souldiers put to the worst, and that the campe was not long to be defended, tooke horse and fled by the port which was furthest from the enemie. The rest of the souldiers fled also, making such poore shift for themselues as they could. In this battell 5000 Turks were slaine, and but 300 taken; for the Christians enraged with the spoile of the countrey, reuenged themselues with the slaughter of the Turks. Scanderbeg lost in this conflict but 20 horsemen, and 50 footmen. The rest of the Turks armie dispersed in the countrey, hearing the tumult in the campe, misdoubting the fortune of their fel-
E lowes, fled also: yet many of them were in that fight pursued and slaine.

Scanderbeg his valiant resolution for the assaulting of Mustapha in his campe.

After this ouerthrow, Mustapha returning to Amurath, the better to excuse the misfortune of himselfe, and the other captaines before sent, greatly commended the inuincible courage of Scanderbeg, and his wonderfull skill in feats of armes; perswading Amurath either to send a greater power against him, or else none at all, saying, That to send such small armies, was but to minister matter to the increase of his glorie, and the infamie of the Turks; and to vse policie against him the master of policie, was but meere follie. It greeued Amurath to heare the praises of his enemie, although he knew the same to be true, by the continuall fortune he had alwaies against his great captaines Alis Bassa, Ferises, and Mustapha: wherefore he determined for a time not to prouoke him further, but to suffer him to liue in peace: yet commanded Mustapha to renew his
F armie for defence of the borders of his kingdome towards EPIRVS, against the innouation of Scanderbeg; but straightly commanding him in no case to inuade any part of EPIRVS, neither vpon any occasion offered, or conceiued hope of victorie, to ioyne battell with Scanderbeg, for feare of such euill successe as before.

At this time also the Grecians of PELOPONESVS, now called MORRA, hauing before fortified the strait of CORINTH from sea to sea, with a perpetuall wall, which they called HEXA-

MYLVM, and deepe trenches about six miles in length, had also built fiue strong castles in the same wall, of purpose to take away all passage by land into that rich countrey, and began now not only to denie the yeerely tribute they were wont to pay vnto the Turkish King, but also to inuade such Princes of ACHAIA their neighbours, as were content to remaine still the Turks tributaries: amongst whom Nereus Prince of ATHENS, and Turacan gouernour of THESSALIA for Amurath, ceased not by continuall complaints to incense him against them of PELOPONESVS. Who hauing his armie in readinesse, although it was now winter, and he himselfe very aged, set forward from HADRIANOPLE, and marching thorow THESSALIA, came into ACHAIA, where most of the Grecians were before fled for feare into PELOPONESVS. So passing on with his armie, he came to the strait commonly called ISTMVS, where the famous citie of CORINTH sometime stood; and there encamped his armie neere vnto the strong wall, and castles, lately before built, hoping that the Grecians of PELOPONESVS, terrified with the multitude of his armie, would without resistance submit themselues: but when he perceiued them to stand vpon their guard, and to trust to their strength, he laid batterie to the wall foure dayes, and hauing made it saultable, brake thorow the same with his armie. The Grecians hauing lost the wall (their chiefe strength) fled, some to one strong hold, and some to another, as their fortune led them; the Turks at their pleasure spoiling and destroying that rich and pleasant countrey, sometime the nurse of worthie wits, and famous captaines: where they found wonderfull riches, and tooke prisoners without number; insomuch that they were sold among the Turks at most vile price. There Amurath for his pleasure, cruelly sacrificed six hundred Christian captiues, to the hellish ghost of his dead father Mahomet: and afterwards imposing a yeerely tribute vpon the Peloponesians, and other Grecian Princes now yeelding againe vnto him, as an induction to their further slauerie vnder the Turkish tyrannie, he returned, taking in his way the two famous cities of PATRAS and SICYONE. Thus the rich countrey of PELOPONESVS, and all the rest of GRECIA, sometime fountaine of all learning and ciuilitie, became tributarie to the barbarous and cruell Turks, in the yeere of our Lord 1445.

Peloponesus made tributarie vnto the Turke.

1446 Baiazet borne.

Old Amurath now clogged with yeeres, and wearied with long wars, was content to take his rest at HADRIANOPLE: during which time, Baiazet the sonne of Mahomet was borne in the yeere 1446, who afterwards of long time with great glorie gouerned the Turkish empire at CONSTANTINOPLE, as in his place shall appeare.

The Hungarians after the calamitie of VARNA, wherein they had together with Vladislaus their king, lost most part of their nobilitie also; in a generall assemblie of their states, made choice of Ladislaus, the posthumous sonne of Albertus, (and then in keeping of Fredericke the Emperour) for their King. But forasmuch as he being then but a child of fiue yeeres old, and chosen King, more for the remembrance of the Emperour Sigismund his grandfather, and Albertus his father, and for the good hope conceiued of him, than for any other thing presently to be expected from him; it was thought more than necessarie, to make choice of some notable and worthie man, vnto whom they might (during the time of the Kings minoritie) commit the gouernment & protection of that so great and turbulent a kingdome. Many there were in that honourable assemblie well thought of, both of themselues and others: but such was the glorie and valour of Huniades, and so great the remembrance of his worthie deserts both of the kingdome of HVNGARIE, & of the Christian common-weale in generall, as without his seeking, procured vnto him the generall fauour and suffrages of all; yea so farre, that euen they which most enuied at his honour, as ouershadowing their owne, were glad to hold their peace, for that without him it was commonly thought the state of that shaken kingdome could not long stand: So by the generall consent of all the States there assembled, he was with the great applause of the people chosen and proclaimed gouernour, as of all others most fit for so great and heauie a charge: wherein he quietly spent some few yeeres in deciding of ciuill controuersies, in composing the quarrels of the nobilitie; not forgetting in the mean time the indifferent administration of iustice to all men, ending many controuersies farre from the place of iudgement, and that without all suspicion of corruption, vsing therein such expedition and neuer-wearied patience, in hearing euery mans cause, that sitting, going, standing, riding, he dispatched many great and waightie matters: alwayes shewing himselfe affable & courteous, as well vnto them of the poorer sort, as others of greater calling, that had any sutes vnto him. So that it was of him truly said, That no man was than he vnto his friends more friendly, or vnto his enemies more crosse and contrarie.

Huniades in the minoritie of the King, chosen gouernour of all the kingdome of Hungarie.

In

A In time of peace he was alwaies prouiding for warre, heaping vp great treasure, and such other things, as without which, the warres could not be maintained. But aboue all things, he was carefull of the good agreement of the nobilitie, taking great paines in reconciling their displeasures conceiued one against another, and that with such dexteritie, as that he was both of them and others generally both beloued and feared.

In the meane time, whilest he was thus busied in disposing of the ciuill affaires of the commonweale and the administration of iustice, hee was aduertised by his espials, how that the old Sultan Amurath was raising great forces both in ASIA and EVROPE, and that as the common fame went, for the inuasion of HVNGARIE. For the withstanding whereof, Huniades not vn- 1448 Huniades goeth against the Turks.

B prouided, as neuer vnmindfull of so dangerous an enemie, or of any thing more desirous, than in some sort to be reuenged of the great losse receiued at VARNA; in the fourth yeare of his gouernement and in the yeare of our Lord 1448. accompanied with most part of the nobilitie of HVNGARIE, and the Vaiuoid of VALACHIA his friend and confederate, set forward against the Turke, with an armie of two and twentie thousand choice souldiers. So hauing passed the riuer TIBISCVS, or TEISE, and trauailing through VALACHIA, a little beneath where the riuer MOROVA running through SERVIA, falleth into DANVBIVS, he with most part of his armie passed that great riuer; the rest in the meane time taking passage ouer at a towne called SEVERIN. Huniades with his armie being thus gotten ouer into SERVIA, by his Embassadors requested the Despot, as he had oftentimes before, to put himselfe into that most Christian warre; and re-

C membring the great benefits he had receiued frō the Hungarians, not to shew himselfe therfore vngratefull, then which, nothing could bee more dishonourable: and to encourage him the more, certified him both of his owne strength, and of the aide brought vnto him by the Vaiuod; and that for the good successe of the warre, there wanted nothing but his presence and direction, with such troupes of light horsemen as he knew hee had alwaies in readinesse. Wherewith he requested him with all speed to follow him. But he being a man of no religion, and better affected vnto the Turke than Huniades, the more cleanely to withdraw himselfe from this warre, pretended many excuses: first, the league he had with Amurath his sonne in law, which he said he might not breake, for feare that if things chanced not well, hee might so fall againe headlong into his olde miserie; then, the vnseasonablenesse of the time, Autumne being now

D past, which difficulties in those cold countries they had to their cost too much felt in the late warre: These with many other such like he alleadged, in excuse that he came not: but the truth was, the malice of the man, greeued to see Huniades preferred before him in the gouernment of the kingdome, and disdaining to serue vnder his ensignes, being himselfe Despot, and King of SERVIA, descended of the royall race, the cause of his backewardnesse: so that blinded with enuie, he could not there rightly iudge of himselfe, or what was fit for him in this case to haue done. But Huniades angrie with his vnkinde answere, threatned him with his owne hands to be reuenged vpon him, and to giue away his kingdome to one more worthie thereof than hee, if he should The false Despot giueth Amurath knowledge both of Huniades his comming, and of his strength.

E with victory returne. So passing through SERVIA, as through the enemies countrie, he came into BVLGARIA. After whose departure, the false Despot by speedy messengers aduertised Amurath both of the comming of the Hungarians, and of their strength; yea hee certified him of euery dayes march, and how that Huniades was but with a small companie of his owne, and some weake supplies of the Vaiuods come ouer DANVBIVS: whom if hee should not presently meet, but suffer him to come on further, and so with his armie to get betwixt him and home, he might so shut him in, as that he should hardly be able to scape his hands. All which he did, partly for enuy, partly to gratifie the Turke, and the better to keepe friendship with him. So Amurath not contemning the Despots counsell, suffered Huniades without resistance to enter a great way into his countrey, and comming two or three daies march behinde him, so stopped the passage as that he could not possibly retire, but that hee must needes fight. And now they were both come vnto a great plaine in BVLGARIA, which the Hungarians call RIGOMEZV, and the

F Rascians the plaine of COSSOVA, through the middest whereof the riuer SCHICHNIZA rising out of the mountaines of ILLIRIA running, at length falleth into MOROVA, and so into DANVBIVS: this plaine is about 20 miles in length, & in breadth fiue, enuironed on each side with pleasant mountains, in manner of a Theatre, the riuer and low vallies at the foot of the mountaines being garnished with many countrey villages and townes. Into this fatall plaine when as the Hungarians first, and after them the Turkes, were as into a place of combate descended;

an old woman dwelling in one of the villages vpon the riuer side fast by, where both armies of late passed, with a loud voice cried out, Oh how much I now feare, the hard fortune of the Hungarians. When as their passage ouer by the foord troubled the riuer but one day, and the Turks three. By the small number of their armie, diuining their ensuing ouerthrow. In the middest almost of this plaine ariseth a small hill, by the foot whereof the riuer SCHICHNIZA runneth; not farre beyond which, toward the head of the plaine, was a certaine tower built like a piramides, in memoriall of Amurath the first of that name, and third King of the Turks, there slaine: which tower, Amurath fearing lest Huniades marching before him, should take, and so become vnto him ominous (for in such matters the Turks are very superstitious) he made the more haste, of purpose to ioyne battell with him before he should come to the foresaid tower. Huniades being come vnto the hill, easily arising in the middest of the plaine, there encamped, expecting the comming of Scanderbeg; who was said (according to appointment made betwixt him and Huniades) to be euery houre comming. Wherefore Amurath fearing left the tower fast by should be taken, and the enemies power strengthened by the comming of the Albanois, prouoked Huniades to battell; who still refused the same, in hope of his friends comming: which made the Turke more fierce vpon him, seeking by all meanes he could to draw him to battell, but especially by cutting him off from water and forrage: for why, he much presumed vpon his multitude, hauing in his armie about fourescore thousand fighting men. At length Huniades for want of water and other necessaries, enforced to fight, vpon S. Lukes day being then Thursday, commanded his souldiers to make themselues readie: and diuiding his armie into two and thirtie battailions, in such order as he meant to giue battell, the more to encourage them, spake vnto them as followeth:

The ominous speech of an old woman.

The notable speech of Huniades to encourage his souldiers against the Turks.

At length (valiant souldiers and fellowes in armes) the day is come, wherein you may reuenge that dishonour, or disgrace, you receiued in the battell of VARNA; and recouer your former credit of constancie, and praise, if you will play the men: the enemie opposeth against you, but these reliques of his armies, by you so often broken and discomfited; who although they be in number moe than you, yet are they in hope, quarrell, and strength, farre inferiour. For what can they hope for, which fight not for their owne, but for another mans kingdome? and in conquering, procure vnto themselues nothing but bondage in this life, and torment in the life to come, and in both perpetuall and endlesse miserie? Whereas you on the other side, howsoeuer the matter fall out, fighting for your owne kingdome, your children, your countrey, your houses and altars, may assuredly hope for in both, eternall and vndoubted blisse. You haue also farre greater cause to fight, as they which if they doe not valiantly ouercome their enemies, are in danger with themselues to lose also all that theirs is. The strength of both are sufficiently tried. Once we vnfortunatly ioyned battell at VARNA, where if we might make exchange of our fortunes there found, happily the Turke would make choice of our flight, rather than of the great slaughter of his owne men: who being not able to ouertake vs, was there notably beaten, with the losse of a great part of his armie: whose great losse there receiued, may counteruaile our dishonour; although the losse, he suffered perforce, but we our flight by choice. But of that our ouerthrow, the angrie powers from aboue (willing to reuenge our breach of faith) were as I verily beleeue, the cause, rather than our cowardise: for euen there, all the authors of that perfidious dealing, euen there I say, euery one receiued the iust guerdon of their treacherie. Whereas we against our wils, drawne into that wofull warre, by the mercie of God yet liue with you, preserued for the defence of the Christian common-weale, and especially of HVNGARIE, that it should not be ouer-runne with the Turkish power and rage. The number of your enemies is not of you to be feared, when as you with few, haue oftentimes learned to fight with their multitudes, and caried away from them the victorie. Hitherto we haue rather fought by the power of God than man, and in the name of Christ Iesus our Sauiour, haue easily ouerthrowne their prophane battels. Which way soeuer we haue turned our selues, in his most mightie name, we haue with our victorious armes opened our way, for that we fought vnder the leading and conduct of the highest, whose helpe we haue alwayes felt at hand: neither shall we thereof this day faile, if we be mindfull of his forepassed loue towards vs, and of our wonted valour. God is alwayes present with them that in his iust quarrell fight couragiously. Hereunto is ioyned the safe manner of our fight, by reason of our men at armes, and barbed horses, who like a strong castle cannot easily be ouerthrowne. Our battalions are such as may easily be commanded, and yet strong enough against our enemies: whereas their great multitude breedeth but confusion. We haue many notable and forcible engines of warre, which they haue

A haue not. Besides that, euery houre we looke for the worthie Scanderbeg his comming. The danger is not so great, as that we should feare it; or so little, as that we should contemne it. Backe againe without victorie we may not goe, for that our armie is hardly by the straits of these mountaines to be led: and if the way were neuer so easie, yet without doing that we came for, and glorie with victorie, we may not retire. Vnto the valiant, all difficulties are propounded. Wherefore sith this your last labour is at hand, wherein the whole strength of the Turks may be for euer cut off, I pray and beseech you (fellow souldiers) by that God vnder whose power and protection we serue, and by the loue you beare vnto your countrey, your wiues, your children, and wealth, vpon the signall of battell giuen, so to shew your valour, as men resolued to be fully reuenged of the iniuries by that filthie and wicked nation done both to God and man:
B and especially of the losse receiued at Varna. We lost there a deuout King, who for our safetie, and for the breach of his faith, sacrificed himselfe; by which royall sacrifice, that diuine anger is appeased: vnto whose ghost, I beseech you, in this battell to make an honourable sacrifice. Not forgetting withall, to reuenge the death of other worthie men in that battell slaine. This feare of the Turks, is at once and euen this day to be cut off; and so, as that it should neuer grow againe: and the kingdome of Hvngarie, so to be deliuered from the danger of most cruell slauerie, as that it may by this dayes worke gaine perpetuall rest, and glorie, vnto the enioying of the pleasures both of this life, and of the life to come. Wherefore (worthie souldiers) we must fight with all our force, for that our honour so requireth, our profit so perswadeth, and necessitie enforceth. As for our selues, howsoeuer the matter fall out, all
C shall be with vs well: If victorie, perpetuall blisse and happinesse shall thereby be procured vnto our countrey, and immortall fame vnto our selues: but if we shall be ouercome, here we shall be most honourably buried in the bed of fame, to liue in heauen with God and his Saints for euer. Wherefore I beseech you so to figt, as men resolutely set downe to ouercome, or if it shall otherwise fall out, as men resolued honourably to die.

With this the Generals speech, all the mindes of the hearers were greatly enflamed, and they all by his words, and their owne hot desires, sufficiently encouraged. Neither did old Amurath on the other side with lesse care or dilligence marshall his armie & encourage his Turks, sparing neither cheerfull speech, glorious promises, or seuere command: Whose armie being brought into the plaine, & ranged in order of battaile, filled the same from the one side to the other, euen
D vnto the very mountaines, to the great astonishment of the Christians: and so about nine a clock in the morning set forward. Huniades had from the hill where he lay, sent downe both the wings of his armie, and had a front on both sides before them, stretched out certain long troups of light horsemen, to begin the skirmish: In the middest betwixt both he had placed Zechel, his sisters son, with a strong square battaile of men at armes: and such as he had kept aloft vpon the hill for rescues, he had compassed about with his waggons, as with trenches. The signall of the battaile being giuen, the fierce and couragious souldiers on both sides, with cheerefull mindes, began at first to skirmish a farre off: but afterwards fortune as it were fawning vpon both sides, and their courage thereupon increasing, they began with greater force to fight foot to foot, and hand to hand. Which hot fight, continued about three houres: at length the Turkes battaile
E was put to the worst, by Benedict Losonicus, who had the leading of the right wing; and so likewise in the left also by Stephen Bamffi, who with great slaughter had notably foyled the great Bassa of Evrope, still pressing hard & desperately vpon him. Which discomfiture of his men in both wings Amurath beholding, presently sent in strong supplies, & in both places renewed the battaile: whereby the Hungarian and Valachian light horsemen before wearied, were enforced to retire vnto the men at armes; who serred together, and standing as a strong wall, easily repulsed the greatest assaults of the Turks: In which maner of fight many were on both sides slain, but farre more of the Turkes, by reason they were neither so well horsed nor armed as were the Christians. Huniades in the meane time with the artillerie from the hill, did the Turkes great harme: which Amurath perceiuing, drew as close vnto the hill as he could, by that meanes sa-F uing his people (so much as was possible) out of the danger of the artillerie, mounted on high aboue them in such sort, as that it could little or nothing now hurt them. Which Huniades from the hill beholding, came downe to the releefe of his men, sending new supplies to both wings; sometime encouraging them with cheerfull speech, and sometime with his owne most valiant hand: vnto the wearie he sent releefe, the fearefull he encouraged, them that were flying he staied, and where hee saw the enemies fastest comming on, there was hee himselfe present to meet them; them,omitting nothing that was of a good Generall or worthie ſouldier to be done. The valiant G he commended,the coward he reproued,and as a carefull Generall,was himſelfe in euery place preſent. Whereby the battell became ſo fierce and terrible, that in euery place a man might haue ſeene all fowly foiled with bloud,and the quarrey of the dead. Amurath in like manner ſtill ſent in new ſupplies, nothing diſcouraged with the great loſſe of his men, preſuming vpon his multitude,as fully reſolued orderly to fight, & to make vſe of all his forces;in hope at length by continuall ſending in of freſh ſupplies,to wearie his enemies, whō he ſaw he could not by force ouercome. Wherein he was not deceiued, for one battailion of the Hungarians was oftentimes enforced to wearie foure or fiue of the Turks before they could be releeued,they came on ſo faſt. That day they dined and ſupped in the battell, refreſhing themſelues with ſuch ſhort repaſt as H they could eat ſtanding, going, or riding. The Turks armie was that day in euery place put to the worſt,and oftentimes with great ſlaughter enforced by the Hungarians to retire almoſt vnto their trenches: yet was the battell ſtill againe renewed,& ſo fought on both ſides,as well appeared they were reſolued either to ouercome, or there to die. This cruell fight maintained all the day,was by the comming on of the night ended, both the armies retiring into their owne trenches:but with purpoſe the next day to renew the battell,& not to giue ouer or turne their backs, vntill the victorie were by dint of ſword determined. So with little reſt, was that night ſpent, both armies keeping moſt diligent watch,al carefully expecting the next day,as by battel therin with ſuch force & courage as before, for there was none of them which had not the day before ſpent their whole ſtrength;whereas there was yet almoſt fortie thouſand of the Turks,which either had not fought at all,or but lightly skirmiſhed. Yet Huniades exhorted his ſouldiers,not by

Hee wiſhed them to ſet before their eyes the calamities like to enſue, if they ſhould as cowards be o- K
uercome: firſt, the diuers kinds of death and torture; then, the ſlauerie of their wiues and children; the rauiſhment of their virgins and matrons; and laſt of all, the vtter deſtruction of their kingdome,with the horrible confuſion of all things, as well ſacred as prophane: all which were by that one daies labour (as he ſaid) to be auoided. And therfore he beſought them for the loue both of God and man,with their wonted valour, that day to ſet at liberty for euer, themſelues, their countrey, their wiues & children, and whatſoeuer elſe they held deere. In like manner alſo did Amurath encourage his ſouldiers, with great promiſes,and threats, perſwading them rather to endure any thing, then by that daies ouerthrow to be driuen out of EVROPE. He carefully viewed his armie, ordered his battailes, & with many great reaſons perſwaded them to play the men. But after that ſome light skirmiſhes being paſt, both the armies were fully ioyned,the bat- L taile was fought with no leſſe force and furie then the day before. Of the Chriſtians many then wounded, came now againe into the battaile, there either by ſpeedy death or ſpeedy victory to cure their wounds before receiued; and there did right good ſeruice. Great was the ſlaughter in euery place,neither could the force of the Hungarians be withſtood;whoſe furious impreſſion, when the Turks could not by plain force endure,they began with their freſh horſemen, cūningly to delude their deſperate fierceneſſe: at ſuch time as the Hungarians beganne moſt hardly to charge them,they by & by turned their backs, ſuffering them a while to follow after them,far ſcattered and diſperſed: who allured as it were with the hope of a preſent victory, eagerly purſued them, & in the purſuit ſlew diuers of them. And they againe vpon a ſignall giuen, cloſing together,& turning back vpon the diſperſed troupes,well reuenged the death of their fellowes: M & with their often charges and retraits,wonderfully wearied the Hungarians;notably deluding their furious attempts with that vncertaine kind of fight,all the day long. Many of the Hungarians were ſlaine, and the Turkes had that day the better, and ſo both armies being wearied night and wearines ended the fight: both retiring into their trencher,there keeping moſt careful watch. The next morning by the dawning of the day,the battaile was again begun. Huniades his bro-

A brother, Generall of the Valachians, with his light horſemen ſetting firſt forward; after whom in ſeemely order followed the reſt of the nobilitie, with their companies. Where for certaine houres, the battaile was heardly fought with like hope on both ſides, & a great ſlaughter made, but eſpecially of the Hungarians; who wearied with the long fight, & moſt part of them wounded, were now all to endure this third daies labour. Zechel (Huniades his ſiſters ſonne) valiantly fighting in the front of the battaile, was the firſt of the leaders there ſlaine in the thickeſt of the Turks. Emericus Marzalus and Stephen Bamffi, both great commanders, encloſed by the Turks, there died alſo. Amurath ſeeing the formoſt enſignes of the Chriſtians, which ſtood in Zechel his regiment, taken, & his ſoldiers (diſcomfited with the death of their colonell) turning their backs;
B preſently commanded all the companies, which were many (yet left in the trenches, for freſh ſupplies) to iſſue foorth, and at once to ouerwhelme the Chriſtians, being (as hee ſayd) but few and ouerwearied with three daies continuall fight. Vpon which the Kings cõmand, they fiercely breaking out, preſently ouerthrew both the wings of the Chriſtians, before wauering; and in a great battaile (wherein moſt of the chiefe commanders were ſlaine, and their enſignes taken) diſcomfited the reſt, and with a great ſlaughter put them to flight. Huniades ſeeing his brother now ſlaine, the enſignes taken, and the battaile quite loſt; betook himſelfe to flight alſo, leauing behinde him his tents and baggage, all which ſhortly after became a prey vnto the Turkes: who from noone vntill night furioſly followed the chaſe, with moſt cruell execution; but at length ſtaied by the comming on of the darkneſſe, they returned againe vnto their trenches. The reſt
C of the Turkes armie that followed not the chaſe, compaſſing in the Hungarian campe, were there by the wounded ſouldiers, the wagoners, & other drudges of the armie, kept out ſo long as they had any ſhot left; but yet were in the end euery mothers ſonne ſlaine, though not altogether vnreuenged, two or three of the Turkes in many places lying dead by the bodie of one Hungarian. Amurath to couer the greatneſſe of the loſſe he there receiued, commanded the bodies of his captaines there ſlaine, to be forthwith buried; and the bodies of his common ſouldiers, to be for the moſt part caſt into the riuer SCHICHNIZA: For which cauſe the inhabitants of the countrey there by, of long time after abſtained from eating of any fiſh taken in that riuer. The plaine by this great battaile made once againe famous, lay neuertheleſſe many yeares after couered with dead mens bones, as if it had been with ſtones: neither could be ploughed by the D countrey people, but that long time after armour and weapons were there ſtill in many places turned vp and found. Thus albeit that this bloody victorie fell vnto the Turkes, yet was their loſſe farre greater then the Hungarians; hauing loſt (as was reported by them that ſay leaſt) foure and thirtie thouſand of themſelues, for eight thouſand of their enemies. Howbeit they themſelues report the loſſe to haue been on both ſides far greater; as that of the Chriſtians were ſlaine ſeuenteen thouſand, and of themſelues fortie thouſand: which in ſo long and mortall a fight, is not vnlike to haue been true. In this vnfortunate battaile fell moſt part of the Hungarian nobilitie: all, men worthie eternall fame and memorie, whoſe names we for breuitie will paſſe ouer. Many in the chaſe taken, and the next day brought to Amurath, were by the commandement of the angry tyrant ſlaine. Such as eſcaped out of the ſlaughter by the way of ILLYRIA, returned E in ſafetie: but ſuch as ſought to ſaue themſelues by returning back againe through SERVIA the Deſpots countrey, found the ſame ſo troubleſome as that few of them eſcaped, but that they were by the way either ſlaine, or quite ſtripped of all they had.

The battaile againe began the third day.

Huniades flieth

The number of the Turks and Chriſtians ſlaine in the battaile of Coſſoua.

Neither was the fortune of the noble Huniades much better then the fortune of the reſt, who hauing on horſebacke all alone by vncouth and vntract waies, trauailed three dayes without meat or drinke, and the fourth day tyred his horſe and caſt him off; being on foot and diſarmed, fell into the hands of two notable theeues, who in diſpoiling him of his apparel, finding a faire crucifix of gold about his necke, fell at ſtrife betwixt themſelues for the ſame: whereby he tooke occaſion to lay hand vpon one of their ſwords, and with the ſame preſently thruſt him through; and then ſuddenly aſſailing the other, put him to flight alſo. So deliuered of this dan-
F ger, trauailing on, and almoſt ſpent with thirſt and hunger, the next day he light vpon a ſheepheard, a ſturdie rough knaue, who hearing of the ouerthrow of the Hungarians, was (in hope of prey) roaming abroad in that deſolate countrey: Who at their firſt meeting, ſtrucken with the maieſtie of the man, ſtood at gaze vpon him; as alſo did Huniades, fearing in his ſo great weakeneſſe to haue to doe with him. Thus a while hauing the one well regarded the other, they began to enter talke, the ſheepheard bluntly asking him of his fortune; and he for Gods ſake cra-

uing of him ſome thing to eate. When as the ſhepheard hearing of his heard happe, mooued with his eſtate, and hope of promiſed reward, brought him vnto a poore cottage not farre off, cauſing to be ſet before him bread and water, with a few oynions. Who in the pleaſant remembrance of that paſſed miſerie, would oftentimes after in his greateſt banquets ſay, That he neuer in his life fared better, or more daintily, than when he ſupped with this ſhepheard. So well can hunger ſeaſon homely cates. Thus refreſhed, he was by the ſhepheard conducted to SINDEROVIA: whereof the Deſpot hauing intelligence (whoſe countrey was all layd for the ſtaying of him) cauſed him by the captaine of the Caſtle to be aprehended, and impriſoned. But after certaine daies ſpent in talke about his deliuerance, it was at length agreed, that all ſuch ſtrong townes in RASCIA and SERNIA, as had by the Hungarians been detained from the Depſot, at ſuch time as his kingdome was by Ring Vladiſlaus reſtored vnto him, ſhould now bee againe to him deliuered; and that Matthias Huniades his youngeſt ſonne, ſhould for the confirmation of farther friendſhip, marrie the Deſpots daughter: with ſome other ſuch conditions as it pleaſed the vngratefull Prince for his owne behoofe to ſet downe. For performance whereof, he required to haue Ladiſlaus, Huniades his eldeſt ſon, in hoſtage. All which Huniades was glad forthwith to yeeld vnto, for feare the falſe Deſpot ſhould haue deliuered him into the hands of Amurath, his mortall enemie. So the hoſtage being giuen, Huniades was againe ſet at libertie. Who vpon Chriſtmas day comming to SEGEDINVM, was there by all the nobilitie of HVNGARIE, and great concourſe of the people, honorably receiued. This ingratitude of the Deſpots no leſſe greeued this worthie man, than the diſhonour receiued from the Turke. Wherefore vpon the ſudden raiſing a great armie, he inuaded the territorie, long before giuen to the Deſpot by the Emperor Sigiſmond in HVNGARIE, in exchange of the ſtrong towne of BELGRADE, deſtroying the countrey before him, and burning the villages, neuer reſting, vntill he had got into his power whatſoeuer the Deſpot had in HVNGARIE, & not ſo contented, preſently entered inno RASCIA, where the Deſpots Embaſſadors met him, bringing with thē Ladiſlaus the hoſtage, honorably rewarded, & hūbly crauing peace at his hands: which he at the requeſt of the nobility eaſily granted, with forgiuenes of all former wrongs or iniuries. And ſo hauing with him concluded a peace, returned back again into HVNGARIE. But Fortune neuer ſuffereth long the valiant man to reſt, but ſtill keepeth him buſied, leaſt he ſhould at too much eaſe attaine vnto honors glorie.

Huniades taken priſoner by the Deſpot.

G H I

1449 The Deſpot inuaded by Amurath, craueth aid of Huniades

The yeare following, Amurath certainely enformed, That George the Deſpot hauing of late Huniades in his power, had again ſet him at libertie: was therwith exceeding wroth, blaming him of great ingraritude, That for a kingdome which he had at his hands receiued, he had not deliuered vnto him his enemy, in full recompence thereof: whom of all others he moſt feared, & therefore likewiſe wiſhed to haue had him periſh. In reuenge of which iniurie (as he tooke it) the melancholie tyrant, ſent Fritze-beg and Ioſe-beg, two of his moſt expert captaines, with a ſtrong power to inuade RASCIA, the Deſpots countrey: who accordingly entring thereinto, ſtrongly fortified CHRYSONICVM, a towne before ruinated, vpon the ſide of the riuer MORAVA, and from thence with fire and ſword deſtroyed the countrey both farre and neare. The Deſpot diſmayed with this ſudden and vnexpected inuaſion, wiſt not well which way to turne himſelfe: the angrie Turke, he well knew, was not to be appeaſed without yeelding vnto ſome great inconuenience; and to pray aide of Huniades, without which he was not able to withſtand the Turkes, he thought but vaine, for the wrong he had before done him. So that what to doe he wiſt not: yet had he rather to endure any thing, than againe to ſuffer the heauie bondage of the Turke. In this extreamitie he thought beſt to make proofe of Huniades, of whom he humbly, and not without great ſhame, craued aid. Which the courteous gouernour, according to his honourable nature, forgetting all former iniuries, eaſily granted: and the rather, for that hee deſired nothing more, than to be of the Turkes in ſome part reuenged of the ouerthrow from them of late receiued in the plaines of COSSOVA: as alſo for that he wiſely foreſaw, That the Deſpots countrey being loſt, hee ſhould haue the Turkes ſtill brauing him euen as it were in the gates of HVNGARIE. Wherefore hauing with great ſpeed raiſed a conuenient power, he forthwith in perſon himſelfe ſet forward, and at SYNDEROVIA paſſing ouer the riuer DANVBIVS into RASCIA, there ioyned his power with the Deſpots, which he found there ready. And ſo marching forward with ſuch expedition, that he preuented the fame of his comming; and the weather alſo at the ſame time as it were fauouring his purpoſe, and couering the countrey with a thick miſt, hee was the fourth day vpon the Turkes before they were aware of him. Who wonderfully diſmayed with

A the ſudden comming of the Chriſtians, and vpon the breaking vp of the miſt, diſcouering alſo Huniades his enſignes (alwayes vnto them dreadfull) thought now no more of reſiſtance, or of the ordering of their battell, but as men diſcouraged, betooke themſelues to ſpeedie flight. After whom followed the Hungarian and Seruian light horſemen, with moſt bloudie execution hauing them in chaſe all that day; Huniades with his men at armes following ſtill after in good order, for feare the Turks ſhould againe make head vpon the light horſemen that had them in chaſe. And had not the comming on of the night ended the ſlaughter, few of the Turks had there eſcaped: but by the approch thereof many of them got into the woods, and ſo ſaued themſelues. Fritze-beg the Generall, with moſt part of the Turks beſt commanders, were in that
B flight taken. Huniades after this victorie entering into BVLGARIA, came to BVDINA, the metropoliticall citie of that countrey, which (as the cauſe oftentimes of great warres) he burnt downe to the ground. And ſo hauing well reuenged himſelfe, and cleared the countrey of the Turks, he returned backe againe into SERVIA, and there gaue vnto the Deſpot for a preſent all the priſoners he had taken: and contenting himſelfe with the honour of the victorie, returned with triumph to BVDA, there to find no leſſe trouble with the Bohemians, and ſome of the diſcontented nobilitie of HVNGARIE, than he had with the Turks, to the great hurt of the Chriſtian common-weale.

All this while that Amurath was thus troubled with Huniades and the Hungarians, Muſtapha lying ſtill vpon the borders of MACEDONIA, as Amurath had commanded; it chanced that
C a great quarrell grew betwixt the Venetians and Scanderbeg, about the inheritance of Lech Zacharie (a noble man of EPIRVS) then ſhamefully murdered by his vnnaturall kinſman Lech Duchagne; part of whoſe inheritance lying in the frontiers of EPIRVS, the Venetians claimed, as belonging to their ſeignorie: and hauing got poſſeſſion of the citie of DAYNA, part thereof, by force held the ſame againſt Scanderbeg: vpon which quarrell great warres aroſe betwixt the Venetians and him, who had before beene very great friends: inſomuch, that in the end they ioyned in battell at the riuer of DRINE, where the Venetians were by him in a great battell ouerthrowne. Of which troubles Muſtapha daily vnderſtood, and how that Scanderbeg ſo buſied, had left but a ſmall garriſon vpon the borders of EPIRVS. Wherefore being deſirous to redeeme his former diſgrace with ſome better hap; he would faine haue taken the opportunitie D now preſented, but that his great maſters command lay ſo heauie vpon him, as that he durſt not without his leaue attempt the ſame; knowing that the danger of his euill fortune, if it ſhould ſo fall out, would farre exceed the vncertaine glorie of his better ſucceſſe. Yet ceaſed he not from time to time to giue Amurath intelligence of theſe troubles and warres in EPIRVS, earneſtly requeſting him not to let ſlip ſo faire an opportunitie, but to giue him leaue to enter into the countrey: in manner, aſſuring him before hand of the victorie. Yet the ſuſpitious old King was long in reſoluing what to doe, ſtill fearing the fortune of his enemie. At length diſcharged of the feare of the Hungarians, and commending Muſtapha his forwardneſſe, he ſent vnto him a meſſenger with letters of this purport, anſwerable to his deſire.

Amurath his graue letters of aduertiſement to Muſtapha, concerning his going againe into Epirus.

E The warres thou ſo greatly deſireſt, behold Muſtapha we grant vnto thee: the glorie thereof (if thoſe things be true which we heare of the Venetian warre) thine owne valour, and worthie right hand ſhall giue thee: yet thou muſt warily deale with that enemie, and not raſhly take vp armes, which thou maiſt be enforced ſhamefully to caſt away, when thou thinkeſt leaſt. Peraduenture the counterfeit ſhew of warre, and faigned falling out among the Chriſtians, doe too much allure thee; for the common ſaying is, There is no quarrell ſooner ended, than betwixt the father and the ſonne: we in perſon abſent, can neither adviſe thee as preſent, nor commend a fooliſh forwardneſſe in armes. Thou muſt before thou put on armes, diſpoſe of all things, and conſider of euery particular, which is to be put in execution when thou art in the field. Thou haſt a great armie of freſh and luſtie ſouldiers, thine enemies are with continuall warres wearied and ſpent: in that remaineth, doe as thou thinkeſt good, for I forbid thee the doing of nothing, which F thou thinkeſt may be for the aduancement of our honour.

Muſtapha hauing thus obtained leaue, and well appointed, with all his forces entered into EPIRVS, hoping in one battell to end that warre: which he (preſuming vpon the ſtrength of his armie) many times offered in the plaine field. Newes hereof was brought to Scanderbeg (then lying at the ſiege of DAYNA againſt the Venetians) from his garriſons lying vpon the frontiers of

of EPIRVS, to whom he addreſſed a ſpeedy meſſenger: commanding them in no wiſe to encounter with the enemie, but to keepe themſelues within the ſafegard of their ſtrong holds, and to protract the time vntil his cõming. Afterwards ſelecting out of his armie fiue hundred horſemen, & fifteen hundred choſen footmen, all old beaten ſoldiers, he with that ſmal number marched to the place where he knew lay his garriſons intrenched, in the vpper countrey of DIBRA: leauing Ameſa his nephew at the ſiege of DAYNA. Muſtapha hauing many times in vaine ſought to draw the garriſon ſouldiers out of their trenches by offering them many faire opportunities of aduantage, & now out of hope that way to circumuent them, began to ſpoile and burne the countrey round about. But when he vnderſtood by his ſcouts of Scanderbeg his comming, hee ſpeedily called together his armie, and encamped within two miles of Scanderbegs campe, at a place called ORONOCHE, in the vpper countrey of DIBRA. Scanderbeg had there in his campe of his garriſon ſouldiers and thoſe hee brought with him, foure thouſand horſemen, and two thouſand foot, all old expert ſouldiers: where, after he had made his trenches ſtrong, hee left therein three hundreth of them, and brought the reſt into the field in order of battaile. Muſtapha on the other ſide likewiſe brought on in good order his armie alſo. But whileſt both armies thus ſtood ranged one within the view of the other, expecting nothing but the ſignall of battaile, ſuddenly a man at armes, in gallant & rich furniture, iſſued out of the Turks armie into the middeſt of the plaine betwixt both armies, and from thence with a loud voice challenged to fight hand to hand with any one of the Chriſtian armie. This Turke was called Caraguſa. At the firſt Scanderbegs ſoldiers vpon this challenge ſtood ſtill, one looking vpon another; for as they were all aſhamed to refuſe ſo braue an offer, ſo the danger ſo ſuddenly offered, ſtayd euery mans forwardneſſe for a while: Vntill that one Paul Maneſſi, accounted the beſt man at armes in Scanderbeg his armie (vpon whom euery mans eye was now caſt, as if he had bin the man by name called out by the proud challenger) not able longer to endure the Turks pride, with great courage and cheereful countenance came to Scanderbeg, requeſting him that he might be the man to accept that challenge. Who greatly commended him, and willed him on God his name to ſet forward, firſt to win honour to himſelfe, and then to giue example of his valour for all the reſt of the armie to follow. Paul ſtaying a while, vntill he had for that purpoſe moſt brauely armed himſelfe, mounted preſently to horſe, & riding forth into the plaine, called aloud vnto the Turk, that he ſhould make himſelfe ready to fight. Whom Caraguſa required to ſtay a while that hee might ſpeake vnto him a few words, indifferently concerning them both.

The ſpeech of Caraguſa the Turke, to Maneſi.

The victorie (ſaid hee) our force and fortune ſhall determine: but the conditions of the victorie, wee are now to appoint our ſelues. If the Deſtinies haue aſſigned vnto thee the honour of this day, I refuſe not, but that thou mayeſt by law of armes, when I am ouercome, cary away with thee my rich ſpoiles, and at thy pleaſure diſpoſe of my dead bodie. But if thou ſhalt fall vnder my hand, I require that I may haue the ſame right, and power ouer thy captiue bodie: and that the Generals will grant that no man ſhall mooue out of either armie, to better the fortune of either of vs in the time of the combat, or after.

Maneſi his ſtout anſwere to Caraguſa.

Whereunto Maneſſi anſwered, That hee agreed to thoſe conditions of the combate, which hee vpon a needleſſe feare had ſo required to be kept: ſaying, That where the fierce ſoule had yeelded, there of good right all the reſt ought to bee the conquerours; and that therefore hee ſhould fight without feare of any more enemies than himſelfe: whom ſo ſoone as he had depriued of life, he ſhould haue free power to doe with his dead bodie what he would. Which if thou wouldeſt giue (ſaid hee) vnto the teares of my fellow ſouldiers, yet would not worthie Scanderbeg ſuffer the carkaſſe of a vanquiſhed coward to bee brought backe againe into his campe.

Caraguſa maruailed to heare his ſo braue reſolution, and as it was thought, repented him of his challenge. But after that both the Generals had vpon their honours confirmed the lawes of the combat before rehearſed, both the Champions were left alone in the middeſt of the plaine betweene both armies, with all mens eyes fixed vpon them. Now both the armies betwixt feare and hope, ſtood in great expectation of the euent of the combat, preſaging their own fortunes in the fortune of their Champions. In which time they both hauing withdrawn themſelues one frõ the other a conuenient diſtance, for the making of their courſe, & after with great violence running together: Caraguſa was by Maneſsi, at the firſt encounter ſtroke through the head and ſlaine. Maneſſi alighting, diſarmed the dead bodie, and ſtroke off his head: and ſo loaded with the armour and head of the proud challenger, returned with victory to the armie, where he was

A ioyfully receiued and brought to Scanderbeg, of whom he was there preſently honourably both commended and rewarded. Scanderbeg ſeeing his men by this good fortune of Maneſſi greatly encouraged, and the Turks as men diſmaied with the death of their Champion, hanging their heads, like an inuincible captaine himſelfe ſet firſt forward toward the enemie, as it were in contempt of their multitude: and had charged them as they ſtood, before they had ſet one foot forward, had not Muſtapha to encourage his ſouldiers, with certaine diſordered troupes oppoſed himſelfe againſt him, which the whole armie ſeeing, faintly followed: but as they ſet forward with ſmall courage, ſo were they at the firſt encounter eaſily driuen to retire. Which when Muſtapha ſaw, he called earneſtly vpon them to follow him, and the more to encourage them by B his owne example, put ſpurres to his horſe, and fiercely charged the front of Scanderbegs armie, as one reſolued either to gaine the victorie, or there to die; after whom followed moſt of the principall captaines of his armie, which would not for ſhame forſake their Generall: thus by his valour the battell was for a while renued. But Moſes preuailing with great ſlaughter, in one part of the armie, the Turks began to flie: in which flight Muſtapha the Generall, with twelue others of the chiefe men in that armie, were taken priſoners, but of the common ſouldiers few were ſaued. There were ſlaine of the Turks armie ten thouſand, and fifteene enſignes taken, whereas of the Chriſtians were loſt but three hundred. The Turks tents and campe, with all the wealth thereof, became a prey to Scanderbegs ſouldiers. Wherewith although he had ſatisfied the deſires of them all, yet to keepe his old cuſtome, he entred into the confines of MACEDONIA,
C and there burnt and ſpoiled all that he could. And afterwards leauing a garriſon of two thouſand horſemen, and a thouſand foot, for defence of his frontiers, returned againe with the reſt of his armie to the ſiege of DAYNA.

The battell betwixt Scanderbeg and Muſtapha.

Not long after, the Venetians made peace with Scanderbeg: and Amurath deſirous to redeeme his captaines, about the ſame time ſent great preſents vnto Scanderbeg, with fiue and twentie thouſand duckats, for the ranſome of Muſtapha, and the other chiefetaines: whom Scanderbeg ſo honourably vſed, as if there had neuer beene any hoſtilitie betwixt him and them: and ſo with a ſafe conuoy, ſent them out of his countrey. The ranſome of Muſtapha and the other Turks he diuided amongſt his ſouldiers. When Scanderbeg had thus made peace with the Venetians, he forthwith led his armie againe into MACEDONIA, with the ſpoile of that coun-
D trey to make his ſouldiers better pay, as his vſuall manner was. And to doe the greater harme, he diuided his armie into three parts, wherewith he ouer-running the countrey, waſted and deſtroied all before him, putting to the ſword all the Turks that came in his way. As for the Chriſtians that there liued amongſt them, he ſpared, but left them nothing more than their liues: the buildings of the countrey he vtterly conſumed with fire, ſo that in all that part of MACEDONIA which bordereth vpon EPIRVS, nothing was to be ſeene more than the bare ground, and the ſhewes of the ſpoile by him there made. Which vnmercifull hauocke of all things he made, to the end that the Turks ſhould find no reliefe in thoſe quarters, whenſoeuer they ſhould come either to lie in garriſon in that countrey, or to inuade EPIRVS. The ſpoile he made was ſo
E great, that it was thought he left not in all that countrey, ſo much as might releeue the Turks armie for one day.

Muſtapha vanſomed.

Of all theſe great harmes by Scanderbeg done in MACEDONIA, Amurath was with all ſpeed aduertiſed, and therewith exceedingly vexed: howbeit he reſolued with his great counſellors, no more to ſend any of his Baſſaes or captains, but to goe himſelfe in perſon, with ſuch a royall armie, as ſhould be ſufficient not to conquer EPIRVS, but if need were, to fill euery corner thereof. Wherefore he commanded commiſſions to be ſpeedily directed into all parts of his kingdomes and prouinces, for the leuying of a great armie for HADRIANOPLE: yet whither he intended to imploy the ſame, was not known to any in the Turks court, more than to the Baſſaes of the counſell. Which cauſed all the bordering Chriſtian Princes to make the beſt preparation they could for their owne aſſurance, euery one fearing leſt that growing tempeſt ſhould breake F out againſt himſelf. But Scanderbeg of long acquainted with the Turkiſh policie, eaſily perceiued all that great preparation to be made againſt him: which he was the rather induced to thinke, by reaſon of the vnaccuſtomed quietneſſe of Amurath, who all that while had neither ſent any armie to reuenge the ouerthrow of Muſtapha, nor ſo much as a garriſon for defence of the borders of his kingdome, but had let all things negligently paſſe, as if he had beene in a dead ſleepe. Beſides that, it was alſo thought, that he had ſecret intelligence from ſome of his old friends and acquaintance in Amurath his court, who probably suspected the matter. Wherefore Scanderbeg G setting all other things apart, gaue himselfe wholly to the preparing of things necessarie for the defence of his small kingdome against so mightie an enemie. First he by letters and messengers aduertised all the Christian Princes his neighbours & friends, of the greatnesse of the danger of that warre; wherein Amurath (as he said) sought not only his destruction, but the vtter ruine of them all: exhorting them therefore to consider, how farre the danger of so great an armie might extend, and therefore to stand fast vpon their guard. Then he sent Moses and other his expert captains into all parts of EPIRVS, to take vp souldiers, and all the prouision of corne & victuals that was possible to be had. Wherein he himselfe also busily trauelled day and night, not resting vntill he had left nothing in the countrey whereupon the enemie might shew his crueltie. Most H part of the common people with their substance, were receiued into the strong cities, the rest tooke the refuge of the Venetian and other Christian Princes townes and countries farther off, vntill this furie was ouerpast: all such as were able to beare armes, were commanded to repaire to CROIA; where when they were all assembled, there were ynow to haue made a right puissant armie. But out of all this multitude, Scanderbeg made choice onely of ten thousand old expert souldiers, whom he purposed to lead himselfe to encounter with the Turks great armie, as he should see occasion: and placed a thousand three hundred in garrison in CROIA. The citizens also themselues were throughly furnished with all manner of weapons & other prouision meet for the defence of their citie. Then proclamation was made, That all the aged men vnfit for warres, with the women and children, should depart the citie; and none to be therein left but the I garrison souldiers, and such citizens as were willing to tarie, and able to beare armes. This citie of CROIA was the chiefe citie of EPIRVS, and of the fortune thereof seemed to depend the state of all the other strong towns and cities, and so consequently of the whole kingdome: for which The lamentable departing of the weake citizens out of Croia. cause, Scanderbeg had the greater care for the defence thereof. It was a miserable sight to see the lamentable departure of this weake companie out of CROIA: all was ful of weeping & wailing; no house, no street, no part of the citie was without mourning: but especially in the churches was to be seene the very face of common sorrow and heauinesse; where all sorts of people in great numbers flocking together, poured forth their deuout praiers, with fountaines of teares, wringing their hands; yea, and some in the impatiencie of their griefe forgetting themselues, seemed to expostulate their griefe with God. But when their sorrow was with teares asswaged, and K their hearts somewhat eased, the aged mothers kissing their sonnes, gaue them many a tearefull commandement: sometime rehearsing how louingly and tenderly they had brought them vp, and othersome times shewing vnto them their feeble limmes and hoarie haires, willing them to be mindfull of them. The wiues presented their children vnto their husbands, bewailing to leaue them as childlesse widowers, and their houses desolate. The old men mute with sorrow, and carefull of their children, durst neither encourage them, for feare of making them too forward; neither disswade them from aduenturing themselues, lest they should seeme to loue them more than their natiue countrey. In the middest of these passions commandement came from Scanderbeg, that they must now depart, that the souldiers might take their places & charge. Then began their sorrowes afresh, with pitious scriching and teares. A man would haue thought the L citie had euen then beene presently taken by the Turks. They could hardly be drawne from the embracing of their friends, all now desiring to remaine still with them in the citie, partakers of their common dangers. But when they saw the officers begin to be earnest vpon them, and to hasten their departure, then with heauie hearts they tooke as it were their last farewell, and departed out of the citie, setting their feet many times they wist not where, for desire they had to looke backe againe vpon the citie. This great multitude was conueyed also into the Venetian cities, and other places free from danger: whither all the countrey people, which were not before receiued into the strong cities, resorted also, with all their substance & cattell; leauing nothing in all the countrey of EPIRVS, but the bare ground for the Turks to prey vpon. After this multitude was departed, and all well quieted, and none left in the citie but men fit for seruice, Scander- M beg throughly stored it with all things needfull for the defence thereof, and for the enduring of a long siege: besides that, he gaue to euery souldier conuenient armour, with some small reward.

Then he placed Vranacontes (a valiant & famous captaine, honourably descended) gouernour of the citie. And so hauing set all things in order for the safegard thereof, after he had in few words exhorted them couragiously to endure the siege, and not to listen to Amurath his flattering

A ring and deceitfull charmes, he departed out of the citie vnto his armie, then lying within view, and began presently to march towards DYBRA. But he was not farre gone, before he met with Moses with a gallant troupe of horsemen comming from SFETIGRADE, a strong citie of DYBRA, situate in the confines of EPIRVS, bordering vpon MACEDONIA: which citie was Scanderbeg his second care, for that it was like to be the first that should endure the angrie tyrants furie, standing first in his way, as it were the fortresse of that countrey. Moses had there set all things in like order, as had Scanderbeg in CROIA; and had there placed one Peter Perlat (a graue and politicke man) Gouernour, with a strong garrison of souldiers chosen out of all the countrey of DYBRA, which were alwayes accounted the best men of warre in all EPIRVS,
B and was for so doing greatly commended of Scanderbeg. Who deliuering vnto him all the forces he had prepared for the defence of the other castles and cities of EPIRVS, sent him with diuers other of his nobilitie and captaines, to take order for the safetie of those places, appointing vnto euery man his charge. As for himselfe, he with a small troupe of horsemen went to SFETIGRADE, carefull of that citie aboue measure, as it were before diuining the ensuing danger. Being come thither, and all the souldiers assembled by his commandement into the market place, he there in open audience spake vnto them as followeth:

Scanderbeg commeth to Sfetigrade.

Almightie God could not this day offer vnto you (worthie souldiers of SFETIGRADE*) better matter: neither could a fairer occasion be presented vnto braue minds and souldiers desirous of honour,*
C than that which now hath caused you to take vp most iust armes. Wherein you may for euer by worthie example make knowne your constant faith and worthie valour, both towards me in priuate, and the people of EPIRVS in generall. Hitherto we haue borne armes for the honour of our kingdome, but now we must fight for our liues, our libertie, and the wals of our countrey. You must now force your selues, that you doe not by reproch and cowardise staine the worthie praises you haue alreadie deserued, by the great victories by you obtained vnder my conduct. The greatest part of the fortune of this warre depen- deth vpon you: For the first passage of Amurath into EPIRVS (that I my selfe may be vnto you the first messenger of that danger) will be this way: the first furie of the Turkes will assaile you, that hauing here as it were broken downe the strongest fortresse of EPIRVS*, hee may afterwards breake through the countrey, more subiect to danger. The first fruits of this warre is yours, you (if you beare the* D hearts of courageous men, mindefull of your libertie) may beate downe the proud strength of the haughtie enemie, and discourage his high conceits. The Othoman King shall haue the beginning both of his hope and feare, of you: if hee shall finde you so minded, as I now see you gallantly moued, and with ioy heare your violent indignation; hee will in euery place feare a great force of danger, and therby learne to abstaine from the other cities of EPIRVS: neither will he lie here long at a vaine siege, except the wayward olde man, will foolishly hereupon gage all his forses: for such is the situation and strength of this cittie, that it may easily set at nought an angry enemie. Wherefore resolue with your selues worthie souldiers and citizens, only by constancie and faithfulnesse, without bloodshed, to gaine vnto your selues an honourable victorie. Of your valour (which I willingly speake of) dependeth for the most part the E faithfulnesse of all the rest; they will looke vpon you whom they may praise or accuse, and whose example they may follow in the fortune of these warres. But to what purpose should men of worth in their actions pretend the necessitie of faith, or chaunce of fortune? whereas, by reason things are both best begunne and accomplished. It seldome chaunceth, that fortune faileth the sound aduice, or is not obedient vnto vertue: and you haue all things which most politicke care could prouide for your safetie. You want not armour, you want not plentifull prouision of victuals, you want not valiant men: the superfluous multitude of vnnecessarie people, the pittifull lamentation of women, and troublesome crying of children shall not withdraw you from your publicke charge, from your seruice and defence of your countrey; I haue left you alone to your selues, for defence of your citie, your religion, and dwellings, that you might be encouraged onely with the prouocations of honour and libertie, with the emulation of aduenture and danger, and the very sight one of another; and I my selfe will not bee farre off with my couragious soul-
F diers, a silent beholder and encourager of your vertue: where although I may not auert from you all the force of the cruell enemie by rash aduenture, nor trie the whole fortune of this warre in plaine field; yet will I turne a great part of your dangers vpon my selfe, and trouble the enemies designes, with many a hot skirmish. For as much as there is no better manner of fight, nor safer kinde of warre, for vs amongst such a multitude of men, and so many thousand of souldiers, than neuer to offer battaile vnto the enemie in plaine field, neither to aduenture all vpon the fortune of one conflict, although a man did

The effectuall speech of Scanderbeg vnto the souldiers and citizens of Sfetigrade, to encourage thē against the comming of Amurath.

see apparent signes of victorie. He will of purpose at the first giue vs the opportunitie of good hap; he will feed our hardinesse with the bloud of his base souldiers, the easilier to intrap and oppresse our rashnesse, allured with the sweet baits of good fortune: but the craftie deuices of the Othoman King, are by great policie and consideration to be frustrated. This mightie enemie is by little and little to be cut off, as time and place shall giue occasion. For truly that victorie should be vnto me lamentable, which I should buy with the bloud of my souldiers: and beleeue me, it would be vnto me a more sorrowfull than pleasant sight, to see eight or ten thousand of my enemies slaine, with the losse of a few of you. I will praise and honour my subiects of Epirvs for valiant conquerours, if they shall not suffer themselues to be conquered of the Turkish King. The rest I had rather you couragious souldiers of Dibra should consider with your selues, than that I should seeme to distrust of your assured faith, by giuing you a carefull and tedious admonition. G H

When Scanderbeg had with cheerefull perswasion thus encouraged the minds of them of Sfetigrade, he departed thence, and visited diuers other cities of Epirvs, where finding all things politickly ordered by Moses and the other captaines, whom he had put in trust, he returned to his armie, then lying neere vnto Croia.

Whilest Scanderbeg was with great carefulnesse yet thus prouiding for the safegard of his kingdome, in the meane time Amurath his armie was assembled at Hadrianople, to the number of a hundred and fiftie thousand men, wherof many were pioners, and men appointed for other base seruices necessarie at the siege of townes. Of this great armie Amurath sent fortie I thousand light horsemen before him to Sfetigrade, who according to his command came and encamped before the citie: the newes of their comming, with a great deale more than truth, was forthwith brought to Scanderbeg, then lying with his small armie neere Croia: whereupon he with foure thousand horsemen, and a thousand foot, tooke the way toward Sfetigrade, and strongly encamped his armie within seuen miles of the citie. Where hauing set all things in good order, he, accompanied with Moses and Tanusius, went by certaine blind wayes through the mountaines and woods, vntill he came so neere vnto the citie, that from the place where he stood, vpon the top of a hill, he might easily discouer in what sort the enemie lay encamped: and so returning backe againe to his campe, rise with his armie in the night following, and drawing as neere vnto the Turks armie as he could, vndiscouered, placed all his armie in the couert of K the woods and secret vallies, vnperceiued of his enemies. After that he sent forth Moses and Musachi his nephew, with thirtie of his best horsemen, apparelled as if they had beene but common souldiers, but passing wel mounted, driuing before them certaine horses laden with corne, by a by-way, as if they had purposed to haue secretly got into the citie. The day then breaking, they were discouered by the Turks scouts, and set vpon: where at the first Moses and the rest began of purpose to flie, but when he saw that they were pursued but with like number to themselues, he returned backe vpon the Turks, and slew fiue of them, and chased the rest vnto the campe. The Generall seeing what had happened, sent forth foure thousand horsemen to pursue these supposed victuallers: whom they quickly recouered the sight of, for that Moses of purpose had made small haste to flie: but when the Turks began to draw nigh, Moses left the horses laden L with corne, and fled; yet so that he still drew on the Turks with hope to ouertake him, vntill he had brought them where Scanderbeg with his armie lay in wait: by whom they were suddenly assailed on euery side, and with great slaughter put to flight. In this conflict, two thousand of the Turks were slaine, and a thousand of their horses taken: of the Christians were lost but two and twentie. This was the first welcome of the Turks armie to Sfetigrade.

A notable stratageme of Scanderbeg for the intrapping of his enemies.

About eight daies after came Amurath with all his armie, in the beginning of May in the yeere 1449 of our Lord 1449, and hauing made the greatest shew he could with his huge armie to terrifie the defendants: he encamped the baser sort of his footmen at the foot of the hill, whereon the citie stood, & lay himselfe with his Ianizaries, and other his most valiant souldiers, about three quarters of a mile further off: where after he had lien stil one day, & well considered the strength M of the place, towards euening he sent a messenger to the citie, who requested to speake with the Gouernour Perlat. Whereof he hearing, came to the wall: of whom the messenger requested, That he would command the souldiers standing by, to goe further off, for as much as he had something in secret to say vnto him from his master. Vnto whom Perlat merrily answered: It is like indeed to be some great secret, that you would haue kept not onely from the hearing

Amurath commeth to Sfetigrade with his armie.

A ring of my ſouldiers, but from the very light of the day, and therefore haue choſen the night: but I haue not learned of mine elders, to heare any meſſage from mine enemie by night, neither at any time elſe out of the hearing of the garriſon, to whom Scanderbeg hath committed the defence of this citie, and I the ſafegard of my perſon: you muſt therefore at this time pardon me, and to morrow if your maſter ſo pleaſe, I will heare you at large. And therewith commanded him to depart from the wals. So he returned for that time without audience as he came. It grieued Amurath not a little to ſee his meſſenger ſo lightly regarded: yet foraſmuch as he had more hope to gaine the citie by large offers, or ſome reaſonable compoſition, than by all his great force, he diſſembled his wrath: and the next day ſent the ſame meſſenger againe, with one
B of his Baſſaes, a graue and well ſpoken man, himſelfe borne in EPIRVS. This Baſſa with three ſouldiers, and two ſeruitours, was by the gouernours commandement by one of the ports receiued into the citie, and brought into S. Maries church. Where after he had with great eloquence ſought to inſinuate himſelfe into the minds of the gouernour, and the hearers, and afterwards augmented the terrour of Amuraths power beyond all meaſure, laying before them the great victories by him obtained againſt the Hungarians, and the other Chriſtian Princes: in fine he exhorted them to yeeld the citie vnto him, in whoſe name he promiſed firſt that the citizens ſhould in all reſpects vnder his gouernment liue as they had before done vnder Scanderbeg; then, that the gouernour ſhould receiue at Amurath his hands moſt honourable preferments, with many rich and princely gifts; and that it ſhould be lawfull for the garriſon ſouldiers to de-C part in ſafetie whither they would, and to haue three hundred thouſand aſpers diuided amongſt them in reward. But when the Baſſa had ended his ſpeech, the gouernour in this ſort replied:

If you had not deliuered this ſpeech vnto reſolute men, deuoted vnto the defence of their libertie, it might perhaps haue wrought ſome effect; and we (ſaid he) might peraduenture liſten vnto your offers, if we were either afraid of the Othoman King, and the vaine threats of our enemies, or elſe were wearie of the gouernment of the noble Scanderbeg. But foraſmuch as no euill deſert of his, nor good deſert of your maſters, hath yet paſſed, for which we ſhould preferre a ſtranger before our naturall Soueraigne, an enemie before a friend, a Turke before a Chriſtian; let your maſter proceed firſt in his action begun, let him proue his fortune, let him by force terrifie vs, beat downe our wals, make hauocke
D of our men, and by ſtrong hand driue vs to humble our ſelues at his feet, and to ſue for peace: But it were a great diſhonour, yea a thing almoſt to be laughed at, if we ſhould cowardly accept of theſe conditions by him offered, before any aſſault giuen, before one drop of bloud ſpilt, before any ſouldier did ſo much as once grone for any wound receiued, before one ſtone were ſhaken in the wall, or any ſmall breach made. But your maſter ſhall doe better to raiſe his ſiege, and get him backe againe to HADRIANOPLE, there to ſpend the ſmall remainder of his old yeeres in quiet, and not to prouoke vs his fatall enemies, whoſe courage in defence of our liberties, and fidelitie towards our Prince, he hath ſo oftentimes proued to his great diſhonour, and loſſe of his armies. The faith I haue once giuen to my Soueraigne, for the defence of this citie, I will neuer forget, vntill the effuſion of the laſt drop of my bloud. It ſhall be vnto me reward and honour enough, if I either liuing defend this citie, or with loſſe of my life ſhall leaue my guilt-
E leſſe ſoule at libertie, and my carkaſſe amongſt the dead bodies of worthie ſouldiers, when I ſhall find a way into a farre better place.

The reſolute anſwere of Perlat the Gouernour, vnto the Baſſa.

The Generall hauing giuen this reſolute anſwere vnto the Baſſa, bountifully feaſted him that day at dinner, and afterwards led him through the middeſt of the citie: where he ſaw great ſtore of victuals, by the gouernour commanded of purpoſe to be ſet in ſhew, to put Amurath out of hope of winning the citie by long ſiege. And ſo ſent the Baſſa out by the ſame port whereby he came in, much diſcontented with the anſwere he was to returne to his maſter.

ceeding wroth, and thereupon with his great ordinance battered the citie three dayes without F intermiſſion. And hauing by the furie of his artillerie made a ſmall breach, he forthwith gaue thereunto a moſt terrible aſſault, labouring firſt to win the ſame by the force and multitude of his common ſouldiers, which the Turks call Aſapi, whom he forced by great numbers to that ſeruice. Of theſe ſouldiers, the Turke in his wars maketh no great reckoning, but to blunt the ſwords of his enemies, or to abate their firſt furie, thereby to giue the eaſier victorie to his Ianizaries and other his better ſouldiers: which the Othoman Kings hold for good policie. Whileſt these forlorne souldiers, without respect of danger pressing forward, are slaine by heapes at the G breach, the Ianizaries at the same time in another place attempted to haue scaled the wals of the citie: but whilest they with much labour and difficultie first crawle vp the steepe rocke whereon the citie was built, and afterward desperatly mount vp their scaling ladders, they were by the defendants with huge stones and weightie peeces of timber cast vpon them, beaten downe, wherewith they were driuen headlong to the bottome of the rocke, and so miserably slaine.

Many of them together with their skaling ladders, were by the Christians thrust from the wall, and tumbling from the rocke, violently carried with them others, comming vp behind them.
Some few got to the top of the ladders, and taking hold of the battlements of the wals, lost some their fingers, some their hands, but most their liues, being beaten downe as the other were. Many H of them which stood farther off, were then wounded also, and with shot from the wals slaine.
With this miserable slaughter, and no hope to prenaile, the Turks discouraged, began to withdraw themselues from the assault: but the Bassaes and captaines standing behind them, forced them againe forward, exhorting some, threatening others, and beating the rest forward with their trunchions. By which meanes the assault was againe renewed, but not with such courage as before, though with no lesse slaughter: which the defendants seeing, gaue from the wals great tokens of ioy and triumph. Amurath perceiuing his discouraged souldiers readie of themselues to forsake the assault, presently sent Feri-Bassa (one of his most valiant captaines) with a new supplie of three thousand chosen souldiers to renew the fight. The Christians well aware of their comming, ceased not with continuall shot to beat them from the wals: but such was the I forwardnesse of that fierce captaine, that without regard of danger he brought his men to the wals, where the defendants from aboue ouerwhelmed them with stones, timber, wild fire, and such other things as are vsually prepared for the defence of townes besieged. For all that, Feri- Bassa gaue so great an assault, that he slew diuers of the defendants vpon the wals, and had there forcibly entered, had not the Gouernour perceiuing the danger, with a companie of fresh soul-diers come with speed to the defence of that place; whereby the enemie was presently repulsed, The Turks repulsed, retire. and driuen againe from the wals. Amurath seeing the great slaughter of his men, and no hope of succesſe, caused a retreat to be sounded, and so leauing the assault, retired againe into his campe. The great losse and dishonour at this assault receiued, much troubled his wayward mind: who for all that yet ceased not to giue the like vaine attempts. At length the captaine of K the Ianizaries perceiuing that part of the citie which was fartheſt from the campe, to be commonly but slenderly manned, by reason that it seemed a place impregnable, both for the height
The Ianizaries desperatly attempt to surprise the citie. and steepnesse of the rocke; told Amurath, That he would assay (if it so pleased him) secretly in the night to attempt by that place to enter the citie: where as they thought nothing was more to be feared, than the height thereof, which they supported with the wings of desire, doubted not to mount vnto. This his deuice exceedingly pleased the King, and was the next night with great silence put in execution. But such was the carefulnesse of the Gouernour ouer euery part of his charge, that nothing could be done against the same, but that it was by him forthwith discouered. The Gouernour aduertised by the watch, of the Turks attempt; with great silence presently repaired to the place with a great companie of the garrison souldiers, and standing L close, from the top of the wall beheld the Turks, as it had beene a swarme of Emmets climing vp the high rocks, and one helping vp another by such desperate way, as was in reason to haue beene thought no man would haue attempted. But when they were come to the top of the rocke, and now euen readie to enter, they were from aboue suddenly ouerwhelmed, as it had beene with a shower of shot, and so violently forced downe that high rocke, that most part of them which had got vp to any height, were miserably crushed to death either with the weight of the rocke: whereof Amurath presently vnderstanding, was therewith exceedingly greeued.

During the time of this siege, Scanderbeg neuer lay long still in one place, but remoued continually from place to place, as best serued his purpose, breaking sometimes into one quarter of M the Turks campe, and sometime into another, & straightway so suddenly gone againe and as it were vanished out of sight, that Amurath many times wondered what was become of him. At this time, being the latter end of Iune, he was come with his armie within eight miles of Amu- raths campe: and from thence sent Moses his greateſt captaine, in the attire of a common souldier, with two other, to take view how the enemie lay encamped. By which trustie espials he was enformed,

A enformed, That the Turks lay in great ſecuritie, as men without feare, keeping but negligent watch. Of which opportunitie, Scanderbeg reioycing, the night following ſuddenly aſſaulted one quarter of the Turks campe. Whoſe comming, although it was a little before by the Turks ſcouts diſcouered; yet his furious aſſault was ſo ſudden and ſo forceable, that he ſlew two thouſand of the Turks, and filled euery corner of that great campe with feare and tumult, before they could well arme themſelues or make reſiſtance. After which ſlaughter he ſafely retired, carrying away with him two hundred and thirtie horſe, with ſeuen of the Turks enſignes, hauing in this skirmiſh loſt of his men but two and fortie: whoſe dead bodies the Turks the next morning in reuenge of their ſlaine friends hewed into ſmall peeces.

B Vpon theſe great diſgraces one following in the necke of another, Amurath hauing no other obiect but the citie to ſhew his furie vpon, gaue three fierce aſſaults vnto the ſame, one after another, and was alwayes with loſſe both of his men and honour repulſed. But the more he loſt, the more he burnt with deſire of reuenge, perſwading his ſouldiers, That as the ſtrongeſt cities and fortreſſes were built by mens hands, ſo were they to be ouerthrowne and laid euen with the ground by reſolute and valiant men: encouraging them to a freſh aſſault, with greater promiſes of reward than euer he had done before in all his warres, from the firſt beginning of his raigne. And becauſe he would with more ſafetie giue this his laſt and greateſt aſſault, he appointed Feri-Baſſa, with twelue thouſand horſemen and ſix thouſand foot to attend vpon Scanderbeg, if he ſhould hap to come (as he thought he would) to trouble the aſſault, by aſſailing of his campe.

C Feri-Baſſa glad of this charge, well hoping now to redeeme his former ouerthrow with ſome great victorie, & leading forth his armie a little from the campe, as he was commanded, ſo lay; wiſhing for nothing more than the comming of Scanderbeg, vainly boaſting, That he would ſeeke him in the field, and there trie his force and fortune with him hand to hand: which he did ſhortly after to his coſt. When Amurath had thus ſet in order all things requiſite, as well for the ſiege, as for the ſafegard of his campe: the next morning he cõpaſſed the citie round about with his armie, & couered the ground with his men of war, purpoſing at that time to gage his whole forces vpon the taking thereof. The wals he had before in ſome places battered, ſo much as was poſſible; and yet but ſo, as that they were not without skaling ladders to be aſſaulted: partly for the naturall ſtrength of the place, & partly for that the defendants had with great diligence con-

D tinually repaired & filled vp with earth what the furie of the cannon had throwne downe. This aſſault Amurath began firſt with his archers and ſmall ſhot, which deliuered their arrowes and bullets vpon the top of the wall, & into the citie, as if it had beene a ſhower of haile, thereby to trouble the ſtationarie ſouldiers. In this heat, ladders were clapped to the wals in euery place where any could be poſſibly reared, and the Turks began deſperatly to skale the wals: but the Chriſtians nothing diſmaied thereat, with great courage reſiſted them, and with ſhot from their ſafe ſtandings wounded and ſlew many of them: yet others ſtill preſſed vp in the places of them that were ſlaine, ſo that the aſſault became moſt terrible in many places at once, but eſpecially neere vnto the great gate of the citie; where the Turks had vpon the ſudden with ladders, timber, and planks clapped together, raiſed cloſe vnto that tower, as it had been a woodden tower,

E equall in height to the wall; frõ whence the Turks greatly diſtreſſed the Chriſtians in that place, fighting with them as if it had beene vpon euen ground, ſtill ſending vp freſh ſouldiers in ſtead of them that were ſlaine: and thereby preuailed ſo far, that they had ſet vp certaine of Amurath his enſignes vpon the wall, to the great comfort of the Turks, & aſtoniſhment of the beſieged Chriſtians. The Gouernour ſeeing the imminent danger, haſted to the place with a companie of freſh and valiant ſouldiers, by whoſe force the Turks were quickly repulſed from the wall, their enſignes taken and ſent into the market place: the tower of wood with many ladders and much timber by the Turks brought to that place, was quickly conſumed with wild fire caſt vpon the ſame from the wals. Perlat hauing deliuered the citie of this feare, preſently placed freſh ſouldiers in ſtead of them which were ſlaine or hurt, and ſo worthily defended the citie.

F Whileſt Amurath was giuing this great aſſault to Sfetigrade, Scanderbeg to withdraw him from the ſame, came with nine thouſand ſouldiers to aſſaile the Turks campe, as Amurath had before ſuſpected, and was now come very neere the ſame. Feri-Baſſa glad of his comming, oppoſed his armie againſt him: which Scanderbeg ſeeing, retired a little, of purpoſe to draw the Baſſa farther from the campe, and then forthwith began to ioyne battell with him. The Baſſa conſidering the ſmall number of his enemies, & his owne greater power, withdrew foure thouſand ſand horſemen out of his armie to fetch a compaſſe about, & to ſet vpon the rereward of Scanderbegs armie: hoping ſo to incloſe him, that he ſhould neuer eſcape thence, but there either to be ſlaine or taken aliue, and his armie vtterly defeated. But the expert captaine perceiuing his purpoſe, to meet therewith, left Moſes to lead the maine battell, and he himſelfe with two thouſand horſemen, ſo valiantly charged thoſe foure thouſand of his enemies before they were well departed from the reſt of the Baſſaes armie, that they had now more cauſe to looke to their own ſafetie, than how to circumuent others. In this conflict Feri-Baſſa hand to hand, as he had oft times before deſired, encountring with Scanderbeg, was by him there ſlaine. All this while that Scanderbeg was in fight with Feri-Baſſa in the right wing of the armie, and Muſachie in the left, Moſes ſtood faſt, receiuing the aſſault of the enemie without mouing any thing forward, expecting the ſucceſſe of the wings. But Scanderbeg hauing diſcomfited the right wing, and ſlaine the Generall, comming now in, he ſet forward with ſuch force and courage, that the Turks not able longer to abide his force, turned their backs and fled: of whom many were ſlaine in this chaſe, though Scanderbeg doubting the great power of his enemie ſo nigh at hand, durſt not follow them farre; but ſounding a retrait, put his armie againe in good order, for feare of ſome ſudden attempt from the campe, and after appointed ſome of the meaneſt of his ſouldiers to take the ſpoile of the ſlaine Turks. When Amurath had vnderſtood what had happened to Feri-Baſſa, he was ſo ouercome with anger and melancholie, that for a while he could not ſpeake one word: but after the heat was a little paſt, he commanded certaine ſmall peeces of ordinance, which he had before vſed againſt the citie, to be remoued into the campe, and there placed vpon that ſide which was moſt in danger to the enemie. He alſo preſently ſent thither foure thouſand ſouldiers to ioyne with the remainder of Feri-Baſſaes armie, for defence of the campe, with ſtraight charge that they ſhould not iſſue out of the trenches. Neuertheleſſe he himſelfe continued the aſſault of the citie all that day: but when night drew on, and no hope appeared for him to preuaile, he cauſed a retrait to be ſounded, and leauing the aſſault, he returned againe into his campe. At this aſſault Amurath loſt ſeuen thouſand men, beſide many that died afterwards of their wounds; but of the garriſon ſouldiers were ſlaine but ſeuentie, and ninetie moe hurt.

The terrour of the Turkiſh armie began now to grow into contempt throughout EPIRVS; and Scanderbeg was in good hope, that Amurath after ſo many ouerthrowes and ſhamefull repulſes, would at length raiſe his ſiege and be gone: yet he ſent ſpies continually to diſcouer what was done in the Turks campe, and he himſelfe with two thouſand ſouldiers would oftentimes ſhew himſelfe vpon the ſides of the mountaines neere vnto Amurath his campe, of purpoſe to draw the Turks out, that he might take them at ſome aduantage. But the old King had giuen commandement vpon paine of death, that no man ſhould goe out of the trenches without leaue, or once to ſpeake of giuing battell or aſſault: ſo that he lay certaine dayes in his campe, not like a King beſieging of a citie, but more like a man beſieged himſelfe: the which his ſtill lying, Scanderbeg had the more in diſtruſt, fearing greatly that he was hatching ſome miſchiefe, which ſo ſoone as it was ripe would violently breake out.

Amurath by great promiſes ſeeketh to corrupt the gariſon of Sſetigrade.

Amurath conſidering with what euill ſucceſſe he had many times aſſaulted the citie, and holding it for a great diſhonour to raiſe his ſiege and depart, hauing done nothing worth the remembrance; thought good once againe to proue, if it were poſſible to ouercome the minds of the garriſon ſouldiers with gifts, whō he was not able to ſubdue by force. For which purpoſe he ſent an embaſſadour vnto the citie, offering vnto the beſieged and garriſon ſouldiers eaſie conditions of peace, with ſuch large gifts & rewards as had not been heard offered to any garriſon in former time. All which his magnificall promiſes were lightly reiected by the common conſent of all the whole garriſon, preferring their faithfull loyaltie before all his golden mountaines. For all that, Amurath was in good hope, that amongſt ſo many, ſome would be found into whoſe minds his large offers might make ſome impreſſion: wherein he was not deceiued.

A traitor corrupted with Amurath his large promiſes, cōſpireth to betray the citie.

For one baſe minded fellow amongſt the reſt, corrupted with the Turkes great promiſes, preferring his owne priuate wealth, before the welfare of his countrey, waiting his time, had ſecret conference with the Turks eſpials, & promiſed vpon aſſurance of ſuch reward as was before by Amurath profered, to finde meanes that in few daies the citie ſhould be yeelded into his power. This corrupted traitor, had laid many miſcheeuous plots for the effecting of this horrible treaſon: but the firſt deuice he put in practiſe, which of all others a man would haue thought to haue been of leaſt moment, ſerued his wicked purpoſe in ſtead of all the reſt. All the garriſon ſouldiers

A diers of SPETIGRADE were of the vpper countrey of DIBRA, put into that citie, by Moses, for their approoued valour aboue all the other ſouldiers of EPIRVS. But as they were men of great courage, ſo were the exceeding ſuperſtitious both in their religion and manner of liuing, putting nice difference betwixt one kinde of lawfull meat and other: accounting ſome cleane, ſome vncleane; abhorring from that, which they fondly deemed vncleane, with more then a Iewiſh ſuperſtition, chuſing rather to die than to eate or drink thereof: ſuch is the ſtrong deluſion of blinde error, where it hath throughly poſſeſſed the mindes of men. The citie of SPETIGRADE (as is aforeſaid) is ſituat vpon the top of a great high rock, as moſt of the cities of EPIRVS now bee, and was then watred but with one great well in the middeſt of the citie, which
B ſunke deepe into the rock, plentifully ſerued both the publicke & priuate vſe of the inhabitants. Into this common well the malicious traitor in the night time caſt the foule ſtinking carion carkas of a dead dog, knowing, that the conceited gariſon ſouldiers of DIBRA would rather indure the paines of death, & ſtarue, or els yeeld vp the citie vpon any condition, than to drink of that polluted water. In the morning when that ſtinking carion was eſpied, and drawne out of the well, the report thereof was quickly bruted in euery corner of the citie, and that the well was poiſoned: ſo that all the people were in maner in an vprore about the finding out of the traitor. The citizens were exceeding ſorrie for that had happened, but the gariſon ſoldiers deteſted that loathſome & vncleane water (as they accounted it) more then the Turkiſh ſeruitude, proteſting, that they would rather periſh with thirſt, than drinke thereof. Whereupon ſome of them deſired
C to ſet fire vpon the citie, and whileſt they had yet ſtrength, to breake through the enemies campe or there manfully to die. And they which thought beſt of the matter, requeſted, That the cittie might be yeelded vp: for now, they diſcouraged with a ſuperſtitious vanitie, could be content to hearken to the former conditions of peace, yea they were readie enough of themſelues to ſue vnto Amurath for peace, thought it had beene vpon harder tearmes. The Gouernour troubled with that had happened, and aſtonied to ſee ſo great an alteration in the mindes of his ſouldiers vpon ſo ſmall occaſion, could not tell whether he might thinke it to proceed of a ſuperſtitious conceit, or of ſome ſecret compact made with Amurath. But the better to pacifie the matter, he came into the market place, and there in the hearing of all the garriſon, with many effectuall reaſons, exhorted them to continue faithfull vnto their Prince and countrey in that honorable ſer-
D uice; and in a matter of ſo great conſequence to make ſmall reckoning to vſe that water, which would eaſily in ſhort time be brought againe to the wonted puritie and cleaneneſſ: And to perſwade them the rather, he went preſently to the well himſelfe, and in the ſight of them all drunk a great draught of the water, whoſe example the citizens following, dranke likewiſe. But when it was offered to the captaines and ſouldiers of the garriſon, they all refuſed to taſte thereof, as if it had been a moſt loathſome thing, or rather ſome deadly poiſon, & with great inſtance cryed vnto the Gouernor, to giue vp the citie: for which cauſe many thought they were corrupted by Amurath his great promiſes. Howbeit none of that garriſon (except that one traitour) did euer afterwards reuolt vnto the Turkiſh King, or yet appeared any thing the richer for any gift receiued, whereby ſuch ſuſpition might be confirmed. When the Gouernour ſaw that the obſtinate
E minds of the garriſon were not to be mooued with any perſwaſion or reward (whereof he ſpared not to make large promiſe) nor by any other meanes which he could deuiſe: he called vnto him his chiefe captaines, with the beſt ſort of the citizens, & reſolued with them full ſore againſt his will, to yeeld vp the citie to Amurath, vpon ſuch conditions as they themſelues there agreed vpon: which were, That it ſhould be lawfull for all the captains and ſouldiers to depart in ſafetie with their armour and all other things; and that ſo many of the citizens as would ſtay, might there ſtill dwell in the citie, in ſuch ſort, as they had done before, vnder the gouernment of Scanderbeg; the reſt that liſted not to remaine there ſtill, might at their pleaſure with bag and baggage depart whither they would. Glad was Amurath when this offer was made vnto him, and granted them all that was deſired, ſauing that he would not conſent that the citizens ſhould continue F in the citie, yet was he content that they ſhould liue vnder him as they had done before, quietly enioying all their poſſeſſions, but to build their houſes without the wale of the citie: which condition ſome accepted, and ſome forſaking all, went to Scanderbeg. When all was throughly agreed vpon, the keyes of the gates were deliuered to Amurath, and the Gouernor with the captaines and all the garriſon ſouldiers ſuffered quietly to paſſe through the Turkiſh campe, as the King had promiſed. Howbeit, Mahomet the ſonne of Amurath, a Prince of a cruell diſpotion, earneſtly earnestly perswaded his father, to haue broken his faith, and to haue put them all to the sword: G saying, it was one of their Prophet Mahomets chiefe commandements, to vse all crueltie for the destruction of the Christians. But the old King would not therein hearken vnto his sonne, saying, That he which was desirous to be great amongst men, must either be indeed faithfull of his word and promise, or at leastwise seeme so to be, thereby to gaine the minds of the people, who naturally abhorre the gouernment of a faithlesse and cruell Prince. The traitor which corrupted the water, remained still in the citie, and was by Amurath rewarded with three rich suits of apparell, and fiftie thousand aspers, and had giuen vnto him besides a yeerely pension of two thousand duckats. But short was the ioy the traitor had of this euill gotten goods: for after he had a few dayes vainly triumphed in the midst of Amurath his fauours, he was suddenly gone, H and neuer afterwards seene or heard tell of: being secretly made away (as was supposed) by the commandement of Amurath: whose noble heart could not but detest the traitor, although the treason serued well his purpose. Amurath entring into SFETIGRADE, caused the wals to be forthwith repaired, and placed one thousand two hundred Ianizaries in garrison there. And raising his campe the first of September, departed out of EPIRVS, hauing lost thirtie thousand of his Turks at the siege of SFETIGRADE; much greeued in mind for all that, that he could not vanquish the enemie, whom he came of purpose to subdue. In his returne, the viceroy of ASIA marched before him with the Asian souldiers; in the rereward followed the viceroy of EVROPE with his Europeian souldiers; in the middest was Amurath himselfe, compassed about with his Ianizaries and other souldiers of the court. Scanderbeg vnderstanding of Amurath his departure, I followed speedily with eight thousand horsemen, and three thousand foot, and taking the aduantage of the thicke woods and mountaine straits (to him well knowne) whereby that great armie was to passe, oftentimes skirmished with the Turks, charging them sometime in the vaward, and sometime in the rereward, sometime on the one side, and sometime on the other, and slew many of them: whereby he so troubled Amurath his passage, that he was glad to leaue the viceroy of ROMANIA, with 30000 to attend vpon Scanderbeg, that he himselfe might in the meane time with more safetie march away with the rest of his armie. Scanderbeg perceiuing the stay of the viceroy, ceased to follow Amurath further, fearing to be enclosed betweene those two great armies. The viceroy seeing that Scanderbeg was retired, after he had staied a few dayes, followed his master to HADRIANOPLE, and so Scanderbeg returned to CROIA. K

A traitor worthily rewarded according to his treason.

Shortly after the departure of Amurath out of EPIRVS, Scanderbeg left two thousand souldiers vpon the borders for defence of the country against the Turks. These souldiers so straightly kept in the Ianizaries left in garrison at SFETIGRADE, that they could not looke out of the citie, but they were intercepted and slaine. And within a few dayes after came himselfe with an armie of eighteene thousand, and laid siege to SFETIGRADE the space of a moneth, which was from the middle of September vntill the middle of October. In which time he gaue two great assaults to haue recouered the citie, but was both times repulsed, with the losse of fiue hundred men. Amurath vnderstanding that Scanderbeg lay at the siege of SFETIGRADE, sent with all speed to recall his armie, but lately before dispersed. Whereof Scanderbeg hauing intelligence, considering also the difficultie of the enterprise, with the approch of Winter, raised his siege, and re- L turned to CROIA: where he set all things in the same order he had done before the comming of Amurath to the siege of SFETIGRADE, and put two thousand of his best souldiers there in garrison, vnder the charge of the famous captaine Vranacontes, and stored the citie with sufficient victuall for a yeeres siege, wherein he had great helpe from the Venetians and other Christian Princes, for that there was then great scarcitie of all things in EPIRVS, by reason of the late warres. The like care he had also of all the rest of his cities, being continually aduertised from his secret friends in the Turks court, of the great preparation intended against him by the Turkish King, against the beginning of the next Spring.

1450 Amurath vnderstanding that Scanderbeg was departed from SFETIGRADE, changed his former determination for the calling backe againe of his armie, and appointed it to meet againe at M HADRIANOPLE, in the beginning of March following: whither the Bassaes, & other great commanders, at the time appointed assembled with their companies, according as Amurath had before commanded. So that by the latter end of March, he had there in readinesse an armie of an hundred and threescore thousand men strong. Of which great multitude, he after the manner of the Turkish wars, sent fortie thousand horsemen, vnder the leading of Sebalyas a politick captaine, Amurath assembleth againe his armie at Hadrianople.

A captaine, as his vauntcourriers into EPIRVS, in the beginning of Aprill, in the yeere 1450. The valiant captaine with great ſpeed and no reſiſtance entred into EPIRVS, as was giuen him in charge, and without let came to CROIA: where, after he had aduiſedly conſidered of the ſituation thereof, and of the places thereabouts, he ſtrongly encamped himſelfe neere thereunto in the pleaſant plaine called TYRANNA: and there within his trenches kept his ſouldiers cloſe, attending nothing more, but that no new ſupplie of men, munition, or victuals, ſhould be conuaied into the citie, more than was therein before his comming. For he was not able with his horſemen to doe any thing againſt the citie: and Scanderbeg had left nothing abroad in the countrey ſubiect to his furie. Beſides that, he was expreſly by Amurath forbidden, to attempt B any thing againſt Scanderbeg himſelfe.

After Sebalyas had twentie dayes thus lien encamped before CROIA, neither doing nor taking harme; Amurath by reaſon of his great age, hauing marched oftentimes but fiue miles a day, came thither alſo with his whole armie, wherewith he filled all the countrey round about: the very ſight whereof, had beene enough to haue diſcouraged the ſmall garriſon in CROIA, had they not beene men both of great experience and reſolution. Where after he had ſpent foure dayes in ſetling of his campe, he ſent two meſſengers to the Gouernour (as the manner of the Turks is) offering him if he would yeeld vp the citie, that it ſhould be lawfull for him with all his ſouldiers in ſafetie with bagge and baggage to depart; and the Gouernour himſelfe to re-
C ceiue in reward two hundred thouſand aſpers, with an honourable place amongſt the great Baſſaes of his court, if it would pleaſe him to accept thereof: and further, that the citizens ſhould enioy all their ancient liberties as in former time, without any alteration; with promiſe alſo of greater. Theſe meſſengers comming to the gates of the citie, could not be ſuffered to enter, but ſtanding without, were commanded there to deliuer their meſſage. Which when the Gouernour had heard, he ſcornfully reiected their offers, and returned the meſſengers ſhamefully derided by the ſouldiers which ſtood vpon the wall. Amurath more offended with this contempt, than the refuſall of his offers; and ſeeing no other meanes to gaine the citie, conuerted all his deuices vnto the ſiege thereof. Wherefore he firſt commanded ten great peeces of artillerie to be forthwith caſt, for he had brought none with him readie made, becauſe of the dif-
D ficult paſſage ouer the high mountaines into EPIRVS; whereby it ſeemed to be a matter of infinite trouble to haue brought his great ordinance: and therefore caried with him great ſtore of metall in maſſe, whereof at his pleaſure to make his great artillerie as he ſaw cauſe. In fifteene dayes this worke was brought to perfection, and ten peeces of huge greatneſſe were readie mounted vpon cariages. Six of them he placed againſt the Eaſt ſide of the citie, towards the plaine of TYRANNA, and the other foure againſt the gate: in which two places onely, CROIA was ſubiect to batterie, being on all other parts naturally defended with impregnable rocks, vpon the tops whereof were built faire battlements more for beautie than needfull defence. Theſe two places Amurath battered foure dayes continually, and with the furie of his artillerie had in Croia battered. both places beaten downe halfe the wall, and ſore ſhaken the reſt. Wherewith the Turks were exceedingly encouraged, and with great cheerefulneſſe made all things readie to aſſault thoſe
E breaches, whenſoeuer Amurath ſhould command, ſtriuing among themſelues who ſhould ſhew himſelfe moſt forward in that dangerous enterpriſe. And Mahomet the young Prince, the more to encourage the ſouldiers, beſides the great rewards by his father propoſed, promiſed of himſelfe to giue an hundred thouſand aſpers to him that ſhould firſt ſet vp an enſigne vpon the wals of the citie. The garriſon ſouldiers on the other ſide, conſidering that the whole ſtate and welfare of EPIRVS was repoſed in their valour; and that the eyes of moſt part of Chriſtendome were as it were fixed vpon them, were nothing diſmaied with the breaches made, but manfully comforted and encouraged one another to endure all manner of perill and danger that might poſſibly chance: but eſpecially the worthie Gouernour Vranacontes, who going through the middeſt of his ſouldiers, and ſhaking ſome of them by the hands, withall ſaid:

Theſe, theſe are the fortreſſes of our citie, theſe are the inuincible bulwarkes, theſe are the irremouable ſtones and ſureſt ſement. What honour? what praiſe? what triumph ſhould we hope for? if theſe wals ſtanding whole and ſtrong, we ſhould lie ſhrouded vnder the defence of them, and not they defended by vs? So can cowards defend cities, and ſheepe feare not the wolues rage, when they are ſafely ſhut vp within the wals of their ſheepcoats: But that is the praiſe of the wals, and not of the men. The cheerefull ſpeech of Vranacontes the Gouernour to encourage his ſouldiers.

Worthie

Worthie Caſtriot our Prince hath commended this his citie to be defended by vs, and not vs by it. Honour is attended vpon with danger, and foſtered vp amongſt perils: euery baſe mariner may be a maſter in faire weather: and firme things ſtand of themſelues, and need not our vpholding. Wherefore, men of worth ſhun ſuch things, which being kept or loſt, yeeld like praiſe. Things readie to fall, need ſhoaring, and thither haſteth honour, and there (worthie ſouldiers) appeareth courage and valour. Wherefore let our valiant right hands defend theſe broken breaches, and in ſtead of theſe dead wals, courageouſly oppoſe our luſtie and liuely armed bodies againſt the force of our enemies. If theſe wals ſtood ſtill firme, and vnbattered, you ſhould then fight from the top of them like women; but now that they are ſomething ſhaken, you ſhall as men ſtand vpon ſomewhat more euen ground, and encounter your enemies hand to hand, the better to ſatisfie your furious deſire. Where I alſo in the thickeſt, ſhall eaſily view and iudge of euery mans priuate courage, in particular, and of all your valour in common. And yet if we well conſider of the matter, the place it ſelfe doth yet notably make for vs; and our former good hopes are little or nothing by theſe ſmall breaches diminiſhed: For, this riſing of the hill (not poſſible to be taken from vs) although it be not ſo high as it is in other places, yet doth it not ſerue vs ſufficiently at great aduantage to charge our enemies, and hinder their aſſault? The ſteepeneſſe whereof, as it will be troubleſome vnto them, ſo will it keepe vs moſt freſh in ſtrength, and make our ſhot more forcible. Wherefore this had beene a thing of vs to haue beene wiſhen for, if we deſire the ſlaughter of our enemies at this ſiege; or if we wiſh for perpetuall honour and glorie by this warre. For this breach of the wals will encourage theſe barbarians, and allure their armed men to clime vp in greater multitude than if the wals were whole, whereof ſo many ſhall on euery ſide be eaſily ſlaine, as we ſhall but aime at: except you had rather ſit ſtill, holding your hands together in your boſomes as cowards. Their dead bodies ſhall fill vp the breaches againe, if you be men mindfull of your libertie. What is there (worthie captaines and ſouldiers) that letteth our victorie? or memorable ſlaughter of our enemies? by whom onely theſe two places of the citie can be aſſaulted: all the reſt is out of danger, and feares no enemies force. Here onely is the paines to be taken, this onely is left for you to defend, and here ſhall you all be: the courage, force, and ſtrength of you all ſhall in this place appeare. How will you ſo many worthie captaines, and valiant ſouldiers, in ſo little roome beſtow your ſelues? We are too many defendants for ſo ſmall breaches. Yet let vs play the men, and doe our endeuour: let vs in one conflict weaken the tyrants ſtrength, and burſt his proud heart; he will forſake this citie, and raiſe his ſiege vnfortunatly begun, ſo ſoone as he ſhall ſee his firſt aſſault to coſt him the liues of ſo many thouſands of his men.

Croia aſſaulted. When Vranacontes had with this comfortable ſpeech thus encouraged his ſouldiers, againſt the aſſault which he expected the next day; and had with great care and diligence ſet all things in order for the ſame, and repaired the breaches as well as was poſſible in that caſe: he gaue them leaue for that night to take their reſt. In the morning Amurath commanded the aſſault to be giuen to both the breaches, which was forthwith by the Turks cheerefully begun, and euery man buſie to performe the ſeruice he was appointed vnto. But by that time that the aſſault was well begun, a ſudden allarum was raiſed throughout all the Turks campe: for Scanderbeg with fiue thouſand valiant ſouldiers, had ſuddenly broken in vpon one ſide of the Turks great campe, and at the firſt encounter had ſlaine ſix hundred of the Turks, & was now ſpoiling their tents. The rumour whereof, troubled the whole campe, and made the Turks with leſſe courage to aſſault the breaches, for feare of the danger behind them. Amurath although he had great confidence in them whō he had before left for the ſafegard of his tents, yet for more ſuretie ſent Seremet one of his greateſt captaines, with foure thouſand ſouldiers backe into the campe, for more ſuretie: ſaying, that nothing could be too ſure, againſt that wild beaſt: meaning the furie of Scanderbeg. Mahomet alſo the young Prince, haſted thither in great choler with his guard, much againſt his fathers will. But Moſes, Scanderbeg his lieutenant, knowing himſelfe too weak to withſtand the multitude that was ſwarming thither (contenting himſelfe with that which was alreadie done) had before Mahomet his comming, ſpeedily retired with all his armie into the ſafegard of the mountaines, from whence he came: hauing done great harme in the Turks campe, with the loſſe but of ten men. Scanderbeg in the heat of this skirmiſh, forgetting himſelfe, had ſo farre engaged himſelfe among the Turks, that he was by them on euery ſide encloſed, and in great danger to haue beene ſlaine or taken: yet valiantly breaking through them, he eſcaped the danger and recouered the mountains, and with much adoe came at length to his campe, to the great ioy and comfort of them all, being before in great feare he had beene loſt. This was accounted

A the greatest ouersight of Scanderbeg in all his warres, for so much as the office of a good Generall consisteth not in aduenturing of his person to manifest danger, but in the politicke gouernment of his charge. During the time that Scanderbeg thus assailed the Turks campe, Amurath but faintly assaulted the breaches, expecting the successe in the campe: but when he vnderstood that Scanderbeg was retired and all quieted, he brought all his forces to the wals, and first with the multitude of his archers and small shot, laboured to driue the defendants from the wals, ouerwhelming them with arrowes falling as thicke as haile. And likewise at the same time other common souldiers of baser account, brought scaling ladders and other things needfull for the scaling of the wals. After whom also followed the Ianizaries and other chosen souldiers, rea-
B die to mount the ladders as soone as they should be set to the wals. But whilest they climbe vp the high hils in this order, the garrison souldiers made such slaughter of them with shot from the wals and out of the citie, that they would haue presently retired, had they not beene forced forward by their captaines, who spared neither stripes nor wounds when words would not serue. By this tyrannicall meanes, the scaling ladders were with great slaughter of the common souldiers set vp against the wals, and the Turks climing vp, came to handie blowes with the defendants at the breaches: nothing was to be heard, but the crying of people, the clattering of armour, and the instruments of warre, which was terribly redoubled with the ecchoes from the mountaines round about. The Turks doing what they might to winne the breaches, were by the Christians worthily repulsed, and with their ladders tumbled headlong downe the moun-
C taine, with such horrible slaughter and discomfiture, especially of the common souldiers, that none of them would set one foot forward againe towards the wals, although they had small hope to saue themselues by retiring backe: for the fierce young Prince Mahomet, euen then making shew of his cruell disposition, caused them that returned, to be slaine, by the terrour thereof to driue others forward. These common souldiers whom the Turks make small reckoning of, are for most part miserable Christians, which liue in such countries as had sometimes receiued the faith of Christ, but are now vnder the Turkish slauerie; of which sort of wretched people, the Turkish tyrants draw with them great multitudes in their wars, most commonly vnarmed, because they dare not well trust them in wars against the Christians: these carrie all the baggage of the campe, these serue to fetch wood and water for other souldiers of better ac-
D count, these serue in stead of pioners to cast trenches and raise bulwarks: and when battell is to be giuen, if it be in plaine field, these haue then weapons put into their hands, and thrust into the forefront of the battell to blunt the enemies swords: but if a citie be to be besieged, these serue as fit matter to fill the ditches with their dead bodies, or to make bridges for other souldiers to passe ouer vpon: and if they shrinke to attempt any thing they are commanded, then are they more cruelly vsed by their commanders than by their enemies. When Amurath saw his souldiers so discouraged, he stood in doubt whether it were better for that time to sound a retrait, or to send a new supplie: but being enraged with the losse of his men, and desirous to be in some part reuenged, he sent diuers companies of his better souldiers for the incouragement of them which were before discouraged, and so gaue a fresh assault. But with as euill, or worse successe
E than before: for Vranacontes had withdrawne from the breaches all those souldiers which had endured the former assault, and placed other fresh and lustie men in their stead; who encouraged with the former victorie, & loth to be accounted inferiour to their fellowes, repulsed the Turks with double slaughter: vntill that the aged King, not able longer to behold the endlesse losse of his men, caused a retrait to be sounded; which all his souldiers were glad to heare, and so returned into his campe, hauing lost in those two assaults eight thousand men, without any notable harme done vnto the defendants worth the remembrance.

This shamefull repulse much grieued all the captains & commanders of Amuraths armie, but especially Mahomet the young Prince, whose violent nature vnacquainted with mishap, burnt impatiently with reuenge. Wherefore vnderstanding that Scanderbeg lay intrenched vpon the F mountaine of TVMENIST, not farre from his fathers armie, he drew most of the best & readiest souldiers of all the whole campe, into that quarter which was neerest vnto Scanderbeg: of purpose that if he should againe assaile the campe in that place (as it was most like he would) he should be encountred with so many braue and valiant men there in readinesse, as that it should be hard for him either to doe any great harme, or for himselfe to escape. Of all which, Scanderbeg by certaine fugitiues had intelligence, as also in what order the campe lay: whereupon he left Moſes with fiue hundred ſouldiers in the place where he lay, taking order with him before his departure, that he at a certaine appointed houre in the night following, ſhould aſſaile the Turks campe in the quarter next vnto him where Mahomet lay; and hauing there raiſed ſome tumult, ſpeedily to retire againe to his aſſured ſtrength in the mountaine. Scanderbeg himſelfe with the whole ſtrength of his armie, in number about eight thouſand, in the meane time tooke a compaſſe about, and by certaine ſecret by-wayes through the woods and mountaines, came vnto the farther ſide of the Turks armie, to a place called MOVNTECLE. The night following, Moſes at the appointed houre with his fiue hundred ſouldiers aſſailed that part of the Turks campe next vnto him, with ſuch noiſe and tumult, as if it had beene ſome great armie. By occaſion whereof, all the Turks campe was in alarme, and drew in haſte to that place where they heard that great tumult, as was before by Mahomet commanded. When at the ſame inſtant, Scanderbeg with all his armie brake into the other ſide of the Turks campe, where he was leaſt feared or looked for, and from whence the beſt ſouldiers were before drawne by Mahomet: and there made ſuch ſlaughter and hauocke of the reſt, not knowing which way to turne themſelues, that the loſſe a little before receiued vnder the wals of CROIA was now forgot, as a ſmall thing in compariſon of this. Moſes hauing raiſed a great feare, and done little harme, retired in ſafetie to his well knowne ſtrength: and Scanderbeg hauing made great ſpoile in the campe, fearing to be oppreſſed with the multitude of his enemies if he ſhould there longer ſtay, returned in good time, hauing ſcarce loſt one man.

Amurath after this great loſſe and trouble of his campe, withdrew moſt of his ſmall ordinance which he had before bent againſt the citie, into his trenches, placing it as commodiouſly as he might for the defence thereof againſt the ſudden attempts of Scanderbeg. Yet for as much as he could not in that hot ſeaſon of the yeere ſo cloſely encampe his great armie, but that ſome part thereof would ſtill be in like danger as before; he therefore appointed Sebalias with ſixteene thouſand ſouldiers to attend vpon Scanderbeg, that he ſhould no more trouble the whole campe. After which order taken, he battered the wals of CROIA afreſh, and with his great ordinance ouerthrew whatſoeuer the citizens had repaired, making the breaches greater and more faultable than before, intending once againe by a new aſſault to proue his fortune, and the force of his ſouldiers: which he appointed to be the next day. But when he perceiued no ſigne of courage or good hope in the heauie countenances of them diſcouraged, and that they yeelded to him their conſents, rather for feare and ſhame, than for hope of victorie; he called them cowards diſcouraged with the leaſt frowne of fortune, and ſaid;

Euery weake caſtle is able to hold out one aſſault: but if you will draw theſe wilde beaſts out of their dens, you muſt arme your ſelues like reſolute men of inuincible courage, to endure what thing ſoeuer ſhall happen. Great captaines with their puiſſant armies haue growne old vnder the wals of their enemies, vpon light and ſmall diſpleaſures: and will you hauing receiued ſo many diſgraces of theſe periured Epirots, leaue them all vnreuenged? What great victorie was euer yet by any man gained without bloudſhed? Remember the moſt glorious victorie of VARNA. It is hard without bloudie hands to put the yoke vpon the fierce enemies necke. All honourable things are brought to paſſe with aduenture and labour: and the end of this warre dependeth of the taking of CROIA. If it were once won, all this warre were at an end: which if Scanderbeg loſe (being the ſtrength of his kingdome) he will not tarrie one day longer in EPIRVS. Wherefore be of good cheere, and couragiouſly ſet vpon it: there is not more vncertaintie in any thing, than in matters of warre. Fortune is to be proued, and oftentimes prouoked of him that will wed her. And yet I will not denie, but that we muſt goe more warily to worke againſt this enemie, and hazard our ſelues with better aduiſement, and not without reaſon like wilde beaſts to run headlong vpon our owne death. At length we ſhall weare them out, if we kill but ten of them at an aſſault: yet are they daily to be aſſailed, that they may haue no leiſure to refreſh themſelues, or to make vp their breaches. And peraduenture if force may not preuaile, fortune may find ſome meane that we looke not for, as it fell out at the ſiege of SPETIGRADE, beyond all your expectation. Treaſon is ingenious, and mens deſires great, where great rewards are propounded.

With theſe and like ſpeeches old Amurath encouraged his captaines and ſouldiers, and the next day early in the morning began the aſſault, which the Turks valiantly attempted: and without regard of danger came to the gates of the citie, aſſaying, but with vaine and deſperate labour,

A bour to haue broken them open. In this aſſault wilde fire was caſt into many places of the citie, and the great artillerie oftentimes diſcharged into the breaches: whereby many of the Turkes themſelues were ſlaine with their owne great ſhot, together with the Chriſtians: for Amurath deſperatly ſet, was content to buy the life of one Chriſtian with the loſſe of twentie of his Turks. But the Chriſtians ſtill valiantly repulſed their enemies, ſo that of them that came to the gates, none eſcaped aliue; and of them that aſſaulted the great breach, they which were moſt forward, were firſt ſlaine, and they which ſtood farther off, were ſore wounded with ſhot. Yet for all that, Amurath ſtill maintained the aſſault, by ſending in of new ſupplies, delighting to ſee them goe forward, but grieued at the heart to ſee them ſo ſlaine: vntill at laſt wearie with beholding
B the ſlaughter of his men, he cauſed a retrait to be ſounded, and ſo ended the aſſault; perſwaded by his Baſſaes, not wilfully to caſt away his valiant ſouldiers where there was no hope to preuaile, but to reſerue them for his better ſeruice. The Turkes retire.

Amurath now out of hope to win the citie by aſſault, thought good to proue what might bee done by vndermining of the ſame: during which worke, he cauſed ſmall alarums daily to be giuen vnto the citie, to the intent that the defendants buſied therewith, ſhould not perceiue the ſecret worke of the mine. About which time his prouiſion of corne began to faile in his campe; for which cauſe he ſent his purueyors for corne to LISIA, a citie of the Venetians, with whom he was at that time in league, and bought of them great ſtore of corne. But as his officers were conueying it to his campe, Scanderbeg hauing intelligence thereof, ſlew the conuoy, & carried
C away with him all that prouiſion, deuiding it amongſt his owne ſouldiers. Howbeit, not long after Amurath receiued great abundance of corne and other prouiſion out of MACEDONIA: beſide that, the Venetian marchants afterward furniſhed him with plentie of corne, oyle, hony, and other neceſſaries; which Scanderbeg might well haue hindered, but that he would not in ſo doing offend the Venetians, which were alſo his ſecret friends, conſidering that Amurath might haue had all the ſame prouiſion out of the further part of MACEDONIA, THRACIA, MYSIA, and ſuch other places, if he had not otherwiſe had it from the Venetians. Amurath ſeketh to vndermine Croia.

Whileſt Amurath thus lay expecting the ſucceſſe of his mine, foure hundred of the garriſon ſouldiers of CROIA ſallying out of the citie, chaſed diuers of the Turks that were come forth backe againe vnto the campe: whereof Amurath was glad, hoping, that they encouraged with D that good hap, would to their further loſſe giue the like attempt afterwards. But the ſtayed diſcretion of the Gouernour deceiued that his expectation: who conſidering the daunger, would not ſuffer his ſouldiers any more to ſallie out of the citie. Scanderbeg alſo at this time hauing encreaſed his armie with a new ſupply of two thouſand ſoldiers, diuided the ſame into three parts, deliuering one part to Moſes, another to Tanuſie, and reſeruing the third to himſelfe. With this armie of nine thouſand thus deuided, he determined by night at one inſtant to aſſaile the Turks great campe in three diuers places: appointing in which quarter euery one ſhould charge. But as Scanderbeg in the night appointed, was comming towards the Turks campe, he was diſcouered by their ſcouts: whereupon a ſudden alarme was raiſed in the campe, and all mens minds turned that way, and ſouldiers appointed with all diligence to guard that ſide of the campe. But E whileſt the Turkes were all at gaze this way for feare of Scanderbeg, Moſes and Tanuſie, in the dead of the night, at one time aſſailed the Turks campe in two diuers quarters, as they were appointed, where they ſlew a number of the Turks, and made great ſpoile. At which time Scanderbeg did alſo what he might: but by reaſon he was before diſcouered, did not much harme. Vpon the approach of the day Scanderbeg retired againe to the hils, and by that time it was faire daylight, ſate downe vpon the ſide of a great mountain, about twentie furlongs off, in the open ſight of all the Turks campe: which he did of purpoſe, that Moſes and Tanuſie, which were by night retired into the mountains, might ſee which way to hold, to meet with him again. But the Turks thinking that he ſtood there to braue their whole campe, and as it were to deface them, to the great encouragement of the defendants: diuers of them earneſtly craued leaue of Amurath, That F they might goe vp to him, and at leaſtwiſe beat him out of ſight: which hee graunting, twelue thouſand of his beſt ſoldiers, whereof ſeuen thouſand were horſemen, and the reſt foot, preſently ſet forward to encounter him. Scanderbeg ſeeing them all the way the came, vpon their approch ſoftly retired a little farther vp into the mountaines, ſtill expecting the comming of Moſes and Tanuſie. The Turks vnacquainted with ſuch difficult waies, marched vp the ſteep hils after Scanderbeg with much labour and paine, well wearied of themſelues: but when they were come a great way into the mountains, they perceiued by the rising of the dust, that some greater force G was comming crosse those mountaines: and not long after they might plainly see the formost of their enemies. Wherefore fearing to be enclosed, they began to retire, in which retreat Scanderbeg hardly pursued them, and hauing the aduantage of the ground, slew many of them, but especially with his archers. Moses also comming in afresh on another side, caused them to flie downe the hill amaine, and beside the slaughter that he made, tooke diuers prisoners. After which victorie, by Scanderbeg obtained in the sight of Amurath and his whole armie, he retired againe into the mountaines.

The late spoile of the Turks campe, with this ouerthrow of the souldiers but now sent against Scanderbeg, much greeued the old tyrant: but the worke of the mine, wherein he had of long laid vp his greatest hope, sorting now to no good purpose, being deemed as well an end- H lesse peece of worke for the naturall hardnesse of the rocke, as also of small importance, for that it was by the defendants discouered, draue him to his wits end. His forces he had to his great losse sufficiently proued, and still found them too weake: and policie preuailed not. Nothing now remained, but to proue, if by great gifts and glorious promises he could first corrupt the faith of the Gouernour, and afterwards the garrison: wherein he determined to spare no cost. Vpon which resolution, he sent one of his Bassaes (a man of great authoritie and dexteritie of wit) vnto Vranacontes, with such rich gifts and presents as might haue moued a right constant mind: commanding the Bassa (if it were possible) first to fasten the same vpon the Gouernour, as presents sent from Amurath of meere bountie, in the honour of his valiant mind; and after- I wards to deliuer his message, not sparing to promise any thing for the giuing vp of the citie, yea more than should be desired. The Bassa attended on but with two seruants, came with this rich present neere to the gates of the citie, and there staied, vntill the Gouernours pleasure were knowne: by whose command he was receiued into the citie, and brought to his presence. Then the Bassa with much reuerence and many magnificall words presented vnto Vranacontes the rich gifts sent from Amurath, and would forthwith haue deliuered them vnto him, as the rewards of his valour. But Vranacontes willed him first to declare his message from Amurath; vpon the hearing whereof, he would (as he said) as he saw cause, either receiue or refuse them: before which time he would not be beholden to his enemie, by receiuing from him the least courtesie. With which answere the subtill Bassa nothing dismaied, with great constancie thus K began to deliuer his message.

The craftie speech of the Bassa sent from Amurath to corrupt the Gouernour, and to perswade the souldiers to yeeld vp the citie.

Howsoeuer we agree (said he) vpon other matters we come for, we brought not these gifts of purpose to deceiue any: for so men vse to deale with their children and seruants, and not with men of courage and valour. And albeit that enemies gifts are euer to be suspected (as you haue right wisely said, and wee our selues well know) yet wee durst not for shame come vnto so worthie a Gouernour (as the common saying is) emptie handed: neither ought you, if you be the man you seeme to be, and whom men report you are, to refuse our courtesie. Take these presents in good part, which shall no way enforce or hinder you to determine or dispose of your affaires otherwise than shall seeme vnto you good: neither shall we once obiect vnto you these gifts, which wee so franke and freely offer in the great Sultans L name, whether you reiect or admit our demands and message; wherein there is (perhaps) no lesse regard had of your good, than of ours. For there is no greater token of a base mind, than to giue, in hope to receiue againe. Wee come vnto you frankly (worthie Gouernour) I speake it from my heart: wee goe not about with filed speech and rich rewards to circumuent thee, whose inuincible mind wee haue so often in vaine proued with our forces and power. That is it for which Amurath loueth thee. He doth wonderfully admire the vertues of his enemies, and if it were possible, desireth to haue them with himselfe. There verily with so mightie a Monarch might thy inuincible mind and pregnant wit find a better way vnto the highest type of fortunes blisse. Not that I condemne Scanderbeg, whom wee his enemies doe highly commend, for his countrey so well recouered, and so oftentimes worthily defended, yet chiefly by your helpe: but you are worthie another manner of Soueraigne, and of another manner of M calling, and not to spend all the dayes of your life and such heroicall vertues in obscuritie, and (without offence be it said) in contemptible baseneſſe. Besides that, Scanderbeg his estate is but momentarie; the destinies haue assigned vnto him too too mightie an enemie, his destruction may well be deferred, but not by any meanes auoided. Amurath hath conceiued against him an implacable displeasure, and prepared his forces accordingly: he hath sworne to spare no cost, no labour, no danger: and that he will

A will neuer whileſt he liueth depart out of EDIRVS, before he haue impoſed a deadly yoke vpon his necke. And behold, the firſt of this miſerie beginneth at this citie, and vpon your ſelues. We daily heare his pauilions ſound with theſe and ſuch like ſpeeches, That he will neuer depart out of this place before he haue taken this citie, and ſatisfied his angrie mind with the torture of your bodies, no, not if he ſhould therefore loſe HADRIANOPLE, yea, and that more is, his whole kingdome. And verily he will doe it, which I feare to diuine or thinke vpon. For although I with others beare againſt you the mind of an enemie, yet am I a man, and moued with humane compaſsion: beleeue me (ye men of CROIA) beleeue me, my eyes would ſcarcely endure to behold the horrible ſpectacle of your miſerable fortune. I tell you againe he will doe it, except you change your purpoſe, and now receiue health, life, libertie, and

B peace, whileſt it is ſo freely offered. For albeit, that this notable ſtrong place, theſe impregnable wals, and eſpecially your owne valour, doe yet defend you: how long will it hold out? Verily, no longer than you haue victuall, no longer than you haue meat to ſuſtaine your bodies. Doe you thinke that Amurath will raiſe his ſiege in the middle of the heat of this warre, and be gone? No, no, if force will not preuaile, if all his attempts faile, yet ſhall you ſee and feele theſe enemies continually to your hurt: you ſhall alwayes haue theſe tents in your eyes and at your gates, vntill long famine, which maſtereth all things, tame your courage alſo. I pray you, what hope haue you left? from whence ariſeth in your reſolute minds ſuch deſperate contempt of danger? Can Scanderbeg victuall you, being ſo ſtraightly beſieged? which hideth himſelfe (poore man) in the woods all day, and flieth ouer the tops of the mountaines, loaden with trauaile and care, ſcarce able to releeue his owne miſerie. Or will the Venetians releeue you? which

C daily bring vnto vs and ſtore vs with too too great plentie of all things neceſſarie for this warre againſt you. Wherefore repent your too much hardineſſe, and gather your wits together. Behold I your enemie aduiſe you. You haue long enough continued in your obſtinacie. Your countrey and libertie is not ſo farre to be defended, as that you ſhould therefore fight againſt God. But wherefore doe I call this libertie? You muſt giue place vnto your fortune, and learne to obey them that be too ſtrong for you. You ſhall find aſſured libertie, rich rewards, perpetuall reſt, with Amurath. Prouide for your ſelues, if you be wiſe, whileſt all things are yet whole for you to determine of; whileſt we your enemies exhort and requeſt you, and had rather haue you our voluntarie companions and friends, than our enforced ſeruants and ſlaues.

D This the Baſſa ſpake with great grauitie and no leſſe vehemencie, expecting ſome great motions to haue riſen in the minds of the ſouldiers. But when he perceiued that his ſpeech had rather filled them with indignation, than with feare: and that it was but a vaine thing to goe about to terrifie them with words, whom all the power of Amurath could not make afraid with weapons, he requeſted to talke alone with the Gouernour in ſecret: which was alſo granted. For all men had no leſſe good opinion of the worthie Gouernours fidelitie, than of his great wiſedome and valour. The craftie Baſſa hauing him by himſelfe, began with great cunning to deliuer his more ſecret meſſage: when Vranacontes perceiuing by a little what the whole tale meant, interrupted him in the middle of his ſpeech, and without more adoe commanded him to depart: ſtraightly charging him, That neither he nor any other ſhould after that time preſume to come

E from his maſter to the citie to ſpeake with him about any ſuch diſhonourable matter; for if he did, he would in deteſtation thereof cauſe their hands, their noſes, and their eares to be cut off, and ſo returne them diſmembred in ſtead of anſwere. And ſo the Baſſa was with his preſents againe turned out of the citie, and no man ſuffered to receiue any thing of him in reward, although the ſouldiers could haue beene well content to haue eaſed him and his ſeruants of that carriage, if the Gouernour would but haue winked thereat.

Vranacontes reieɔɔeth Amurath his preſents, and threateneth the Baſſa.

Great was the expectation in the Turks campe, of the Baſſaes returne: but when they ſaw the preſents were not receiued, they eaſily gueſſed that all went not as they wiſhed. But when Amurath himſelfe vnderſtood the Gouernors reſolute anſwere, he in great rage cõmanded all things to be made ready for a freſh aſſault: which he did rather to ſatisfie his anger, than vpon any hope

F he had to preuaile therein. The next day, he cauſed a furious aſſault to be giuen to the citie, but with greater loſſe to himſelfe than before; the Chriſtians ſtil valiantly defending the citie againſt the Turkiſh furie. In this aſſault many of the Turks were ſlaine at the breach, with their owne great ſhot: for whileſt Amurath ſought therwith to driue the Chriſtians from the defence of the breach, he ſlew a great number more of the forwardeſt of his owne men than he did of the defendants. But wearied at length to behold the endleſſe ſlaughter of his men, he gaue ouer the aſ-

Croia againe in vaine aſſaulted.

ſault,and returned into his campe,as if he had been a man halfe franticke or diſtract of his wits; G and there ſate downe in his tent, all that day full of melancholie paſſions, ſometimes violently pulling his hoarie beard and white locks, complaining of his hard and diſaſter fortune, that he had liued ſo long to ſee thoſe daies of diſgrace,wherein all his former glorie and triumphant victories were obſcured,by one baſe towne of Epirvs. His Baſſaes and graue counſellors labouring in the meane time with long diſcourſes to comfort him vp : ſometimes recounting vnto him his many & glorious victories, and other whiles producing ancient examples of like euent. But darke and heauie conceits had ſo ouerwhelmed the melancholie old tyrant, that nothing could content his waiward mind,or reuiue his dying ſpirits:ſo that the little remainder of naturall heat which was left in his aged bodie, now oppreſſed and almoſt extinguiſhed with melancholie conceits, and his aged bodie dried vp with ſorrow, he became ſicke for griefe. Whereupon by the counſell of ſome of his Baſſaes,he ſent an embaſſadour to Scanderbeg,offering him H peace,if he would yeeld to pay vnto him a yeerely tribute of ten thouſand duckats:thinking by that meanes his honour to be well ſaued, if before his departure out of Epirvs, he could but make Scanderbeg his tributarie. This embaſſadour was by Scanderbeg honourably entertained in his campe, but the offered peace at the ſame time vtterly refuſed. The embaſſadour returning to Amurath, declared vnto him the euill ſucceſſe of his embaſſage, which greatly increaſed his melancholie ſickneſſe. And Scanderbeg to grieue him the more,vnderſtanding that he was dangerouſly ſicke,and that the great Baſſaes were more carefull of the Kings health than of the ſucceſſe of the warres ; diuers times aſſailed the Turks campe. Which thing though the Baſſaes I kept from his knowledge with all carefulneſſe : yet he oftentimes ſuſpected the matter, by the often allarums and tumults in the campe,and with the griefe thereof languiſhed. So feeling his ſickneſſe daily to increaſe,and that he could not longer liue,lying vpon a pallet in his pauilion, greeuouſly complained to his Baſſaes, That the deſtinies had ſo blemiſhed all the former courſe of his life,with ſuch an obſcure death,that he which had ſo often repreſſed the furie of the Hungarians, and almoſt brought to nought the pride of the Grecians, together with their name, ſhould now be enforced to giue vp the ghoſt, vnder the wals of an obſcure caſtle (as he termed it) and that in the ſight of his contemptible enemie.After that,turning himſelfe to his ſon Mahomet,he earneſtly commended him to the faithfulneſſe of his Baſſaes,and gaue him many graue aduertiſements, ſometimes in ſecret betwixt themſelues,& ſometimes in the hearing of others: K want of ſtrength & abundance of teares running downe his aged face(vpon the ſight of his ſon) oftentimes interrupting his ſpeech. Yet ſicke vnto death as he was, and drawing faſt vnto his end,he forced himſelfe, to warne his ſon of ſuch things as now at his death greeued him moſt.

The laſt ſpeech and admonition of Amurath vnto his ſonne Mahomet vpon his death-bed.

Let mine example (quoth he) be a warning vnto thee my ſonne, neuer to contemne thine enemie, be he neuer ſo weake : of which one thing aboue all others, I haue repented my ſelfe of long, and ſhall doe after my death, if any feeling of humane things remaine in the dead. And that I was ſo fooliſh, and inconſiderate, as to foſter vp as it were in my boſome this my domeſticall and neglected enemie: whereby I haue purchaſed vnto my ſelfe this calamitie, and for euer blemiſhed the honour of the Othoman Kings : whileſt I ſo baſely ending my daies vnder the wals of Croia, ſhall become a by-word vnto the world, and all poſteritie for euer. This traitour ſhould euen then haue beene oppreſſed, when he by great treacherie, firſt recouered his wicked kingdome : in that newneſſe of his eſtate, and before the minds of the people were aſſured vnto him, then it had beene an eaſie matter, without bloudſhed to haue vtterly extinguiſhed the wretch, together with his name. Ali Baſſa, whoſe euill fortune was the firſt beginning of his good : nor the other Generals, who by him ſlaine or taken priſoners, increaſed his ſtrength and credit with his ſubiects, ſhould not haue beene ſent againſt him : a thing which I haue oftentimes thought vpon, but could ſcarce haue beleeued, that euer I ſhould haue thereby receiued ſuch diſgrace, together with the ignominious renting of my kingdome, if I had not beene taught the ſame by mine owne experience, to my great loſſe and hearts greefe. We entered into Epirvs, and here encamped an hundred and threeſcore thouſand men ſtrong : now if leiſure ſerue you, take view of them, exa- M mine the matter, you ſhall find a great want of that number. The fields could not containe our regiments and the multitude of our men : but now, how many tents ſtand emptie ? how many horſes want riders ? You ſhall goe to Hadrianople with our forces much impaired. As for me, the deſtinies haue vowed my ſpirits to this countrey of Epirvs, as vnto me fatall. But wherefore doe I impute vnto my ſelfe theſe impediments and chances of Fortune ? for then firſt began this ſeed of miſchiefe in Epirvs, when the

Hungarians

A Hungarians with other the Chriſtian Princes, roſe vp in armes againſt vs: at which time we fought not with them for ſoueraigntie, but for the whole ſtate of our kingdome; as the bloudie battels of VARNA and COSSOVA ſtill witneſſe vnto the world. So whileſt I had neither leiſure nor ſufficient power to take order for all my important affaires at once; in the meane time this enemie grew as you ſee. But how, or in what order you are hereafter to wage warre againſt him, you may not looke for any direction from me, which haue in all theſe matters ſo euill directed my ſelfe: Fortune neuer deceiued my endeuours more, than in this. But happily thou Mahomet my ſonne, maieſt proue a more fortunate warriour againſt him: and for ſo many honours alreadie giuen vnto me, the deſtinies haue reſerued the triumph of EPIRVS for thee. Wherefore my ſonne, thou ſhalt receiue from me this ſcepter, and theſe royall enſignes: but aboue
B all things, I leaue vnto thee this enemie; charging thee not to leaue my death vnreuenged. It is all I charge thee with, for ſo great and ſtately a patrimonie as thou art to receiue from me: it is the only ſacrifice that my old departing ghoſt deſireth of thee.

Shortly after he became ſpeechleſſe, and ſtriuing with the pangs of death halfe a day, he then breathed out his gaſtly ghoſt, to the great ioy and contentment of the poore oppreſſed Chriſtians. He died about the middle of Autumne, in the yeare of our Lord 1450, when he had liued 85 yeares, as moſt write: and thereof raigned 28 (or as ſome others report 30;) about fiue moneths after the ſiege laid before CROIA. Amurath his death.

Thus lieth great Amurath, erſt not inferiour vnto the greateſt Monarchs of that age, dead al-
C moſt in deſpaire: a worthie mirrour of honours frailtie; yeelding vnto the worldly man in the end, neither comfort nor reliefe. Who had fought greater battels? who had gained greater victories, or obtained more glorious triumphs than had Amurath? who by the ſpoiles of ſo many mightie Kings and Princes, and by the conqueſt of ſo many proud and warlike nations, againe reſtored and eſtabliſhed the Turks kingdome, before by Tamerlane and the Tartars in a manner cleane defaced. He it was that burſt the heart of the proud Grecians, eſtabliſhing his empire at HADRIANOPLE, euen in the center of their bowels: from whence haue proceeded ſo many miſeries and calamities into the greateſt part of Chriſtendome, as no tongue is able to expreſſe. He it was that firſt brake downe the Hexamile or wall of ſeparation on the ſtrait of CORINTH, and conquered the greateſt part of PELOPONESVS. He it was that ſubdued vnto the Turks
D ſo many great countries and prouinces in ASIA; that in plaine field and ſet battell ouerthrew many puiſſant Kings and Princes, and brought them vnder his ſubiection: who hauing ſlaine Vladiſlaus the King of POLONIA and HVNGARIE, and more than once chaſed out of the field Huniades that famous and redoubted warriour; had in his proud and ambitious heart, promiſed vnto himſelfe the conqueſt of a great part of Chriſtendome. But O how farre was he now changed from the man he then was! how farre did theſe his laſt ſpeeches differ from the courſe of his forepaſſed life! full of ſuch baſe paſſionate complaints and lamentations, as beſeemed not a man of his place and ſpirit; but ſome vile wretch ouertaken with deſpaire, and yet afraid to die. Where were now thoſe haughtie thoughts, thoſe loftie lookes, thoſe thundring and commanding ſpeeches; whereat ſo many great commanders, ſo many troupes and legi-
E ons, ſo many thouſands of armed ſouldiers were wont to tremble and quake? Where is that head, before adorned with ſo many trophies and triumphs? where is that victorious hand that ſwaied ſo many ſcepters? where is the maieſtie of his power and ſtrength, that commanded ouer ſo many nations and kingdomes? O how is the caſe now altered! He lieth now dead, a gaſtly filthy ſtinking carkas, a clod of clay vnregarded, his hands cloſed, his eyes ſhut, and his feet ſtretched out, which erſt proudly traced the countries by him ſubdued and conquered. And now of ſuch infinite riches, ſuch vnmeaſurable wealth, ſuch hugie treaſures, ſuch ſtately honours and vaine-glorious praiſes as he in his life time enioyed; his fraile bodie enioyeth nothing, but left all behind it. O the weake condition of mans nature! O the vaine glorie of mortall creatures! O the blind and peruerſe thoughts of fooliſh men! Why do we ſo magnifie our F ſelues? why are we ſo puffed vp with pride? why do we ſo much ſet our minds vpon riches, authoritie, & other vanities of this life? whereof neuer man had yet one daies aſſurance, and at our moſt need and when we leaſt thinke, quite forſake vs; leauing euen them that moſt ſought after them, and moſt abounded in them, ſhrowded oft times in the ſheet of diſhonour and ſhame. Amurath an example of the vanitie of worldly honour.

That his death is otherwiſe by ſome reported, I am not ignorant: the Turks ſaying, that he died miraculouſly forewarned of his death at HADRIANOPLE: and ſome others, that he died in ASIA, ſtrucken with an Apoplexie proceeding of a ſurfet taken of the immoderat drinking of wine. But Marinus Barleſius, who liued in his time in SCODRA faſt by EPIRVS, whoſe authoritie, in report of the warres betwixt him and Scanderbeg we follow, ſetteth it downe in ſuch manner as is aforeſaid. G

in

Preſently after his death, Mahomet his ſonne, for feare of ſome innouation to be made at home, raiſed the ſiege, and returned to HADRIANOPLE: and afterward with great ſolemnitie buried his dead bodie at the Weſt ſide of PRVSA, in the ſuburbs of the citie, where he now lieth in a chapell without any roofe, his graue nothing differing from the manner of the common Turks: which (they ſay) he ſo commanded to be done in his laſt will; that the mercie and bleſſing of God (as he tearmed it) might come vnto him by the ſhining of the Sun and Moone, and falling of the raine and dew of heauen vpon his graue. H

Amurath buried at Prusa.

He whileſt he liued, mightily enlarged the Turkiſh kingdome, and with greater wiſedome and policie than his predeceſſors, eſtabliſhed the ſame: inſomuch that ſome attribute vnto him the firſt inſtitution of the Ianizaries, and other ſouldiers of the court (the greateſt ſtrength of the Turkiſh empire) before indeed begun in the time of Amurath the firſt, his great grandfather, (as is before declared) but by him greatly augmented, and the policie of that ſtate, whereby it hath euer ſince in his poſteritie flouriſhed, euen by himſelfe plotted. For the better eſtabliſhing whereof in his owne houſe, and to cut off all occaſions of feare; as alſo to leaue all ſuch as might haue the heart to ariſe againſt him, all naked and bare of forces to reſiſt; but eſpecially the other ancient and noble families of the Turks, ſtill ſecretly repining at the great honour of the Othoman Kings: he as a man of great wiſedome & iudgement, to keepe them vnder, in the beginning of his raigne, by manifold fauours began to bind vnto himſelfe men of ſtrange & forrain countries, his ſeruants; and by ordering of his moſt waightie affaires by their authoritie, ſo by little and little to caſt off the ſeruice of his naturall Turks: they in the meane time little or nothing at all looking into this his practiſe. And whereas the Othoman Kings his predeceſſors had for the moſt part, or rather altogether raiſed their Ianizaries and other ſouldiers of the court, of ſuch children of the Chriſtians as were taken in the wars; he, ſeeing by experience how ſeruiceable thoſe new kind of ſouldiers were, began forthwith to plot in his head, how to make himſelfe an armie altogether of ſuch able perſons, his owne creatures, and ſo to bring in a new kind of warfare, wholly depending of himſelfe. And to that end, by his officers appointed for that purpoſe, tooke from the Chriſtians throughout his dominions, euery fift child: the faireſt and apteſt of whom, he placed in his owne Seraglio at HADRIANOPLE, and the reſt in other like places by him built for ſuch purpoſe: where they were by ſufficient teachers, firſt inſtructed in the principles of the Mahometan religion, and then in all manner of actiuitie and feats of armes. Of theſe, when they were growne to mans ſtate, he made horſemen, gaue them great penſions, & ſorting them into diuers orders, appointed them alſo to guard his perſon; honouring the better ſort of them with the name of Spahi-Oglani, that is to ſay, his ſons the Knights. And of theſe he began to make his Baſſaes, his Generals of his armies, and the Gouernours of his prouinces and cities, with all the great offices of the ſtate. The reſt and farre the greateſt part of theſe tribute children, taken from their Chriſtian parents, and not brought vp in theſe Seraglioes, he cauſed to be diſperſed into euery citie and countrey of his dominion in ASIA, there for certaine yeeres to be brought vp in all hardneſſe and painfull labour, neuer taſting of eaſe or pleaſure: out of which hard brood ſo enured to paines, he made choiſe of ſo many of the moſt luſtie and able bodies fitteſt for ſeruice, as he thought good; who kept in continuall exerciſe, & by skilfull men taught to handle all manner of weapons, but eſpecially the bow, the peece, and the Scimitar, were by him as occaſion ſerued added to the other Ianizaries, and appointed for the guarding of his perſon: calling them commonly by the names of his ſonnes. The remainder of theſe tribute children, as vnfit for the warres, he put vnto other baſe occupations and miniſteries. But vnto thoſe martiall men of all ſorts ſo by him ordained, he appointed a continuall pay, according to their degrees and places: and by great benefits and liberties beſtowed vpon them, bound them ſo faſt vnto him, as that he might now account himſelfe to haue of them ſo many ſonnes, as he had ſouldiers: For they together with the Chriſtian religion, hauing forgot their parents and countrey, and knowing no other lord and maſter but him, and acknowledging all that they had to come and proceed of his free grace onely, remained euer bound and faithfull vnto him; and ſo kept others alſo, as well the natural Turks themſelues, as the other oppreſſed Chriſtians within I K L M

A in the bounds of obedience and loyaltie. A great policie proceeding from a deepe iudgement, firſt to weaken the Chriſtians by taking from them their beſt children, and of greateſt hope; and then by them depending wholly of himſelfe, to keepe in awe and dutifull obedience his naturall ſubiects alſo: hauing them alwaies as a ſcourge readie to chaſtiſe the rebellious or diſloyall. Now the other Othoman Kings and Emperours, the ſucceſſors of Amurath, keeping this cuſtome, and alſo increaſing it one after another, haue thereby not only kept the empire ſtill in their houſe and familie, where it was firſt gotten: but alſo ſo maintained the maieſtie of their ſtate, as that they are of their ſubiects feared, obeyed, and honoured, not as Kings, but as Gods. For the naturall Turks their ſubiects loſing courage continually, and daily growing more baſe
B and daſtardly, by reaſon they are not ſuffered to practiſe the knowledge of armes; and the ſouldiers in whoſe power all things are, knowing nothing of their owne, but holding and acknowledging all that they haue to come of their Lord, account them as Kings and Lords of all: ruling much after the manner of the Pharaohs the ancient Kings of ÆGYPT; who were abſolute Lords and maſters, both of the publicke and priuate wealth of their ſubiects, whom they kept vnder as ſlaues and villaines. And hereof commeth it to paſſe, that the better part of them, whom we call Turks, (but are indeed the children of Chriſtians, and ſeduced by their falſe inſtructors) deſire to be called Muſulmans (that is to ſay, right beleeuers) holding it a reprochfull and diſhonourable thing to be called Turks, as it were peculiarly and aboue other people: For that they knowing right well, that there is not one naturall Turke among all thoſe that beare
C authoritie and rule, and are had in greater honour and reputation than the reſt (ſuch as are the men of warre and courtiers) but he is borne a Chriſtian either of father, or at the leaſt of his grandfather: auouch thoſe only to be Turks which liue in NATOLIA, all of them either marchants, or of baſe and mechanicall crafts, or poore labourers with the ſpade and pickaxe, and ſuch like people vnfit for the warres; the reſt (as I ſay) holding it for a title of honour to be deſcended of Chriſtian parents. Yea the Grand Signior himſelfe, although by the fathers ſide he be come of progenitors ſuch as were naturall Turks borne, yet many of them had Chriſtian mothers, which they accounted in the greateſt part of their nobilitie and honour. Thus by the wiſedome of Amurath was the order of the Ianizaries, and other ſouldiers of the court greatly aduanced, though not by him begun, and the politicke ſtate of the Turks kingdome (to ſay the D truth) quite altered; the naturall Turks (more than the Sultan himſelfe) now bearing therein no ſway: but only theſe new ſouldiers, all of them deſcended from Chriſtian parents, and by adoption as it were become the ſonnes of the Turkiſh Sultans, and vnder them commanding all: by whom they haue euer ſince managed their eſtate, and by their good ſeruice wonderfully, euen to the aſtoniſhment of the world, increaſed and extended their empire. But of them more ſhall be ſaid hereafter.

A great policie.

This great King was whileſt he liued, of his ſubiects wonderfully beloued, and no leſſe of them after his death lamented. He was more faithfull of his word than any of the Turkiſh kings either before or after him: by nature melancholie and ſad, and accounted rather politicke than valiant, yet was indeed both: a great diſſembler, and painfull in trauell, but wayward and teſtie
E aboue meaſure, which many imputed vnto his great age. He had iſſue ſix ſonnes, Achmetes, Aladin, Mahomet, Haſan (otherwiſe called Chaſan) Vrchan, and Achmetes the younger, of ſome called Calepinus: three of whom died before him; but the two youngeſt were by their vnnaturall brother Mahomet, who ſucceeded him in the Turkiſh kingdome, euen in their infancie, in the beginning of his raigne moſt cruelly murdered.

I that ſo many nations, townes, and kingdomes, haue brought low;
And haue alone diſmaied the world, and fild the earth with woe:
Am now by death (which all deuoures) brought downe from high degree: Yet doth the glorie of my name, ſurmount the ſtarrie skie.
The great King Alexanders fame, the world no better fild: Nor worthie Hannibal, whoſe force ſo many Romans kild.
I vanquiſht the victorious Greekes, and tam'd with mightie hand, The warlike people of EPIRE, and fierce TARTARIA land.
My force in field HVNGARIA felt, my greatneſſe is there knowne:
Which of late time through ITALIE, to their great ruth is blowne.
Th' Aſſyrians felt my heauie hand, ſo did th' Arabians wild:
The Perſian King with all his force,
I driue out of the field.
I purpoſed to win the RHODES, and ITALIE t' vndoe:
If that the fatall deſtinies, had granted leaue thereto.
But woe is me, for griſly death hath brought all this to nought:
And in the twinckling of an eye, is periſht all I thought.
So periſheth the pride of man, his honour, wealth, and power,
His gold, and whatſoeuer elſe, it fadeth as a flower.

THE LIFE OF MAHOMET, SECOND OF THAT NAME, SEVENTH KING AND FIRST EMPEROR OF THE TVRKS, FOR HIS MANY VICTORIES SVRNAMED THE GREAT.

THe report of the death of old Amurath the late King, was in ſhort time blowne thorow moſt part of Chriſtendome, to the great ioy of many: but eſpecially of the Greekes, and other poore Chriſtians which bordered vpon the tyrants kingdome; who were now in hope, together with the change of the Turkiſh King, to make exchange alſo of their bad eſtate and fortune: and the rather, for that it was thought, that his eldeſt ſonne Mahomet, after the death of his father, would haue embraced the Chriſtian religion, being in his childhood inſtructed therein (as was ſuppoſed) by his mother, the daughter of the Prince of SERVIA, a Chriſtian. But vaine was this hope, and the ioy thereof but ſhort, as afterward by proofe appeared. For Mahomet being about the age of one and twentie yeeres, ſucceeding his father in the kingdome in the yeere of our Lord 1450, embraced in ſhew the Mahometane religion, abhorring the Chriſtian, but indeed making no great reckoning either of the one or of the other; but as a meere Atheiſt, deuoid of all religion, and worſhipping no other god but good fortune, derided the ſimplicitie of all ſuch as thought that God had any care or regard of worldly men, or of their actions: which graceleſſe reſolution ſo wrought in him, that he thought all things lawfull that agreed with his luſt, and making conſcience of nothing, kept no league, promiſe, or oath, longer than ſtood with his profit or pleaſure. 1450

Mahomet of no religion.

Now in the Court men ſtood diuerſly affected towards the preſent ſtate: the mightie Baſſaes and others of great authoritie, vnto whom the old Kings gouernment was neuer greeuous, inwardly lamented his death; doubting leſt the fierce nature of the young King ſhould turne to the hurt of ſome of them in particular, and the ſhortening of their authoritie in generall, as indeed it ſhortly after fell out. But the luſtie gallants of the Court wearie of the old King, who in hope of preferment had long wiſhed for the gouernment of the young Prince, were glad to ſee him ſet vpon his fathers ſeat. And the vulgar people (neuer conſtant but in vnconſtancie, and alwaies fawning vpon the preſent) exceedingly reioyced in their young King. The Ianizaries alſo at the ſame time (according to their accuſtomed manner) tooke the ſpoile of the Chriſtians and Iewes that dwelt amongſt them, and eaſily obtained pardon for the ſame: whereupon he was by the ſame Ianizaries and the other ſouldiers of the Court with great triumph ſaluted King. Which approbation of theſe men of warre, is vnto the Turkiſh Kings a greater aſſurance for the poſſeſſion of their kingdome, than to be borne the eldeſt ſonne of the King, as in the proceſſe of this Hiſtorie ſhall appeare: ſo great is the power of theſe maſterfull ſlaues, in promoting to the kingdome whichſoeuer of the Kings ſonnes they moſt fauour, without much regard whether he be the eldeſt or not.

This young tyrant was no ſooner poſſeſſed of his fathers kingdome, but that he forgetting the lawes of nature, was preſently in perſon himſelfe about to haue murthered with his owne hands, hands, his youngeſt brother, then but eighteene moneths old, begotten on the daughter of G Sponderbeius. Which vnnaturall part, Moſes one of his Baſſaes, and a man greatly in his fauour, perceiuing, requeſted him, not to imbrue his owne hands in the bloud of his brother, but rather to commit the execution thereof to ſome other: which thing Mahomet commanded him the author of that counſell forthwith to doe. So Moſes taking the child from the nurſe, ſtrangled it, with pouring water downe the throat thereof. The young Ladie vnderſtanding of the death of her child (as a woman whom furie had made paſt feare) came, and in her rage reuiled the tyrant to his face, ſhamefully vpbraiding him for his inhumane crueltie. When Mahomet to appeaſe her furie, requeſted her to be content, for that it ſtood with the policie of his ſtate: and willed her for her better contentment, to aske whatſoeuer ſhe pleaſed, and ſhe ſhould forthwith haue H

But ſhe deſiring nothing more than in ſome ſort to be reuenged, deſired to haue Moſes (the executioner of her ſonne) deliuered vnto her, bound: which when ſhe had obtained, ſhe preſently ſtrucke him into the breaſt with a knife (crying in vaine vpon his vnthankfull maſter for helpe:) and proceeding in her cruell execution, cut an hole in his right ſide, and by peece-meale cut out his liuer, and caſt it to the dogs to eat. At the ſame time alſo he cauſed another of his brethren, committed by his father to the keeping of Caly Baſſa, and now by him betraied into his hands, to be likewiſe murthered.

Mahomet reformeth the Turkiſh common-weale. Thus beginning his tyrannous raigne with the bloudie execution of them that were in bloud neereſt vnto him, and whom of all others he ought to haue defended, he preſently after began to frame a new forme of a common-weale, by abrogating & altering the old lawes and cuſtomes, I and publiſhing of new, better fitting his owne humour, and more commodious for himſelfe: impoſing alſo new taxes and ſubſidies vpon his ſubiects, neuer before heard of; thereby to increaſe his treaſures, and ſatisfie his auaritious deſire: which amongſt many other his vices ſo much raigned in him, as that he was thought ouer-ſparing vnto himſelfe, as well in his apparell as in his diet. And proceeding farther, he called vnto ſtraight account all the great officers of his kingdome: of whom ſome he put to death, and confiſcated their goods; others he put to great fines, or quite remoued them from their offices. In like manner he dealt alſo with his great Baſſaes, admitting many falſe and ſurmiſed accuſations againſt them: whereby to bring them within his danger, where little mercie was to be looked for. By which meanes he became no leſſe terrible vnto his ſubiects, than he was afterward vnto his enemies; and ſo was of them ex- K ceedingly feared, but more hated. Amongſt other things, he much miſliked in his court the exceſſiue number of faulconers and huntſmen; which was growne ſo great by the immoderate delight which his predeceſſors tooke in the pleaſures of the field, that there were continually maintained of the Kings charge, ſeuen thouſand faulconers, and not many fewer huntſmen, ſaying, that he would not be ſo much a foole, as to maintaine ſuch a multitude of men to attend vpon ſo meere a vanitie. And therefore tooke order, that from thenceforth there ſhould be allowance made for 500 faulconers onely, and 100 huntſmen: the reſt he appointed to ſerue as ſouldiers in his wars. At the ſame time alſo he entered into league with Conſtantinus Palæologus, the Emperour of Constantinople, and the other Princes of Grecia: as alſo with the Deſpot of Servia, his grandfather by the mothers ſide, as ſome will haue it; howbeit, ſome others L write, that the Deſpot his daughter, Amurath his wife, was but his mother in law, whom he vnder the colour of friendſhip ſent backe againe vnto her father after the death of Amurath, ſtill allowing her a princely dowrie. But if ſhe were not his mother (as like enough it is that ſhe was not) much more happie was ſhe, that ſhe neuer groned for ſo graceleſſe a ſonne.

1451 Whileſt Mahomet was thus occupied about his ciuill affaires, Ibrahim King of Caramania, Mahomet goeth againſt the king of Caramania. who long before had maried Amurath his ſiſter, and yet for all that, had (as his anceſtors had before him) alwaies enuied the proſperous ſucceſſe of the Othoman Kings, tooke occaſion in the firſt yeere of Mahomet his raigne, with fire and ſword to inuade his dominions in Asia. Which thing when Mahomet vnderſtood, he diſplaced Iſa his lieutenant in Asia, as a man not ſufficient to manage ſo great wars, and appointed Iſaack Baſſa in his roome, a moſt valiant man M of war, vpon whom not long before he had vpon ſpeciall fauour beſtowed in mariage the faire daughter of Sponderbeius, one of his fathers wiues, of whom we haue before ſpoken. This great Baſſa paſſing ouer into Asia, raiſed a great armie. After whom followed Mahomet in perſon himſelfe with a greater, out of Evrope: and hauing all his forces together, entered with great hoſtilitie into Caramania. But the Caramanian King perceiuing himſelfe vnable to withſtand

A so puissant an enemie, fled into the strength of the great mountaines, and by his embassadours offered vnto Mahomet such reasonable conditions of peace, as that he was content to accept thereof. Which after they had by solemne oath on both parts confirmed, Mahomet returned with his armie to PRVSA: but when he was come thither, the Ianizaries presuming that they might be bold with the young King; putting themselues in order of battell, came and with great insolencie demanded of him a donatiue or largious, as a reward of their good seruice done. With which so great presumption, Mahomet was inwardly chafed: but for so much as they were his best souldiers, and alreadie in armes, he wisely dissembled his anger for the present, hauing a little before had warning thereof by Abedin Bassa, and Turechan-beg, two of his B great captaines, who had got some suspition of the matter: wherefore to content them, he caused ten great bags of aspers to be scattered amongst them, and so pacified the matter. But within few dayes after, he caused Doganes (the Aga or chiefe captaine of the Ianizaries) to be brought before him, and to be shamefully whipt: and so presently discharging him of his office, placed one Mustapha in the same. The like seueritie he vsed against the rest of the vnder-captaines, causing them to be cruelly scourged and beaten like slaues: which in that tyrannicall gouernment is an vsuall punishment, vpon the least displeasure of the King to be inflicted vpon any man, without respect of degree or calling, if he be not a naturall Turke borne. Presently after he sent Isaack his lieutenant against Elias Prince of MENTESIA or CARIA, by whom the poore Prince was driuen out of his countrey: euer since which time it hath remained in subiection to the C Turkish Kings, as part of their kingdome and empire.

Mentesia subdued by the Turks.

When Mahomet had thus ended the Caramanian warre, and was determined with his armie 1452 to returne to HADRIANOPLE, he was aduertised, That the straits of HELLESPONTVS were so strongly possessed by the Christian fleet, that he could not possibly there passe ouer but with most manifest danger: wherefore he tooke his way through that part of BYTHINIA which lieth aboue CONSTANTINOPLE, and came to the castle which the Turks call Acte-Chisar, and the Grecians λευκὸς πύργος, or White castle, standing vpon the narrow strait of BOSPHORVS on ASIA side, and there passed ouer into EVROPE at the same place where his father Amurath had not many yeeres before in like manner found passage. Where when he was safely got ouer with his armie, he by the aduice of his Bassaes encamped fast by the sea side, and there presently be-D gan to build a great strong castle close vnto the straits of BOSPHORVS, neere vnto PROPONTIS on EVROPE side, directly ouer against the other castle in ASIA. For the speedie accomplishment of which worke, he assembled thither all the workmen he could possibly get out of EVROPE and ASIA; apportioning vnto his captaines and souldiers of his armie part of the worke also: by whose industrie and labour, that great building was in shorter time brought to perfection, than was by any man at the first expected. This castle which for the greatnesse thereof is of most writers reputed for a citie, was by the Turks named Genichisar, and of the Grecians Neocastron, or New castle, and also Lamocastron, or castle vpon the straits; and was there by the Turks built, as well for the safetie of their owne passage to and fro, as for to hinder the passage of the Chri-
E stians through those narrow straits, they now possessing the strong forts on both sides: and thereby also to distresse the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, from whence this castle was not aboue fiue miles distant. When Mahomet in the second yeere of his raigne had finished this great castle, with some other small forts about the same, and also repaired the other castle in ASIA ouer against it, he placed therein strong garrisons, and furnished the same with artillerie; in such sort, that no ship could passe through the strait of BOSPHORVS into the great Euxine or blacke sea, but she was in danger to be sunke: whereby the rich trade which the marchants of VENICE, GENVA, and CONSTANTINOPLE, had to CAFFA, and other places lying vpon the Euxine, were almost quite cut off, to the great hinderance of those estates. Now Mahomet by nature ambitious, and withall desirous to doe some such thing as the glorie whereof might farre passe the fame of his predecessors, thought nothing more answerable vnto his high conceits, than to at-F tempt the winning of CONSTANTINOPLE, & the vtter subuersion of the Greeke empire: whereupon his father Amurath, and his great grandfather Baiazet, had before in vaine spent their forces. Besides that, it greeued him to see that goodly citie, the ancient seat of the Christian empire, to be so commodiously situated, as it were in the middest of his kingdome, and not to be at his command. Hereunto the small power of the Greeke Emperour himselfe, and the other Christian Princes at the same time at mortall discord amongst themselues, ministred vnto his greedie desire no small hope of successe, and serued as spurs to pricke him forward vnto so great an enterprise. Wherefore all the Winter he caused great preparation to be made of shipping and other warlike prouision both for sea and land: and gaue out commissions for the leuying of a mightie armie, to be in readinesse against the next Spring. But whither he would imploy the same, no man could certainly tell: some ghessing one thing, and some another, as the manner of men is, when such extraordinarie preparation is at hand. Constantinus the eight of that name, then Emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE, a Prince of a mild and soft spirit, fitter for the Church than for the field, hearing of the great preparation made by the Turkish King; and fearing lest that tempest then growing, should vpon the sudden breake forth vpon himselfe, first made such preparation as his owne small abilitie would extend vnto: and then sent his embassadours vnto other Christian Princes, earnestly crauing their aid and assistance in that his dangerous estate. But that labour was lost, and all his sute vaine: for they being at variance one with another, and hauing more care of priuate reuenge, than how to repulse the common enemie of Christianitie, could not or would not affoord him any helpe at all. Nicholas the fift of that name, then Bishop of ROME, with Alphonsus King of NAPLES, and the state of VENICE, promised to haue sent him thirtie gallies, but none for all that came.

Constantinus the Emperour in vaine craueth aid of the Christian Princes.

There were by chance at CONSTANTINOPLE certaine ships and gallies of VENICE, GENVA, CRETE, and CHIOS, of whom the Emperour made stay: at which time also it chanced, that Ioannes Iustinianus, an aduenturer of GENVA, who had beene scouring those seas, came to CONSTANTINOPLE with two tall ships, and foure hundred souldiers: where he was entertained by the Emperour. And forasmuch as he was a man honourably descended, and supposed to be both of great courage & direction, was by the Emperor appointed Generall of all his forces next vnto himselfe. He also entertained six thousand Greekes: which, with three thousand Venetians, Genowaies, and others, whom he had made stay of, ioyned vnto the citizens, was all the weake strength he had to relie vpon, for the defence of his state and empire.

1453 Vide Leonardi Chiensis Archiepiscopi Mitylen. hist. de captiuitate Constantinopolitana.

Against the beginning of the Spring, the Turkish King had in readinesse a great and puissant armie of three hundred thousand men, of whom, the greatest part were taken out of BVLGARIA, SERVIA, RASCIA, THESSALIA, MACEDONIA, and GRECIA, which as yet were called the Christian countries, and were themselues either indeed Christians, or else such renegates as had not long before forsaken the Christian faith: vnto these also were ioyned diuers other Christians which came out of GERMANIE, BOHEMIA, and HVNGARIE, to serue the Turke in his warres. This hath beene none of the least meanes, whereby the Turkish Kings haue growne so great, and their kingdome so mightily enlarged, by enforcing and alluring Christians to fight against Christians, to the vtter confusion of themselues. Amongst the great multitude of the Europeian Christians, were mingled his effeminate souldiers of ASIA, and his naturall Turks and Ianizaries, which were in number fewest, and yet commanded all the rest.

Mahomet encampeth before Constantinople.

With this great armie, well appointed with all warlike prouision, came Mahomet the Turkish King from HADRIANOPLE: and the ninth day of Aprill, in the yeere 1453, encamped before CONSTANTINOPLE, and with the multitude of his armie filled all the maine land before the citie, from the sea side of BOSPHORVS, vnto the place where the same sea compassing in the citie on two parts, and running farre into the land betwixt CONSTANTINOPLE and PERA, maketh there a goodly hauen betwixt them.

The situation of Constantinople.

This citie of CONSTANTINOPLE (called in ancient time BIZANTIVM) is in forme of a Triangle, situated in EVROPE in the pleasant countrey of THRACIA, vpon a point of the maine land shooting out towards ASIA, called of Plinie and Solinus, the promontorie CHRYSOCERAS; where the sea of PROPONTIS ioyneth vnto that strait of sea which diuideth ASIA from EVROPE, called in ancient time BOSPHORVS THRACIVS; sometime the strait of PONTVS; and the mouth of PONTVS; and of the moderne writers, the strait of CONSTANTINOPLE; and about 200 yeeres past, or more, S. George his arme. This point of the maine, whereon the citie standeth, lieth about two Italian miles more Northward than doth the ancient citie of CALCEDON, on the other side of the strait in ASIA: more than thirtie miles distant from the Euxine or blacke sea, lying from it Northward; and two hundred miles from the strait of HELLESPONTVS or CALLIPOLIS, from thence South. Which noble citie (of all others most fitly seated for the empire of the world, and with great maiestie ouerlooking both EVROPE and ASIA) is by the Cosmographers accounted to stand in the height of 43 degrees, vpon seuen little hils, of Conſtantinople built by Pauſanias, deſtroyed by Seuerus, re-edified by Conſtantine the Great, and now taken by Mahomet the Turke.

A no great and eaſie aſcent: and was there firſt built by Pauſanias the Lacedemonian King, and called BIZANTIVM, and ſo many yeeres flouriſhed as a populous and rich citie, vntill the ciuill wars betwixt Seuerus the Emperour, and Niger: what time it endured the ſiege of the Romanes vnder Seuerus, three yeeres, with ſuch obſtinacie, that it yeelded not vntill it was brought to ſuch extremitie, that the citizens did eat one another; and then yeelding, had the wals ouerthrowne by Seuerus, and the citie it ſelfe deſtroyed, and brought to the low eſtate of a poore countrey village, and ſo by him giuen to the Perinthyans. In which baſe eſtate in continued vntill the time of Conſtantine the Great, the ſonne of Helena (whom ſome will needs haue to haue beene an Engliſh woman) by whom it was new built, and beautified with buildings ſo ſtately
B and ſumptuous, that vnto the ſtrange beholders it ſeemed a dwelling place for heauenly wights rather than for earthly men. And to grace it the more, tranſlated his imperiall ſeat thither, and called it NOVA ROMA, or NEVV ROME; and all that pleaſant part of THRACIA alongſt the ſea coaſt of HELLESPONTVS, PROPONTIS, and BOSPHORVS, by the name of ROMANIA, of the faire Romane colonies there by him planted, which name it at this day retaineth, and is of the Turks called RVMILIA and RVM-ILI, that is to ſay, the Romane countrey. But as for the citie it ſelfe, the glorious name of the founder ſo preuailed, that the citie was and yet is of him called CONSTANTINOPLE, or Conſtantine his citie: and now of the barbarous Turks commonly, but corruptly, STAMBOLI. It is (as we ſaid) built in the forme of a Triangle, whereof the longeſt ſide which runneth from Northeaſt to Southweſt, is on the South ſide waſhed with the PRO-
C PONTIS; and towards the ending of the point, which is about the ſeuen towers, is ſomewhat indented; being commonly reputed to be eight miles long. The other ſide lieth Eaſt and Weſt fiue miles in length, being waſhed with the hauen, which is ſomewhat more than eight miles long before it meet with the freſh water, and about a quarter of a mile broad: on the farther ſide whereof ſtandeth the citie of PERA, commonly called GALATA, ſometimes a colonie of the Genowaies. This hauen is very deepe, & by that reaſon as commodious as deepe, bearing ſhips full fraught cloſe to the ſhoare, ſo that they may diſcharge their burthens with the leaſt trouble that may be, and is of Strabo called CORNV BIZANTII, or the horne of BIZANTIVM. The third ſide of this citie towards the Continent, lieth almoſt North and South fiue miles alſo in length: thoſe two ſides that lie vpon the ſea, and the hauen, are enuironed and girt in with a ſingle wall, D built after the antique maner, with many high towers, which ſtrongly defend & flanke the ſame. Without which wals (eſpecially towards the hauen) there lieth a ſtreet betweene them and the ſhore. But the other ſide, which is the third, & regardeth the maine land (beſide the ditch, which is alſo fenced) is defended with three wals: the firſt wall ſtanding vpon the ditch being but low; and the ſecond not far diſtant from the firſt, raiſed ſomewhat higher; but the third ouerlooketh and commandeth both the other; from whence as from an high fortreſſe both the other wals & all the ditch without may eaſily be defended. But the two vtter wals, with the whole ſpace betwixt them, are now by the Turks but ſlenderly maintained, lying full of earth & other rubbiſh, euen as they were in the time of the Grecians: ſome cauſe why they with leſſe heart and courage defended the ſame againſt their barbarous enemies. In the Eaſt part of the citie, on that point
E which in the raigne of the Grecians was called the cape of S. Demetrio, diſtant from ASIA not much more than halfe a mile, ſtandeth the Seraglio or Palace of the great Turke, containing in it ſelfe a great part of an hill, encloſed round with a wall, as if it were it ſelfe a citie, in circuit more than two miles: wherein amongſt other ſtately buildings, neere vnto the ſea ſtandeth a very faire and ſumptuous gallerie, built for pleaſure, with a priuie gate well fortified and planted with great ordinance, and other munition, whereby the great Turke at certaine times paſſeth, when he is diſpoſed in his gallie to take his pleaſure vpon the ſea, or to paſſe ouer the ſtrait vnto his houſes or gardens of delight, on the other ſide in ASIA. In this great citie are alſo many other moſt ſtately and ſumptuous buildings, as well of late erected by the Turkiſh Sultans, ſince they became Lords thereof, as before by the Greeke Emperours: amongſt all which, the F Temple of S. Sophia ſtanding on the Eaſt ſide of the citie, not farre from the Seraglio (now reduced vnto the forme of a Mahometan Moſchie, and whither the great Turke goeth oftentimes to heare ſeruice, being indeed but the ſanctuarie or chancell only of the great, ſtately, and wonderfull Church built by Iuſtinian the Emperor) is moſt beautifull and admirable. That which ſtandeth of it now, is both round and very high, built after the faſhion of the Pantheon in ROME, but much greater, fairer, and not open in the top as is that: the wals thereof being of the fineſt marble, and the floore all paued with faire marble alſo. In the middeſt there is a very great and large circle, compaſſed in with high and huge pillars of moſt excellent marble of diuers ſorts; and theſe ſupport a mightie vault that beareth vp as many moe pillars aboue, ſtanding after the very ſame order, and in a downe-right line, almoſt of the like greatneſſe and goodneſſe of the marble with the other below: vpon which, aboue the ſecond vault in manner of a loouar, reſteth the great round roofe which couereth all that ſpace of the church which is compaſſed with the aforeſaid pillars: being all enameled and fillited, with the pictures of Saints, after the ancient manner of ſome great churches in Chriſtendome: but that the Turks, who like not to haue any pictures in their churches, haue put out their eyes onely, as loth to ſpoile ſuch a rare peece of worke, and vtterly to deface it. In like manner the wals of the vpper vault are wrought, painted, or portraied after the ſame order, though in ſome part decaied, by reaſon of their long continuance and ſtanding. About this church are eighteene or twentie doores of braſſe, right faire and coſtly, well declaring the magnificence and greatneſſe thereof in more ancient times: when as it had (as is reported) more than two hundred doores of like making and greatneſſe; and beſide the hugeneſſe of the frame & building it ſelfe, had alſo diuers faire monaſteries and houſes of religion ioyned vnto it: whereunto belonged ſix thouſand Prieſts, whoſe houſes and lodgings extended almoſt all ouer the place where now the Turke his palace ſtandeth, and the other places adioyning to this great church, which is now their chiefe Moſchie, and called by them by the proper name of S. Sophia, becauſe they hold euen as we doe, the wiſdome of God to be incomprehenſible & infinite. The next in magnificence vnto this, is the Moſchie of Solyman, wherein he lieth buried, with his welbeloued wife the faire Roxolana: a worke well beſeeming the maieſtie of ſo mightie a Monarch. There are beſide theſe alſo many other faire Moſchies, Seraglioes for the Turke his wiues & concubines, Bezeſtanes or Burſes for marchants, Obeliskes, Bathes, and other publicke edifices and buildings of great maieſtie and ſtate, all well worth the beholding: wherein conſiſteth all the beautie of this ſo ancient and renowned a citie; farre vnlike to that it was in the time of the firſt Greeke Emperours, and before it was ſpoiled by the Latines. For the Turks priuate houſes in this ſo great and imperiall a citie, ſo much renowmed through the world, are for the moſt part low and baſe, after the Turkiſh faſhion, built ſome of wood, ſome of ſtone, and ſome of vnburnt bricke, laid with clay and dirt, which quickly decaieth againe: they after their homely manner (by long cuſtome receiued) neuer building any thing ſumptuouſly for their owne priuate vſe, but contenting themſelues with their ſimple cottages, how meane ſoeuer, commonly ſaying them to be good enough for the ſhort time of their pilgrimage: and yet not ſparing for any coſt vpon the publicke buildings and ornaments of the common-wealth, which they build with great maieſtie & pompe; but eſpecially their Moſchies, wherein they excell. Neuertheleſſe, there yet are in CONSTANTINOPLE ſome other houſes alſo built high and comely enough; but theſe be few, and very old, all inhabited by the Chriſtians and Iewes, and not by the Turks. But of this enough. And ſo againe to our purpoſe.

The frugalitie of the Turks in their priuate buildings.

The Turks fleet. Mahomet with his puiſſant armie thus encamped before the citie, placing his Aſian ſouldiers on the right hand, toward the BOSPHORVS; his European ſouldiers on the left hand, toward the hauen; lay himſelfe with 15000 Ianizaries and other ſouldiers of the court, in the middle betwixt both, againſt the heart of the citie. On the farther ſide of the hauen alſo by PERA, he placed Zoganus, one of his chiefe counſellors, with another part of his armie. At which time alſo Pantologes his Admirall came to the ſiege, with a fleet of thirtie gallies, and 200 other ſmall ſhips, and a number of other leſſer veſſels, which were rowed with three, or fiue oares a peece, full of Turkiſh archers, fitter for ſhew than ſeruice. But for defence of the hauen, and ſo of the citie on that ſide, the Emperour had cauſed the hauen to be ſtrongly chained ouerthwart from the citie to PERA: and within the chaine had orderly placed his ſmall fleet, the greateſt ſtrength whereof was ſeuen great ſhips of GENVA, with three gallies, and two galliots of VENICE, three of CRETE, and a few others of the Iland of CHIOS; all which were there, rather by chance vpon marchants affaires, than that they were prouided for any ſuch ſeruice: yet by this meanes the Turks fleet was ſhut out of the hauen, and ſo the citie put in good ſafetie on that ſide.

When Mahomet had thus conueniently encamped his armie, and ſurrounded the citie both by ſea and land: he firſt caſt vp great trenches as neere as he poſſibly could vnto the wals of the citie, and raiſed mounts in diuers places as high as the wals themſelues, from whence the Turks with their ſhot greatly annoied the defendants. After that, he placed his batterie againſt one of the

A the gates of the citie called CALEGARIA, and terribly battered the ſame, eſpecially with one peece of ordinance of a wonderfull greatneſſe, which with much difficultie was brought from HADRIANOPLE with an hundred and fiftie yoke of oxen, and caried a bullet of an hundred pound waight, made (as his other ſhot was) of a kind of hard blacke ſtone brought from the Euxine ſea: for as yet (as it ſeemeth) ſo ſoone after the inuention of that fatall engine, the vſe of bullets of metall was vnknowne. There with continuall batterie, he terribly ſhooke the wals, which although they were very ſtrong, yet were they not able to withſtand the furie of ſo great a batterie. The Chriſtians alſo out of the citie diſcharged their great artillerie vpon the Turks, but ſo ſparingly, as if they had beene afraid to ſhake their owne wals, or loth for good huſban-
B drie, to ſpend ſhot and powder, which was vnto the canoniers very ſparingly allowed: yet that which was ſpent, was ſo well beſtowed, that the Turks were therewith greeuouſly annoyed. The breach alſo which they had made at the aforeſaid gate, was by the defendants with great and dangerous labour againe repaired with faggots and earth, and ſuch like matter beſt ſeruing for that purpoſe, and ſo made ſtronger than before. In which moſt dangerous worke, they were altogether directed and greatly encouraged by Iuſtinianus the Genoway, the Emperours lieutenant generall for defence of the citie.

Yet for all this diligence of the Chriſtians, Mahomet continued his batterie with no leſſe furie than before: but repoſing greater hope to find a way into the citie, by the ſpade and mattocke, than by batterie; he employed his pyoners, whereof he had great ſtore, to digge a mine: being
C altogether directed by Chriſtians skilfull in that kind of worke, whom he had for that purpoſe entertained. By whoſe cunning direction, with the induſtrious labour of the poore pioners, the mine was brought to ſuch perfection, that part of the wall, with one of the ſtrong towers in the ſame, was quite vndermined, and ſtood ſupported, but with ſuch vntruſtie ſtaies as the pioners had left for the bearing vp thereof vntill ſuch time as it ſhould by the tyrants appointment be blowne vp. This dangerous worke was neither perceiued, neither yet feared by the Conſtantinopolitans, as a thing not poſſible to haue beene done: foraſmuch as Baiazet and Amurath had both with great labour before in vaine attempted the ſame, at ſuch time as they hardly beſieged the citie. But that which thoſe great Kings had with much vaine labour by vn-
D skilfull men made proofe of, Mahomet had now by men of greater deuice, brought to paſſe; although it tooke not ſuch effect as he wiſhed: for one Io. Grandis, a Germane captaine, and a man of great experience, ſuſpecting the matter, had cauſed a countermine to be made, whereby the labour of the Turks was in good time diſcouered, and they with fire and ſword driuen out of the mine, and the ſame ſtrongly filled vp againe, and ſo the citie for that time deliuered of a great feare and danger. Mahomet perceiuing that it auailed him not to continue his batterie againſt that place, which was againe ſo ſtrongly repaired, remoued the ſame, and planted it againſt a tower called BACTATINA, neere vnto the gate called PORTA-ROMANA, or Romane gate. Which tower ſhaken with continuall batterie, at length fell downe, and filled the ditch before the vtter wall, euen with the ground. But this breach was alſo ſpeedily and with great courage made vp againe by the defendants, although the Turks did what they could, with E continuall ſhot, to haue driuen them from the ſame. At which time they alſo erected certaine high towers of timber, couered with raw hides to defend the ſame from fire, out of which they with their ſhot ſlew many of the Chriſtians vpon the wals, and in making good the aforeſaid breach: but Mahomet ſeeing this valiantneſſe of the defendants, openly ſaid, That it was neither the Grecians skill, nor courage, but the Frenchmen that defended the citie: for the Turks commonly call all the Chriſtians of the Weſt by the name of Frankes or Frenchmen.

Conſtantinople vndermined by the Turks.

The cheerefulneſſe and induſtrie of the Chriſtians in defending and repairing the aforeſaid breach, was ſo great, that the Turkiſh King began almoſt to deſpaire of winning the citie; which he could no way aſſault but on one ſide. When as a wicked Chriſtian in his campe, put him againe in good hope, by ſhewing vnto him a deuice how to bring a great part of his fleet ouer
F land into the hauen, and thereby to aſſault that part of the citie by water, which the citizens leaſt feared: by which ingenious deuice, and by the great ſtrength of men, Zoganus Baſſa (to whom that charge was committed) brought ſeuentie of the leſſer ſhips and galliots, with all their ſailes abroad (to the great admiration of all that ſaw them) vp a great hill, and ſo by drie land, out of the BOSPHORVS behind PERA, the ſpace of eight miles, into the hauen of CONSTANTINOPLE, which running in betweene the citie and PERA, runneth into the maine land (as we ſaid) about eight eight miles. The Christian that discouered this deuice vnto the King, is supposed to haue learned it of the Venetians, who not long before had done the like at the lake of BENNACVS. Glad was Mahomet to see so many of his ships and gallies in the hauen, and the Christians with the sight thereof no lesse discouraged. Neuertheless, they attempted to haue burnt those vessels as they were in launching, but the Turks had so commodiously placed certaine peeces of great Ordinance for their defence, that the formost of the gallies of the Christians, approching the Turks fleet, was presently sunke; wherewith the rest dismaied, returned backe from whence they came. Certaine of the Christians of the lost gallie, whom the Turks tooke vp swimming in the hauen, were the next day cruelly slaine in the sight of the Christians: in reuenge whereof, certaine Turks before taken prisoners into CONSTANTINOPLE, were forthwith brought to the top of the wals, and there in the sight of the campe with like crueltie put to death.

A wonderfull bridge made by the Turks ouer the hauen of Constantinople.

Mahomet thus possessed of the hauen, shortly after caused a wonderfull bridge to be made quite ouer the hauen, from Zoganus his campe which lay by PERA, vnto the wals of CONSTANTINOPLE: which bridge was built with timber and plankes, borne vp with small boats and emptie caske, after a most strange manner, and was in length more than halfe a mile: by which bridge his armie came ouer the hauen, to assault the citie on that side also.

A notable fight betweene foure of the Christians ships, and the Turks fleet.

In the meane time, three tall Genoway ships laded with men and munition from the Island of CHIOS, with one of the Emperours laded with corne from SICILIA, came with a faire wind for CONSTANTINOPLE. The Turks great fleet then lying not farre off, within the sight of the campe, set vpon them, and after a great fight, wherein an exceeding number of the Turks were slaine with shot, the gallies boorded the ships: but being much lower, were so farre from doing any good, as that the Turks could not well looke out, but they were from aboue slaine or wounded. Mahomet from the shore beholding the vnequall fight, and slaughter of his men, cried out aloud, swearing and blaspheming God, and in great rage rid into the sea as farre as he durst; and comming backe againe, rent his clothes, faring with himselfe like a mad man. The whole armie of the Turks beholding the same fight at sea, was filled with like indignation also, but could nothing remedie the matter. The great fleet ashamed in the sight of their King to be ouercome of so few ships, did what they might desperatly to enter: but all in vaine, being continually ouerwhelmed with shot and stones from aboue, and valiantly beaten downe by the Christian souldiers. At length wearie of their losse, they were glad with dishonour to fall off againe, and to get them farther off. The report of the losse the Turks sustained in this fight, is almost incredible: some of the Turks fugitiues reported, almost ten thousand Turks to haue there perished: but certaine it is, that such was the losse, as filled the whole armie with indignation and sorrow, many hauing there lost their kinsmen or friends. Three of these ships that had made this fight, arriued in safetie at CONSTANTINOPLE, the other was lost. Mahomet vpon this ouerthrow conceiued such displeasure against Pantogles his Admirall, who in that fight had lost one of his eyes, that he neuertheless thrust him out of his office, confiscated his goods, and was hardly by the great Bassaes intreated to spare his life.

Whilest Mahomet thus lay at the siege of CONSTANTINOPLE, and had thereunto giuen many great attempts, with more losse vnto himselfe than to the defendants, a rumour was raised in his campe, of great aid that was comming out of ITALIE by sea, and out of HVNGARIE by land, for the releese of the besieged. This report (although indeed it was not true) with the due consideration of the danger of the siege, filled the Turks campe with feare: so that the souldiers commonly murmured amongst themselues, saying, That to satisfie the ambitious humour of their young King, they were led to fight against impregnable wals & fortresses, yea against the barres of nature it selfe, without all reason. Whereupon Mahomet entered into consultation with the three great Bassaes his counsellors, Whether it were best for him to continue the siege, or not. When Caly Bassa, sometime his tutor, a man of greatest authoritie amongst the Turks, both for his long experience and high place, and withall secretly fauouring the distressed Emperor, after he had with long & graue discourse declared the difficultie or rather impossibilitie of the wished succesſe in the present warre; and confirmed the same, by producing the examples of Baiazet his great grandfather, and of Amurath his father, who had both in vaine made proofe of their strength against that citie: at length concluded, that in his opinion it were best for him to raise his siege, and to depart before he had sustained any further losse or disgrace. But Zoganus the second Bassa, in great fauour also with Mahomet, and secretly enuying the greatnesse of Caly Bassa, perswaded

A ſwaded the King to proceed in his honorable enterprife: aſſuring him of the good ſucceſſe ther-of, and with all the reaſons he could deuiſe, impugned that which Caly-Baſſa had ſaid. And of the ſame opinion with Zoganus was alſo the third Baſſa, rather of purpoſe to croſſe Caly-Baſſa, and withall to fit the Kings humour, than for any great hope he had in the good ſucceſſe of that he ſo much deſired. Howbeit the ſpeech he and Zoganus deliuered, ſo well agreed with the Kings affection, that he reſolued to continue the ſiege: and thereupon gaue full authoritie to Zoganus to appoint a day for a great and generall aſſault to be giuen, reſoluing at once to gage all his forces vpon the winning of the citie. Which charge Zoganus gladly tooke vpon him, & with his good liking appointed the 29 day of May for that generall aſſault, being then the Tueſday next B following. In the meane time he ſent one Iſmael, the ſonne of Alexander Prince of SINOPE, em-baſſadour vnto the Emperour, to offer him peace: but vpon ſuch hard conditions, as were no leſſe to be refuſed than death it ſelfe. Which thing he did, partly to ſatisfie the minds of his Turks (who are for moſt part of opinion, that God will not proſper them in their aſſaults, except they firſt make vnto their enemies ſome offer of peace, how vnreaſonable ſoeuer it forceth not) and partly to make proofe what confidence the enemie yet had in himſelfe, for the holding out of the ſiege. But that diſhonourable peace ſo offered, together with the intolerable conditions, was by the Emperour honourably refuſed: who no leſſe feared the Turks faith (if he ſhould haue accepted thereof) than he did the hardnes of the conditions. Three daies before this fatall aſſault was to be giuen, the Turks (according to their manner) kept their ſolemne faſt, eating no-C thing all the day vntill night; and then making the greateſt cheare and ioy they could deuiſe, and in the winding vp of the ſame, tooke their leaue one of another, with ſuch kiſſing & embracing, as if they ſhould neuer haue met againe. At the ſame time Mahomet to encourage his ſouldiers, cauſed proclamation to be made thorow his campe, That he would freely giue all the ſpoile of the citie for three dayes vnto his ſouldiers if they could win it: and for confirmation thereof, ſolemnly ſwore the Turks great oath, By the immortall God, and by the foure hundred Prophets, by Mahomet, by his fathers ſoule, by his owne children, and by the ſword wherewith he was girt, faithfully to performe whatſoeuer he had to them in his proclamation promiſed.

Whileſt theſe things were in doing, Caly-Baſſa diſdaining that his counſell was reiected, and the opinion of his aduerſaries followed: by ſecret letters aduertiſed the Emperour of the day D appointed for the generall aſſault, together with all the preparation made againſt him: perſwa-ding him not to be afraid of them, who were themſelues no leſſe afraid of him; but carefully to prouide to haue all things in readineſſe for the defence of his citie, and valiantly to withſtand the raſh and laſt attempt of his enemies.

This wofull Emperour had alreadie done what he could to the vttermoſt of his power for defence of the citie, all the time of the ſiege: but ſuch was the diſloyaltie of the citizens his ſubiects, that many times they could hardly be drawne from their priuate trades and occupations vnto the wals to withſtand the enemie, fooliſhly affirming, That it was to no purpoſe for them to fight againſt the Turks at the breaches, and to ſtarue for food at home in their houſes. The citizens of Conſtantinople without cauſe murmur againſt the Emperour.

For which cauſe, the Emperour commanded a view to be taken of all the corne in the citie
E (which then began to grow very ſcarce;) but vpon diligent ſearch made, ſuch ſtore was found in many mens hands, (which was by them either altogether kept in to ſell afterwards at vnrea-ſonable priſes; or elſe ſo ſparingly vttered, as if they had none to ſpare) as that it appeared, the dearth and ſcarcitie which then began to increaſe, to proceed rather of the couetouſneſſe of men, than of any true want of graine: this ſtore the Emperour cauſed to be proportionably diuided vnto euery familie at reaſonable priſes, according to their ſpending; and ſo eaſed the great murmuring and grudging of the common people for bread. The Grecian mercenarie ſouldiers alſo, regarding more their owne priuate profit than the publique ſeruice, refuſed any longer to goe to the wals, than they were ſure of their daily pay: which the poore Emperour otherwiſe vnable to giue them, was glad to conuert the Church plate and iewels into money, A bare ſhift for money.
F to content them. For he had many times before with teares, in vaine requeſted to haue borrowed money of his couetous ſubiects, to haue beene emploied in defence of the citie; but they would ſtill ſweare, that they had it not, as men growne poore for want of trade: which in few daies after, their enemies found in ſuch abundance, that they wondred at their wealth, and derided their follie, that poſſeſſing ſo much, they would beſtow ſo little in defence of themſelues and their countrey. But this had beene their vſuall manner of dealing with their Emperours, in

in that declining ſtate of the empire: as well appeared in the time of the Emperour Baldwin, G who for lacke of money was glad firſt to ſell away many of the goodly ornaments of the citie, and afterwards to pawne his owne ſonne vnto the Venetian marchants, for money to maintaine his ſtate, as is in the former part of this Hiſtorie declared.

But to returne againe to the courſe of our Hiſtorie. The Emperour certainly aduertiſed of the enemies purpoſe, for the generall aſſault ſhortly to be giuen, firſt commended the defence of himſelfe and the citie vnto the protection of the almightie, by generall faſting and praier: and afterwards appointed euery captaine and commander, to ſome certaine place of the wall for defence thereof: which was done by the direction of Io. Iuſtinianus his Generall, in whoſe valour the Conſtantinopolitans had repoſed their greateſt hope. H

But the citie being on euery ſide now beſet with the Turks great armie, and the defendants in number but few, for ſo great a citie (in compaſſe eight miles) the wals could not but ſlenderly in many places be manned, and eſpecially on both ſides toward the ſea, where indeed leaſt danger was. The greateſt ſtrength and beſt ſouldiers, were placed for defence of the vtter wall, where the breach was, and the aſſault expected by land. Iuſtinianus the Generall himſelfe, with three hundred Genowayes well armed, and certaine choſen Greeks vndertooke the defence of that part of the battered wall, neere vnto the Romane gate, where the fall of the tower BACTA-TINA had filled the ditch, as is aforeſaid: againſt which place Mahomet himſelfe lay encamped, with his Ianizaries and beſt men of warre. Neere vnto Iuſtinianus lay the Emperor himſelf, for defence of another part of the wall: and ſo other captaines orderly with their companies, all I alongſt the vtter wall. And becauſe the defendants ſhould haue no hope to ſaue their liues, more than their owne valour, the Emperor cauſed all the gates of the inner wal to be faſt ſhut vp. And in this ſort they lay all the night, expecting continually when the aſſault ſhould bee giuen: all which time they might heare great hurly burly and noiſe in the Turks campe, as they were putting things in readineſſe for the aſſault.

Conſtantinople aſſaulted by the Turks.

A little before day, the Turks approached the wals, and begun the aſſault, where ſhot and ſtones were deliuered vpon them from the wals as thicke as haile; whereof little fell in vaine, by reaſon of the multitude of the Turks, who preſſing faſt vnto the wals, could not ſee in the darke how to defend themſelues, but were without number wounded or ſlaine: but theſe were of the common and worſt ſouldiers, of whom the Turkiſh King made no more reckoning than K to abate the firſt force of the defendants. Vpon the firſt appearance of the day, Mahomet gaue the ſigne appointed for the generall aſſault, whereupon the citie was in a moment and at one inſtant on euery ſide moſt turiouſly aſſaulted by the Turks: for Mahomet, the more to diſtreſſe the defendants, and the better to ſee the forwardneſſe of the ſouldiers, had before appointed which part of the citie euery colonell with his regiment ſhould aſſaile. Which they valiantly performed, deliuering their arrowes and ſhot vpon the defendants, ſo thicke, that the light of the day was therewith darkened: others in the meane time couragiouſly mounting the ſcaling ladders, and comming euen to handie ſtroakes with the defendants vpon the wall; where the formoſt were for moſt part violently borne forward by them which followed after. On the other ſide, the Chriſtians with no leſſe courage withſtood the Turkiſh furie, beating them L downe againe with great ſtones and waightie peeces of timber, and ſo ouerwhelmed them with ſhot, darts, and arrowes, and other hurtfull and deadly deuices from aboue; that the Turks diſmaied with the terrour thereof, were readie to retire.

Mahomet renueth the aſſault.

Mahomet ſeeing the great ſlaughter and diſcomfiture of his men, ſent in freſh ſupplies of his Ianizaries and beſt men of warre, whom he had for that purpoſe reſerued as his laſt hope and refuge: by whoſe comming on, his fainting ſouldiers were againe encouraged, and the terrible aſſault begun afreſh. At which time, the barbarous King ceaſed not to vſe all poſſible meanes to maintaine the aſſault: by name calling vpon this and that captaine, promiſing vnto ſome whom he ſaw forward, golden mountaines; and vnto others in whom he ſaw any ſigne of cowardiſe, threatning moſt terrible death: by which meanes the aſſault became moſt dreadfull, M death there raging in the middeſt of many thouſands. And albeit that the Turks lay dead by heapes vpon the ground, yet other freſh men preſſed on ſtill in their places, ouer their dead bodies, and with diuers euent either ſlew, or were ſlaine by their enemies.

In this ſo terrible a conflict, it chanced Iuſtinianus the Generall to be wounded in the arme:
who loſing much bloud, cowardly withdrew himſelfe from the place of his charge, not leauing any

A any to ſupplie his roome, and ſo got into the citie by the gate called ROMANA, which he had cauſed to be opened in the inner wall: pretending the cauſe of his departure to be for the binding vp of his wound, but being indeed a man now altogether diſcouraged.

The ſouldiers there preſent, diſmaied with the departure of their Generall, and ſore charged by the Ianizaries, forſooke their ſtations, and in haſte fled to the ſame gate whereby Iuſtinianus was entered: with the ſight whereof, the other ſouldiers diſmaied, ran thither by heapes alſo. But whileſt they violently ſtriue, all together to get in at once, they ſo wedged one another in the entrance of the gate, that few of ſo great a multitude got in: in which ſo great a preſſe and confuſion of minds, eight hundred perſons were there by them that followed, trodden vnder foot or B thruſt to death. The Emperour himſelfe, for ſafegard of his life flying with the reſt, in that preſſe as a man not regarded, miſerably ended his dayes, together with the Greeke empire. His dead bodie was ſhortly after found by the Turks amongſt the ſlaine, and knowne by his rich apparell; whoſe head being cut off, was forthwith preſented to the Turkiſh tyrant: by whoſe commandement it was afterward thruſt vpon the point of a launce, and in great deriſion carried about as a trophee of his victorie, firſt in the campe, and afterwards vp and downe the citie.

The Chriſtians forſake the wals.

The Turks encouraged with the flight of the Chriſtians, preſently aduanced their enſignes vpon the top of the vttermoſt wall, crying victorie; and by the breach entered as if it had beene a great floud, which hauing once found a breach in the banke, ouerfloweth, and beareth downe all before it: ſo the Turks when they had won the vtter wall, entered the citie by the ſame gate
C that was opened for Iuſtinianus, and by a breach which they had before made with their great artillerie; and without mercie cutting in peeces all that came in their way, without further reſiſtance became Lords of that moſt famous and imperiall citie. Some few there were of the Chriſtians, who preferring death before the Turkiſh ſlauerie, with their ſwords in their hands, ſold their liues deare vnto their enemies: amongſt whom, the two brethren Paulus and Troilus Bochiardi Italians, with Theophilus Palæologus a Greeke, and Ioannes Stiauus a Dalmatian, for their great valour and courage, deſerue to be had in eternall remembrance: who after they had like lions made ſlaughter of their enemies, died in the midſt of them, embrued with their bloud, rather oppreſſed by multitude, than by true valour ouercome. In this furie of the Barbarians, periſhed many thouſands of men, women, and chi dren, without reſpect of age, ſex, or condition.
D Many for ſafegard of their liues, fled into the Temple of SOPHIA; where they were all without pitie ſlaine, except ſome few reſerued by the barbarous victors, to purpoſes more grieuous than death it ſelfe. The rich and beautifull ornaments and iewels of that moſt ſumptuous and magnificent Church (the ſtately building of Iuſtinianus the Emperour) were in the turning of a hand, pluckt downe and carried away by the Turks: and the Church it ſelfe built for God to be honoured in, for the preſent conuerted into a ſtable for their horſes, or a place for the execution of their abhominable and vnſpeakable filthineſſe: the Image of the crucifix was alſo by them taken downe, and a Turks cap put vpon the head thereof, and ſo ſet vp and ſhot at with their arrowes; and afterwards in great deriſion carried about in their campe, as it had beene in proceſſion, with drums playing before it, railing, and ſpitting at it, and calling it the God of the E Chriſtians. Which I note not ſo much done in contempt of the Image, as in the deſpight of Chriſt and the Chriſtian religion.

Conſtantinople won by the Turks.

But whileſt ſome were thus ſpoiling of the Churches, others were as buſie in ranſacking of priuate houſes, where the miſerable Chriſtians were enforced to endure in their perſons whatſoeuer pleaſed the inſolent victors: vnto whom all things were now lawfull that ſtood with their luſt, euery common ſouldier hauing power of life and death, at his pleaſure to ſpare or ſpill. At which time riches were no better than pouertie; and beautie worſe than deformitie. What tongue were able to expreſſe the miſerie of that time? or the proud inſolencie of thoſe barbarous conquerours? where of ſo many thouſands, euery man with greedineſſe fitted his owne vnreaſonable deſire: all which the poore Chriſtians were enforced to endure. But to F ſpeake of the hidden treaſure, money, plate, iewels, and other riches there found, paſſeth credit; the Turks themſelues wondred thereat, and were therewith ſo enriched, that it is a prouerbe amongſt them at this day, if any of them grow ſuddenly rich, to ſay, He hath beene at the ſacking of CONSTANTINOPLE: whereof if ſome reaſonable part had in time beene beſtowed vpon defence of the citie, the Turkiſh King had not ſo eaſily taken both it and the citie. But euery man was carefull how to increaſe his owne priuate wealth, few or none regarding the publicke ſtate;

ſtate; vntill in fine, euery man with his priuate abundance was wrapped vp together with his needie neighbour in the ſelfe-ſame common miſerie. Yea the ſecuritie of the Conſtantinopolitans was ſuch, that being alwaies enuironed with their mortall enemies, yet had they no care of fortifying of ſo much as the inner wall of the citie (which for beautie and ſtrength was comparable with the wals of any citie in the world, if it had beene kept well repaired) but ſuffered the officers which had the charge to ſee to the fortifying of the citie, to conuert the greateſt part of the money into their owne purſes: as appeared by Manuel Giagerus, a little before a very poore man; and likewiſe by Neophitus, who then hauing that office to ſee vnto the fortification of the citie, had in ſhort time gathered together ſeuentie thouſand florens, which became all a worthie prey vnto the greedie Turks. G

After that the barbarous common ſouldier had thus by the ſpace of three daies without controlment taken his pleaſure in the citie (as Mahomet had before promiſed) and throughly ranſackt euery corner thereof: they then returned into the campe, with their rich ſpoiles, driuing the poore Chriſtian captiues before them, as if they had beene droues of cattell, or flocks of ſheepe: a ſpectacle no leſſe lamentable, than was the ſacking of the citie. It would haue grieued any ſtonie heart to haue ſeene the noble gentlewomen and great Ladies, with their beautifull children, and many other faire perſonages, who lately flowed in all worldly wealth and pleaſure, to be now become the poore and miſerable bondſlaues of moſt baſe and contemptible raſcals; who were ſo farre from ſhewing them any pitie, as that they delighted in nothing more than to heape more and more miſerie vpon them, making no more reckoning of them than of dogs. There might the parents ſee the wofull miſerie of their beloued children, and the children of the parents, the huſband might ſee the ſhamefull abuſe of his wife, and the wife of her huſband, and generally one friend of another: and yet not able to mourne together (the leaſt part of heauie comfort) being in the thraldome of diuers cruell maſters, by whom they were kept in ſunder, like in few dayes to be diſperſed into diuers farre countries, without hope that they ſhould euer find releaſe, or one ſee another againe. H I

The ſouldiers being all retired into the campe, Mahomet as a proud conquerour, with great triumph entered into the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, then deſolate and void of all Chriſtian inhabitants; and there after the manner of the Turkiſh Kings, made a ſumptuous & royall feaſt vnto his Baſſaes and other great captaines: where after he had ſurcharged himſelfe with exceſſe of meat and drinke, he cauſed diuers of the chiefe Chriſtian captiues, both men and women (of whom many were of the late Emperours line and race) to be in his preſence put to death, as he with his Turks ſate banquetting: deeming his feaſt much more ſtately by ſuch effuſion of Chriſtian bloud. Which manner of exceeding crueltie he daily vſed, vntill ſuch time as he had deſtroied all the Grecian nobilitie that was in his power, with the chiefe of the late Conſtantinopolitan citizens. At which time alſo diuers of the Venetian Senators, with Baiulus their Gouernour, and many rich marchants of GENVA and other places of ITALIE, were in like manner murthered: ſo that of ſeuen and fortie Senators of VENICE which were there taken (whereof moſt part came thither by chance, bound for other places, but there vnluckily ſhut vp) ſome few found the fauour, with exceeding great ranſomes to redeeme themſelues. K L

Amongſt theſe noblemen thus lamentably executed, was one Lucas Leontares, or Notaras, commonly called Kyr-Lucas, or lord Lucas, but of late great chancellor of CONSTANTINOPLE, a man of greateſt account next vnto the Emperour himſelfe: whom the Turkiſh tyrant ſeemed greatly to blame, that he being a man in ſo great credit with the late Emperour, perſwaded him not in time to haue ſought for peace vpon any condition, or elſe to haue yeelded vp the citie, rather than to haue run that extreame courſe of wilfull miſerie. He to excuſe the matter, ſaid, That the late Emperour his maſter was encouraged to hold out the ſiege, by the Venetians & citizens of PERA, from whom he receiued ſecret aid: as alſo by ſome of the greateſt men about his owne perſon: for proofe whereof, he drew out of his boſome the letters which Caly-Baſſa had to that purpoſe written vnto the Emperour, and deliuered them to Mahomet, hoping thereby to haue found ſome fauour. But when he had ſaid what he could, the eldeſt of his ſons then liuing (for he had loſt two elder in the time of the ſiege) was cruelly executed before his face, & the youngeſt reſerued for the tyrants luſt: and after all this miſerie, had his owne head ſtrucke off with the reſt appointed for that dayes ſacrifice. Out of this generall calamitie eſcaped Io. Iuſtinianus the Generall, who with all ſpeed fled at firſt to PERA, and from thence to CHIOS, where in few daies M after

A after he died, of griefe of mind (as was thought) rather than of his wound, being happie if he had honourably before ended his dayes vpon the wals of CONSTANTINOPLE. Iſidorus alſo the Cardinall & Legat from the Pope, diſguiſed in ſimple apparell, and being of the Turks vnknowne, redeemed himſelfe for a ſmall ranſome, as if he had beene a man of no account, and ſo eſcaped: whom if Mahomet had knowne, he had vndoubtedly beene made ſhorter by the head.

The glorie of this famous citie of CONSTANTINOPLE continued many hundred yeeres, commanding a great part of the world, vntill that by ciuill diſcord and priuate gaine, it was by little and little ſo weakened, that the Emperours of latter times, for the maintenance of their eſtate, were glad to relie ſometime vpon one, and ſometime vpon another, yet ſtill holding the
B title and ſtate of an empire, by the ſpace of 1121 yeeres, when as (God his iudgement ſet apart, wonderfull and ſhamefull it is to conſider how) it was by this Turkiſh King Mahomet ſo quickly taken, and the Chriſtian empire of the Eaſt there vtterly ouerthrowne: which happened in the nine and twentieth day of May, in the yeere of our Lord 1453. Conſtantinus Paleologus, the ſonne of Helena, and laſt Chriſtian Emperour, being then ſlaine, when he had raigned about eight yeeres. Since which time it hath continued the imperiall ſeat of the Turkiſh Emperours, and ſo remaineth at this day.

Pera yeelded to the Turke.

The poteſtats and citizens of PERA, otherwiſe called GALATA, a citie ſtanding oppoſite
C againſt CONSTANTINOPLE, on the other ſide of the hauen, and then vnder the gouernment of the Genowayes, doubting to run the ſame courſe of miſerie with their neighbours, ſent their Orators vnto Mahomet (the ſame day that CONSTANTINOPLE was taken) offering to him the keyes of their gates, and ſo to become his ſubiects. Of which their offer Mahomet accepted, and ſent Zoganus with his regiment to take poſſeſſion of the citie. Who comming thither, according to Mahomet his commandement, there eſtabliſhed the Turkiſh gouernment, confiſcated the goods of all ſuch as were fled, and vſed the reſt of the citizens which ſtaied, with ſuch inſolencie and oppreſſion, as that their miſerie was not much leſſe than theirs of CONSTANTINOPLE. And becauſe it was doubted, that the Genowayes might by ſea giue aid vnto the citizens, if they ſhould at any time ſeeke to reuolt, he cauſed all the wals and fortreſſes of the citie which were toward the land, to be caſt downe and laid euen with the ground. Thus is the fatall period of the Greeke empire run, and Mahomet in one day become Lord of the two famous cities of Con-D STANTINOPLE and PERA: the one taken by force, the other by compoſition. At which time the miſerie of PERA was great, but that of CONSTANTINOPLE iuſtly to be accounted amongſt the greateſt calamities that euer happened to any Chriſtian citie in the world.

Mahomet notably diſſembleth his hatred againſt Caly-Baſſa.

Mahomet had of long time borne a ſecret grudge againſt Caly-Baſſa, ſometime his tutor, for that by his meanes Amurath his father, in the dangerous time of the Hungarian warres, had againe reſumed vnto himſelfe the gouernment of the Turkiſh kingdome, which he had before reſigned vnto him, then but young. But foraſmuch as he was the chiefe Baſſa, and had for many yeeres ruled all things at his pleaſure, to the generall good liking of the people, during the raigne of old Amurath, and was thereby growne to be of ſuch wealth, credit, and authoritie, as no man had at any time obtained greater vnder any of the Othoman Kings: Mahomet in the beginning
E of his raigne, before he was well eſtabliſhed in his kingdome, durſt not to take reuenge of that iniurie (as he deemed it) but yet ſtill kept it in remembrance, warily diſſembling his deepe conceiued hatred, as if he had quite forgot it. Neuertheleſſe ſometime (for all his warineſſe) words fell from him, whereby the warie courtiers (which as curiouſly weigh their Princes words, as the cunning goldſmith doth his fineſt gold) eaſily perceiued the ſecret grudge that ſtucke in his ſtomacke againſt the Baſſa: and thereby diuined his fall to be at hand. So it happened one day that as Mahomet was walking in the court, he ſaw a fox of the Baſſaes tied in a chaine, which after he had a while earneſtly looked vpon, he ſuddenly brake into this ſpeech: Alas poore beaſt, haſt thou no money to giue thy maſter to ſet thee at libertie? out of which words, curious heads gathered much matter concerning the Kings diſpoſition towards the Baſſa. This ominous ſur-
F miſing of the courtiers (which oftentimes proueth too true) was not vnknowne vnto the Baſſa himſelfe, but troubled him much: wherefore to get himſelfe out of the way for a ſeaſon, more than for any deuotion, he tooke vpon him to goe in pilgrimage to viſit the temple of the great Prophet (as they tearme him) at MECHA, which amongſt the Turks is holden for a right religious and meritorious worke: hoping, that the young Kings diſpleaſure might in time be mitigated, and his malice aſſwaged. But Mahomet perceiuing the diſtruſt of the Baſſa, and whereof it proceeded, ſeemed to take knowledge thereof, and with good words comforted him G vp, willing him to be of good cheere, and not to miſdoubt any thing; neither to regard the vaine ſpeech of fooliſh people, aſſuring him of his vndoubted fauour: and the more to put him out of all ſuſpition, continually ſent him rich gifts, and heaped vpon him new honours, as if of all others he had eſteemed him moſt. Vntill that now at the taking of CONSTANTINOPLE, it was diſcouered by Lucas Leontares, that he had intelligence with the late Emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE, and his letters produced. For which cauſe, or as the common report went, for the old grudge that the tyrant bare againſt him, as alſo for his great wealth, he was by Mahomets commandement apprehended and caried in bonds to HADRIANOPLE: where after he had with exquiſite torments beene enforced to confeſſe where all his treaſures lay, he was moſt H cruelly in his extreame old age executed. After whoſe death, his friends and ſeruants (which were many, for he was a man greatly beloued in court) in token of their griefe put on mourning apparell: ſo that in the court appeared a great ſhew of common ſorrow; wherewith Mahomet being offended, cauſed proclamation to be made, That all ſuch as did weare ſuch mourning apparell, ſhould the next day appeare before him: at which time there was not one to be ſeene about the court in that heauie attire, for feare of the tyrants diſpleaſure.

Mahomet placeth his imperial ſeat at Conſtantinople, and is worthily accoũted firſt Emperor of the Turks

After that Mahomet was thus become Lord of the imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, as is aforeſaid, and had fully reſolued there to place his imperiall ſeat; he firſt repaired the wals and other buildings ſpoiled in the late ſiege, and by proclamations ſent forth into all parts of his dominions, gaue great priuiledges and immunities to all ſuch as ſhould come to dwell at CONSTANTINOPLE, with free libertie to exerciſe what religion or trade they pleaſed. Whereby in I ſhort time that great and deſolate citie was againe well peopled, with ſuch as out of diuers countries reſorted thither: but eſpecially with the Iewiſh nation, which driuen out of other places, came thither in great numbers, & were of the Turks gladly receiued. So when he had there eſtabliſhed all things according to his hearts deſire, he tooke vpon him the name and title of an Emperour: and is from that time not vnworthily reputed for the firſt Emperour of the Turks.

Now amongſt many faire virgins taken priſoners by the Turks at the winning of CONSTANTINOPLE, was one Irene a Greeke borne, of ſuch incomparable beautie & rare perfection, both of body & mind, as if nature had in her to the admiration of the world, laboured to haue ſhown her greateſt skill; ſo prodigally ſhe had beſtowed vpon her, all the graces that might beautifie or K commend that her ſo curious a worke. This paragon was by him that by chance had taken her, preſented vnto the great Sultan Mahomet himſelfe, as a iewell ſo fit for no mans wearing as his owne: by the beautie and ſecret vertues whereof, he found himſelfe euen vpon the firſt view not a little moued. Neuertheleſſe, hauing as then his head full of troubles, and aboue all things carefull for the aſſuring of the imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, by him but euen then won; he for the preſent committed her to the charge of his Eunuch, and ſent her away, ſo to be in ſafetie kept vntill his better leiſure. But thoſe his troubles ouerblowne, and his new conqueſts well aſſured, he then began forthwith to thinke of the faire Irene: and for his pleaſure ſending for her, tooke in her perfections ſuch delight & contentment, as that in ſhort time he had changed ſtate with her, ſhe being become the miſtreſſe and commander of him ſo great a conqueror; and he in L nothing more delighted, than in doing her the greateſt honour and ſeruice he could. All the day he ſpent with her in diſcourſe, and the night in daliance: all time ſpent in her companie, ſeemed vnto him ſhort; and without her nothing pleaſed: his fierce nature was now by her well tamed, and his wonted care of armes quite neglected: Mars ſlept in Venus lap, and now the ſouldiers might goe play. Yea the very gouernment of his eſtate and empire ſeemed to be of him, in compariſon of her, little or not at all regarded; the care thereof being by him careleſly committed to others, that ſo he might himſelfe wholly attend vpon her, in whom more than in himſelfe, the people ſaid he delighted. Such is the power of diſordered affections, where reaſon ruleth not the reine. But whileſt he thus forgetfull of himſelfe, ſpendeth in pleaſure not ſome few dayes or moneths, but euen a whole yeere or two, to the lightning of his credit, and the great diſcontent- M ment of his ſubiects in generall: the Ianizaries and other ſouldiers of the court (men deſirous of imploiment, & grieued to ſee him ſo giuen ouer vnto his affections, & to make no end thereof) began at firſt in ſecret to murmur thereat, and to ſpeake hardly of him; and at length (after their inſolent manner) ſpared not openly to ſay, That it were well done to depriue him of his gouernment and ſtate, as vnworthie thereof, and to ſet vp one of his ſonnes in his ſtead. Which ſpeeches

A ſpeeches were now growne ſo rife, and the diſcontentment of the men of warre ſo great, that it was not without cauſe by ſome of the great Baſſaes feared, whereunto this their ſo great inſolencie would grow. But who ſhould tell the tyrant thereof; whoſe frowne was in it ſelfe death? or who durſt take in hand to cure that his ſicke mind? which diſtraught with the ſweet, but poiſoned potions of loue, was not like to liſten to any good counſell, were it neuer ſo wiſely giuen: but as a man metamorphoſed, to turne his furie vpon him which ſhould preſume ſo wholeſomely (but contrary to his good liking) to aduiſe him. Vnhappie man, whoſe great eſtate and fierce nature was not without danger to be medled or tempered with, no, not by them who of all others ought in ſo great a perill to haue beene thereof moſt carefull; but were now for feare
B all become ſilent and dumbe. Now amongſt other great men in the Court, was one Muſtapha Baſſa, a man for his good ſeruice (for that he was of a child brought vp with him) of Mahomet greatly fauoured, and by him alſo highly promoted; and he againe by him as his Soueraigne no leſſe honoured than feared: who no leſſe than the reſt, greeued to ſee ſo great a change in the great Sultan, of whom they had conceiued no ſmall hope of greater matters than were by him as yet performed; and moued alſo with the danger threatened vnto him by the diſcontented Ianizaries and men of warre: eſpying him at conuenient leiſure to be ſpoken vnto, and preſuming of the former credit he had with him, aduentured thus to breake with him, and to giue him warning thereof.

C How dangerous a thing it is for a ſubiect or vaſſale, without leaue, preſumptuouſly to enter into the ſecrets of his dread Lord and Soueraigne, the wofull examples of others (moſt mightie Mahomet) haue ſo ſufficiently warned me, as that were it not for the dutifull loyaltie I owe vnto your greatneſſe, farre dearer vnto me than mine owne life, I would not at this time aduenture my ſelfe vnto the hazard of your doubtfull acceptance of my faithfull ſpeech & meaning; but with others keepe ſilence, and in ſecret mourne together with my heauie thoughts: which if I ſhould in ſo great a danger both of your life and empire now doe, without warning you thereof, I were not to be accounted vnworthie only thoſe your great fauours and honours, moſt bountifully on me beſtowed; but as a moſt vile traitor both vnto your ſtate and perſon, to be of all men deteſted and abhorred. The life you haue of late led, euer ſince the taking of Constantinople, as a man careleſſe of his ſtate, and wholly wedded vnto his owne pleaſure, hath giuen occa-
D ſion not vnto the vulgar people only (alwayes readie to ſay the worſt) and ſouldiers of the Court, the guarders of your perſon, but euen vnto the greateſt commanders of your armies and empire, to murmure and grudge, I dare not ſay, to conſpire againſt you. Yet pardon me dread Soueraigne, if I ſhould ſo ſay, for that there is no man which with great diſcontentment marueileth not much to ſee ſo great an alteration in your heroicall diſpoſition and nature: whereby you are become farre vnlike that noble Mahomet, which hauing ouerthrowne the Greeke empire, and taken the great citie of Constantinople, promiſed both vnto himſelfe and others, the conqueſt of Italie, and the ſacking of Rome, the ſtately ſeat of the ancient Romane conquerours. You haue giuen your ſelfe ouer (as they ſay) for a ſpoile and prey vnto a poore ſimple woman, your ſlaue and vaſſale, who with her beautie and allurements hath ſo bewitched your vnderſtanding and reaſon, as that you can attend nothing but her ſeruice, and the ſatisfying of your moſt paſſio-
E nate and inordinate deſires; which how much the more you cheriſh them, ſo much the more they torment and vex you. Enter but a little into your ſelfe (I pray you) and compare the life you now lead with the like time heretofore by you ſpent in treading honours ſteps, and you ſhall find a notable difference betwixt the one and the other. Had the noble Othoman, the firſt raiſer of your houſe and familie, ſo giuen himſelfe ouer vnto pleaſure, you had not now inherited the countries of Bithynia and Galatia, with others moe alongſt the Euxine, by him conquered. Neither had his ſonne Orchanes (the liuely image of his father, and follower of his vertues) by leading this kind of life, triumphed ouer Licaonia, Phrygia, and Caria, or extended the bounds of his empire ſo farre as vnto the ſtraits of Hellespontvs. What ſhould I ſpeake of Amurath his ſonne, and ſucceſſour in the empire? who in perſon himſelfe, firſt of the Othoman Kings, paſſed ouer into Evrope, placed his imperiall ſeat at Ha-
F drianople, conquered Thracia, Bvlgaria, and Rascia. Yea Baiazet your great grandfather is in his misfortune to be more than you commended, as vanquiſhed in field by the mightie Tamerlane with foure hundred thouſand horſemen and ſix hundred thouſand foot, and not by a fillie woman: comforting his miſhap with the honour and greatneſſe of him by whom he was ſo ouercome. Neither may I with ſilence paſſe ouer your worthie grandfather the noble Mahomet, who not contented to haue reſtored the ſhaking empire, conquered alſo a great part of Macedonia, euen to the Ionian ſea, and carying the terror of his armes ouer into Asia, did great matters againſt the Caramanians and G others. As for your father Amurath (of worthie memorie) I cannot but to my great griefe and ſorrow ſpeake of him, who by the ſpace of thirtie yeeres made both the ſea and earth to quake vnder his feet, and with ſtrong hand more than once vanquiſhed the Hungarians, and brought vnder his ſubiection the countries of Phocis, Beotia, Ætolia, with a great part of Morea; and to ſpeake of him truly, brake euen the very heart and ſtrength of the Grecians, and other his fierce enemies. Let all theſe moſt famous conqueſts of your noble progenitors, whoſe worthie praiſes (as eternall trophees of their honour) are diſperſed into euery corner of the world, awake you out of this heaute Lythargie wherein you haue too long ſlept, yea, let the remembrance of the conqueſt of this imperiall citie by you to your immortall glorie won, ſtirre you vp to greater things: and let it neuer be ſaid of you, That you were able with your ſword to ouer-come your greateſt enemies, and not with reaſon to ſubdue your inordinate affections: Thinke that your greateſt conqueſt, and ſuffer not your ſelfe, ſo great a conquerour, to be led in triumph by your ſlaue. What H auaileth it you to haue won Constantinople, and to haue loſt your ſelfe? Shake off theſe golden fetters wherein the wilie Greeke hath ſo faſt bound you: which at the firſt though it ſeeme vnto you hard and painfull, yet ſhall time diſgeſt it, and make you to thinke it both good and neceſſarie for your eſtate.

Weane your ſelfe from your deſires, and giue reſt vnto your trobled thoughts: which if you cannot doe at once, ſtriue by little and little to doe it: pleaſure groweth greater by the ſeldome vſe thereof, and ſatietie bringeth loathſomeneſſe. Moderate your ſelfe therefore, and againe take vp armes. Your ſouldiers if they be not employed abroad, will to your farther trouble ſet themſelues to worke at home: Idleneſſe maketh them inſolent, and want of martiall diſcipline corrupteth their manners. Hereof proceedeth I their intemperate and diſloyall ſpeeches, That if you will not lead them forth for the honour and enlarging of the Othoman empire, as did all your moſt noble progenitors, they will ſet vp another that ſhall, euen one of your owne children. And what the common ſouldier fooliſhly ſaith, their great commanders maliciouſly purpoſe: which what a confuſion it would bring vnto the whole ſtate of your empire, together with the danger of your royall perſon, I abhorre to thinke. Wherefore it is time, it is now high time for you to ſhew your ſelfe, and with the maieſtie of your preſence to repreſſe their tumultuous inſolencie, before it breake farther out. Rebellions are by farre, more eaſily preuented, than in their heat appeaſed. The diſcontented multitude is a wild beaſt with many heads; which once enraged, is not a little to be feared, or without danger to be tamed: yet doe you but ſhew your ſelfe maſter of your owne affections, and you ſhall eaſily maſter them alſo. But what is fit for you to doe, beſeemeth me not for to ſay: yea K pardon me, I beſeech you, that I haue thus much (contrary perhaps to your good liking) alreadie ſaid; prouoked (by what diuine inſpiration I know not) euen halfe againſt my will, to diſcouer vnto you the ſeeret of my heart, and to lay open vnto you thoſe things, which others knowing as well as I, doe yet for feare keepe the ſame from you. And if I haue gone too farre, or in any thing that I haue ſaid, forgot my ſelfe, impute the ſame (my dread Soueraigne) vnto the zeale of my loue and loyaltie towards you, or vnto my fidelitie ſo often by you tried, or to our ancient education (the ground of your affection towards me) or to what elſe ſhall pleaſe you, rather than to my preſumption; from which, how farre I haue alwayes beene, I appeale euen to your maieſties owne knowledge.

Hauing thus ſaid, he fell downe at his feet, as there to receiue the heauie doome of his ſo free L ſpeech, if it ſhould be otherwiſe than well taken of the angrie Sultan: who all this while with great attention and many a ſterne looke had hearkened vnto all that the Baſſa had ſaid: for well he knew it to be all true; and that in ſo ſaying, he had but diſcharged the part of a truſtie and faithfull ſeruant, carefull of his maſters honour. But yet the beautie of the Greeke was ſtill ſo fixed in his heart, and the pleaſure he tooke in her, ſo great, as that to thinke of the leauing of her, bred in him many a troubled thought. He was at warre with himſelfe, as in his often changed countenance well appeared: reaſon calling vpon him, for his honour; and his amorous affections, ſtill ſuggeſting vnto him new delights. Thus toſſed to and fro (as a ſhip with contrarie winds) and withall conſidering the danger threatened to his eſtate if he ſhould longer follow thoſe his pleaſures, ſo much diſpleaſing vnto his men of warre, he reſolued vpon a ſtrange M point, whereby at once to cut off all thoſe his troubled paſſions; and withall, to ſtrike a terrour euen into the ſtouteſt of them that had before condemned him, as vnable to gouerne his owne ſo paſſionate affections. Whereupon with countenance well declaring his inward diſcontentment, he ſaid vnto the Baſſa, yet proſtrate at his feet:

Although thou haſt vnreuerently ſpoken, as a ſlaue preſuming to enter into the greateſt ſecrets of thy

A thy Soueraigne (not without offence to be of thee once thought vpon) and therefore deſerueſt well to die; yet for that thou waſt of a child brought vp together with me, and haſt euer beene vnto me faithfull, I for this time pardon thee: and before to morrow the Sunne goe downe, will make it knowne both to thee, and others of the ſame opinion with thee, whether I be able to bridle mine affections or not. Take order in the meane time that all the Baſſaes, and the chiefe commanders of my men of warre be aſſembled together to morrow, there to know my farther pleaſure: whereof faile you not.

So the Baſſa being departed, he after his wonted manner went in vnto the Greeke, and ſolacing himſelfe all that day and the night following with her, made more of her than euer before: and the more to pleaſe her, dined with her; commanding, that after dinner ſhe ſhould be attired
B with more ſumptuous apparell than euer ſhe had before worne: and for the further gracing of her, to be deckt with many moſt precious iewels of ineſtimable value. Whereunto the poore ſoule gladly obeyed, little thinking that it was her funerall apparell. Now in the meane while, Muſtapha (altogether ignorant of the Sultans mind) had as he was commanded, cauſed all the nobilitie, and commanders of the men of warre, to be aſſembled into the great hall: euery man much maruelling, what ſhould be the Emperors meaning therein, who had not of long ſo publikely ſhewed himſelfe. But being thus together aſſembled, and euery man according as their minds gaue them, talking diuerſly of the matter: behold, the Sultan entred into the palace leading the faire Greeke by the hand; who beſide her incomparable beautie and other the greateſt graces of nature, adorned alſo with all that curioſitie could deuiſe, ſeemed not now to the behol-
C ders a mortall wight, but ſome of the ſtately goddeſſes, whō the Poets in their extacies deſcribe. Thus comming together into the midſt of the hall, & due reuerence vnto them done by all them there preſent; he ſtood ſtill with the faire Lady in his left hand, and ſo furiouſly looking round about him, ſaid vnto them: I vnderſtand of your great diſcontentment, and that you all murmure and grudge, for that I, ouercome with mine affection towards this ſo faire a paragon, cannot withdraw my ſelfe from her preſence: But I would faine know which of you there is ſo temperate, that if he had in his poſſeſſion a thing ſo rare and precious, ſo louely and ſo faire, would not be thrice aduiſed before he would forgoe the ſame? Say what you thinke: in the word of a Prince I giue you free libertie ſo to doe. But they all rapt with an incredible admiration to ſee ſo faire a thing, the like whereof they had neuer before beheld, ſaid all with one conſent, That he had with greater reaſon ſo paſſed the time with D her, than any man had to find fault therewith. Whereunto the barbarous Prince anſwered: Well, but now I will make you to vnderſtand how far you haue beene deceiued in me, and that there is no earthly thing that can ſo much blind my ſenſes, or bereaue me of reaſon, as not to ſee and vnderſtand what beſeemeth my high place and calling: yea I would you ſhould all know, that the honour and conqueſts of the Othoman Kings my noble progenitors, is ſo fixed in my breaſt, with ſuch a deſire in my ſelfe to exceed the ſame, as that nothing but death is able to put it out of my remembrance. And hauing ſo ſaid, preſently with one of his hands catching the faire Greeke by the haire of the head, and drawing his falchion with the other, at one blow ſtrucke off her head, to the great terror of them all. And hauing ſo done, ſaid vnto them: Now by this iudge whether your Emperour is able to bridle his affections or not. And within a while after, meaning to diſcharge the reſt of his choller, cauſed great prepa-
E ration to be made for the conqueſt of Peloponesvs, and the beſieging of Belgrade.

At the ſame time that the barbarous Turks tooke the imperiall citie of Constantinople, Thomas and Demetrius Palæologi, brethren to the late vnfortunate Emperour Conſtantinus, gouerned a great part of Peloponesvs, one of the moſt famous prouinces of Græcia: which in forme of a leafe of a Plane tree, is almoſt in manner of an Iland, enuironed with the ſeas Ionivm and Ægevm, which running farre into the land on either ſide thereof, ſeparateth the ſame from the reſt of Græcia, by two great bayes; leauing but a ſtraight necke of land, called of the Greekes Istmos, in breadth about fiue miles, which was ſometime by the Grecians, and afterward by the Venetians, fortified by a ſtrong wall, and fiue great caſtles: neare vnto which place ſtood the great and famous citie of Corinth. This prouince is in length 175 miles, and almoſt F as much in breadth; wherein are contained the countries of Achaia, Messenia, Lacedemonia, Argolica, and Archadia; with many famous cities and goodly hauens, wherein it farre exceedeth all the other prouinces of Graecia. Theſe two Princes Thomas and Demetrius, diſmaied with their brothers diſaſter fortune, began now ſo farre to deſpaire of their owne eſtate, that vpon the firſt brute thereof, they were about preſently to haue fled by ſea into Italy. And as it commonly falleth out, That one euill happeneth not alone; ſo at the ſame time it fortuned, that the Albanians riſe in armes againſt the ſaid two Princes their Soueraignes: and vnder the G leading of their rebellious captaine Emanuel Cateuzenus, grieuouſly troubled both the poore Princes. Theſe Albanians were a rough and hardie kind of people, which liuing after the manner of the rude Scythian heardſmen, by feeding of cattell, had of long time planted themſelues in PELOPONESVS; differing from the naturall Greekes, both in the manner of their liuing and language: which diuerſitie was no ſmall cauſe that they oftentimes ſpurned, as now, againſt the gouernment of the Grecian Princes. In this extremitie, the two diſtreſſed Princes (not well 1454 knowing which way to turne themſelues) ſought for peace at Mahomets hands, offering to become his tributaries. Of which their offer he willingly accepted, as an induction to the full con-queſt of that countrey; and ſent Turachan gouernour of THESSALIA, one of his greateſt men of H warre, with an armie into PELOPONESVS, to aid thoſe Princes againſt the Albanians: by whoſe induſtrie the maſterfull rebels were in ſhort time diſcomfited, and the countrey of PELOPONE-SVS quieted; yet ſo, that it was now become tributarie to the Turkiſh King.

Theſe two Princes Demetrius and Thomas, the laſt of all the Chriſtian Princes that raigned in PELOPONESVS, hauing thus loſt their libertie, liued for a few yeeres as the Turks vaſſals; paying ſuch yeerely tribute as they had before promiſed. During which time, many diſpleaſures aroſe betwixt the two brothers, being both iealous of their eſtate, and deſirous by all plauſible meanes to win the hearts of their ſubiects one from another: whereby it came ſo to paſſe, that whiles they both deſired to become popular, they weakned their owne credit, and had not their ſubiects at ſuch command as beſt ſtood with the ſafetie of their eſtate. Neuertheleſſe as ſoone as I Thomas & Demetrius rebell againſt Mahomet, and are by him ſpoiled of part of their dominion. they vnderſtood that the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt were making great preparation againſt the Turke; and that Calixtus the third of that name (then the Biſhop of ROME) had alreadie put a fleet of gallies to ſea, which did great ſpoile vpon the borders of the Turks dominions; they vainly perſwading themſelues that the Turks would in ſhort time be againe driuen out of GRECIA, refuſed to pay any more tribute vnto the Turkiſh King, or to keepe league any longer with him. Vpon which occaſion, Mahomet with a puiſſant armie came downe and firſt beſieged CORINTH, and afterwards entring into PELOPONESVS, tooke diuers ſtrong townes, and deſtroied the countrey before him: and forced the two Princes for ſafegard of their liues to flie, the one to MANTINIA, and the other into the ſtrong citie of EPIDAVRVS, now called RAGVSIVM.
The poore Princes deſtitute of ſuch aid as they expected, and altogether vnable to withſtand the K power of the mightie tyrant, began againe to ſue for peace: which he, hauing now ſpoiled their countrey, granted vpon condition, That all ſuch places as he had alreadie taken, ſhould be ſtill his owne; and alſo that the citie of PATRAS with the countrey adioyning, ſhould be deliue-red vnto him; and that for the reſt, the ſaid Princes ſhould pay vnto him a yeerely tribute: which hard conditions the poore Princes, now in danger to loſe all, were glad to accept of: whereupon a peace was for that time againe concluded.

In his returne he tooke the citie of ATHENS in his way, which he not long before had taken from Francus Acciauoll by compoſition (by meanes of Omares the ſonne of Turechan, one of his great captaines) promiſing to giue him the countrey of BEOTIA with the citie of THEBES in lieu thereof. This Francus was nephew to Nerius, ſometime Prince of ATHENS, and had of L long time beene brought vp in the Turks court, as one of Mahomet his minions; and was of him (as was ſuppoſed) entirely beloued. But when he had receiued the dukedome of THEBES, in exchange for his princely ſtate of ATHENS, he was ſhortly after, as if it had beene in great friendſhip ſent by Mahomet to Zoganus, his lieutenant in PELOPONESVS: by whom he was at firſt courteouſly entertained, but afterwards being about to depart, he was (according as Mahomet had before commanded) ſuddenly ſtaied, and when he leaſt feared, cruelly murdered.

About three yeeres after the peace before concluded betwixt Mahomet and the two brethren, Mahomet vnderſtanding that the Chriſtian Kings and Princes had combined themſelues againſt him, with a purpoſe to driue him againe out of GRECIA: thought it now high time, and much Mahomet commeth againe into Peloponeſus. for the aſſurance of his eſtate, to root vp the ſmall reliques of the Grecian empire, which yet re- M mained in PELOPONESVS in the two Princes of the imperiall bloud, Thomas and Demetrius: whereunto he ſaw a faire occaſion preſented. For aſmuch as thoſe two brethren were at that time at great variance betwixt themſelues, neither paid him ſuch tribute as they had before promiſed: hereupon he with a great and ſtrong armie came to CORINTH, where Arſanes a noble man of great authoritie and power in that countrey, whoſe ſiſter Demetrius had maried, came vnto him from

A from the Prince his brother in law, attended vpon with many gallant gentlemen, his followers, of purpoſe to aid him againſt the other Prince Thomas, nothing fearing any harme to haue been by the Turke intended againſt himſelfe or his brother in law Demetrius, whom they both reckoned of as of a friend. But when Mahomet was entered into PELOPONESVS, and come to TEGEA, he cauſed the ſame Aſanes, with all his chiefe followers, to be laid hold vpon, and caſt into bonds: knowing (as it ſhould ſeeme) no man for friend, which might any way hinder his ambitious deſignes.

Demetrius hearing what was happened vnto Aſanes, fled to SPARTA, now called MIZETHRA: whither Mahomet in few dayes after came and laid ſiege to the citie. But the poore Prince conſi- Demetrius ſubmitteth himſelfe to Mahomet.
B dering, that he muſt needs at length fall into his hands, went out of the citie, and humbly ſubmitted himſelfe with all that he had into his power. Which ſo well pleaſed the Turkiſh tyrant, that he courteouſly receiued him, comforted him, and promiſed him inſtead of SPARTA to giue him other lands and poſſeſſions of like value elſewhere: Neuertheleſſe, he committed him to ſafe cuſtodie, and caried him about with him as his priſoner, vntill he had finiſhed thoſe warres. After he had taken SPARTA, he beſieged CASTRIA, where he loſt diuers of his Ianizaries: for which cauſe, when he had taken the citie, he put all the ſouldiers therein to the ſword, and cut the captaines ouerthwart in two peeces. From thence he marched to LEONTARIVM, called in ancient time MEGALOPOLIS, which he tooke; with another citie called CARDICEA, whither they of LEONTARIVM had before conueyed their wiues and children, as to a place of more ſafe-
C tie. There he cruelly put to death all the inhabitants of thoſe cities, men, women, and children, in number about ſix thouſand, of whom he left not one aliue: and yet not ſo ſatisfied, commanded the very beaſts and cattell of thoſe places to be killed. Many cities of PELOPONESVS terrified with the dreadfull example of their neighbours, forthwith yeelded themſelues: and amongſt others SALVARIVM, a great and ſtrong citie of ARCHADIA; where he cauſed all the inhabitants, men, women, and children, to the number of ten thouſand, to be caſt into bonds, looking for nothing but preſent death: all which he commanded afterwards to be ſent captiues to CONSTANTINOPLE, and with them peopled the ſuburbs of that citie. After that, he by the counſell of Demetrius, ſent ~~one of~~ his captaines called Ioſua, with certaine companies of Greeke ſouldiers, vnto the ſtrong citie of EPIDAVRVS, to command them in the name of the Prince, to de-D liuer vnto him the citie, with the Prince his wife and daughter, which lay there. But the gouernour truſting vnto the ſtrength of the citie, refuſed to deliuer the ſame: yet ſuffered the Princeſſe with her daughter to depart out of the citie, being willing to goe to her huſband; whom the captaine hauing receiued, returned, and preſented them to Mahomet. By whoſe commandement they were preſently ſent into BEOTIA, there to attend his returne towards CONSTANTINOPLE, and an Eunuch appointed to take charge of the young Ladie, who had ſo warmed Mahomets affection, that he tooke her afterwards to his wife. At the ſame time he alſo ſubdued the moſt part of ACHAIA and ELIS, by Zoganus Baſſa his lieutenant: whither he came not long after himſelfe, and laid ſiege to the citie of SALMENICA, which for lacke of water was at length yeelded vnto him: but the caſtle was by the ſpace of a whole yeere after valiantly defended againſt the E Turks left to beſiege it, by Thomas the Prince: of whom Mahomet afterwards gaue this commendation, That in the great countrey of PELOPONESVS he had found many ſlaues, but neuer a man but him. This valiant Prince ſeeing the miſerable ruine of his countrey, and the ſtate thereof vtterly forlorne, after he had moſt notably endured a yeeres ſiege in the caſtle of SALMENICA, got to ſea, and ſo arriued in ITALIE: where trauelling to ROME, he was honourably receiued by Pius Secundus, then Biſhop there: who during his life, allowed him a large penſion for the maintenance of his ſtate. Thus Mahomet hauing thruſt both the Grecian Princes out of their dominions, and ſubdued all PELOPONESVS (excepting ſuch ſtrong townes and caſtles, as bordering vpon the ſea coaſt were yet holden by the Venetians) left Zoganus Baſſa his lieutenant to gouerne that new conquered prouince, & with great triumph returned himſelfe towards Con- Peloponeſus ſubdued by the Turks.
F STANTINOPLE, carying away with him Demetrius the Prince, with his wife and daughter, and many other noble priſoners. But after he was come to HADRIANOPLE, and placed in his royall ſeat, he remoued the Eunuch from the faire young Ladie, and tooke charge of her himſelfe. As for Demetrius her father, he gaue to him the citie ÆNVM, with the cuſtome ariſing of the ſalt there made, as a penſion for him to liue vpon. Thus this moſt famous and populous countrey of PELOPONESVS fell into the Turkiſh thraldome, about the yeere of our Lord 1460, ſeuen yeeres after after the taking of CONSTANTINOPLE. Which I haue here together ſet downe, as it is reported by them who liued in that time, and in the ſame countries: omitting of purpoſe other great occurrents of the ſame time (which ſhall alſo in conuenient place be hereafter declared) to the intent that the fall of that great empire, with the common miſerie of the delicate Grecians, might appeare vnder one view; which otherwiſe being deliuered by peece-meale, as it did concurre with other great accidents according to the courſe of time, would but breed confuſion, and require the Readers greater attention. G

The Chriſtian Princes, eſpecially ſuch as bordered vpon the dominions of the Turkiſh tyrant, were no leſſe terrified than troubled with the ſubuerſion of the Conſtantinopolitane empire: for they ſaw by the continuall preparation of the Turke, that his ambitious deſires were rather increaſed, than in any part ſatisfied with his ſo great & late victories. Wherefore they with all carefulnes fortified their frontier townes, & prouided all things neceſſarie for defence of themſelues, H and for the repulſing of ſo mightie an enemie. Amongſt the reſt, George the old Deſpot, or Prince of SERVIA (whoſe dominions of all other lay moſt in danger of that tempeſt) ſpeedily muſtred his men of warre, fortified his ſtrong cities, placed his garriſons, and left nothing vndone, that he thought needfull for the defence of his countrey: for he had many times before to his great loſſe, endured the furie of the Turkiſh Kings, although he were ioyned vnto thē in the bonds of neereſt alliance. And hauing thus politikely ſet all things in order at home, in perſon himſelfe tooke his iourney into HVNGARIE, from thence to procure aid againſt ſuch time as he ſhould haue need. But the Hungarians, and eſpecially Huniades (who at that time bare greateſt ſway in that I kingdome) hauing before had ſufficient trial of the vncertaintie & light faith of that aged Prince, who had ſo often faſhioned himſelf according to the occurrents of the time, that he was accounted neither right Turke, nor good Chriſtian; refuſed to promiſe him any aid, but left him to his owne fortunes: wherewith he returned diſcontented, and full of indignation. But ſhortly after he was come home, he died of an hurt receiued in a skirmiſh with Michael Zilugo, gouernour of BELGRADE: whoſe brother Ladiſlaus he had but a little before trecherouſly murdered, as he was trauelling by wagon to BELGRADE with his ſaid brother Michael, who at the ſame time hardly eſcaped. This was the end of George Deſpot of SERVIA, when he had liued ninetie yeeres: in which time of his long life, he had plentifully taſted of both fortunes. A man aſſuredly of great courage, but of a maruellous vnquiet nature: by profeſſion a Chriſtian, yet a great friend vnto K the Turks, whom he many times ſtood in great ſtead: a deepe diſſembler, and double in all his dealings, whereby he purchaſed vnto himſelfe that credit, that he was not of any his neighbour Princes whileſt he liued, either beloued or truſted; and after his death, of his ſubiects ſo deteſted, that the people of that countrey euen at this day in their countrey ſongs, ſtill tearme him, The faithleſſe & graceleſſe Deſpot. Lazarus his youngeſt ſon, after his death ſucceeded in his place; hauing depriued both his elder brethren Stephen and George) of the gouernment: for Amurath the Turkiſh King had long time before put out their eyes, of purpoſe to make them vnfit for the gouernment of ſo great a countrey: yet theſe blind Princes found meanes to flie away from him to Mahomet, carrying with them a great maſſe of money; and ſo incited him againſt Lazarus their younger brother, that to keepe friendſhip with the tyrant, he was glad to promiſe vnto him L a great yeerely tribute, and ſo to become his tributarie. But within few moneths after, Lazarus died, the laſt Chriſtian Prince that raigned in SERVIA: after whoſe death, great troubles aroſe in SERVIA for the ſoueraignetie: the blind brethren ſtill crauing aid of Mahomet, with whom they then liued; and the deſolate widow of Lazarus, putting her ſelfe with her three ſons, Iohn, Peter, and Martin, into the protection of the Hungarians: by which meanes ſhe with much trouble held her ſtate for a ſeaſon. Vntill ſuch time as that the Seruians, ſeeing ſmall aſſurance in that manner of gouernment, and wearie of the harmes they daily receiued of the Turks; yeelded themſelues with their countrey, vnto the obedience of the Turkiſh Emperour Mahomet, who for euer vnited the ſame vnto his empire as a prouince thereof, and ſo it remaineth at this day.

The death of George, Diſpot of Seruia.

Seruia yeelded to the Turke.

Now was Mahomet by the continuall courſe of his victories, growne to that height of mind, M that he thought no Prince able to abide his force; neither any enterpriſe ſo great, which he was not of power to bring to paſſe: wherefore he ceaſed not on euery ſide continually to vex and trouble the Princes, whoſe countries bordered vpon his. But aboue others, his heart was greateſt againſt the Hungarians: for that by them the Turkiſh Kings his anceſtors, had beene more troubled, & their ſtate more endangered, than by any or all other the Chriſtian Princes. Wherefore

A fore he reſolued now to take them in hand; which thing he had from the beginning of his raigne greatly deſired. And becauſe the citie of BELGRADE ſtanding vpon the great riuer of DANVBIVS, was accounted the key of that countrey, he determined there to begin his wars, and by taking thereof to make an entrance into the heart of HVNGARIE. Hereupon he leuied a great armie of an hundred and fiftie thouſand of his beſt ſouldiers; in whom he repoſed ſuch an aſſured truſt and confidence, that he accounted the citie alreadie as good as taken, and a faire way made into HVNGARIE: ſo readie are we to promiſe vnto our ſelues, the things we earneſtly deſire. For the better accompliſhment of theſe his deſignes, he had prouided in readineſſe a fleet of 200 ſhips and gallies, which he ſent vp the riuer of DANVBIVS from VIDINA to BEL-
B GRADE, to the intent that no reliefe or aid ſhould be brought vnto the citie out of HVNGARIE, by the great riuers of DANVBIVS and SAVVS, whereupon the citie of BELGRADE ſtandeth. With this fleet he kept both thoſe riuers ſo ſtraitly, that nothing could poſſibly be conuaied into the citie by water: and not ſo contented, ſent part of his ſaid fleet farther vp the riuer of DANVBIVS, and ſo landing his ſouldiers in many places, ſpoiled the countrey all alongſt the riuers ſide. Shortly after he came with all his forces by land, & encamped before the citie: whereunto Belgrade beſieged. at his firſt comming he gaue a moſt fierce aſſault, thinking to haue taken them vnprouided: but finding greater reſiſtance than he had before imagined, and that the Hungarians were readie to skirmiſh with thē without the wals, he begun to proceed more warily, & entrenched his armie: and to prouide for the ſafetie thereof, by caſting vp of deepe trenches & ſtrong rampiers, againſt
C the ſudden ſallies of his enemies: and after, planting his batterie, began moſt furiouſly to ſhake the wals with his great artillerie. By the furie whereof, he ouerthrew a part thereof, and laid it flat with the ground: which the defendants with great induſtrie and labour ſpeedily repaired, by caſting vp of new fortifications & rampiers, in ſuch ſort, that it was rather ſtronger than before.

In the meane time Huniades (not to be named without the addition of a moſt worthie captaine) being then Generall for the Hungarians, ſent a fleet of ſhips and gallies, well appointed with all warlike prouiſion, downe the riuer of DANVBIVS from BVDA: which encountring with the Turks fleet, tooke twentie ſaile of them, and ſo diſcomfited the reſt, that they were glad The Turks fleet ouerthrowne by the Chriſtians. to run themſelues on ground neere vnto the Kings campe. All which were by Mahomets commandement preſently ſet on fire, becauſe they ſhould not come into the power of the Hungari-
D ans. By this meanes the Chriſtians became maſters of both the riuers of DANVBIVS and SAVVS; and ſo at their pleaſure, by water conuaied into the citie all things needfull for the defence thereof. Huniades alſo himſelfe, with fiue thouſand valiant ſouldiers, and Io. Capiſtranus a Minorite Frier (by whoſe perſwaſion fortie thouſand voluntarie Chriſtians out of GERMANIE, BOHEMIA, and HVNGARIE, were come to that warre) entred into the citie that way with their ſouldiers and followers.

Mahomet reſolutely ſet downe for the winning of the citie, had with continuall batterie made the ſame at length ſaultable; and ſo determined the next day to giue a generall aſſault, appointing which part of the wall euery Colonell with his regiment ſhould aſſaile. But as they were with great diligence and greater ſtirre, preparing all things needfull for the next dayes ſeruice, it
E fortuned, that Carazies Baſſa, Mahomet his lieutenant generall in EVROPE, and his beſt man of Carazies Baſſa ſlaine. warre, was by chance ſlaine with a great ſhot out of the towne. With whoſe death, Mahomet was exceedingly troubled, as with an ominous token of the euill which afterwards enſued vnto him and his whole armie. For all that, proſecuting his former determination, the next day early in the morning he commanded the aſſault to be giuen: & with the dreadfull ſound of trumpets, Belgrade aſſaulted by the Turks drums, cornets, and other inſtruments of warre, brought on his Ianizaries to the breach; who as couragious ſouldiers fiercely aſſailed the ſame, and without any great reſiſtance, entred both there and in diuers other places of the citie; reckoning the ſame to be now their owne. For Huniades hauing before ſtored euery corner of the citie with his moſt valiant and expert ſouldiers, had taken order that the defendants, vpon the firſt charge of the Ianizaries, ſhould forſake
F their ſtations, and as men diſcouraged, retire towards the citie: of purpoſe to draw the fierce enemies faſter on, to their farther deſtruction; and vpon a ſigne giuen to ſet vpon them on freſh, and to repaire vnto their former places of defence. Which was accordingly done: ſo that as ſoone as the Ianizaries, with other of the Turks moſt forward ſouldiers, were in great numbers entered, vpon the retiring of the defendants, and the ſigne before appointed in the citie giuen, the defendants, as men ſuddenly changed, turning againe, fiercely charged the Turks which were entred,

The Turks notably repulsed.

tred contrary to their expectation: and the valiant Huniades, at the same time issuing out on euery side with his most resolute souldiers, so oppressed the Turks, that few of them that were entred escaped with life, but were there in the citie either slaine or taken prisoners; and the rest with exceeding slaughter beaten from the wals. Presently after, Huniades in this confusion of the Turks, strengthened with the souldiers which came with Capistranus the Frier, made a sallie out of the Towne, and set vpon the Turks appointed for the defence of the great ordinance; which was with such resolution performed, that the Turks were glad with great slaughter to forsake their charge, and to leaue the ordinance to their enemies. G

The Turkish tyrant sore troubled and throughly chafed with the losse of his great ordinance, couragiously charged the Hungarians afresh, to haue recouered the same againe: but was so valiantly repulsed by Huniades, and so beaten with the murthering shot out of the citie, that he was glad when he had got him out of the danger thereof into his trenches. Huniades also retiring, turned the ordinance he had lately won, vpon the Turks campe, and with the same did them no small harme. H

In this hurle, a great part of the Christian armie (which then lay on the other side of DANVBIVS) was speedily transported ouer the riuer; and making no stay in the citie, ioyned themselues with Huniades, then lying without the wals of the citie. Who notably strengthened with this new supplie, assailed the Turks trenches, as if he would euen presently haue entred their campe: at which his presumption, the proud tyrant (neuer before so braued) disdaining, went out of his trenches, and valiantly encountring him, beat him backe againe to the great ordinance; from whence he was againe by the Christians driuen to his trenches. Which manner of doubtfull and dreadfull fight, was on both sides notably maintained, vntill the day was almost spent: victorie with indifferent wings, houering now ouer the one side, now ouer the other. I

Mahomet wounded, and caried away for dead.

In these hot skirmishes and conflicts, Chasanes captaine of the Ianizaries, with many other valiant men were slaine. And Mahomet himselfe performing the part as well of a couragious souldier, as of a worthie chieftaine, was sore wounded vnder his left pappe; so that he was taken vp for dead, and so caried into his pauilion, to the great discomfiture of his whole armie. But comming againe vnto himselfe, and considering that he had in that siege lost his whole fleet, his great ordinance, with most part of his best souldiers, and yet in no possibilitie of the towne: secretly in the night arose with his armie, and with great silence shamefully departed; still looking behind him when the Hungarians should haue pursued him into SERVIA, or haue troubled him vpon his way towards CONSTANTINOPLE. At this siege (beside many of his best captaines and chiefe commanders) were slaine fortie thousand of his best souldiers. The losse that he there sustained was so great, and so stucke in his mind, that euer after during his life, when he had occasion to speake of that siege, he would shake his head and sigh deeply, and many times wish, That he had neuer seene that citie, whereat both he and his father had receiued so great dishonour. Many were of opinion, that if Huniades had there had his horsemen on that side of DANVBIVS to haue presently pursued the fearfull enemie, that the whole armie of the Turks might haue there beene ouerthrowne. This notable victorie was obtained against the Turke the sixt of August in the yeere of our Lord 1456. K L

The death of the most famous captaine Huniades.

Shortly after, this most valiant and renowmed captaine Huniades, worthie of immortall praise, died of a hurt taken in these wars; or as some others write, of the plague, which was then rife in HVNGARIE: who when he felt himselfe in danger of death, desired to receiue the sacrament before his departure, and would in any case (sicke as he was) be caried to the church to receiue the same; saying, That it was not fit, that the Lord should come to the house of his seruant; but the seruant rather to goe to the house of his Lord and master. He was the first Christian captaine that shewed the Turks were to be ouercome; and obtained more great victories against them than any one of the Christian Princes before him. He was vnto that barbarous people a great terror, and with the spoile of them beautified his countrey: and now dying, was by the Hungarians honourably buried at ALBA IVLIA, in S. Stephens church: his death being greatly lamented of all good men of that age. M

Mahomet the Turkish Emperour, no lesse desirous to extend his empire with the glorie of his name, by sea than by land; shortly after the taking of CONSTANTINOPLE, put a great fleet to sea, wherewith he surprised diuers Islands in the ÆGEVM, and hardly besieged the citie of the

RHODES.

A Rhodes. At which time, Calixtus the third, then Biſhop of Rome, aided by the Genowaies (for the grudge they bare againſt the Turks for the taking of Pera) put to ſea a fleet of ſixteene tall ſhips and gallies well appointed, vnder the conduct of Lodouicus, Patriarch of Aquilla; who with that fleet ſcoured the ſeas,& recouered againe from the Turks the Iſland of Lemnos, with diuers other ſmall Iſlands thereabout: and encountering with the Turks fleet neere vnto the Iſland of the Rhodes, at a place called the Burrow of S. Paul, diſcomfited them, ſunke and tooke diuers of their gallies, and forced them to forſake the Rhodes. After which victorie at ſea, he for the ſpace of three yeeres, with his gallies, at his pleaſure ſpoiled the frontiers of the Turks dominions all alongſt the ſea coaſt of the leſſer Asia, and wonderfully terrified the effe-
B minate people of thoſe countries: and ſo at length returned home, carrying away with him many priſoners and much rich ſpoile.

After that Mahomet was thus ſhamefully driuen from the ſiege of Belgrade, and his fleet at ſea diſcomfited (as is before declared) he began with great diligence to make new preparation againſt the next Spring to ſubdue the Iſles of the Ægeum, eſpecially thoſe which lay neere vnto Peloponesvs. But whileſt he was buſie in theſe cogitations, in the meane time embaſſadours from Vſun-Caſſanes the great Perſian King, arriued at Constantinople, with diuers rich preſents ſent to him from the ſaid King. Where among other things, they preſented vnto him a paire of playing tables, wherein the men & dice were of great and rich precious ſtones of ineſtimable worth, and the workmanſhip nothing inferiour to the matter: which the embaſſa-
C dours for oſtentation ſaid, That Vſun-Caſſanes found in the treaſures of the Perſian King, whom he had but a little before ſlaine and bereft of his kingdome, and had there beene left long before by the mightie conquerour Tamerlane. Together with theſe preſents, they deliuered their embaſſage, the effect whereof was, That thoſe two mightie Princes might ioyne and liue together in amitie: and that whereas Dauid the Emperour of Trapezond, had promiſed to pay vnto Mahomet a yeerely tribute, enforced thereunto by George his lieutenant in Asia; he ſhould not now looke for any ſuch thing: foraſmuch as that empire after the death of the Emperour then liuing, ſhould of right belong vnto Vſun-Caſſanes, in right of his wife, who was the daughter of Caloioannes, the elder brother of Dauid the Emperour, then liuing: And further required him, from that time not to trouble or moleſt the ſaid Emperor his friend & neer alliance, ſo ſhould he find D him his faithfull and kind confederat: otherwiſe it was (as they ſaid) in his choice to draw vpon himſelfe the heauie diſpleaſure of a moſt mightie enemie. Mahomet before enuying at the riſing of the Perſian king, and now diſdaining ſuch peremptorie requeſts, little differing from proud commands; in great choller diſmiſſed the Embaſſadors with this ſhort anſwer: That he would ere long be in Asia himſelfe in perſon, to teach Vſun-Caſſanes what to requeſt of a greater than himſelfe. This vnkindneſſe was the beginning & ground of the mortall wars which afterwards enſued between theſe two, then the greateſt Princes of the Eaſt, as ſhal be hereafter more at large declared. The Embaſſadors being departed, and Mahomets fleete of an hundred and fiftie ſaile readie to put to ſea, he altered his former determination for the Iſlands of the Ægeum (which after the loſſe of Constantinople had for the moſt part put themſelues vnder the protection E of the Venetians) and commanded his Admirall with that fleete to take his courſe through the ſtraits of Boſphorus into the great Euxine ſea, (now called the black ſea) and ſo ſayling alongſt the coaſt to come to anker before Sinope, the chiefe citie of Paphlagonia, and there to expect his comming thither with his armie by land. This great citie of Sinope ſtandeth pleaſantly vpon a point of the maine which runneth a great way into the Euxine, ſometime the metropoliticall citie of that prouince: but as then, with Castamona and all the countrey thereabout, was vnder the gouernment of Iſmael, a Mahometane Prince: vpon whom Mahomet had now bent his forces, for no other cauſe than that he was in league with Vſun-Caſſan, the Perſian king. Now with great expedition had Mahomet leuied a ſtrong armie, and paſſing therewith ouer into Asia, was come before he was looked for, to Sinope. Iſmael ſeeing himſelfe ſo ſuddenly beſet both
F by ſea & land in his ſtrongeſt citie, although he wanted nothing needfull for his defence, hauing in the citie foure hundred peeces of great artillerie, and ten thouſand ſouldiers: yet doubting to be able with that ſtrength to endure the ſiege, offered to yeeld vp the citie to Mahomet, with all the reſt of his dominion, vpon condition, That he ſhould freely giue him in lieu thereof the citie of Philippopolis in Thracia, with the countrey thereto adioyning. Of which his offer Mahomet accepted: and ſo taking poſſeſſion of Sinope, with the ſtrong citie of Castamona,

MONA, and all the reſt of the Princes territorie, ſent him away with all his things to PHILIPPOPOLIS, as he had promiſed. This Iſmael was the laſt of the honourable houſe of the Iſfendiars, who had long time raigned at HERACLEA and CASTAMONA in PONTVS. From SINOPE he marched on forward with his armie to TRAPEZOND. This famous citie ſtandeth alſo vpon the ſide of the Euxine or blacke ſea in the countrey of PONTVS, where the Emperours of CONSTANTINOPLE had alwayes their deputies, whileſt that empire flouriſhed and commanded the Eaſt part of the world, as farre as PARTHIA: but after it began againe to decline (as all worldly things haue but their time) one Iſaack (whoſe father, Emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE, the Conſtantinopolitanes had for his euill gouernment ſlaine) flying to TRAPEZOND, tooke vpon him the gouernment of that citie, with the countries of PONTVS and CAPADOCIA, and many other great prouinces, and was at firſt called the King of TRAPEZOND: but after he was well eſtabliſhed in that gouernment, both he and his ſucceſſors tooke vpon them the name and title of Emperors; which they maintained equally, if not better, than the late Conſtantinopolitane Emperours, and therefore are of moſt accounted for Emperours. He that then raigned, was called Dauid Comnenus: which moſt honourable familie of the Comneni had long time before raigned in CONSTANTINOPLE; and out of the ſame were many other great Princes deſcended, which ruled in diuers places of MACEDONIA, EPIRVS, and GRÆCIA. Mahomet comming to TRAPEZOND, laid hard ſiege vnto the ſame by the ſpace of thirtie dayes both by ſea and land, and burnt the ſuburbs thereof, as he had before at SINOPE. The fearfull Emperour diſmaied with the preſence of ſo mightie an enemie, and the ſight of ſo puiſſant an armie, offered to yeeld vnto him the citie with his whole empire, vpon condition, That he ſhould take his daughter to wife, and deliuer vnto him ſome other prouince, which might yeeld him ſuch yeerely profit as might ſuffice for the honourable maintenance of his ſtate. Mahomet perceiuing the weakneſſe of his enemie by his large offers, refuſed to accept thereof, and attempted by force to haue taken the citie: which not ſorting to his deſire, the matter was againe brought to parle: where after long debating to and fro, it was at laſt agreed vpon, That the Emperour vpon the faith of the Turkiſh King for his ſafe returne, ſhould in perſon meet him without the citie, if happily ſo ſome good attonement might be made betwixt them. Whereupon the Emperour following the Turks faith before ſolemnly giuen for his ſafe returne, as was before agreed, went out of the citie to meet him, in hope to haue made ſome good agreement with him: but as ſoone as he was come out, Mahomet according to the damnable and helliſh doctrine of his falſe prophet (That faith is not to be kept with Chriſtians) preſently cauſed the Emperour to be caſt into bonds, and ſo to be detained as priſoner. Which when it was bruted in the citie, the citizens vtterly diſcouraged, without farther reſiſtance yeelded themſelues with the citie into his power.

Trapezond beſieged by Mahomet.

Trapezond yeelded vnto the Turks.

Mahomet now Lord of TRAPEZOND, entring the citie, tooke priſoners the Emperors daughter, with all the reſt of his children and kindred, and all ſuch of the nobilitie as he found in the citie: whom he cauſed forthwith, together with the Emperor, to be ſent by ſea as it were in triumph to CONSTANTINOPLE. Of the reſt of the citizens he choſe out ſo many as he pleaſed for his owne ſeruice, and appointed eight hundred of the Chriſtian children, in whom appeared moſt towardlineſſe, to be brought vp for Ianizaries, many alſo of the other citizens were ſent into captiuitie to CONSTANTINOPLE: the beautifull women and virgins he diuided amongſt his friends and men of warre, certaine choſen paragons of whom, he ſent as preſents to his ſonnes. After he had thus taken his pleaſure in the citie, and left none there but the baſeſt of the people, he put a ſtrong garriſon of his Ianizaries into the caſtle, and a great garriſon of common ſouldiers into the citie, appointing his Admirall to gouerne the ſame. The reſt of the Emperours ſtrong townes, diſcouraged with the taking of TRAPEZOND, and the miſeries therof, in ſhort time ſubmitted themſelues vnto the Turkiſh thraldome, wherein they haue euer ſince moſt miſerably liued. So Mahomet in the ſpace of few moneths hauing reduced that empire into the forme of a prouince, returned in great triumph to CONSTANTINOPLE; when he had in this expedition ſubdued PAPHLAGONIA, PONTVS, and a great part of CAPADOCIA, with ſome other prouinces neere vnto the Euxine ſea. When he was come to CONSTANTINOPLE, he ſent the Emperour with his children priſoners to HADRIANOPLE. But afterwards vnderſtanding that the Perſian Queene, the wife of Vſun-Caſſan, ſought meanes to get ſome one of her vncles children, whom by the power of her huſband ſhe might if it were poſſible aduance vnto her fathers empire, he ſent for Dauid the wofull Emperour to CONSTANTINOPLE, and there cruelly cauſed him,

A him, with all his ſonnes and kinſmen, to be put to death; and to the vttermoſt of his power rooted out all that moſt honourable familie of the Comneni, excepting George the Emperours youngeſt ſonne, who at his firſt comming to HADRIANOPLE turned Turke: whoſe ſiſter (the Emperours daughter) Mahomet afterwards tooke to be one of his concubines. This Chriſtian empire was by the Turkiſh tyrant Mahomet thus miſerably ſubuerted and brought to nought in the yeere of our Lord 1461. The ruine of the empire of Trapezond.

The yeere following, which was the yeere 1462, Mahomet hauing intelligence, that Wladus 1462.
Dracula Prince of VALACHIA, his tributary, was reſolued to caſt from him his obedience, and Mahomet ſeeketh to entrap Wladus Prince of Valachia.
to ioyne himſelfe vnto the Hungarians, his mortall enemies; thought it beſt to proue if he could B by policie circumuent him, before he were altogether fallen from him. For which purpoſe he ſent Catabolinus his principall ſecretarie vnto him to bring him to the court, promiſing him greater fauours & promotions from the Emperor, than he had as yet at any time enioyed. And by the ſame truſtie meſſenger, he commanded Chamuzes Baſſa, gouernour of BIDINA and the countrey lying ouer againſt VALACHIA, on the other ſide of Danubius, to doe his vttermoſt deuoire for the entrapping of Wladus: promiſing him great rewards if he could bring the matter to effect. Whereupon Chamuzes deuiſed with the ſecretarie, that when he had done his meſſage to the Prince, and with all his cunning perſwaded him to take that iourney vpon him, he ſhould ſecretly beforehand giue notice vnto him of the certaine day of his returne backe againe from the Prince: at which time it was like, that Wladus would in courteſie of himſelfe bring the C ſecretarie well on his way, being a man of ſo great account in the court, or at leaſtwiſe not refuſe ſo to doe, being thereto requeſted by the ſecretarie: at which time the Baſſa ſecretly paſſing ouer Danubius with certaine troupes of horſemen, and lying cloſe in ambuſh vpon the way, ſhould ſuddenly ſet vpon the Prince, & ſo either take him, or elſe kill him. The plot thus laied, and euery circumſtance agreed vpon, the ſecretarie held on his way; and comming to the Prince, forced his wit to perſwade him to go to the court: ſometime cunningly extolling the great opinion that Mahomet had of his fidelitie and valour; and otherwhiles feeding him with the hope of greater honours and princely preferments he was to receiue at the Emperours hands. But when he had ſaid what he could, he obtained no more of the warie Prince, but good words againe, & that he would in courteſie conduct him on his way vnto the ſide of Danubius. Whereof the ſecretarie
D by ſpeedie meſſengers gaue Chamuzes intelligence: who ſecretly paſſing ouer Danubius with certaine troupes of horſemen, and riding a good way into the country, lay in ambuſh vpon the way wherby the Prince with the ſecretarie muſt needs paſſe. According as was before appointed, the ſecretarie accompanied with the Prince, put himſelfe vpon the way, and at the very prefixed time came to the place where Chamuzes lay in ambuſh with his horſemen: who ſuddenly ariſing, and on euery ſide aſſailing the Prince, ſlew diuers of his men before they were wel aware of his comming. But Wladus being a man of great courage, and better appointed than the Baſſa had ſuppoſed (for he went alwaies attended vpon with a ſtrong guard of valiant and ſtout men) ſo receiued Chamuzes & his Turks, that he ſlew many of them, & at length after a hard conflict tooke him with the reſt priſoners: whoſe hands and feet he cauſed to be cut off, and their bodies Chamuzes Baſſa and the Turks ſecretary hãged
E afterwards to be thruſt vpon ſharp ſtakes ſet faſt in the ground, to the terror of all that ſaw them: and did the Baſſa ſo much honour, as to hang him and the ſecretarie vpon a gibbet a great deale higher than the other Turks. And not ſatisfied with this reuenge, preſently gathered his forces, & paſſing ouer Danubius into the Turks dominions, burnt all the countrey before him alongſt the riuers ſide, killing man, woman, & child, without mercy: after which great ſpoile & ſlaughter made, he returned againe into VALACHIA. The report of theſe newes being brought to Mahomet, ſet him in ſuch a choller and rage, that he commanded the great Baſſa Mahometes, which firſt told him thereof, to be cruelly whipt: which ſeruile puniſhment in that tyrannicall gouernment hath vſually beene inflicted euen vpon the greateſt Baſſaes of the court, vpon the leaſt diſpleaſure of the tyrants, eſpecially if they be not naturall Turks borne; accounting the reſt in F their anger but as their baſe & contemptible ſlaues, as well appeareth by the wofull end of many, euen of the greateſt of them. But when he vnderſtood by moſt ſure aduertiſements that all was as the Baſſa had before reported, or rather worſe, it is not to be in words expreſſed into what a rage he fell: the ſpoile of his countrey grieued him much, but the ſhamefull death of the ſecretarie his embaſſadour, and of Chamuzes the Baſſa, tormented his heart, and filled him with indignation & deſire of reuenge. Wherefore with all ſpeed poſſible he aſſembled his ſouldiers and men of warre, out of all parts of his dominions to PHILIPPOPOLIS: and had in ſhort time G raiſed ſuch an armie, as the like he had not at any time imployed ſince the winning of CONSTANTINOPLE. At the ſame time alſo, he ſent his Admirall with 25 gallies, and 150 ſaile of other ſmall veſſels by the Euxine, to enter the riuer Danubius, and there landing his men, to ioyne his forces with the Prince of PODOLIA: who for a grudge he bare againſt Wladus, had promiſed to aid the Turke againſt him. When all things were now in readineſſe, he marched with his armie from PHILIPPOPOLIS, and paſſing ouer Danubius, entered into VALACHIA; before which time, the Admirall had landed his men, and with the helpe of the Podolian, had burnt the citie of PRAILABA, the greateſt towne of trade in all VALACHIA; and was beſieging CEBIVM, called in ancient time LYCOSTOMOS: where after they had lien a H while and receiued ſome loſſe, they left the ſiege and departed, the Podolian backe againe into his countrey, and the Admirall to his fleet.

Mahomet himſelfe in perſon inuadeth Valachia.

Mahomet being got ouer Danubius, burnt the villages, draue away the cattell, and made hauocke of all that came in his way. As for priſoners, he tooke but few; for the Valachies before his comming, had retired their wiues and children, and all that were vnfit for warres, either into their ſtrong cities, or into the refuge of great and thicke woods (whereof there is in that countrey plentie) or elſe into the high and rough mountaines, where they were in more ſafetie than in any their ſtrongeſt holds: and all ſuch as were able to beare armes, followed the Prince, who euer kept the woods and mountaines, ſtill following the Turks armie ſo neere as he poſſibly could, with ſafetie; and many times cut off ſuch as ſtragled any thing farre abroad from the ar- I mie, into the countrey: yet neuer durſt ſhew himſelfe in plaine field, being indeed but a handfull, in compariſon of the Turks multitude. Mahomet, to ſmall purpoſe roaming vp and downe the countrey at his pleaſure, ſtaied neuer long in one place; and making no reckoning of ſuch a weake enemy as durſt neuer ſhew himſelfe, pitched his tents ſtill in the open plaines, and ſo lay with his armie in great ſecuritie, not entrenched at all. Wladus by his eſpials vnderſtanding of this the manner of Mahomets encamping, came in the dead time of the night, and with all his power furiouſly aſſailed that quarter of the Turks campe where the Aſian ſouldiers lay, and ſlew many of them in their tents; the reſt terrified with the ſuddenneſſe of the alarum, fled out of their tents for refuge vnto the Europeian ſouldiers: the Prince following them at the heeles, and entring into that quarter of the campe alſo, did there great harme; and ſtrucke ſuch a gene- K rall terrour & feare into all the Turks armie, that they were euen vpon the point to haue wholly forſaken their tents and betaken themſelues to flight. Yea Mahomet himſelfe, diſmaied with the terrour of the night and tumult of his campe, and fearing leſt the Hungarians had ioyned their forces with the Prince; not knowing which way to turne himſelfe, had vndoubtedly fled, had not Mahomet Baſſa a man of great experience in martiall affaires, perſwaded him otherwiſe: and by generall proclamation made thorow the campe, That no man ſhould vpon paine of death, forſake the place wherein he was encamped, ſtaied the flight; and with much adoe enforced them to make head againſt the Prince. Wladus perceiuing the Turks now to begin to ſtand vpon their guard, and to make reſiſtance: after great ſlaughter made, returning, tooke the ſpoile of the tents forſaken by the Aſian ſouldiers, and vpon the approach of the day, againe retired with L victorie into the woods. As ſoone as it was day, Mahomet appointed Haly-Beg with certaine companies of ſelect ſouldiers, to purſue the Valachies: who ouertaking part of the Princes armie, tooke a thouſand of them priſoners, and put the reſt to flight: all which priſoners were by the tyrants command, preſently put to the ſword. From that time Mahomet euery night entrenched his armie, and cauſed better watch and ward to be kept in euery quarter of his campe, than before.

A moſt horrible ſpectacle.

As he marched along the countrey, he came to the place where the Baſſa and the ſecretarie were hanging vpon two high gibbets, and the diſmembred Turks empailed vpon ſtakes about them: with which ſight he was grieuouſly offended. And paſſing on farther, came to a plaine containing in bredth almoſt a mile, and in length two miles, ſet full of gallowes, gibbets, wheels M ſtakes, and other inſtruments of terrour, death, and torture; all hanging full of the dead carkaſes of men, women, and children, thereupon executed, in number (as was deemed) about twentie thouſand. There was to be ſeene the father, with his wife, children and whole familie, hanging together vpon one gallowes; and the bodies of ſucking babes, ſticking vpon ſharpe ſtakes; others with all their limbes broken vpon wheeles, with many other ſtrange & horrible kinds of death.

A death : ſo that a man would haue thought, that all the torments the Poets faigne to be in hell had beene there put in execution. All theſe were ſuch as the notable, but cruell Prince, iealous of his eſtate, had either for iuſt deſert, or ſome probable ſuſpition, put to death ; & with their goods rewarded his ſouldiers : whoſe cruell manner was, together with the offender to execute the whole familie, yea ſometimes the whole kindred. Mahomet, although he was by nature of a fierce and cruell diſpoſition, wondred to ſee ſo ſtrange a ſpectacle of extreme crueltie : yet ſaid no more but that Wladus knew how to haue his ſubiects at command. After that, Mahomet ſent Ioſephus, one of his great captaines, to skirmiſh with the Valachies ; who was by them put to the worſe : but by the comming in of Omares the ſonne of Turechan, they were againe in a B great skirmiſh ouerthrowne, and two thouſand of their heads brought by the Turks vpon their launces into the Kings campe : for which good ſeruice Omares was by the King preferred to be gouernour of THESSALIA.

Two thouſand of the Valachies ſlaine.

When Mahomet had thus traced VALACHIA, and hauing done what harme he could, ſaw it to be to no purpoſe, with ſuch a multitude of men to hunt after his flying enemie, which ſtill kept the thicke woods or rough mountaines : he returned againe to CONSTANTINOPLE, leauing behind him Haly-beg with part of his armie, to proſecute that warre ; and with him Dracula the younger brother of Wladus, who was alſo called Wladus, as a ſtale to draw the Valachies into rebellion againſt the Prince. This Dracula the younger, was of a little youth brought vp in Mahomets court, and for his comely feature of him moſt paſſionatly affected : which inordinate C perturbation, ſo preuailed in the intemperat nature of the laſciuious Prince, that he ſought firſt by faire words and great gifts to corrupt the youth ; and not ſo preuailing, attempted at laſt to haue forced him : wherewith the noble youth being enraged, drew his rapier, and ſtriking at him to haue ſlaine him, grieuouſly wounded him in the thigh : and thereupon fled. Neuertheleſſe being drawne backe againe to the court, and pardoned, he was afterwards reconciled to the King, and ſo became his Ganimede ; and was of him long time wonderfully both beloued and honoured, and now ſet vp for a ſtale (as is before ſaid) for the Valachies his countreymen to gaſe vpon.

It fortuned, that after the departure of the King, diuers Valachies came to Haly-beg the Turkiſh Generall, to ranſome ſuch friends of theirs as had beene taken priſoners in thoſe wars, and D were yet by him detained : to whom the younger Dracula by way of diſcourſe declaring the great power of the Turkiſh Emperour, and as it were lamenting the manifold and endleſſe miſeries of his natiue countrey ; cunningly imputed the ſame vnto the diſordered gouernment of his cruell brother, as the ground of all their woes : aſſuring them of moſt happy and ſpeedy redreſſe, if the Valachies, forſaking his fierce brother, would cleaue vnto him as their ſoueraigne, in ſpeciall fauour with the great Emperour. Which ſpeech, he deliuered vnto them with ſuch liuely reaſons, and in ſuch effectuall tearmes, that they there preſent, perſwaded by him ; and others by them ; in ſhort time all, as if it had been by a ſecret conſent, forſooke Wladus the elder brother, and choſe Dracula the younger brother to be their Prince and Soueraigne. Who ioyning vnto him the Turks forces, by the conſent of Mahomet tooke vpon him the gouernment E of that warlike countrey and people ; yet holding the ſame as the Turkiſh tyrants vaſſaile, the readieſt way to infidelitie. Wladus ſeeing himſelfe thus forſaken of all his ſubiects, and his younger brother poſſeſſed of his dominion, fled into TRANSYLVANIA, where he was by the appointment of the Hungarian King apprehended and laid faſt in ſtrait priſon at BELGRADE, for that he had without iuſt cauſe (as it was laid to his charge) moſt cruelly executed diuers Hungarians in VALACHIA : yet ſuch was his fortune, after ten yeeres hard impriſonment, to be againe enlarged, and honourably to die in battaile againſt his ancient enemies the Turks.

The death of Wladus.

Mahomet returning out of VALACHIA to CONSTANTINOPLE, ſent the ſame fleete which he had vſed in his late warres, into the ÆGEVM, to take in ſuch Iſlands as being before vnder the Conſtantinopolitane empire, had vpon the loſſe of the citie put themſelues vnder the F protection of the Venetians ; but eſpecially the Iſle of MITYLENE, called in ancient time LESBOS : pretending that Nicholaus Cateluſius Prince thereof, did harbour the pyrats of ITALY, and other places ; & alſo bought of them ſuch priſoners, and other bootie, as they continually tooke from the Turks at ſea, or alongſt the ſea coaſt, out of many places of his dominions : pretending alſo the chaſtiſing of the ſaid Prince, for that he had by treacherie ſlaine his eldeſt brother, and ſo vniuſtly taken vpon him the gouernment. His fleet thus ſet forward, he himſelfe with a

ſmall armie paſſed ouer into ASIA, and came by land to POSSIDIVM a citie of IONIA ouer G againſt MITYLENE. From whence he embarked himſelfe ouer the narrow ſtrait into the Iſland: where after he had once landed his armie, he in ſhort time ouerran the whole Iſland, & miſerably ſpoiled the ſame, leading away all the inhabitants thereof into captiuitie; who ſhortly after were ſold at CONSTANTINOPLE like flocks of ſheepe, and from thence diſperſed into all parts of his dominions. After he had thus harried the countrey, & left nothing therein vnſpoiled; he beſieged the Prince in the citie of MITYLENE, whereof the Iſland now taketh name: and with his great ordinance continually battered the ſame by the ſpace of 27 dayes. In which time many ſharpe aſſaults were alſo giuen by the Turks, whereby the defendants were greatly diminiſhed and waſted. The Prince perceiuing himſelfe not able long to hold out, offered to H yeeld vp the citie, with all the ſtrong holds in the Iſle, vpon condition, that Mahomet ſhould therefore giue vnto him ſome other prouince, of like value to the Iſland: which his offer Mahomet accepted, and by ſolemne oath bound himſelfe for performance of that he had promiſed. Whereupon the Prince came out of the citie, and humbled himſelfe before him, excuſing himſelfe for the receiuing of the men of warre (where with he was charged) as done for no other purpoſe, but that they ſhould forbeare to ſpoile his owne countrey, much ſubiect to their furie: vtterly denying that he had at any time bought, or ſhared, any part of ſuch prizes as had by thoſe pirats by ſea or land beene taken from the Turks. With which his excuſe, Mahomet ſeemed to be reaſonably well contented, and with good words cheered him vp: neuertheleſſe, as ſoone as the citie, with all the other ſtrong holds in the Iſle, were by the Princes meanes deliuered into I his hands, he no longer made reckoning of his Turkiſh faith, but cruelly cauſed many of the chiefe citizens of MITYLENE to be put to death; and three hundred pirats, whom he found in the citie, to be cut in two peeces in the middle, ſo to die with more paine. And when he had placed conuenient garriſons in euery ſtrong hold in the Iſle, he returned to CONSTANTINOPLE, carrying away with him the Prince, and all the better ſort of the inhabitants of MITYLENE, that were left aliue, together with all the wealth of that moſt rich and pleaſant Iſland; leauing it almoſt deſolate, none remaining therein more than his owne garriſons, with a few of the pooreſt and baſeſt people. Mahomet after he was arriued at CONSTANTINOPLE, caſt the Prince Nicholaus, with Lucius his coſin (whoſe helpe he had before vſed in killing of his elder brother) into cloſe priſon: where they ſeeing themſelues euery houre in danger of their liues, to K winne fauour in the tyrants ſight, wickedly offered to renounce the Chriſtian religion, and to turne Turke. Which Mahomet vnderſtanding, cauſed them both to be richly apparelled, and with great triumph to be circumciſed, and preſently ſet at libertie: yet ſtill bearing in minde his old grudge, he ſhortly after, when they leaſt feared any ſuch matter, clapt them both faſt againe in priſon, and there cauſed them to be moſt cruelly put to death. A iuſt reward for the bloudie murtherers, and apoſtacie, who to gaine a little longer life, went content to forſake God.

Mitylene beſieged.

Mitylene yeelded to the Turke.

1464 Shortly after it fortuned, that Stephen King of BOSNA (in ancient time called MÆSIA SVPERIOR) who ſupported by the Turkiſh Emperor, had wrongfully obtained that kingdom againſt his owne brethren, refuſed now to pay ſuch yeerely tribute as he had before promiſed: for L which cauſe Mahomet with a ſtrong armie entered into BOSNA, and laid ſiege vnto the citie of DOROBIZA: which when he had with much adoe taken, he diuided the people thereof into three parts; one part whereof he gaue as ſlaues vnto his men of warre; another part he ſent vnto CONSTANTINOPLE; and the third he left to inhabit the citie. From DOROBIZA he marched to IAZIGA, now called IAICA, the chiefe citie of that kingdome, which after foure moneths ſiege was deliuered vnto him by compoſition: In this citie he tooke the Kings brother and ſiſter priſoners, with moſt of the nobilitie of that kingdome, whom he ſent as it were in triumph vnto CONSTANTINOPLE. The other leſſer cities of BOSNA following the example of the greater, yeelded themſelues alſo. But Mahomet vnderſtanding that the King of BOSNA had retired himſelfe into the fartheſt part of his kingdome, ſent Mahometes his chiefe Baſſa with his Europeian M ſouldiers to purſue him: wherin the Baſſa vſed ſuch diligence, that he had on euery ſide ſo incloſed him before he was aware, that he could by no meanes eſcape, which was before thought a thing impoſſible. So the King for ſafegard of his life was faine to take the citie of CLYSSA for his refuge: where he was ſo hardly laid to by the Baſſa, that ſeeing no other remedie, he offered to yeeld himſelfe vpon the Baſſaes faithfull promiſe by oath confirmed, that he ſhould be honorably

A bly vſed, and not to receiue in his perſon any harme frō the Turkiſh Emperor. Whereupon the Baſſaes oath to the ſame purpoſe was with great ſolemnitie taken; and for the more aſſurance conceiued in writing, firmed by the Baſſa, and ſo deliuered to the King: which done, the King came out of the citie and yeelded himſelfe. The Baſſa hauing thus taken the King priſoner, carried him about with him from place to place, & from citie to citie, vntill he had taken poſſeſſion of all the kingdome of Bosna; and ſo returning vnto his maſter, preſented vnto him the captiue King: who was not a little offended with him, for that he had vnto him ſo farre engaged his Turkiſh faith. But when the poore King thought to haue departed, not greatly fearing further harme, he was ſuddenly ſent for by Mahomet: at which time, he doubting the worſt, caried with
B him in his hand the writing wherein the Baſſaes oath for his ſafetie was compriſed: neuertheleſſe, the faithleſſe tyrant without any regard thereof, or of his faith therein giuen, cauſed him preſently to be moſt cruelly put to death, or as ſome write, to be flaine quicke. Thus was the Chriſtian kingdome of Bosna ſubuerted by Mahomet in the yeere 1464: who after he had at his pleaſure diſpoſed thereof, and reduced it into the forme of a prouince to be (as it is at this day) gouerned by one of his Baſſaes; in great triumph returned to Constantinople, carrying away with him many a wofull Chriſtian captiue, and the whole wealth of that kingdome.

Mahomet following the example of his father Amurath, had from the beginning of his raigne by one or other of his great Baſſaes or expert captains ſtill maintained wars againſt Scanderbeg, the moſt valiant & fortunate King of Epirvs: the greateſt part whereof, although it did in the C courſe of time concurre with the things before declared, and might by peecemeale haue beene amongſt the ſame in their due time and place inſerted; yet I haue of purpoſe for diuers reaſons wholly reſerued them for this place: Firſt, for that I would not interrupt the courſe of the hiſtorie before rehearſed, with the particular accidents of this warre: And then, for that the greateſt heat of this hereditarie warre, deliuered as it were from hand to hand from the father to the ſon, happened not long after this time; when as Mahomet hauing conquered the kingdome of Bosna, had ſurrounded a great part of Scanderbegs dominion: wherein I had reſpect alſo vnto the Readers eaſe, who may with greater pleaſure and content, and leſſe paines alſo, view the ſame together, than if it had beene diſperſedly ſcattered and intermedled with the other greater occurrents of the ſame time. In which diſcourſe I will but briefly touch many things well wor-D thie of a larger treatiſe. And if forgetting my ſelfe, I ſhall in ſome places happen to ſtay ſomething longer than the Readers haſt would require; yet I hope, that the zeale and loue he beareth vnto the worthy memorie of moſt famous Chriſtian Princes, together with the ſhortneſſe of the hiſtorie, in compariſon of that which is thereof written in iuſt volumes by others, ſhall eaſily excuſe a larger diſcourſe than this. But againe to our purpoſe.

The great warr betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg, are at large written by Marinus Barletius, in 13. bookes, De vita & geſtis Scanderbegi, from whence this Hiſtorie is taken: and were done betwixt the yeeres 1450 and 1467.

Vide Marinum Barletium lib. de vita & geſtis Scanderbegi.

Mahomet in the beginning of his raigne ſent embaſſadours to Scanderbeg, offering him peace, ſo that he would grant to pay vnto him ſuch yeerely tribute as his father Amurath had in his life time demanded. Which embaſſage the craftie tyrant ſent rather to proue what confidence Scanderbeg had in himſelfe, than for any hope he had to haue his demand granted. This diſhonourably offered peace Scanderbeg ſcornfully reiected, and ſo returned the embaſſadors as they
E came: and preſently vpon their departure entered with his horſemen into that part of the Turks dominion which bordereth vpon Epirvs: & when he had waſted the countrey, returned home laded with the ſpoile thereof. In reuenge of which deſpight, Mahomet ſhortly after ſent Ameſa one of his beſt men of warre, with twelue thouſand horſemen into Epirvs, to requite Scanderbeg with the like ſpoile of his people and countrey. But Scanderbeg vnderſtanding by his eſpials of the Turks comming, lay cloſe in ambuſh with ſix thouſand ſouldiers vpon the great mountaine Modrissa, ouer which the Turks muſt of neceſſitie take their way: and as they were about by night to haue paſſed ouer that rough and ſteepe mountaine, and were with much difficultie almoſt got vp to the top thereof, they were ſuddenly charged by Scanderbeg his footmen, who hauing the aduantage of the place, made great ſlaughter of the Turks, & draue thē downe
F the mountaine amaine; at which time their horſes ſtood them in no ſtead at all, but were rather vnto them an hinderance in that vneuen and troubleſome ground. Now when the Turks were come to the foot of the mountaine, they were in that great feare and diſorder againe fiercely aſſailed on the one ſide by Scanderbeg, & on the other by his nephew, called alſo Ameſa; who before the Turks comming had placed themſelues with their horſemen in places of moſt aduantage: ſo that the Turks hardly beſet and forced on euery ſide, were in ſhort time ouerthrowne and put to flight. In this conflict ſeuen thouſand of the Turks were ſlaine, and Ameſa Generall G of the Turks armie with diuers other captains taken, whom Scanderbeg ſent priſoners to CROIA.

For ioy of this victorie at Scanderbeg his returne, great triumph & feaſting was made at CROIA:
During which time, Scanderbeg cauſed Ameſa the Turke, with the reſt of the Turkiſh captaines, to be enlarged, to be partakers of that ioy, whereof they againſt their wils had giuen the occaſi-on; and afterwards vſed them with all kind of courteſie during the time of their abode. This Ameſa requeſted of Scanderbeg, That he might ſend a meſſenger to CONSTANTINOPLE, to certifie Mahomet how the caſe ſtood with him & the reſt, whom happily he might thinke to haue beene ſlaine in the battaile; and to procure from him their ranſome. Which his requeſt Scander- beg eaſily granted, and ſet downe their ranſome at thirteene thouſand duckats. The newes of H this ouerthrow ſore greeued the Turkiſh tyrant, but afterwards when he ſaw the remainder of his armie without their Generall & leaders, hauing for moſt part loſt their enſignes and armour, and alſo the meſſenger that was ſent from Ameſa, he fell into ſuch a rage, that he denied to giue any thing at all for his ranſome: imputing all that loſſe to his treacherie, follie, or cowardiſe.
Howbeit he was afterwards perſwaded by his Baſſaes & other great courtiers, Ameſa his friends, to thinke better of the Generall, of whoſe faithfulneſſe and valour he had of long time had great experience, and alſo to ſend his ranſome: by denying whereof, he ſhould (as they ſaid) diſcourage his other Generals and captaines, who by chance of warre might hap to fall into the like danger. By whoſe perſwaſion Mahomet ſent an embaſſadour to Scanderbeg, with the ranſome demanded, and other great preſents alſo. Vpon receit whereof, Ameſa with the other captaines I were ſet at libertie, and ſent with ſafe conuoy out of EPIRVS. All the money ſent for the Turks ranſome, Scanderbeg diuided amongſt his captaines and ſouldiers.

This late receiued ouerthrow filled the proud tyrant with deſire of reuenge, ſo that he determined forthwith to ſend another armie into EPIRVS: the leading whereof, diuers of his great and moſt expert captains ambitiouſly ſought for. For Mahomet had promiſed great rewards and moſt honourable preferments to him whoſe hap it ſhould be to vanquiſh Scanderbeg. Amongſt the reſt, one Debreas (a man for his forwardneſſe & courage, in great fauour with his ſoueraigne) Debreas ſent with 14000 horſemen to inuade Epirus. by great ſute obtained to haue that charge: promiſing with exceeding confidencie vnto Maho- met, to make a beginning of better ſucceſſe in his warres of EPIRVS, than others thither by him before ſent: for the accompliſhment whereof he required to haue no greater power than was K ſent the yeere before. But after that Ameſa was returned to the court, and had with long diſ-courſe ſet forth the vertues and valour of Scanderbeg, with the inuincible courage of his ſouldi-ers, Debreas became more temperate in his ſpeech, and was contented to receiue a new ſupplie; ſo that he had vnder his charge fourteene thouſand ſouldiers: with which armie he marched towards EPIRVS, and was come to a place called POLOGVS, where he lay with his armie encamped in a plaine in great ſecuritie, fearing no danger, for that he was not as yet in the enemies countrey, neither as he ſuppoſed, neere the enemie. Of all this preparation, and of the comming of Debreas, Scanderbeg had intelligence: and being reſolued not to expect the comming of the Turks into EPIRVS, made choiſe of ſix thouſand of his beſt horſemen; with whom he marched with as much ſpeed as was poſſible into the enemies countrey, and came by night vnto the L plaine where the Turks lay, hoping to haue beene vpon them before they were aware, and ſo to haue ouerthrowne them. Wherin he was much deceiued: for by the light of the Moone (which then ſhined all night) he was by the Turks in time deſcried, yet the ſuddenneſſe of his approach with the ſtrangeneſſe of the attempt, exceedingly diſmaied the whole armie of the Turks. But Debreas mindfull of the promiſe he had made vnto his lord & maſter, with cheerfull words encouraged his ſouldiers, and preſently ſent out certaine troupes of light horſemen, to receiue the firſt charge of the enemie, vntill he might ſet his whole armie in order of battaile. Betwixt theſe A skirmiſh betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks. troupes, and others ſent out by Scanderbeg, began a ſharpe skirmiſh; both the armies ſtanding faſt, as beholders, carefully expecting the euent thereof. But Scanderbeg doubting, that if his ſouldiers ſhould in this firſt encounter be put to the worſe, it might tend to the great diſcouraging M of the reſt of his armie; ſeconded his men with other freſh troups vnder the leading of Moſes and Ameſa: by whoſe comming in, the Turks were forthwith beaten backe, and chaſed euen to their maine battaile. In the heat of which chaſe, Moſes forgetting himſelfe, had with great danger in following on too faſt, beene encloſed by the Turks, had not his furie beene in good time ſtaied by Ameſa: for which ouerſight, he was afterward blamed by Scanderbeg, that he could not with

A with greater moderation vſe his good fortune; commending ſuch forwardneſſe in a priuat ſouldier, but not in ſo great a commander. When Moſes and Ameſa had thus put the Turks to flight, Scanderbeg brought on his whole armie, and fiercely aſſailed the Turks, yet troubled with the diſcomfiture of their fellowes. Debreas on the other ſide, with cheerefull ſpeech, & his owne valour, ſo encouraged his ſouldiers, that Scanderbeg was there notably reſiſted, and his fortune as it were at a ſtand: vntill that Muſachius, with certaine troupes of reſolute men, drawne out of the left wing of Scanderbeg his armie, gaue ſuch a fierce charge vpon the ſide of the Turks armie, that he brake their rankes, and ſore diſordered that part of the armie. Which when Debreas perceiued, he withdrew himſelfe out of the front of the battaile wherein he had valiantly ſtood
B againſt Scanderbeg, and came to the place where Muſachius had diſordered the battaile, and with ſuch courage cheared vp his troubled ſouldiers, that his onely preſence and valour ſeemed to be the very life and heart of his whole armie. Whileſt Debreas was thus buſied againſt Muſachius, Scanderbeg in the meane time with might and maine ſtill charged the front of the enemies armie: who now in the abſence of the Generall began to looſe their order and to giue ground, making no ſuch reſiſtance as before. At which time, Moſes forcibly breaking into the thickeſt of them, tooke one of their enſignes, which he threw backe amongſt his followers: wherewith they encouraged, ſo preſſed vpon their enemies, without regard of danger, that the Turks being therewith diſcouraged, and their battaile diſordered, were almoſt ready to turne their backs and to flie. Debreas ſeeing all in danger to be loſt, haſted with all ſpeed vnto the place
C where he ſaw moſt perill, and did what was poſſible to haue reſtored the battaile, and encouraged his ſouldiers: where preſſing in amongſt the formoſt, he was by Scanderbeg himſelfe encountered hand to hand, and ſo by him ſlaine: with whoſe fall the whole armie diſcouraged, without further reſiſtance fled. Moſes purſuing them on the one ſide, & Muſachius on the other, with furious hand ſlew more in that chaſe than were ſlaine in the battaile. Of the Turks were ſlaine in this battaile 4120, and ſome priſoners taken, but of the Chriſtians few or none: ſo that for the good fortune thereof, Scanderbeg accounted it a victorie giuen. All the ſpoile taken from the enemie, together with the priſoners, was by Scanderbeg equally diuided amongſt the ſouldiers. Vnto Moſes he gaue Debreas his horſe and armour: and vnto Muſachius a priſoner, which by his port and behauiour ſeemed to be a man of ſome good account. This Turke agreed with Mu- D ſachius vpon a ranſome of two hundred duckats, and preſently vpon agreement made, drew forth the money out of a little bag which he had kept ſecretly about him, and offered it to Muſachius for his ranſome: who receiuing the money, told the Turke, that he muſt prouide another ranſome, foraſmuch as that money was his owne before by law of armes, as taken with his perſon. The Turke on the other ſide alledged for himſelfe, the agreement alreadie made, with the paiment of the full ſumme agreed vpon. This controuerſie was brought before Scanderbeg: who with great pleaſure heard them both what they could ſay: Muſachius laying in hard for another ranſome, and the Turke for his libertie vrging the agreement. Who when they had both ſaid what they could for themſelues, Scanderbeg ſmiling, told them, that they both contended for that which was in right his, and neither of theirs: for the priſoner with the money were both
E mine (ſaid he) at the firſt taking of him; ſince which time I haue giuen to you Muſachius the priſoner, which I knew, but not the money which I knew not of: neither doth the concealing thereof make it yours (ſaid he to the Turke) who had by law of armes loſt your ſelfe, together with all that you had about you. After he had thus pleaſantly diſcourſed of the matter, and brought them both in doubt, he awarded vnto Muſachius the money he agreed for, and to the Turke his deſired libertie: who glad thereof, and hauing alſo receiued his horſe and armour of the gift of Scanderbeg, departed, ſpeaking all the honour he could of ſo noble a conquerour. After this victorie Scanderbeg with great triumph returned againe to CROIA.

The battell betwixt Scanderbeg & Debreas.

Debreas ſlaine by Scanderbeg, and his armie ouerthrowne.

A pleaſant contention betwixt Muſachius and a Turke for his ranſome.

When Mahomet vnderſtood that Debreas was ſlaine, and his armie ouerthrowne, he became exceeding melancholie: but after he ſaw ſo many of his ſouldiers returned as had beene ſuffi-
F cient to haue reſtored a loſt battaile, he was ſo highly diſpleaſed with their cowardiſe, as that he could not endure the ſight of them. The death of Debreas greeued none more than the King himſelfe: for the captaines generally either enuied at his hardineſſe, or elſe hated his inſolencie. Ameſa amongſt the reſt tooke no ſmall pleaſure, that his proud ſucceſſour had taken part of his euill fortune, and ſo in part eaſed his former infamie. The great Baſſaes and men of warre ſeeing their ſoueraigne ſo deſirous of reuenge, offered to ſpend their liues in that ſeruice: whoſe forwardneſſe wardneſſe he ſeemed not to refuſe: howbeit he had in his mind already plotted another manner G of reuenge. He was not ignorant, what great matters his father Amurath had brought to paſſe, by ſowing diſcord amongſt the Princes of GRÆCIA: which foule practiſe he purpoſed now to put in practiſe himſelfe. There were at that time many famous chieftaines in EPIRVS, of Scanderbeg both beloued & truſted; amongſt whom, he was in hope to find ſome one who for deſire of wealth or promotion, might be allured to giue ſome deſperat attempt againſt the life or ſtate of Scanderbeg. Of all others, Moſes Golemus of DIBRA (a man honourably deſcended) was moſt inward with Scanderbeg, and for his proweſſe and experience in martiall affaires, of all men accounted the beſt captaine in all EPIRVS, next vnto Scanderbeg himſelfe: him, the craftie tyrant moſt deſired to alienat from Scanderbeg, as one fitteſt to ſerue his purpoſe, and eaſieſt with- H out ſuſpition to be dealt withall, becauſe he commonly lay with a ſtrong garriſon in DIBRA, vp-on the very frontiers of EPIRVS. Wherefore he directed his letters vnto the gouernour of SPE-TIGRADE, commanding him by all meanes he could poſſibly deuiſe to withdraw Moſes from Scanderbeg; and not to ſpare for any gold or golden promiſes whereby to allure him: promiſing alſo vnto the gouernour himſelfe great preterments, if he could winne him. Vpon receit of which letters, the gouernour began forthwith carefully to deuiſe, how he might beſt attempt the matter he had in charge: where after many deuiſes, he at laſt thought vpon a ſhrewd-headed fellow, one of the Chriſtians which dwelt in SPETIGRADE; whom for that he was a Chriſtian, he might without ſuſpect vſe as an inſtrument in ſo dangerous and important an action. This Chriſtian the gouernour called vnto him, and after he had with great gifts and large promiſes I woon him to vndertake the matter; he ſent him away, fully before armed with plenteous inſtru-ctions, full of treaſon and deceit. When this ſubtill meſſenger was come vnto Moſes, and vnder pretence of great & ſecret matters of importance, had obtained to ſpeake with him in priuat: he after ſome diſcourſe had of matters well worth the hearing, began at length vnder the couert of The craftie proceeding of the Turks meſſenger faire glozing words, to vtter his poiſon: ſhewing vnto him (as a meſſenger from the gouernor) the great and good opinion the Turkiſh Emperor had of long time conceiued of his valour and proweſſe: for which cauſe his heroicall nature could not but honour him, although he were his enemie; and therewith alſo maruell, that he being a man of that worth, could be contented to be commanded by Scanderbeg, whoſe ſtate was by him chiefly vpholden: whereas if he would doe wiſely, and changing his affection, follow Mahomet, an Emperour of greateſt magnificence K and power, he ſhould quickly in his court find ſuch honorable entertainment, as were to be preferred before the ſtate of Scanderbeg: or if the ſoueraigntie of EPIRVS his natiue countrey did better pleaſe him, he might eaſily be thereunto aduanced, by ioyning his owne endeuour vnto Mahomets great power. It pleaſed Moſes well to heare his owne praiſes (a thing incident vnto hautie minds) and he liked well that he was ſo fauoured of the Turkiſh Emperor: but the hope of the kingdome of EPIRVS began to worke in him new conceits, and moued him more than all the reſt. Such is the force of ambitious thoughts, that they make a man forget all things, ſaue themſelues: ſo glorious a thing it is, to ſtand in the higheſt place. For all that, Moſes neither in word or countenance made any ſemblant of liking, or diſliking the meſſage. Which the wily meſſenger taking for a ſecret conſent, and heartily glad that he had been ſo well heard: not deſi- L ring as then any further anſwer, craued leaue to depart; promiſing in ſhort time to returne to him againe. After the departure of this meſſenger, many troubled thoughts began to ariſe in the mind of Moſes: his mirth was changed into melancholy, and the cheerfulneſſe of his countenance was abated, his hautie thoughts were his ſolitarie companions, and the imagined kingdome the idoll he in ſecret worſhipped; ſo that in ſhort time, he ſeemed vnto the wiſer ſort as a man altogether metamorphoſed. Some were ſo bold, as for to aske the cauſe of the meſſengers comming? vnto whom he anſwered, That he was one, from whom he receiued intelligence of matters concerning the good of the ſtate: which his anſwer was holden for true; for who durſt once miſtruſt Moſes? Whileſt he was thus toſſed vp and downe with his owne thoughts, as a ſhippe with the billowes of a wrought ſea, the ſame ſlie meſſenger, according to his pro- M miſe came againe; and for his more credit, in ſecret brought with him ſuch preſents as well might ſeeme to haue beene ſent from the Great Turke; with his meſſage better framed than Moſes corrupted. before. Of all which that was ſent, Moſes is reported to haue receiued nothing but the worſt, which was, the very treaſon it ſelfe. And ſo returned the meſſenger, with anſwer, That he could not but in good part accept of the Turkiſh Emperours great fauours; and for the reſt of his re-queſts,

A queſts, whatſoeuer he ſhould chance to doe therein, he ſhould not from thenceforth finde him any great enemie: commanding the meſſenger at his departure, no more to repaire vnto him about that matter, for feare of ſuſpicion.

After that, it chanced that Scanderbeg came into DIBRA, to ſee how all things ſtood there, and to conſult with Moſes for the beſieging of SFETIGRADE; which citie it grieued him to ſee in the poſſeſſion of the Turks. Moſes to auert Scanderbeg from that enterpriſe, wherein he muſt of force be driuen to ſhew himſelfe, told him, That he vnderſtood of late by a certaine meſſenger which came to him out of SFETIGRADE, that the citie was ſo well ſtored by the Turks, of all things neceſſarie for the defence thereof, that it were but loſt labour to attempt any
B thing againſt the ſame: wherefore he aduiſed him rather to beſiege BELGRADE (not that BELGRADE which is ſituated vpon the riuer of Danubius, but another of the ſame name) in the confines of EPIRVS, then holden by the Turks, but diſtant from SFETIGRADE about an hundred and fortie miles; of the taking whereof, there ſeemed to be more hope. By this perſwaſion, Scanderbeg reſolued with himſelfe to make prouiſion for the beſieging of BELGRADE. And foraſmuch as his ſouldiers of EPIRVS alwayes vſed to the field, were not ſo fit for the beſieging of townes, he thought it good to pray aid out of ITALY, from his old friend Alphonſus King of NAPLES, with whom he had beene of long time acquainted, and vnto him much beholden. Wherefore he ſent two of his noblemen embaſſadours vnto him, with certaine rich preſents, and familiar letters of this purport.

Scanderbeg craueth aid of Alphonſus King of Naples.

Our ſouldiers of EPIRVS, know only how to fight with men, and them to vanquiſh: with wals they know not how to deale. You Italians (as I vnderſtand) haue skill in that kind of ſeruice, and take pleaſure therein: wherefore now at this preſent, I haue need of your helpe and cunning. There be certaine townes of our enemies in EPIRVS, yea almoſt in the heart of our kingdome; which eye ſore I haue of long deſired (if it pleaſed God) to take out of my ſight: but being occupied with continuall wars, had no leiſure vntill now, happily to attempt any thing againſt them. This time I haue choſen as moſt fit, to ſatisfie my deſire, both for the ſeaſonableneſſe of the time of the yeere, and for that Mahomet ſpareth me leiſure; whoſe furie I haue twice calmed. You vnderſtand in few words, what I haue need of: all other things are almoſt in readineſſe, and we only looke for your helpe. Lend me ſuch ſouldiers as D know how to fight a farre off, I meane harquebuſiers and canoniers, for of others we haue ſtore plentie. But happie is APVLIA, my Alphonſus, vnder thy gouernment, from whence men fit for all ſeruices may be drawne as out of a moſt plentifull treaſurie. Whenſoeuer we haue requeſted men fit for ſeruice, either in peace or warre, you haue beautified both our court and campe. By you the kingdome of EPIRVS hath beene ſupported with ciuill policie, and warlike ſtrength: all ſort of people, of what condition ſoeuer: yea euery corner of EPIRVS ſoundeth forth thy praiſe, both at home and abroad. But for mine owne part, I doe ſo louingly embrace your kindneſſe, and ſo firmly retaine the remembrance of your deſerts towards me, that ſometime I wiſh you that fortune (although in ſo doing I may ſeeme vnkinde) which (as the common ſaying is) proueth, but getteth not friends: to the intent, that you might by ſome more certaine proofe know, how much I am to you deuoted.

E

When Scanderbeg had ſent away his embaſſadours, he with all diligence began to prouide things neceſſarie for the ſiege of BELGRADE: wherein he had purpoſed alſo to haue vſed the ſeruice of Moſes. But he now in heart a traitor both to his Prince and countrey, and a friend to Mahomet, found many excuſes to ſtay at home in DIBRA: alleadging firſt, that it was to be thought, that ſo ſoone as the Turkiſh King ſhould heare of the ſiege of BELGRADE, he would inuade ſome part of EPIRVS, thereby to withdraw his enemies from the ſiege: and then, that no part of all EPIRVS lay neerer vnto the Turks, or more in danger, than DIBRA; and that therefore he could not doe any better ſeruice, than to ſee vnto the ſafetie of that countrey, long before committed to his charge, and in which alſo moſt part of his liuing lay. Theſe his excu-
F ſes, proceeding indeed from deepe treaſon, were yet neuertheleſſe thought reaſonable, and he for his prouident care highly commended; and authoritie giuen him with new ſupplies to augment the garriſon vnder his command, as time and occaſion ſhould require.

By that time that Scanderbeg had fully made his preparation for the intended ſiege, the embaſſadours before ſent to Alphonſus, were returned into EPIRVS, and with them ſuch aid as Scanderbeg had before requeſted, and a great deale more: For Alphonſus fearing the greatneſſe of

of the Turkiſh Emperour, in what he could furthered Scanderbeg his actions, reckoning EPIRVS G not aboue 60 miles diſtant frō his dominions, to be the ſtrongeſt wals of his kingdome in APVLIA (as not many yeeres after, it by proofe appeared, when as the Turks hauing taken OTRANTO put all ITALY in no ſmall feare.) With this aid he alſo wrote louing letters vnto Scanderbeg, thanking him for his preſents, and for the good opinion he had of him, willing him to make as bold of all his things, as of his owne. But when he came to make mention of the ſouldiers he had ſent; Alphonſus, after the manner of his pleaſant nature, merrily wrote vnto Scanderbeg, That he had ſent him Italian ſouldiers which could according to his deſire, fight well both with men and wals; but better with women: and that therefore the Epirots were beſt to take heed, that they whoſe helpe they required for fight a farre off, proued not alſo good warriours at hand H at home in their houſes. The great commendation Scanderbeg had giuen of the King, was by him referred vnto the exceſſe of his loue, and by the King requited with like.

Scanderbeg beſiegeth and diſtreſſeth Belgrade.

Scanderbeg now furniſhed with all things needfull, ſet forward, and according to his former determination, came and encamped before BELGRADE, with an army of fourteene thouſand good ſouldiers: and in ſhort time had ſo diſtreſſed the citie, that the Turks were glad to take truce with him for ſixteene daies, which time expired, they promiſed to deliuer vp the towne, if they were not before relieued. Vpon concluſion of this truce, Scanderbeg encamped himſelfe vpon an high hill neere vnto the citie, with three thouſand horſe, and a thouſand foot; and appointed Muſachius and Tanuſius, with the reſt of the armie, to remoue farther off into a large plaine, where they might encampe themſelues in a more wholſome and freſh aire, in that hoat I ſeaſon of the yeere, during the time of the truce. At which time he appointed alſo 25 ſcouts to keepe continuall watch vpon the top of the higheſt mountaine, to diſcouer a farre off the comming of the enemie, & to giue warning thereof vnto the campe by making a fire vpon the mountaine: by the negligence of which watch, Scanderbeg receiued a great ouerthrow, as hereafter followeth.

The newes of the ſiege of BELGRADE was brought vnto Mahomet, at ſuch time as he was ready to haue paſſed into ASIA againſt the Emperour of TRAPEZOND: which great enterpriſe he was loath to giue ouer, for the reliefe of BELGRADE; and yet to loſe that citie vnto Scanderbeg, grieued him much: wherfore he reſolued with himſelfe ſo to do the one, as that he would not altogether neglect the other. And ſo holding on his intended iourney into ASIA himſelfe, K with ſuch fortune as is aforeſaid, he ſent Sebalias one of his great Baſſaes, with fortie thouſand horſemen to releeue BELGRADE, promiſing him great rewards if he could bring him Scanderbeg either aliue or dead. This Baſſa was of the Turks accounted for a warie captaine, but not ſo couragious, alwaies more politike than forward: he hauing receiued his charge, ſet forward with all ſpeed poſſible, no leſſe carefull of that he was commanded, than was Mahomet himſelfe, and by great iournies came on ſo faſt, that he ſtill preuented the fame of his comming; and by his forerunners intercepted, or rather (as ſome write) corrupted the watch which Scanderbeg had before placed vpon the mountaines; ſo that no ſigne was giuen vnto the campe of the enemies, as was expected. By meanes whereof, Sebalias with all his power were vpon that part of Scanderbeg his armie, which lay in the plaines, before they were well aware of his comming: ſo that L moſt part of them had not ſo much leiſure as to bridle their horſes, or to put on their armour. In which ſo ſudden a feare, Muſachius armed himſelfe, and put his ſouldiers in ſuch order as the ſhortneſſe of the time and the enemies approach would permit; doubting much, whether it were better to fight or to flie: but ſeeing no leſſe danger in flight than in fight, he reſolutely receiued the enemies charge, as a man deſirous before hand to reuenge his owne death. And at length (ſeeing his men ſlaine about him by heapes, and that courage muſt needs giue place vnto fortune) fiercely attempted to haue broken thorow the middeſt of his enemies, and ſo to haue fled vnto the mountaine where Scanderbeg lay: but he was ſo beſet, that no way was poſſible to be made; wherefore reſoluing there to die, he deſperatly fought, to the great admiration of his enemies, vntill that he, with all there with him, were euery man ſlaine. Tanuſius on the other M ſide, after he had giuen diuers braue attempts to haue reſcued his coſin Muſachius, finding by proofe, that he could doe him no more good therein but to become the wofull companion of his death, exhorted all the reſt yet left, for ſafegard of their liues to flie: in which doing, moſt of them were ſlaine, for the Baſſaes great armie ſo filled all places thereabout, and ſo eagerly purſued the victorie, that it was almoſt impoſſible any way to ſcape. Scanderbeg lying vpon the moun-

A mountaine, and ſeeing the ouerthrow of moſt part of his army, was about many times to haue deſcended from the hill, to haue holpen them in what he might, or els to haue there died with them: but yet ſtayed, being thereto earneſtly requeſted by his other moſt expert captaines; and perſwaded, not deſperately to thruſt both himſelfe and them all into the manifeſt perill of aſſured death. Scanderbeg ſeeth his men ſlaine, and is not able to releeue them.

Sebalias hauing ſlaine Muſachius, and put Tanuſius to flight, followed the chaſe with the greateſt part of his army, ſo that few were left in the great plaine, except ſuch as ſtayed to rifle the dead. Scanderbeg taking that oportunitie, came downe from the hill whereon he ſtood, with his foure thouſand ſoldiers, and in a moment ſlew all ſuch Turkes as he found in his way: and after
B following in the taile of the Turkes army, cut off a great number of them, and brought a generall feare vpon the whole army: inſomuch, that Sebalias perceiuing that he gained not ſo much in chaſing of Tanuſius, but that he loſt more in the rereward of his army, by the purſuit of Scanderbeg, left the chaſe, and turned vpon his fierce enemy: Where after a ſharpe skirmiſh begun, the warie Baſſa fearing in the maintaining of that diſordered fight to haue the victory wrung out of his hands by Scanderbeg, cauſed a retreat to be ſounded, ſo to call together his diſperſed ſouldiers, and in better order to encounter his dangerous enemy. Scanderbeg in the meane time hauing aſſembled the remainder of his army, valiantly again encoũtred the Turks, who thought in this battel to haue made an end of the warres in EPIRVS: and with his owne hand ſlew Achmat and Barach, two valiant ſouldiours of the Turkes; which like ſtout champions had before
C ſworne vnto Mahomet the death of Scanderbeg, if they ſhould chance to meet with him. In this laſt skirmiſh a great number of the Turks were ſlain: but night drawing on, Sebalias retired with his army to a mountaine neere vnto the citie, and Scanderbeg likewiſe to another almoſt two miles off: and in the dead time of the night riſing with his army, returned in ſafetie into EPIRVS, leauing ſtrong gariſons vpon all the ſtrait paſſages as he went, for feare leaſt the Baſſa proud of this victory, ſhould forthwith breake into EPIRVS. This was the onely and greateſt ouerthrow that Scanderbeg had hitherto receiued of the Turkes: wherein he loſt two thouſand horſemen and three thouſand foot (moſt part whereof were of the Italians ſent from king Alphonſus) together with his tents and great artillery, and about eightie of his men taken priſoners. And of the Turks were alſo ſlaine three thouſand. Scanderbeg flieth by night into Epirus.

D The next day Sebalias perceiuing that Scanderbeg was retired, commanded the bodies of the ſlaine Turks to be ſought out and buried: but of ſuch Chriſtians as the yet found breathing, the Turks cut off their hands and feet, and ſo left them amongſt the dead. The head of Muſachius and of many other the ſlaine Chriſtians, which by their armour or apparell were thought to be of the better ſort, were by the commaundement of Sebalias cut off: which becauſe he could not for the diſtance of the place, and heat of the weather, without great annoyance carry with him to CONSTANTINOPLE, as the barbarous manner of the Turks is, he cauſed them to be ſlaine, and ſtuffed with chaffe, and ſo to bee carried as the vaine trophees of his victory. Afterwards, when he had repaired the battered wals of BELGRADE, and put a new ſupply of ſeuen hundred freſh ſoldiors into the citie, beſide the old garriſon therin before, and ſet all things in good E order, he returned with great triumph to CONSTANTINOPLE. And the more to ſet out the the glory of his victory, at ſuch time as he entred the cittie, he firſt cauſed the captiue Chriſtians to be led in chaines before him; after whom were borne the enſignes taken from the Chriſtians, with the aforeſaid heads thruſt vpon lances, and after them all the ſpoyle: laſt of all came Sebalias himſelfe, with his ſoldiours, as great conquerours, and was of the people receiued with ſuch applauſe and joy, as if he had conquered ſome great kingdome. No man was now ſpoken of but Sebalias, his praiſes were in euery mans mouth, he was the onely man (as they ſaid) that did ſhew that Scanderbeg was to be ouercome: no preferment was now thought too great for him, or reward ſufficient to counteruail his deſert. The poore Chriſtian captiues were afterwards for the moſt part ſold: of the reſt, ſome were aliue thruſt vpon ſharp ſtakes, ſome hanged vpon iron
F hookes, ſome otherwiſe cruelly at the victors pleaſure tortured to death.

Moſes lately before corrupted by the practiſe of the gouernour of SPETIGRADE, hearing of the great loſſe Scanderbeg had receiued at BELGRADE, thought it now a moſt fit time for his reuolt. But for as much as the fact, in the nature of it ſelfe foule, ſeemed euen to himſelfe the doer thereof, a great deale fouler and more diſhonourable, for that he had therein no complices: he thought it good, if it were poſſible, to allure ſome others into the fellowſhip of his treaſon, ſo to diminiſh diminiſh the infamie of himſelfe, in communicating the ſame with many, and to appeare with G greater credit before the Turkiſh tyrant, than if he ſhould as a contemptible fugitiue come all alone. Wherefore vpon the bad newes from BELGRADE, he ſeemed at the firſt very penſiue, and much to lament the misfortune of Scanderbeg, and the common miſerie of the countrey of EPIRVS, with many words amplifying the ſame: and then on the contrary part, ſetting forth to the vttermoſt the force and power of the Turkiſh Emperour Mahomet, thereby to ſtrike a greater terrour and diſtruſt into the minds of them with whom he was conuerſant: but vnto ſuch as were more ſecret and inward with him, he diſcouered the great affection and fauour the great Emperour Mahomet had of long borne him, with the large offer of his gifts and preferments, aſ-ſuring thē of the like alſo, if they would conforme themſelues vnto his appetite; ſeeking hereby H ſo much as he could, to allure thē into the participation of his moſt execrable treaſon: yet when he had ſaid what he could, he found none but a few of the baſer ſort of the common ſouldiers, which were willing to hearken vnto him or to follow him. When Moſes ſaw how much he had laboured, and how little preuailed, fearing to be diſcouered, he fled by night to SPETIGRADE, accompanied with a few baſe fellowes, and eaſily obtained the gouernours paſſe, with ſafe conduct to CONSTANTINOPLE: where he arriued a little before the returne of Sebalias from BELGRADE, and was of Mahomet both ioyfully receiued and honourably entertained.

When Scanderbeg vnderſtood that Moſes was thus reuolted, at the firſt report thereof he was ſo troubled with the ſtrangeneſſe of the fact, that he ſtood ſpeechleſſe as a man aſtonied: but after he had pawſed a while, and vpon further enquirie had found it to be true, he according to his I heroicall diſpoſition, ſaid no more, but that he could eaſily haue Moſes excuſed, for that he was carried away with the violence of ſuch fortune as might haue alienated the mind of a right conſtant man. And when diuers of his friends (according to the manner of the world) with hard ſpeeches ſeemed to aggrauate his offence: he could not abide to heare the ſame, but cōmanded them to hold their peace, and no more to vſe ſuch ſpeeches: wiſhing that all treaſon & euill fortune were together with Moſes gone out of EPIRVS. Vpon this newes, Scanderbeg accompanied with Ameſa his nephew and a troupe of horſemen, preſently went into the countrey of DIBRA, and there with all care cauſed moſt diligent enquirie to be made, if any could be found partakers of the conſpiracie with Moſes. But finding none, he much reioyced in the fidelitie of his ſubiects: and hauing ſet all things in good order in that prouince, returned himſelfe to CROIA. K

Moſes remaining in the Turks court, ceaſed not to ſolicite Mahomet to proceed in his warres againſt Scanderbeg, promiſing to doe therin great matters, euen to the ſpending of his life in that ſeruice. But the craftie tyrant thinking it not good to truſt him too farre before he had further triall of him, delaied him off vntill the next Spring, pretending that the yeere was too farre ſpent to begin wars. In the meane time he cauſed all Moſes talke, his behauiour and actions, to be diligently obſerued and noted, and oftentimes himſelfe diſcourſed with him concerning the managing of that warre: all which he did eſpecially to ſound the depth of Moſes his thoughts. And finding nothing in him but the moſt aſſured and vndoubted ſignes of a mind deuoted to his ſeruice, & altogether eſtranged from Scanderbeg: in the beginning of the Spring he committed to his charge the leading of fifteene thouſand horſemen for the inuading of EPIRVS, ſuch men as L
Moſes himſelf ſhould make choice of: for a greater number he required not for the vanquiſhing of Scanderbeg. Theſe ſouldiers although they deteſted (ſo few in number) to enter that fatall countrey of EPIRVS, as men faire warned by other mens harmes, yet heartened on by the opinion they had conceiued of their new Generall, and the hope they had by his meanes to find friends in that countrey to ioyne with them, were the willinger to goe. So Moſes furniſhed with a notable armie, and all warlike prouiſion he could deſire for the deſtruction of his countrey; and blinded with the imagination of a kingdome, ſet forward, and marching through THRACIA and MACEDONIA, forgetting the loialtie due vnto his ſoueraigne, and the loue he ought to haue borne vnto his natiue countrey, came and entred into DIBRA.

Mahomet ſendeth Moſes with fifteene thouſand ſelect men to inuade Epirus.

Scanderbeg by his eſpials vnderſtanding of the comming of Moſes, as alſo what ſtrength he M was of, ſtood not now vpon any policie againſt him who had of long beene priuie to all his ſtratagems, but was ready euen at his firſt entrance with true valour to encounter him. As both the armies ſtood ranged in order of battaile, a meſſenger came from the Turks campe, to know of Scanderbeg, if any one of his armie durſt to proue his fortune hand to hand againſt one of the Turks, before the beginning of the generall battell. By which meſſenger anſwer was returned,

That

A That the challenge ſhould be accepted. The name of the Turke which made this braue challenge was Ahemaze, a man for his valour and courage of great name amongſt the Turkes. Vpon this proud challenge, Zacharias Groppa, a Gentleman of no leſſe reputation amongſt the Chriſtians, haſtely ſtept forth before Scanderbeg (as if he had beene afraid to haue beene preuented by ſome other) and requeſted, that he might be the man to abate the Turks pride. Scanderbeg embracing him, cõmended his noble mind, and wiſhing him good fortune, gaue him leaue to carrie with him into the field the firſt honour of the Chriſtian armie. As he was arming himſelfe, his companions and fellowes in armes ſtanding about him, wiſhed vnto him not more courage or ſtrength than he had, but onely the fortune of Maneſſi. Vpon his armour he put on
B many rich iewels and ornaments, the allurements or rather the rewards of the enemie, if he could vanquiſh him. The Turkiſh champion was no ſooner come into the plaine betwixt both armies, and made ſhew of himſelf in great brauerie as if his match had yet been ſcarcely found, but he ſaw Zacharias come forth brauely mounted, and readie to charge him: to whom Ahemaze calling aloud, ſaid there would be time ynough for him to haſten to his death, and therefore requeſted to talke with him before. So when he had learned of him both his name and place, he propoũded ſuch like conditions of the combat, as had been long before deuided by Maneſſi: whereof Zacharias in no better ſort accepted. In few words it was agreed vpon betwixt them, That each of them ſhould abide his owne fortune, without any helpe or aid of others; and that the victor ſhould haue full power ouer the bodie and ſpoile of the vanquiſhed. Thus agreed, C they withdrew themſelues one a good diſtance from another, and with their Launces charged, ran together with ſuch force, that with the violence of the encounter they brake their Launces one vpon the other, and were both horſe and man ouerthrowne. Both vnhorſed, they nimbly recouered themſelues, and with their ſcimitars fiercely aſſailed the one the other on foot. Fortune it ſhould ſeeme had determined to beautifie that combat with varietie, ſtanding a great while indifferent to both. After many ſturdie ſtrokes giuen, without any hurt done, by reaſon they were ſo ſtrongly armed, it fortuned that both their ſwords were beaten out of their hands: then grapling together with their bare hands, as if they had beene two vnarmed wreſtlers, after long ſtrugling till they were both almoſt out of breath, Zacharias ouerthrew the Turke, and lying vpon him, with his dagger, aboue the gorget thruſt him into the throat, and ſlew him: and D ſo riſing vp, with the ſword that firſt came to his hands, cut off the Turks head: at the ſight whereof the Chriſtian armie gaue a great ſhout for ioy, to the great diſcomfiture of the Turks. To be ſhort, Zacharias deſpoyling the Turke of his armour, and what elſe he thought good, returned loded with the ſpoile of his enemie, and preſented vnto Scanderbeg the proud Turks head: for which he was of him afterwards moſt honourably rewarded.

A Combat betwixt a Turke and a Chriſtian.

Into this place yet reeking with the bloud of the late ſlaine Turke, came Moſes, and with a loud voice challenged Scanderbeg hand to hand; thinking indeed that he would not haue aduentured his perſon: but when he ſaw him readie to come forth, he ſhamefully forſooke the place, and returned with ſhame ynough into his Armie.

Preſently after, both the Armies vpon ſignall giuen ſet forward, and ſo began to ioine battaile:
E where at the firſt onſet Scanderbeg ſo valiantly charged the vauward of the Turks armie, that they were glad to giue ground: which Moſes perceiuing, releeued them with new ſupplies: and riding now here, now there, with his preſence and courage reſtored the battaile, in many places almoſt loſt. Howbeit, the Epirots encouraged with the beginning of their good fortune, ſtill preuailed vpon their enemies, and after great ſlaughter made, came to the ſtrength of their battaile; where Moſes had placed moſt of his beſt ſouldiours, as his moſt aſſured and laſt refuge: In this place the Turks fought with exceeding courage, and Moſes warily obſeruing in what part of the battaile Scanderbeg himſelfe was, directed his great forces againſt him, of purpoſe, if poſſibly he might, to haue ſlaine him: whereof he miſſed but a little; for a couragious ſouldiour of the Turks by chance encountering with Scanderbeg, with his horſemans ſtaffe bare him quite back-
F ward vpon his horſe, in ſuch forcible maner, that the Turks for ioy gaue a great ſhout, thinking verely he had beene ſlaine: but Scanderbeg recouering himſelfe againe, and chafed with ſuch an vnwonted diſgrace, furiouſly aſſailed the ſame Turk with his ſword, and after a great fight ſlew him. A great part of the Turks armie being alreadie ouerthrowne by them that had the leading of the wings of Scanderbeg his armie, diuers of the common ſouldiours thruſt the heads of the ſlaine Turks vpon the points of their ſpeares, in token of victorie, to the great aſtoniſhment of the Turks: and now ioyning themſelues with Scanderbeg, more fiercely charged the maine bat- G taile of the Turks than before. Neuertheleſſe, Moſes encouraging his ſouldiours, did what was poſſible for a man to doe, and euen with his owne valour a great while ſtaied the courſe of the victorie: vntill he ſeeing the ground about him couered with the dead bodies of his beſt ſoldiours, and that there was no remedie but that he muſt either flie, or there die; turned his backe and fled. In which flight, many of the hindermoſt of the Turks were ſlaine: as for Moſes himſelfe, he eſcaped by waies to him well knowne, onely with foure thouſand men, the poore remainder of ſo great an armie: the reſt, to the number of about eleuen thouſand, all choiſe men, were ſlaine: whereas of the Chriſtians were not paſt an hundreth loſt, and about eightie wounded. Of all the Turks that were taken, onely one was ſaued; who being a man of good account, H had yeelded himſelfe to Zacharias, and was afterward raunſomed: the reſt were all by the common ſouldiours, without pittie, tortured to death, in reuenge of the crueltie by them ſhewed at BELGRADE: Scanderbeg himſelfe either not knowing thereof, or winking thereat.

The battell betwixt Scanderbeg and Moſes.

Moſes with the reſt of his diſcomfited armie, lay ſtill a while vpon the borders of EPIRVS, and would faine haue perſuaded them, after the departure of Scanderbeg, to haue followed him againe into EPIRVS, to haue ſurprized the garriſon left in DIBRA, in number not aboue two thouſand; promiſing to bring them vpon the ſame garriſon, before they ſhould be aware of their comming. But the Turks hauing him now in contempt, were about by generall conſent to forſake him, and to returne home. And ſo Moſes ſeeing no remedie, returned with them to CONSTANTINOPLE, with countenance as heauie as if he had been a condemned man now I carried to the place of execution: and the Turks which had not long before had him in great admiration, expecting that he ſhould haue ended the wars in EPIRVS; began now to diſgrace him as faſt, and to ſpeake all the euill of him they could deuiſe. Yea the prowd tyrant himſelfe (although he could blame nothing in the man, but his fortune) was ſo highly offended with him for the loſſe of his armie, that he had vndoubtedly put him to moſt cruell death, had not the great Baſſaes, & others neere about him, perſuaded him otherwiſe: ſaying, That in ſo doing, he ſhould alienat the mindes of all others from reuolting vnto him, or attempting any great thing for his ſeruice. So was he by their mediation, pardoned his life; but withall, ſo diſgraced, that he had little or nothing allowed him afterwards for his neceſſarie maintenance: all which deſpightfull contumelies he outwardly ſeemed patiently to beare; but was inwardly ſo tormented K with melancholy and griefe, that he could neither eate nor drinke: The remembrance of the foule treaſon committed againſt his prince and countrey, was day and night before his eies; and the diſgraces of the Turks court inwardly tormented him with intollerable griefe: The ſight of the tyrant (who meaſured all things by the euent) filled his heart with ſecret indignation; and to returne again vnto his naturall prince, of whom he had ſo euil deſerued, he was aſhamed: Sometime the clemencie and princely nature of Scanderbeg, whom he knew of old, ſlow to reuenge, and eaſie to be intreated to forgiue, hartned him on to think of returne; and by and by, the conſideration of his fowle treaſon ouerwhelmed him with deſpaire. Thus with contrarie thoughts plunged too and fro, tormented with the inſpeakable griefs of a troubled conſcience, not knowing what to doe, purpoſing now one thing, and by and by another: at laſt he reſolued to forſake L the inſolent tyrant, and to ſubmit himſelfe to the mercie of Scanderbeg; wiſhing rather to die in his countrey for his due deſert, than to liue with infamie, derided in the Turks court. Reſting himſelfe vpon this reſolution, one euening he got ſecretly out of the gates of CONSTANTINOPLE, and trauelling all that night and the day following before he reſted, by long & wearie iournies, came at laſt vnto his natiue countrey of DIBRA. The garriſon ſouldiours beholding their old Gouernour all alone, full of heauineſſe, as a man eaten vp with cares; mooued with compaſſion, and forgetting the euils hee had beene the occaſion of, receiued him with many teares and friendly embracings, and brought him to Scanderbeg, who by chance then lay not farre off. Moſes comming vnto him with his girdle about his necke, in token that he had deſerued death (as the manner of that countrey was) found him walking before his tent, and there M with heauie cheere falling downe vpon his knees at his feet, ſubmitted himſelfe vnto his mercie, and with great humilitie and ſignes of repentance, craued his moſt gracious pardon. Which his requeſt Scanderbeg preſently granted, and taking him vp by the hand embraced and kiſſed him, in token he had from his heart forgiuen him: and within a few daies after, cauſed all ſuch things of his as were before confiſcat, to be again reſtored vnto him; with all ſuch offices and promo-

tions

A tions as he had before enioyed: & by open proclamation commanded, That from thenceforth no man ſhould either publikely or priuatly ſpeake of that Moſes had treſpaſſed. Mahomet vnderſtanding that Moſes was returned againe into EPIRVS, and honoured of Scanderbeg as in former time, was much grieued thereat, and fumed exceedingly: Firſt, for that he had at all truſted him; and then, that he had ſo let him ſlip out of his hands: being verily perſuaded, that all that Moſes had done, was but a fineneſſe of Scanderbeg to deceiue him.

Shortly after that Moſes was returned into EPIRVS, Mahomet by like practiſe allured vnto him Ameſa, Scanderbeg his nephew, promiſing to make him King of EPIRVS in his vnckles ſteed. For by that meanes, the craftie tyrant thought it a more eaſie way to draw the mindes of B the people of EPIRVS from Scanderbeg vnto him deſcended of the princes bloud, than to Moſes, or to any other ſtranger he ſhould ſet vp. Ameſa vpon this hope of a kingdome, fled to CONSTANTINOPLE: and becauſe he would cleere the mind of the tyrant of all ſuſpition and diſtruſt, he carried with him his wife and children, as the moſt ſure pledges of his fidelitie. This Ameſa was of ſtature low, and the feature of his body not ſo perfect as might ſufficiently expreſſe the hidden vertues of his mind: He was of courage hautie aboue meaſure, ſubtill, and of a pregnant wit; wonderfull painfull, and thereto courteous and bountifull (the chiefe meanes whereby aſpiring minds ſteale away the hearts of men) whatſoeuer he got of himſelfe, or had by the gift of his vnckle, he diuided it amongſt his ſouldiers or friends: he was very affable, and could notably both couer and diſſemble his affections: for which things, he was aboue all
C others both beloued and honoured of all the people of EPIRVS, next vnto Scanderbeg himſelfe. At his firſt comming to Mahomet, he filled not his eares with great promiſes, and vaine praiſes of himſelfe as had Moſes; but only excuſing his owne reuolt, laboured to perſwade him, That he had for iuſt cauſes left his vnckle, with a deſire now faithfully to ſerue him. And to that purpoſe ſpake vnto him as followeth:

Ameſa his firſt ſpeech vnto Mahomet.

If it ſhould pleaſe thee (moſt noble Mahomet*) to call to remembrance the old iniuries, and ancient diſpleaſures by vs committed againſt thine imperiall Maieſtie: wee might ſeeme now rather to haue come hither to receiue the iuſt guerdon of our euill deſerts, than vpon any hope of honour or preferment. For what could haue beene done more in diſgrace of the* Othoman empire, than that you haue ſeene
D long ſince done by vs, in the moſt dangerous time of the Hungarian warre; rather of a malicious and ſet purpoſe, than for that we were iuſt enemies? When as in the ſame perfidious courſe, I my ſelfe being a helper and partaker therein (for now no excuſe is to be pretended for our doings, more than repentance) your fathers armie was betrayed at MORAVA, and the kingdome of EPIRVS by great treacherie wreſted out of your fathers hands; the only cauſe of ſo many calamities, and of ſo much bloudſhed. But vaine is this feare, and our ſuſpition needleſſe, with ſo wiſe and mercifull a Prince; eſpecially for that my yeeres then greene, and youth prone vnto the harme of it ſelfe, and a mind not reſting vpon his owne reſolutions, deceiued me. I beleeued mine vnckle (for the ignorant beleeue many things) and allured with the deſire of ſoueraigntie (the proper diſeaſe of that age) and too much credulous, I forſooke you and followed his promiſes: but diſcretion growing with yeeres, I haue by little and little perceiued both
E the ſlie perfidious dealing of mine vnckle, as alſo that my reuolt from you was more hurtfull vnto my ſelfe than to any other. Scanderbeg recouered, and alſo enlarged the kingdome of EPIRVS; but not without my great labour and helpe. I expected long time, that he ſhould haue giuen me, if not my fathers whole inheritance, yet at leaſt ſome part thereof, as a ſmall reward of my ſo great trauell and danger. Not long after he married a wife, and hath begot a young heire, a new ſucceſſour in his kingdome: vnto me for ſhame of the world, becauſe I ſhould not altogether leade a priuate life, he hath aſſigned a baſe corner of EPIRVS; where he enioying the reſt, I might lead a poore and contemptible life. In this caſe I had much adoe to bridle my affections, and could neuer diſgeſt that iniurie: yet the iniquitie of the time, with the inſolent diſpoſition of the man, compelled me to ſmother vp my thoughts, and to make faire weather, leſt finding ſome ſuſpition, he ſhould craftily haue entrapped me, as he did
F of late George Streſie his ſiſters ſonne; whom wrongfully charged with fained ſurmiſes, he hath almoſt depriued of all his poſſeſſions. I would willingly haue fled vnto the feet of your highneſſe, I would gladly haue forſaken my ingratefull vnckle with the ſtaines of his infamous kingdome; but that the remembrance of the old rebellion, and many iniuries ſithence done, did make me afraid: vntill that now (God I thinke ſo appointing it) I came moſt gladly, following your moſt royall faith and promiſe. You had ſcarcely beckned vnto me, you had ſcarcely inuited me, hauing of long intentiuely waited eue- rie occaſion; but ſtraight way I came with ſuch ſpeed, as if I would haue flowne: I lingred not, I expected not either Scanderbeg or his euill happe, or your more proſperous ſucceſſe, as of late did Moſes; leſt I might thereby iuſtly ſeeme either for feare or regard of ſome imminent danger, rather to haue prouided for mine owne ſafetie than to haue embraced your magnificence. Neither haue I left any thing for you in me to ſuſpect, nor any cauſe wherefore I ſhould deſire to returne againe into EPIRVS: here are preſent moſt ſure bonds of my loue, and faithfull pledges of my loyaltie. Behold (worthy Mahomet) you haue whatſoeuer is deere vnto me, yea whatſoeuer nature could giue, pleaſing vnto men in the courſe of mans life. Theſe I haue brought vnto thee, which ſhould with violence haue beene taken from an enemie: ſuch pawnes as might aſſure thee of the faith of a moſt doubtfull man. More than this, haue I brought nothing: for in ſo great ſpeed and ſecret departure, I could not haue regard of my ſubſtance. And if I might haue had time to haue truſſed vp my traſh at leiſure; yet I know not how, I ſhould haue thought it a kind of baſeneſſe, to haue brought with me any part of the poore reliques of mine old fortune: eſpecially vnto thee, of all other the richeſt. Only my fidelitie I lay downe before thee, for any thing greater I haue not: and if thou deſire of me any other bond for more aſſurance, I refuſe not whatſoeuer your highneſſe ſhall appoint: for I came not hither to ſet downe couenants and agreements of my ſelfe, but to receiue them from you. I dare not promiſe to vanquiſh mine vncle, and to ſubdue EPIRVS with an armie of fifteene thouſand men: the misfortune of Haly-Baſſa and other your Generals; yea and the late and rare victorie of Sebalias, with great bloudſhed gained, may ſerue for examples. In me you ſhall neither want diligence nor faithfull ſeruice: as for other things concerning the euent of this warre, and for the reuenge of the iniuries by you receiued; you being a Prince of power inuincible, and of a moſt deepe iudgement, are not to be aduiſed by me your vnskilfull vaſſaile.

Ameſa honorably entertained by Mahomet.

This ſpeech of Ameſa, ſeemed vnto Mahomet free from all diſſimulation, foraſmuch as he knew moſt part thereof to be true; and his wife and children brought vnto his preſence, confirmed the reſt. Wherefore commending his good affection, he appointed him honourable entertainment, referring other matters vnto a farther time.

Vpon the approch of the Spring, Mahomet deſiring nothing more than to be reuenged vpon Scanderbeg, entred into conſultation with his great Baſſaes, concerning the inuaſion of EPIRVS: vnto which counſell Ameſa was by Mahomet admitted, and his wicked deuiſe for the deſtruction of his countrey, of all others beſt liked. After the matter had beene long to and fro debated, it was concluded, that Iſaack the great Baſſa of CONSTANTINOPLE, ſhould with an armie of fiftie thouſand be ſent againſt Scanderbeg, and Ameſa with him, hauing the charge of fiue thouſand horſemen: and the Baſſa to proclaime Ameſa King of EPIRVS; thereby to perſwade the Epirots, that Mahomet inuaded EPIRVS rather for the diſpleaſure he bare againſt Scanderbeg, and for the aduancement of Ameſa, than for any ambitious deſire he had to take vnto himſelfe that kingdome.

K

Great was the preparation for this warre, and the expectation thereof greater. Flying fame had in ſhort time filled euery corner of EPIRVS with the report of theſe newes; adding thereunto (as the manner is) a great deale more than was true. Whereupon Scanderbeg without delay, ſent for his great captaines and men of warre into DIBRA, where that tempeſt was firſt to be expected: and when they were all aſſembled, he declared vnto them the greatneſſe of the danger, and what he thought thereof himſelfe as followeth.

A notable ſpeech of Scanderbeg vnto his captaines, how the Turks were to be withſtood at their coming into Epirus.

Amongſt all other things which God hath left to vex and greeue the minds of men in ſo great varietie of worldly affaires, we ſee (right worthie ſouldiers) theſe two the greateſt, Hope, and Feare. The firſt a more comfortable thing, and proper to couragious minds (I may not ſay) of light beleefe: the other a thing of more diſcretion and ſafetie, which although it vſe to deferre the deſires of men, yet hath it power at length excellently to cure and ſeaſon the ſame. Hereupon is it eaſily to be gathered, that the great cheefetaines of former times haue gained more honour and greater victories, by fearing all that was to be feared, than others in ſhew more hardie, which feared nothing. Hereupon the great Carthaginentian captaine vſed to call Q. Fabius (whom the Romanes euer thought too ſlow and too fearefull) his great enemie: but Terentius Varro he called a greater enemie vnto his owne countrey and the people of ROME, than to himſelfe. But wherefore doe I wrongfully call that Feare, which might more truly be called Diſcretion, or wholeſome Policie? Call it as you will, it is not much materiall: but this one thing no man can denie, That thereof hath riſen the ancient diſcipline of warre, and the old and ſeuere

A gouernment of martiall affaires. This aduiſed careſulneſſe cheriſheth and nouriſheth Hope it ſelfe, it doth nothing raſhly, it hath eyes before, behind, and on both ſides, it waigheth in indifferent ballance things paſt, preſent, and to come. You may now perceiue to what end my ſpeech tendeth. I would firſt conferre with you, and know your opinions, before I determine any thing of the order of this warre; that either I might yeeld vnto your opinion, or elſe you (as you haue alwayes hitherto done) to mine. You heare, you now heare with your eares what preparation, what warlike prouiſion is daily made againſt vs. Lo the great Baſſa of CONSTANTINOPLE, all the flower of EVROPE, and whole ſtrength of the Othoman kingdome knocketh at our gates. I want not courage (neither euer did) to proue my fortune againſt him, not without your honour: but I thinke it better to vſe policie and warie heed againſt ſo great
B an enemie, than our wonted force and courage. That notable ouerthrow of Hali Baſſa, ſo many great victories by vs atchieued, our minds by ſo many good haps confirmed, perſwade me to thinke that we haue both courage and ſtrength to encounter him in plaine battaile: but the vncertaine euents of warre, and fortune neuer ſufficiently knowne, maketh wiſe men to forget what is paſt, and to feare that is to come. It was neuer proper to any man, it was neuer giuen by inheritance, alwayes to ouercome; new occurrents require new correſpondents: neither may you, for that you conquered yeſterday, preſume to aſſure your ſelfe to deuide the ſpoile of your enemies to day. Victorie is like a trauellour, and goeth hither and thither, not reſting long in a place: and although it be for moſt part both gotten and kept by courage and diſcretion; yet oftentimes, when you haue moſt carefully and politiquely diſpoſed of all things, the fortune and chance of warre haue therein a great ſway. I was wont to require (I remember
C it well) onely valour and courage in my ſouldiers, contemning all externall accidents and fortunes haps; if you did promiſe vnto me couragious minds, I aſſured you of all good hap and proſperous ſucceſſe: but that loſſe we receiued at BELGRADE (the remembrance whereof my mind feareth, and alwayes abhorreth to thinke vpon) hath much changed my former cogitations, and made me to deeme farre otherwiſe of worldly matters, and the vncertaintie of fortune. What if that day had beene longer? or Sebalias of more courage? might not the ſtate of EPIRVS haue that day beene vtterly ouerthrowne? We were then rather by God preſerued, than by any thing that was in our ſelues: what remained more, but that we ſhould like cowards haue yeelded our ſelues to haue beene bound of the conquerours? The night defended vs, yea euen God himſelfe defended vs; who tooke from them both policie and force, and gaue vs time to breath and eſcape away. We were then but as a prey, expecting but the comming of the vi-
D ctor: Howbeit, he tooke nothing from vs, he carried little or nothing away with him, being too much carefull to keepe the honour he had alreadie gained, and peraduenture in feare of them of whom he was not without cauſe moſt feared. I ſpeake not this of purpoſe to terrifie any of you, but rather to admoniſh you, and to conſult with you, how ſuch great preparations may be fruſtrated and ouerthrowne, and ſome notable victorie by vs atchieued, without the price of our bloud, or the loſſe of ſuch things as we haue. The number of our enemies is great, and ſo great, as vntill this day we neuer ſaw in EPIRVS greater, except at ſuch times as they came to beſiege our cities, and to deuoure vs all. Now if we ſhall meet them in the plaine fields in a ſet battaile, the euent thereof will be doubtfull, many of vs muſt needs fall, many of vs muſt die (I would I might be a falſe prophet) before ſo great an armie will either flie or be ouercome, your victorie ſhall be mingled with teares, and the heauineſſe of the conquerour not much
E vnlike the ſorrow of the conquered. Was it but a few that we loſt at BELGRADE? Is that loſſe ſo to be recouered? What flower of Chiualrie, hardly to be in many yeeres reſtored? How many worthie men were there ſlaine? EPIRVS muſt needs in ſhort time be vnpeopled, if we ſhall ſo deſperatly only ſeeke for ſuch glorious victories. Wherefore if we will doe well, we muſt ſo fight to day, as that we may fight to morrow alſo. Neither are our enemies and we in like caſe: The loſſe of fortie or fiftie thouſand is leſſe vnto the Turkiſh tyrant, than the loſſe of an hundred of you is to me. We are in all but a few, and therefore carefully to be kept: which if we regard not for our owne ſakes, yet let vs doe it for our wiues and childrens, whoſe welfare and libertie dependeth of our liues: I know the number of you, I know your faces and countenances, and almoſt euery one of your names, which maketh me alſo more carefull of your health. And yet I would not refuſe to trie the whole fortune of this battaile in plaine field, if F we might thereby end all the warres againſt the Turks for euer; if I were in hope ſo to find an end of our labours and trauels hereafter, I would gladly aduenture my life with yours, for the perpetuall quiet and peace of our poſteritie: but a new enemie alwayes ariſeth, and we muſt ſtill looke for new warres. When this Iſaack is gone, another Iſaack will ere long come in his place: we ſhall be alwayes exerciſed with new warres, and encloſed with new dangers: It is the deſtinie of EPIRVS (as farre as I can ſee) and we our ſelues are borne thereto. Wherefore we muſt gather our wits together, we muſt well husband our forces, and ſo diuide our patrimonie, as that we may alwayes haue ſomething to content our creditors, when they G ſhall chance to come vpon vs. Yet ſhall God (no doubt) giue an end alſo vnto theſe troubles: for extremities cannot be of long continuance, and you your ſelues ſhall at length take reſt: yea, the ſtrong and puiſſant enemie, wearied with ſo many vaine attempts, will at laſt haue enough thereof, and leaue off his perpetuall hatred againſt vs: then ſhall it be to you no ſmall pleaſure to remember ſo many labours and dangers paſt. Thus haue I declared vnto you the commodities and incommodities enſuing the victorie in plaine battell. But what if we be vanquiſhed? Where haue we any hope of reliefe left? From whence may we expect helpe? Will the bloudie enemie, inflate with victorie, expect whileſt we againe recouer our ſtrength and encounter him againe with new forces? No, he will purſue vs and chaſe vs ſo long as any of vs are left: and hauing ouercome vs, will poure out the reſt of his furie vpon our townes and countrey, H then ſubiect to his iniurie. But ſome of you peraduenture will ſay, that they are by policie to be ouertaken, and not to be met in open field: of which opinion I alſo am my ſelfe, yet happily differ from you in the time of doing the ſame. Then I thinke it beſt to deceiue them, when they thinke they cannot be de-ceiued: when as they being as it were in poſſeſſion of a ſuppoſed victorie, like men ouerioyed, ſhall caſt no perill. Now they come euen from the gates of Constantinople, full of diſtruſt, prying into euery corner, as men before warned by others harmes, and ſo many dreadfull examples of their fellowes: Beſides that, they haue with them my graceleſſe nephew and domeſticall foe Ameſa, who will teach them to foreſee and ſhun ſuch ſnares as in times paſt he with vs was wont to lay for them. Wherefore we muſt now tower vp vnto the height of ſome notable and ſtrange policie, whereby both our countrey may be from danger preſerued, and alſo ſome great victorie, without our owne bloudſhed (which ſeldome I chanceth) obtained: which to the maintenance of our ancient glorie and renowne, we haue to this day by many moſt notable victories gained: But time and ſpace, and the ſight of the enemie, ſhall furniſh vs with this deuiſe. Now (that my diſcourſe may come to the purpoſed end) firſt of all, all things ſubiect either to the furie or victorie of the enemie, are to be remoued out of the way; all people, of what age, ſex, or condition ſoeuer, are to be brought out of the countrey into places of ſafetie; and then, our townes are to be furniſhed with ſtrong garriſons and all other neceſſarie prouiſion, againſt all the chances of fortune. Beſides, who knoweth the ſecret deſignes of the tyrant? or whether he himſelfe (of long time deſirous of reuenge, and thirſting after our bloud) will follow the Baſſa at the heeles, or no? Perhaps I may beleeue and feare more than is needfull: but it is good to feare all that may be feared, that we may indeed feare nothing. If all things ſhall thus be ſet in order, if there ſhall be nothing left in the fields K or in the villages, that may enrich, feed, or feare our enemies, and which may withdraw our care and thoughts from our enemies, vndoubtedly we ſhall be victors. And if you will be ruled by me, and follow my direction in theſe wars, I will aſſuredly deliuer your enemies into your hands to be ſlaine at your plea-ſure; and (by the leaue of God) will make the name and valour of the Epirots more terrible vnto the Turke, than euer it hath beene in the time of our anceſtors. I flatter not my ſelfe, I deceiue you not: if any thing may be promiſed in worldly actions, this I aſſure you of, and this will I take vpon me. But theſe things are better done than ſaid. In the meane while, to ſpend no more time in longer talke and diſcourſe (than which, no greater loſſe can be to ſouldiers) let euery one of vs take a part in this charge, for the good diſpoſing of all things, and how to withſtand the enemie. I will not command any thing to others, which I will not my ſelfe doe: I will refuſe nothing, or reckon any thing baſe, which may tend to the common ho- L nour or profit of vs all.

This ſpeech of Scanderbeg was well liked and ioyfully receiued of all the hearers, ſo that many beſought him to manifeſt vnto them how he purpoſed to proceed in thoſe wars: whereunto he with cheerefull countenance anſwered, That it was enough for him, if they did but beleeue him, promiſing himſelfe in perſon to be in the moſt dangerous actions as farre as any of them, wherewith they reſted contented. And preſently diſpatching his lieutenants into diuers parts of his kingdome, as he thought moſt conuenient, prouided, That all things were in ſhort time conueyed out of the countrey into the ſtrong townes and other places of refuge. No corne, no cattell, or other things of any worth was left in the countrey; but all left deſolate, in like manner as was before at the comming of the great King Amurath to the ſiege of Croia. M

The Epirots remoue all their things out of the country into the ſtrong townes, before the comming of the Turks.

By this time Iſaack the great Baſſa was come into Epirvs, accompanied with Ameſa: and as he marched, ſtill ſent before him his ſcouts and eſpials, carefully to view euery corner of the countrey, for feare to be entrapped as others before him had beene; directed in his iourney for moſt part by Ameſa. Scanderbeg had in readineſſe ſuch an army as he had purpoſed to vſe againſt his

A his mightie enemie, but lay with ſix thouſand horſemen onely in ſhew, as if he had determined with them to haue giuen them battaile, but meaning indeed nothing leſſe. For as ſoone as the Baſſa was come in ſight, he with thoſe horſemen, according as he had before appointed, as if he had beene diſcouraged with the very ſight of the Turks, turned his backe and fled. And becauſe he would not giue them any occaſion to ſuſpect it to be done for ſome policie or fineneſſe, and ſo to make them more carefull, he fled not into the mountains or woods, as his wonted manner was, but directly toward LYSSA, a towne of the Venetians ſtanding vpon the ſea coaſt, as if he had quite deſpaired of the keeping of EPIRVS, and fled thither for refuge. The Baſſa ſeeing him
B flie, was glad therof, & ſent certaine troupes of horſemen to purſue him, and diligently to marke which way he tooke: but encamped himſelfe with his armie in the plaines of DIBRA, neere vnto ORONYCHIVM, where Scanderbeg lay before: and there reſted his armie, wearie of long trauell, expecting the returne of his horſemen, ſent after Scanderbeg. But vpon their returne, when it was for a certaintie reported by them, That Scanderbeg with an handfull of men was fled out of EPIRVS, and not an enemie to be ſeene, the Turks began to reioyce, and proudly to triumph, that they had without any loſſe driuen the enemie out of the countrey; yet much greeued, that they could no where find any thing to ſatisfie their greedie deſires: for why, all things were ſo cleane gone, as if the countrey had beene ſwept againſt their comming, which might haue beene a ſufficient cauſe for them to haue diſtruſted ſome great matter; but they flattering themſelues, ſuppoſed all this to be done for feare of them, vpon extreme deſperation: ſuch is the fraile condition of C men, to loſe ſtrength of bodie, common ſenſe, yea, their reaſon and vnderſtanding, when ſome great miſchiefe is appointed for their ouerthrow or deſtruction. The Baſſa ſeeing the enemie fled, and now no cauſe of feare, conſulted with his chiefe captaines, what were now beſt to be done? Ameſa ſtill perſwading him not to remoue, but there to ſtay a time, and to expect the farther euent of matters. But the greater number, whoſe opinion preuailed, ſaid it was better to goe farther into the countrey, and to take the ſpoile thereof before the countrey people ſhould conuey away all their ſubſtance into places of ſafetie, as they had done there in DIBRA, and leaue them nothing but the bare ground and emptie cottages. By this perſwaſion, the Baſſa early next morning in good order ſet forward: commanding by generall proclamation, That no man vpon paine of death ſhould breake his array or ſtraggle from the armie. Yet before he ſet
D forward, he called Ameſa vnto him; whom after he had highly commended, and with great vehemencie inuayed againſt Scanderbeg, he with the great applauſe of the whole army in the name of Mahomet created him King of EPIRVS. That day he marched not farre, by reaſon of the great heat: for it was then about the middeſt of Iuly. Yet when he had well wearied himſelfe with that dayes trauell, finding neither enemie nor any thing elſe worthy to be accounted in any part of a victorie; he encamped at night, keeping diligent watch, and ſending forth his ſcouts euery way, but eſpecially towards LYSSA. The next day, which was the third day after the Baſſaes comming into EPIRVS, he ſet forward againe, and came at length into ÆMATHIA, and there encamped that night.

Ameſa is by the Baſſa created King of Epirus.

When Scanderbeg (flying for feare, as the Turks ſuppoſed) was gone a great way out of their
E ſight towards LYSSA, and come euen to the borders of his kingdome, he there ſtaied all the reſt of that day. And a little before the going downe of the ſunne, he with a few ſelect horſemen departed from the armie, and with painfull trauell got vp to the top of the high mountaines, from whence a man might by day well diſcouer all the plaines of ÆMATHIA. There he appointed one Peieus Emanuel, a politicke and valiant gentleman, with certaine horſemen to marke diligently which way the enemie held, and by certaine ſecret and appointed waftings and ſignes, to giue knowledge thereof to the armie. After ſuch order taken, he returned himſelfe, and came again to the campe after midnight. And preſently riſing with his army, and fetching a compaſſe about, came vndiſcouered, and ſecretly encamped himſelfe as neere as he could vnto the mountains where his ſcouts lay, with eagles eies waiting for the leaſt mouing of the enemy. The Baſſa F deſirous to get as farre as he could into the countrey, before the heat of the day, began early in the morning to ſet forward, and came to the plaines of PHARSALIA, through the world ſpoken of for the great battell in them long time before fought, betweene the two moſt famous chiefetaines Cæſar and Pompeius: and now once more to be made famous, by the ſlaughter of the Turks. Here the enemy finding ſome ſtragling cattell, & other ſmall things which the countrey people had in their haſtie flight left behind them, fell to ſeeking after bootie, and as men without feare

feare, ſpent that day in roaming vp and downe the countrey, in hope to find ſomething: and at G night encamped without any great watch, but towards LYSSVM, from whence they (in great ſecuritie) looked for the comming of Scanderbeg; and as it were in diſgrace of him, carried Ameſa in triumph vp and downe the campe, as if he had beene already poſſeſſed of the kingdome of EPIRVS. Scanderbeg lying on the other ſide of the mountaines, perceiued by his eſpials which way the enemy lay: and with great ſilence vnder the couert of the mountaines and woods, ſecretly bent his courſe the ſame way, vntill he came to a mountaine called TVMENIST, at the foot whereof he encamped that night. The next morning the Baſſa holding on his way, came & encamped not farre from the ſame mountaine, and there ſtaied himſelfe with halfe his army, & ſent Ameſa with the other halfe to burne and ſpoile the countrey: who about noone returned H to the campe with ſuch prey as he had got, with his ſouldiers well wearied with trauell and the heat of the day. Scanderbeg like a carefull houſholder, who being about to entertaine and feaſt ſome honourable perſonages, truſteth not to his wife and ſeruants, but looketh vnto the beſtow-ing of his prouiſion himſelfe, carefully ordering and diſpoſing and ſetting forth all things, eſpe-cially if his prouiſion (for want of abilitie) be ſhort, to welcome ſo great gueſts; and ſetting all things forth to the greateſt ſhew, ſeeketh at leaſt to fill the eyes of his gueſts, although he doubt to ſatisfie their appetites: ſo he carefully viewing all the mountaines and thicke woods thereabouts without reſting, ſet Moſes in one place, Tanuſius in another, and all the reſt in places moſt conuenient. He appointeth euery man what to doe, and inſtructeth them, and conſidereth of euery particular circumſtance himſelfe: and ſo diuideth his forces, as might beſt ſerue his pur- I poſe, & make the moſt terrible ſhew vnto the enemie: for which purpoſe he in euery company placed moe trumpets, drums, & other inſtruments of warre, than he had before at any time vſed.
When he had ſo to his moſt aduantage beſtowed ſo many of his captaines and ſouldiers as he thought good, and as the nature of the places would giue leaue, he with 4000 horſemen and the like number of foot, ſpeedily marching vp the rough mountaine of TVMENIST, from thence plainly beheld in what order the Turks campe lay in the plaines below. The Turks, eſpecially they which were lately returned with Ameſa from the ſpoile of the country, lay ſcattered abroad in the fields, with their horſes vnbridled & vnſadled, reſting their weary bodies: ſome got vnder
The Turks campe buried in ſecuritie. the ſhadowes of trees were victualling themſelues; ſome hauing filled their bellies, lay faſt on ſleepe vpon the greene graſſe; the reſt were paſſing the time, ſome with one kind of ſport, ſome K with another, as ſouldiers do in field when they haue little or nothing to do: for it was then the hotteſt time both of the yeere & of the day, being about the midſt of Iuly, and the noonetime of the day. The like negligence was alſo in that part of the campe where the Baſſa himſelfe lay: euery man taking his eaſe and pleaſure, with ſmall regard of horſe or armour; for being out of feare of Scanderbeg, whom they thought to haue beene a great way off at LYSSVM, they lay as men without care wrapped vp in ſecuritie, the common deſtruction of great armies & common wealths. Ameſa with the great captaines, were at the ſame time all together in the Baſſaes paui-lion, conſulting what courſe they were beſt to take, to do ſomething to the contentment of Mahomet, and their owne commendation: Some ſaid it were beſt, with fire and ſword to deſtroy all they could in EPIRVS; and ſo hauing laid the countrey waſt, to returne: Others thought it better L to march directly to CROIA, to proue if the citizens could be perſwaded to yeeld themſelues, & receiue Ameſa for their King; otherwiſe to threaten them with a continuall ſiege, and vtter de-ſtruction of the country, if vpon the vaine expectation of helpe from Scanderbeg they ſhould refuſe to ſubmit themſelues. As for Scanderbeg himſelfe, who then lay houering ouer their heads, he was in all that conſultation leaſt feared: who from the top of the mountaine, beholding the ſecuritie & diſorder of the Turks campe, & delighted with the ſight therof; encouraged his ſouldiers, & martialed them in ſuch order as they were to follow him, for the charging and terrifying of the enemy. But firſt of all he determined to oppreſſe the Turks ſcouts, which lay at the foot of the mountain: for which purpoſe he himſelf with a few horſmen firſt ſecretly deſcended the mountain, the reſt of his army following ſhortly after, & ſo ſuddenly came vpon the ſcouts M that he ſlew them all, excepting one, who eſcaping by the ſwiftneſſe of his horſe, came running into the campe as one halfe feared out of his wit, crying out that Scanderbeg was comming. The Turks ſuſpecting nothing leſſe thā the cōming of him that way, at the preſent inſtant hardly beleeued that he was ſo nie: whē as he following him at the heeles as faſt as he could, with his horſmen & his footmen after them, was in a moment as if it had beene a ſudden tempeſt, broken in amongſt

A amongſt the vnarmed Turks, and there making great ſlaughter of them, filled all the campe with ſudden tumult and feare. Ameſa who at the firſt noiſe had ſpeedily got him to his charge, with his ſouldiours ſome halfe armed, ſome on foot, hauing no leiſure to bridle their horſes, was the firſt that made head againſt Scanderbeg. The Baſſa alſo did what he might in that ſudden feare and ſhortneſſe of time, to arme his men, and to put them in order: but whileſt theſe things were in doing, the ſouldiours which lay in ambuſh in the woods, came downe the mountaine with ſuch horrible ſhouts and noiſe of inſtruments of warre, as if heauen and earth ſhould haue preſently gone togither; the hills and vallies with their hollow ecchoes, encreaſing the terror of the alarum. Inſomuch, that the Turks diſmaied, and fearing that all the force of EPIRVS
B with the countries adioyning had come vpon them, began to flie on euerie ſide, before that Moſes and the reſt that lay in ambuſh were come into the plaines. Ameſa acquainted with his vnckles ſtratagems, as much as he could encouraged the Turks; crying alowd and telling them, That ſuch vaine tumults and terrours were not to be feared, being but the bare ſhifts and deuiſes of their enemies to couer their owne weakneſſe: and by his owne valour ſtaied many which before were about to haue fled. In this while, the Baſſa hauing put his men in beſt order he could, was comming to the aid of Ameſa, hardly charged by Scanderbeg: but in his ſetting forward, he was ſo valiantly encountred on the one ſide by Moſes with his horſemen, and on the other by Tanuſius and Emanuel with their footmen, that he was enforced, not without great loſſe, againe to retire vnto his trenches.

Scanderbeg ſuddenly aſſaileth the Turks.

C All the hope of the battell depended vpon Ameſa, who ſtill with great courage withſtood his vnckle; exhorting his ſouldiours valiantly as men to endure that firſt aſſault, which ſhould afterwards bring them moſt aſſured victorie: hartening them on with hope of ſpeedie help from their fellowes, if they would but a while endure the furie of their enemies, whoſe hearts (as he ſaid) would preſently be diſcouraged, if they preuailed not in that their firſt and deſperat attempt, hauing nothing elſe to truſt vnto. By which perſuaſion the Turks were againe encouraged, accounting it a great diſhonour to flie, and leaue their Chieftaine in the field. But when they ſaw Scanderbeg ſtill to preuaile vpon them, and that no help came as they hoped (for many were by Scanderbeg his horſemen ſlaine as they were arming themſelues; many were by the way cut off as they were comming, & the reſt put to flight) they which before fought valiantly with D Ameſa, turned their backs and fled alſo. Scanderbeg his horſemen purſuing the chaſe, made great ſlaughter of the Turks, and in the ſame chaſe tooke Ameſa priſoner. Scanderbeg, hauing ouerthrown that part of the Turks battell, was comming with a thouſand footmen and ſome horſemen, to haue ayded Moſes againſt the Baſſa: but before his comming, Moſes to blot out his former infamie, had with inuincible courage put the great Baſſa with all his army to flight: and Scanderbeg following the chaſe, gaue him not leaue to looke behind him, vntill he was got out of EPIRVS. Many were in this chaſe taken priſoners, and amongſt the reſt one Meſites a Sanzack, a man of great account amongſt the Turks. In this battell beſide the priſoners, were taken twentie of the Turks faireſt enſignes. As for horſes, armour, and other ſpoiles taken in the field, and in the campe, all which fell vnto the ſouldiors ſhare, it is almoſt incredible to be told. The E number of the ſlaine Turks is of diuers diuerſly reported, they which write of the moſt, recken vp thirtie thouſand; and they which ſpeake of the leaſt, account twentie thouſand. Of the Chriſtians were loſt but ſixtie. Now if any account it ſtrange, that ſo great a victorie ſhould be gained with ſo little loſſe; not to ſpeake of that is written in holy writ, let him but read the auncient hiſtories of the Romans, or the Chronicles of our owne Country, and he ſhall in them find victories no leſſe ſtrange. There was to be ſeene the ſudden and ſtrange alteration of theſe worldly things, no more indeed (whatſoeuer we account of them) to be reckoned of, than of things we haue not. Scanderbeg poſſeſſeth the rich pauilion, erſt belonging to the great Baſſa; and other of his captaines enioy tents, with much other rich furniture neuer prepared for their vſe. Ameſa which the ſame day as a victorious conquerour ouerran a great part of ÆMATHIA
F with his horſemen, and was in triumph carried vp with the generall acclamation of many thouſands of valiant ſouldiors, and honoured as a king, and of them ſo called; is now led through the Chriſtian army to his vnkle, with his hands bound behind him as a ſlaue, ſpeechleſſe and confounded, vnable to hold vp his head for ſhame: whoſe miſerie moued moſt of the beholders to compaſſion, and forced teares out of the eies of many.

A notable victorie of the chriſtians.

The next day after this great victorie, Scanderbeg cauſed the bodies of the ſlaine Turks to be be buried, togither with their horſes; which he did not for any regard of them, but that their G loathſome carkaſes ſhould not infect the countrey: and after that, returned in great triumph to CROIA. By the way as he went, the countrey people, which were before for feare of the Turks fled into the woods & mountaines in great multitudes, met him; as he did others alſo out of the cities, whoſe mouthes were all full of his worthy praiſes. Before him went the captiue Turks with their hands bound behind them, excepting ſuch as were enforced to carrie the Turks enſignes: Next vnto them followed the great Baſſaes rich pauilion, in ſuch manner ſupported by the ſouldiours, as if it had been in the field: Then came Scanderbeg himſelfe with the Turkiſh Sanzacke, and Ameza following him; for Ameſa had with great and humble ſute obtained of his vnckle, that he might not as he well deſerued, be carried bound amongſt the other captiues: H Laſt of all came Scanderbeg his victorious ſouldiours in goodly order, euery man leading a ſpare horſe taken from the enemy, and loaded with ſpoyle. So when he was come to CROIA, and there of his ſubiects ioyfully receiued, he brake vp his army, and gaue euerie man leaue at his pleaſure to depart. The Sanzacke, and Ameſa, were committed to ſafe keeping, vntill farther order was taken for them. Ameſa afterwards was for his treaſon worthely condemned to perpetuall priſon, and by an embaſſador from Scanderbeg ſent vnto king Alphonſus to NAPLES, there to be kept in durance; and with him was alſo ſent an honourable preſent of part of the ſpoile taken from the Turks, in token of the victorie. What became afterward of this Ameſa, concerneth not much the courſe of our hiſtorie; yet to ſatisfie the deſirous, I thinke it not amiſſe with him to ſtray a little out of the way. I

When Ameſa had remained a yeare in priſon at NAPLES, Scanderbeg vnderſtanding of the death of Alphonſus, by his Embaſſadour requeſted of Ferdinand his ſonne, to haue Ameſa reſtored to him againe. By which meanes he was brought backe againe into EPIRVS, and caſt in priſon at CROIA; but not in ſuch ſtraight manner as before: for Scanderbeg according to his accuſtomed clemencie, began now to forget the iniurie to him before done; and at laſt ouercome with the continuall ſupplication and teares of his nephew, pardoned him his life; and reſtoring him to his former libertie, receiued him alſo into his former fauor. But Ameſa remembring what pledges of his loyaltie he had left with Mahomet at CONSTANTINOPLE, and feariug what would become of his wife & children, if he ſhould haſtely vſe that his libertie, giuing his vnckle moſt humble thanks, brake vnto him his mind concerning that matter, as followeth: K

The ſpeech of Ameſa to Scanderbeg.

Whereas you of your owne gracious goodneſſe onely, without any deſert of mine, haue regarded my life and welfare, it behoooeth mee alſo to bee carefull for the life of others: leaſt whileſt I receiue your exceeding bountie with too much deſire of mine owne health and honour, I doe at this preſent, by this ſame benefit of yours, caſt away them, whom I haue long ſithence by mine owne treacherie vndone. Mine vnfortunate and guiltleſſe Wife is with Mahomet, my little and innocent Children are with him alſo: theſe yet liue, and ſhall liue, ſo long as the tyrant ſhall thinke, that I line in heart his; but when hee ſhall once perceiue by this your gracious dealing that I am fallen from him, the cruell creditor will foorthwith cut and rend in peeces the pledges of my faith, and their inno- L cent blood ſhall pay the guilt of their Fathers offence. Wherefore the Othoman tyrant is of mee by ſome deuice to be deceiued, that I may in the meane time preſerue thoſe pledges, vntill I may by ſome fit occaſion afterwards redeeme the ſame. I will by your leaue this night take my flight out of CROIA, as if I had broken priſon, and eſcaped againſt your will, and ſo flie vnto Mahomet, making the greateſt ſhew I can of my wonted loue and loyaltie towards him: not omitting to heare, or ſpeake vnto that credulous king ſuch things concerning your eſtate, as I was wont in my better fortune: that hauing ſo cleared my ſelfe of all ſuſpition, which he perhaps hath conceiued by reaſon of my captiuitie and long ſtay with you, I may at length, with my Wife and Children, ſo eſcape from him: Wherein you may helpe me much, if you ſhall openly make ſhew as if you were greeued with my eſcape, and ſeeme to be highly offended with the keepers of the priſon for the ſame. In the meane time, M whileſt I ſhall ſtay in the tyrants court expecting ſome fit time for my eſcape, I will ſtand you in ſtead of an intelligencer, ſo that your enemie ſhall not to my knowledge either attempt or goe about any thing againſt you, which ſhall be kept from your hearing or knowledge.

Scanderbeg refuſed not to graunt whatſoeuer he had requeſted, but ſaid vnto him:

Ameſa,

A Ameſa, ſithence we haue granted you life, with all the good things thereunto belonging, wee will not prohibit you to vſe that our gift to your moſt good, and to the preſeruation of them who for euer may moſt iuſtly call vpon you, as debtor vnto them, for their welfare and libertie. Goe thy waies, proceed, take thy time and occaſion as ſeemeth vnto thee beſt; and at length reforme thy ſelfe, whileſt thou yet haſt ſufficient time and ſpace. We now beleeue you in all things, and well like of this your deuiſe: Ameſa you ſhall herein deceiue no man but your ſelfe, if you ſhall longer follow the faith and court of the barbarous King, whereas like danger is both of bodie and ſoule both to thee and thine. Whenſoeuer thou ſhalt returne vnto vs, thou canſt not doe vs a greater pleaſure: and in what regard thou haſt heretofore beene with vs, in the ſame thou ſhalt be with vs againe. The anſwere of Scanderbeg to Ameſa.

B The ſame night Ameſa by ſecret order from Scanderbeg, eſcaped both out of priſon and out of CROIA: and in the morning it was all ouer the citie, that he was gone, and the keepers ſharply rebuked for their negligence. He comming to CONSTANTINOPLE, eaſily perſwaded Mahomet, that he was by chance eſcaped, with all things elſe that he told him: yet was he not for all that, ſo well graced of him as before; not for any diſtruſt he had in the man, but for the euill ſucceſſe he had in the former warres. Now whether Ameſa neglected his promiſed returne, or could find no opportunitie to performe the ſame, is vncertaine: but certaine it is, that ſhortly after he died at CONSTANTINOPLE, poiſoned as was thought by the commandement of Mahomet, who could no longer endure the ſight of him, whom he reckoned the au- The death of Ameſa.
C thor of the notable ouerthrow receiued in ÆMATHIA. This was the wofull end of this noble and valiant man, well worthie of remembrance, had not his haughtie thoughts ſoared too high with the deſire of ſoueraigntie.

When Mahomet vnderſtood in what manner Iſaack Baſſa was ouerthrowne, and his armie diſcomfited, he was therewith much greeued, and iuſtly blamed the Baſſaes ſecuritie: yet ſuch was his credit with his ſoueraigne, that the matter was in better ſort paſſed ouer than was ſuppoſed it would haue beene. Neuertheleſſe, Mahomet in reuenge thereof would willingly haue imployed all his forces vpon Scanderbeg, if his more vrgent affaires would haue ſo permitted. For at the ſame time, beſides that great warres began to ariſe betwixt him and the Venetians (which continued for many yeeres after) he was certainly enformed, That the Chriſtian Princes
D were making a ſtrong confederation againſt him. At which time Mahomet diſdaining openly to ſue for peace at Scanderbegs hands, cunningly practiſed by ſuch as were ſent to redeeme the priſoners, and alſo by the Sanzacke himſelfe, to perſwade Scanderbeg to require peace of him; aſſuring him, that if he did but aske it, it would for a long time be eaſily obtained. Which thing Scanderbeg well acquainted with the Turkiſh policie, vtterly refuſed to doe. Wherfore Mahomet for defence of his countries bordering vpon EPIRVS, ſent two of his moſt expert captaines, Sinam, and Hamur, with each of them foureteene thouſand ſouldiers into MACEDONIA, expreſly charging them not to enter at any time or vpon any occaſion, into EPIRVS, or by any meanes to prouoke Scanderbeg: which his commandement they ſo well obſerued, that the Epirots by the ſpace of almoſt two yeeres enioyed the fruits of peace, although there was no peace at all
E concluded. So that the remembrance of old iniuries wearing out with time, at length by the mediation of the ſame captains, a peace for a yeere was agreed vpon betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg. In which time he paſſed ouer into APVLIA, and there notably aided King Ferdinand againſt the French, the proceeding wherein, as not pertinent to our hiſtorie, I of purpoſe paſſe ouer. A peace for a yeere concluded betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg.

After that the time of the peace before concluded was expired, all things now going well with Mahomet, as he deſired, he determined according to his wonted maner to trouble the quiet eſtate of Scanderbeg: and ſo ſending a new ſupplie of ſouldiers vnto Synam beg, who then lay with a ſtrong garriſon vpon the frontiers of EPIRVS, commanded him with all his power to make wars vpon Scanderbeg. Synam accordingly, with an armie of twentie thouſand men entred into EPIRVS, where he was forthwith encountered by Scanderbeg, and his armie vtterly ouerthrown, F ſo that but few eſcaped by flight with Synam himſelfe. Preſently after he ſent Aſam-beg, another of his captaines, into the ſame ſeruice, with an armie of thirtie thouſand, whom Scanderbeg alſo in plaine battaile vanquiſhed at OCRIDA: in which battaile Aſam himſelfe was ſore wounded, and finding no way to eſcape, was glad to yeeld himſelfe priſoner to Scanderbeg, by whom he was courteouſly vſed, and afterwards ſet at libertie. Iuſſum-beg following Aſam with eighteene thouſand into EPIRVS, was ſet vpon by Scanderbeg alſo, and hauing loſt part of his armie, was glad by ſpeedie flight to ſaue himſelfe with the reſt. After all this, Caraza-beg, an old Captaine G and a man of great experience (who had beene a great commaunder, and a companion with Scanderbeg in the time of old Amurath) requeſted of Mahomet, That he might proue his fortune againſt his old acquaintance Scanderbeg, aſſuring him of better ſucceſſe than before. The long and approued experience of this old leader put Mahomet in ſuch hope of good ſpeed, that he gaue preſent order for the leuying of ſuch an armie as Caraza had requeſted, and for ten thouſand mo than he had at the firſt required. With this ſtrong armie, in number almoſt forty thouſand, Caraza ſet forward, hauing before filled the minds of men with the expectation of ſome greater matter to haue been by him done. Scanderbeg vnderſtanding certainly that Caraza was comming, ſtood more in doubt of the man than of his power: and therefore aſſembled greater H forces than he had vſually done before: and to welcome him, ſent two thouſand of his beſt and moſt expert ſouldiors ſecretly into the enemies country; who lying in ambuſh amongſt the woods and mountaines, whereby Caraza muſt needs paſſe, ſuddenly ſet vpon foure thouſand horſemen, the forerunners of Caraza his armie; who marching diſorderedly, and fearing no ſuch matter, were in a trice ouerthrowne, and moſt part of them ſlaine: thoſe few that eſcaped, fled backe again to the armie, as if they had come in poaſt to bring tidings of ſome haſtie newes to the Generall. With which ſo vnfortunat a beginning, Caraza was ſo diſcomfited, that if he might for ſhame, he could haue beene content to haue returned againe and gone no farther: yet for his honours ſake holding on his way, he came into Epirvs; where whileſt he was (after the manner of old men) long in reſoluing what courſe to take, he was vpon the ſudden aſſailed I by Scanderbeg, before he could well put his men in order of battaile. At which time there fell ſuch a vehement ſhower of raine, that both the armies were glad to retire before any great hurt was done. Three dayes together it rained cõtinually (for it was about the later end of Autumne) all which time Scanderbeg ceaſed not in one place or other to trouble the Turks campe: ſo that the old Generall, partly diſtempered with the extremitie of the weather, which for the violence thereof he tooke to be ominous; and more diſcouraged with the reſtleſſe attempts of Scanderbeg, riſe with his armie, and retiring back, by the ſame way he came returned to Constantinople. Where he was well derided of Mahomet, that hauing promiſed ſo much, had performed ſo little: yet afterwards was again by him in ſome ſort commended, for that he had with leſſe loſſe looked vpon Scanderbeg, than other his Generals before ſent againſt him. K

Mahomet perceiuing that Scanderbeg was not to be ſubdued but with ſuch forces as he was not then at leiſure to imploy vpon him, thought it not amiſſe to proue if he could by faire ſpeeches & glorious ſhewes of fained friendſhip get within him, and ſo bring him to confuſion. For which purpoſe he ſent vnto him an Embaſſadour, with rich preſents, and letters of this purport.

Sultan Mahomet, Lord and Emperour of the Eaſt and of the Weſt, and of all parts of the World, vnto Scanderbeg, prince of Albania and Epirvs, ſendeth greeting.

The letters of Mahomet to Scanderbeg.

I thinke friend Scanderbeg, that no acquaintance can be greater, or friendſhip more firme, then that L which hath growne of long and mutuall conuerſing and liuing together: and eſpecially if the ſame haue taken beginning from childhood and tender yeares, as you know it hath done betwixt vs two; who haue of long time, euen from our childhood, liued together in great loue and friendſhip, when as you firſt lay as hoſtage in my fathers court. Wherefore beloued Scanderbeg, when as I call to remembrance all thoſe things, with others, wherewith our youthfull yeares were then delighted; and being mindfull alſo of all thoſe things which you haue oftentimes done for the aduancement of our empire and kingdome, and for the glorie of the Othoman familie; I cannot chuſe but imbrace thee with a ſingular zeale and affection. For I take God to witnes, that nothing could chance more welcome or pleaſing vnto me in my life, then to haue thee with mee, and for a while to enioy thy companie. Neither needeſt thou to feare any thing to come vnto me, for that my ſouldiors without my knowledge or commaundement haue of late broken in M and ſpoiled thy kingdome: which thing as reaſon required, was vnto me exceedingly diſpleaſing: neither did it any whit offend me, that they were by thy forces vanquiſhed and ouercome, and ſo receiued the iuſt reward of their euill deſerts, and that all things fell out with thee according to the equitie of thy cauſe, and as thy heart could haue deſired. But to let theſe things paſſe, the remembrance of our old loue and friendſhip perſuadeth me to come to agreement, and to ioine together with thee in a perpetuall league

A of amitie: to the intent that our ancient acquaintance and familiaritie, which by reaſon of long abſence is almoſt worne out, may againe take life, encreaſe, and be confirmed. Of which peace, let theſe be the capitulations, if they ſhall ſeeme vnto you reaſonable: for I know it belongeth vnto him that requireth not the peace, to appoint the conditions of the ſame. Firſt, we require of you freely and peaceably to ſuffer our armies to paſſe through your kingdome, for the beſieging of the cities and inuading of the countries ſubiect to the Venetians our enemies: Then, to deliuer vnto vs your ſonne Iohn in hoſtage, whom we will alwayes vſe as one of our owne naturall children: And afterwards, that our marchants and men of trade may peaceably come and trauell into all parts of your kingdome with their marchandiſe, and there freely and ſafely vſe their negotiation: Laſt of all, that your ſelfe in perſon may at your plea-

In which things if you will yeeld vnto vs, I promiſe in the faith of a King, to grant vnto you and your kingdome ſincere peace, with perpetuall tranquillitie; and that there ſhall not be any more deerer vnto me than your ſelfe; and will neuer to the vttermoſt of our power permit your kingdome to be infeſted or moleſted by any of our ſubiects, or others. Whatſoeuer you ſhall farther receiue from vs by the mouth of our embaſſadour* Muſtapha, you may thereto giue full credence. Fare you well. From our imperiall palace at CONSTANTINOPLE the 10 of May 1461.

Scanderbeg hauing receiued theſe letters, and well conſidered of the ſame, returned him anſwere by the ſame meſſenger as followeth:

C The ſouldier of Chriſt Ieſus, George Caſtriot, otherwiſe called Scanderbeg, Prince of the Albanenſes and Epirots, vnto Mahomet Prince of the Turks, greeting.

The anſwere of Scanderbeg to the former letters of Mahomet.

Your letters (moſt magnificent) are deliuered vnto vs: wherein you write of your exceeding loue and ſingular affection towards vs, confirmed as you ſay by old acquaintance: which being growne vp betwixt vs, and by tract of time firmely rooted and as it were into nature conuerted, ſhall alwaies retaine his force and ſtrength. But for as much as it ſeemeth vnto you good to awake the ſame, hauing of long time and many yeeres lien as it were aſleepe; and to make a motion that we ſhould enter into a certaine new league and confederation, whereof amongſt other conditions of the league by you propounded, this
D is one, That your forces may freely paſſe through my kingdome, to inuade the Venetians: Vnto this your requeſt, worthie Mahomet, it ſtandeth neither with equitie nor with mine honour to conſent, for ſo much as the Venetians are my eſpeciall good friends and confederates. As for that you deſire to haue my ſonne Iohn with you in hoſtage for the better aſſurance of the peace betwixt vs, I ſhould peraduenture doe it (moſt noble Mahomet) if fatherly affection would giue me leaue: but ſithence I haue no moe but him, and he as yet a tender child, it is not for the good either of him or vs, to haue him now taken from vs, when as he ought of vs to be moſt tenderly cheriſhed, and carefully inſtructed. As for that you requeſted concerning your marchants, that they may freely and ſafely trafficke into my kingdome at their pleaſure, I can be content to yeeld thereunto, and wiſh heartily that there might be a free entercourſe for our marchants indifferently with their commodities into both our kingdomes. Farther, whereas you earneſtly perſwade me boldly and without feare to come vnto you, that by ſuch enteruiew and perſonall preſence, our great deſire, growne of long abſence, might be the better ſatisfied: in this thing moſt excellent
E Prince, I cannot but praiſe your moſt honourable diſpoſition, and commend your good nature; and would therefore boldly follow your perſwaſion, if my other vrgent affaires, with the gouernment of my kingdome, would ſo permit. But what ſhould I doe? My ſonne Iohn is (as I ſaid before) but little, and as yet vnfit to gouerne: and my people (as you know) loue alwayes to haue ſomething to doe; being by nature a fierce and reſtleſſe nation, whom I my ſelfe haue much adoe to rule and gouerne: For all that, I will come vnto you according to your deſire, expecting only a more commodious time. So fare you well, and loue me ſtill. From our campe the 30 of May, 1461.

When Mahomet had receiued theſe letters, and well peruſed the ſame, he writ to him againe F in manner following:

Sultan Mahomet, Emperour of all the parts of the World, vnto Scanderbeg, Prince of the Albanenſes and Epirots, greeting.

The letters of Mahomet to Scanderbeg for the concluding of a perpetuall peace betwixt them.

Your letters we haue receiued by our embaſſadour Muſtapha, wherein you giue vs to vnderſtand, that you like of none of the conditions of peace by vs propounded, but onely that concerning our marchants and G men of trade, that they might freely and at their pleasure vse their traffique and trades with their marchandise to and fro : and vpon this condition onely you grant vs peace. This your offer we accept of, and all the rest of your excuses we willingly admit : wherefore I promise vnto thee (my louing Scanderbeg) and will performe all that thou doest require, and vpon that resolution rest : and will so long as I liue ob-serue and keepe a sincere and inuiolable peace with thee for euer, except thou first giue cause of violating the same. And for that purpose haue we with our vsuall and imperiall seale signed these our letters, which we by our embassadour Mustapha haue sent vnto thee, as thereby confirming vnto thee this per- petuall peace. Wherefore you also (if you be so content) may subscribe, and with your seale confirme this of ours, that I in like manner may also haue your like consent and agreement. And would farther, H that you would command knowledge thereof to be made by open proclamation through all your kingdome, as I will in like manner cause to be done through mine. And for the more manifestation of this my loue towards you, I would also that you should vnderstand, That of mine owne meere motion and bountie, I doe freely giue vnto you all those things, which you by force of armes haue taken from my father in ALBANIA and EPIRVS, so that you may possesse and enioy the same, as if they had alwayes beene yours and your ancestors : Wherefore I giue, grant, and confirme vnto thee and thy heires, all the right, title, or interest, which I heretofore had therein : and from henceforth will alwayes account and repute thee as Prince of ALBANIA and EPIRVS, and so call thee. And as I haue promised thee in the faith of a King, will neuer hereafter with warres molest thee or thine, except thou thy selfe giue cause thereof.

Wherefore after you haue with your seale confirmed these things, you may commend them to our faithfull I embassadour Mustapha, to be by him brought vnto vs : vnto whom I would you should in all things giue full credit. So fare you well, and render vs loue for loue. From our imperiall palace at CONSTAN-TINOPLE, the 22 of Iune, 1461.

A peace concluded betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg.

Vpon receit of these letters a peace was concluded betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg, and the same by publike proclamations solemnly published through both their kingdomes, to the great reioycing of many. Which peace was for a season faithfully kept on both sides, vntill that the Turks lying in garrison vpon the frontiers of EPIRVS, began after their wonted manner againe to fetch preyes and booties out of the countrey. Of which iniuries Scanderbeg by letters complained to Mahomet : who answered that he was altogether ignorant thereof, and seemed in shew to be much offended with the insolencie of the doers thereof : and forthwith caused many things to be againe restored. By which meanes the peace before concluded, was still as before continued. K

A little before the conclusion of the aforesaid peace, great warres began to arise betwixt the Turks & the Venetians : who all this while being in league with the Turke, peaceably followed their traffique and trades of marchandise, little or nothing at all regarding their neighbours harmes and miseries, vntill that now the flame and fire began to take hold vpon their owne houses, and as it were to awaken them out of a dead sleepe. For Mahomet after he had subuerted the empire of CONSTANTINOPLE, and driuen Thomas and Demetrius the Emperours brethren out of PELOPONESVS (now called MOREA) rested not so contented, but by his lieutenants L and other great captaines began to disturbe the quiet of the Venetians, who then held in their possession METHONE, CORONE, NEAPOLIS, ARGOS, with diuers other strong townes in PELOPONESVS, standing vpon the sea coast. And now it chanced, that about this time, Iosue, Mahomets lieutenant in PELOPONESVS, had by the treason of a Greeke priest, vpon the suddaine surprised the citie of ARGOS : And Omares another of his great captaines, hauing first spoiled the countrey about NAVPACTVM (now LEPANTO) entered farther into the territorie of the Venetians about METHONE and CORONE, making hauocke of whatsoeuer came in his way. With which iniuries, plainly tending to open warre, the Venetian Senatours being much troubled, sate oftentimes in counsell, deliberating with much care what course to take in a matter of so great importance. Some being of opinion, that it were best to send embas- M sadors to Mahomet, so to make proofe if the matter might by faire means be redressed: others on the contrary part deeming it to be to no purpose so to doe; for as much as such great and manifest outrages, nothing differing from plaine hostilitie, could not possibly be done without the tyrants knowledge and expresse command. After the Senatours had oftentimes met together, & with many great reasons debated the matter to and fro, and yet for all that concluded nothing

(as

A (as in consultations of great matters with a multitude, it most commonly falleth out to be a harder matter, and to require longer time, to bring the multitude to some certaine resolution, than it is afterwards to performe the same in action.) In this so great a diuersitie of opinions concerning so weightie a cause, at length one Victor Capella, a noble gentleman and graue Senator, stept vp in the middest of the Senate, and there franckly deliuered this notable speech vnto the rest concerning the matter propounded, as followeth:

The notable speech of Victor Capella, to perswad the Venetians to take vp armes against Mahomet.

I haue before this at other times by long experience often noted (most noble Senatours) that in all our greatest consultations of matters most concerning our common state, some are alwayes so addicted or rather wedded vnto their owne conceits, that they can hardly with patience endure to heare B the reasonable opinion of others contrary to their owne; the chiefe cause of our slow resolutions. Wherefore I haue thought it good, briefely at this time to call vpon you for resolution: for as much as I see we must of necessitie take vp armes, be we neuer so loth or vnwilling: For to my vnderstanding, you doe but betray the state, in delaying the time to make present warre vpon the barbarous enemie. Yet many principall men amongst vs, aduise vs to beware, that we doe not rashly or vnaduisedly determine of matters of so great consequence; and thinke it requisit, that we should send embassadours vnto the tyrant, to expostulate with him his vniust dealing in breaking his faith and league; and withall to request him to obserue the conditions of the peace before agreed vpon, if happily he may rather by perswasion than by armes be mooued to change his purpose: and if by this meanes nothing C may be obtained, then at length they thinke it necessarie to resolue to make warre vpon him. They alledge further, That if we shall attempt warre, our cities in the continent bordering vpon the Ionian, in PELOPONESVS, with diuers others of ours in the firme land, will not be able to hold out very long, but for want of necessaries must needs perish with the first of the trouble; besides that, if those places shall be wasted and spoiled, great losse (as they say) shall ensue thereby vnto most of vs in priuat: the greatest motiue (perhaps) wherefore they thinke it most conuenient to deferre the warres, and for that purpose to send our embassadours vnto him. Of which embassage, first by your leaue a few words. At such time as these our embassadours, men of great wisedome and reach, not long since came vnto him, he had them in no regard; but dallying off the time with fraudulent, deceitfull, and glosing speeches, did indeed such things to the contrary as we least hoped: wherefore I can- D not well deuise (if we should send them, or such others againe) what especiall thing of all that we then gaue them in charge, they should now propound vnto him, hauing already said what is to be said; except they should say, That whereas we are not of sufficient strength and power to wage warre against him, we would be glad to decide the matter by talke, and by that simple meanes to redresse our iniuries; and vpon the matter, to shew our selues prest and readie to fall to agreement with him, according as shall stand with his good pleasure and liking. Truly this were good plaine dealing, but it will not serue our turne: ARGOS is alreadie taken from vs, and hee maketh open warre vpon vs: wherein he doth but prooue our courage, and trie how long wee will put vp these iniuries. If wee will quietly digest these, hee will then confidently and without feare proceed further: but if wee shall as best beseemeth vs, valiantly resist him, hee shall bee glad of such rest as wee shall giue him; and when hee E knoweth not well which way to turne himselfe, shall bee as glad as wee to lay downe armes and to seeke for peace: whereas if wee shall doe otherwise, I feare wee shall repent our selues when it will be too late. It is reported, that as soone as he was come into PELOPONESVS, hee went himselfe in person vnto EVBŒA, to view the citie of CALCIS: and going a second time out of PELOPONESVS, sounded the depth of the passage, and came within the sight of the cittie, of purpose to haue assaulted it, if hee had found oportunitie: at which time hee himselfe rid ouer that strait of the sea betwixt BŒOTIA and EVBŒA with his horse, and curiously viewed in what place hee might most conueniently passe ouer with his armie to besiege the citie. Verely these are the most manifest signes of war, whereby any man may sufficiently prooue, that hee hath long since resolued (so soone as he is readie) to make warre vpon vs, whilest wee are yet dreaming in the middest of our long consultations. Hee will pro- F ceed in the warres hee hath begun: and cutting vs short, augment his owne dominions. Then will hee blame his lieutenants and captaines, as authors thereof: but yet still bee doing that best serueth his purpose. And whilest no man opposeth himselfe against him, his power dayly encreasing, hee will doe the best he can suddainely to swallow vs vp, being vnprouided. For hee may easily raise great forces, that by sufferance of others, maketh himselfe of great strength there where hee had before no footing. Shall wee then say that wee haue no warres with this encroching tyrant? Some I know feed themselues and others also, with vaine hopes, saying, That he will neuer turne his forces vpon vs, nor ruinate our G estate, although hee might at ease doe it: wherefore (say they) let vs refraine from warres, and vse our peace and quietnesse, yet omitting nothing in the meane time that shall bee needefull for our safe-tie. But for as much as it plainely appeareth vnto all men by that which is before said, That hee hath already indeed proclaimed warre against vs, inuading our countries, surprising our cities, and killing our people: Whether thinke you it more expedient or profitable for vs, to sit still and suffer our dominions to bee taken from vs, or rather by open warre to make the barbarous king know the great-nesse of our power and strength? For if wee shall enter into open warre, wee being in armes sufficiently prouided for all euents, and with carefull eye attending all his attempts, shall easily auoid both himselfe and all his deuises: who if hee bee suffered to runne still on forward with his prosperous suc- H cesse, people will dayly more and more fall vnto him, in hope to liue the better, as his friends. For which cause, I thinke it better to preferre an honourable warre before a doubtfull peace. As for delay, it hath hurt many great States, and our selues most of all: whereby we haue in sort betrayed the empire of GRECIA, with the wofull Emperour himselfe, when as this tyrant battered the wals of CONSTAN-TINOPLE: for our traffique was much holpen by the Grecians, whom we then left to themselues. After that, we despised and reiected the pitifull complaints of the Princes of PELOPONESVS, who with teares craued our aid: and now wee see that famous countrey lost, and fallen into his hands, through our sloth and negligence. Of late, when as the King of BOSNA humbly requested our aid, and promised fully to requite our courtesie, and whatsoeuer else we should doe in his behalfe; we suffered his kingdome to be lost, and himselfe to be cruelly murdered of the Turks. For all these things I by vs thus neglected, we cannot escape the infamous report of all the rest of the nations in EVROPE, but that they will say, That we for the greedie desire of trade and filthie gaine, haue forsaken, and for our parts betrayed whole kingdomes and nations, agreeing with vs both in manner and religion; and to haue stood still, looking on, vntill they were subdued and brought in thraldome by the Turks.

Wherefore in few words to shut vp the matter, if we shall ioyne in league with the Hungarians, and enter into armes, we shall so be able to keepe our owne: whereas if we shall vse delayes, and hunt after peace, we shall in short time see, that he will suddenly deuoure vs, being vnprouided, and wrest from vs all our prouinces and territories which border vpon him. And therefore it is (in my opinion) best to send our imbassadours into HVNGARIE with a great masse of money to stirre vp that warlike nation into the fellowship of this war. And beside the nauie we now haue in readinesse, to put to K sea as many moe ships and gallies as wee are able. The great Bishop also is not to bee forgotten, but by all meanes to be drawne as a chiefe man into this warre. Besides all this, wee must doe what wee can to raise vp rebellion against the Turke in PELOPONESVS: which will bee no hard matter to bring to passe. For if the Poloponesians rise in armes with one of their poore princes which reuolted from the Turkish king, and forsaking all that they had, aduentured themselues into all manner of perill and danger: what thinke you they will doe, if they shall see so great forces comming both by sea and land against the Turkish king? It were good also, that wee should send two thousand Italian horsemen into PELOPONESVS, to animate the people: who when they shall see vs thus to proceede, will vndoub-tedly presently reuolt from the Turks, and yeeld themselues with their countrey vnto vs, from whence wee may most commodiously vex and molest this tyrant: For there is no where better entrance into his L kingdome, than by the way of PELOPONESVS. So that ioyning in league with the Hungarians, we shall bee set him on euery side: they all along the riuer of DANVBIVS, and we out of PELOPONESVS.
Let vs not therefore sit still with our hands in our bosoms, suffering our countreys to bee taken from vs, and our subiects made bondslaues to the Turks: but encouraging them by our example, animate them to take vp armes, and valiantly to resist the cruell and barbarous tyrant.

The Venetians take vp armes against the Turk.

The greater part of the Senat mooued with this graue Senatours speech, decreed without delay to make warres, and to send their embassadours to the Pope, the king of HVNGARIE, and other the Christian princes their neighbours, to pray aid of them in these warres against the Turkes. According to this decree, the Venetians for defence of their territorie sent one M Bertholdus Este, a valiant captaine, with an armie into PELOPONESVS: where at his first com-ming, he in short time recouered the citie of ARGOS before lost. And departing thence, marched through the country with his armie of fifteene thousand men vnto the strait of CORINTH, called ISTHMVS. At which place Aloisius Lauretanus, Admirall for the Venetians (by appointment before made) met him: and there ioyning their forces together, with great labour

in

A in the ſpace of fifteene daies fortified all that ſtrait from the Ionian vnto the ſea Ægeum, with a continuall rampier and double ditch, in length about fiue miles. In which worke they vſed the helpe of thirtie thouſand men: and in doing thereof, were much furthered by the ruines of the old wall before deſtroyed by Amurath. The Venetian commanders hauing fortified this ſtrait, encamped before CORINTH, and laied ſtrait ſiege vnto it: where at the ſecond aſſault, Bertholdus the Generall deſirous by his owne forwardneſſe to encourage his ſouldiours, was in that aſſault grieuouſly wounded with a ſtone, caſt downe vpon him from the wall, of which hurt he ſhortly after died. Neuertheleſſe, the ſiege was ſtill continued by Betinus Calcinatius, who ſucceeded in Bartholdus his place. But whileſt the Venetians lay thus at the ſiege of Co-
B RINTH, ſuddainly newes was brought vnto the campe that Mahomet was comming with a great armie himſelfe in perſon to raiſe the ſiege, and to deſtroy the new fortifications at ISTHMVS. Whereupon the Venetians left the ſiege, with purpoſe to haue defended the late fortified ſtrait. But after that it was certainely knowne, that Mahomet was euen now at hand with an armie of foureſcore thouſand Turkes, Betinus diſtruſting with his ſmall number to be able to defend the ſtrait againſt ſo puiſſant an armie, left the place ſo lately before fortified, and with all his armie retired to NEAPOLIS to keepe the ſea coaſt.

Shortly after, Mahomet without any reſiſtance at all entered with a world of men by the ſtrait into PELOPONESVS: and when he had with the great ſlaughter of the countrie people roamed vp and downe about ARGOS, he came to NEAPOLIS, and in moſt terrible manner aſ-
C ſaulted the citie twice: both which times he was notably repulſed by the Venetians, and many of his men ſlaine. Departing thence, he deſtroyed and waſted the countrie about METHONE (now MODON) and CORONE; and aſſaulted the citie of IVNCVM, but with no better ſucceſſe than he had before NEAPOLIS. Wherefore Winter now drawing on, he returned with his armie to CONSTANTINOPLE.

After his departure, the Venetians ſpoiled all that part of ARCHADIA which was ſubiect to the Turkes, requiting him with like iniuries as he had done them before. Not long after, Lauretanus the Venetian Admirall had the iſland of LEMNOS deliuered vnto him by one Cominius, a famous pyrat, who had ſurpiſed the ſame, and taken it from the Turkes: but diſtruſting how he ſhould be able to keepe the ſame, deliuered it ouer vnto the Venetians. Shortly after, Vrſatus
D Iuſtinianus, a great magnifico amongſt the Venetians, was ſent to ſucceed Lauretanus their Admirall: But whileſt he was ſcouring the Ægeum with a fleet of two and thirtie great gallies, Andreas Dandalus, Generall of their forces at land, inconſiderately encountering with the Turkes horſemen betweene MANTINEA and PITHEME, was by them ouerthrowne and ſlaine, and with him diuerſe other gentlemen of great account. In which skirmiſh fifteene hundred of the Venetians were ſlaine alſo with their Generall. And as fortune is neuer more conſtant than in miſchiefe, ſo at the ſame time Vrſatus, Generall at ſea, landing his men in the iſland of LESBOS, beſieged the citie of MITYLENE, and gaue thereunto two great aſſaults, wherein he loſt fiue thouſand men. And vnderſtanding that the Turkes fleet was comming to relieue the citie, raiſed the ſiege, and ſailed into EVBŒA, and from thence paſſed ouer into PELOPONESVS: where he ſhort-
E ly after died for ſorrow and griefe of mind. In whoſe place the Venetians ſent another famous captaine called Iacobus Lauretanus.

The Venetians enter into confederation with other Chriſtian princes againſt the Turke.

The Venetians well conſidering the great power of the Turkiſh emperor, laboured by their embaſſadours, to draw as many of the Chriſtian princes as they could into the fellowſhip of this warre; but eſpecially the great Biſhop, by whoſe meanes they were in good hope to be greatly ſtrengthened. Pius the ſecond of that name was then the great Biſhop, who at firſt anſwered the Venetian embaſſadours, That he muſt take away the little Turke, before he had any thing to do with the great: meaning thereby, Sigiſmundus Maleteſta, prince of ARIMINVM, whom he deadly hated, for that he tooke part with the French againſt the Aragonians. Howbeit (the warres in ITLIE being well appeaſed) Pius ſtill ſollicited by the Venetians, F made great preparation againſt the Turkes, giuing it out, That he would in perſon himſelfe goe vnto thoſe warres: and by his authoritie, then much regarded, procured great aid out of GERMANIE, FRANCE, SPAINE, and other countries alſo farther off: at which time alſo voluntarie men in great numbers reſorted out of all parts of Chriſtendome into ITALIE, readie to aduenture their liues in thoſe religious warres. At the ſame time alſo the Venetians had with much adoe by the working of Paulus Angelus, Archbiſhop of DIRRACHIVM, perſuaded Scanderbeg derbeg to renounce the league which he had before made with the Turke, and to enter into arms againe: which he presently did, and vpon the sudden spoyled the borders of the Turks dominions next vnto him. Wherwith Mahomet was no losse troubled, than with all the rest of the great preparation of the Christians against him: fearing that (as it was then reported) he should bee made generall of the Christian armie, which Mahomet feared might tend to the vtter ruine of his kingdome: so dreadfull was the name of Scanderbeg amongst the Turks. Wherefore thinking it most expedient for his affaires, to reconcile him if it were possible, by his embassadour sent for that purpose, writ vnto him as followeth: G

Sultan Mahomet, Emperour of the East and of the West, vnto Scanderbeg, prince of the Albanenses and of the Epirots, greeting. H

The letters of Mahomet to Scanderbeg.

I haue alwaies had thy fidelitie and vpright dealing in great admiration, most noble prince Scanderbeg: for which cause, I thought it a thing incredible, that thou being a prince of such an heroicall and princely perfection, should so inconsiderately and without any occasion breake the faith and league which thou not long since solemnely contracted with me. For as I am aduertised, thou hast entred into the confines of our dominions with a great armie, and with fire and sword destroying all that thou couldest, hast carried away with thee a great bootie. Of which thing I know right well, that the Venetians are the onely cause, by whose counsell and persuasion thou hast beene set on to doe this deed; and seduced by their allurements and subtill persuasions, hast made war vpon me, and art become the faithlesse breaker I of thine owne league, and of the sacred law of nations. Yet doe I little or nothing blame thee therefore, regarding more the cause of the ignominie, than the despight it selfe, and lay the blame vpon them who haue alwaies beene my foes and capitall enemies, rather than vpon thee. But alas, what is this vnto me (Scanderbeg) that thou hast done, which possesse so many and so large dominions? Diddest thou thinke to doe so great hurt vnto our kingdome, by spoyling a little peece of our countrie, and by stealing our cattell, more like a theefe and robber than an open enemie? Which thing I yet account not worth the name of an iniurie. But if thou thinke it so good, proceed in these thy doings: for I make more account of thy friendship and loue, than of whatsoeuer is to me deerest: because as thou knowest I haue alwaies borne vnto thee an especiall fauour, and loued thee most entirely. And therefore as oft as I call to remembrance our tender yeares and old familiaritie whilest we liued together in my fathers court at K HADRIANOPLE, I cannot but thinke my selfe bound vnto thee in all courtesie. And therefore my good Scanderbeg, I most heartily request and entreat thee, That we renuing the former conclusions of of peace, may of new confirme the same by solemne oath: wherewith if the former peace had beene established, thou wouldest not haue suffered thy selfe to haue beene now of the Venetians so circumuented or seduced. It is therefore needfull, that we now againe for euer confirme a league and peace betwixt vs by solemne and sacred oath on both sides: which if thou shalt doe (as I hope thou wilt) and in this be aduised by me, thou with thy posterity shall vndoubtedly alwaies raigne in peace, and in safetie possesse whatsoeuer is yours. Whereas if thou shalt doe otherwise (beleeue me) it will repent thee, and that right quickly. Thou knowest alreadie my force, which whether thou be able to withstand or not, thou were best to be well aduised. The poore princes thy neighbors, the Venetians thy seducers, cannot deliuer thee from my forces L and power. Doest thou not see the Grecians almost all rooted out before thy face? the emperours of CONSTANTINOPLE and TRAPEZOND by vs depriued of their empires? the princes of SERVIA and RASCIA destroyed? the king of BOSNA put to death? and all the kingdomes of ASIA, with many other kings and princes moe vanquished and ouerthrowne, and made subiect vnto me? Wherefore Scanderbeg, I aduise thee in this to follow my counsell, keepe thy promise, and so beleeue me thou shalt not be deceiued. Concerning these matters, we haue giuen further commandement to our embassadour and seruant Mustapha, which commeth vnto thee: vnto whom doubt thou not to giue credence in any thing. Farewell from our imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE the 7 of May 1463.

Scanderbeg hauing by the aforesaid messenger receiued these letters, and well considered of the same, returned answer as followeth: M

The champion of Christ Iesus, George Castriot, otherwise called Scanderbeg, prince of the Albanenses and Epirots, to the most excellent Mahomet king of the Turks, greeting.

Scanderbeg his answere to the letters of Mahomet.

You marueil (most noble Mahomet*) that my souldiers (as you say) contrarie to our league and the conditions*

A conditions of our peace, haue entered into your confines, and from thence caried a great bootie. Of which thing (you say) the Venetians are the authors, whom you call your mortall enemies: inferring afterward, that you are little therewith offended, for that you are a most mightie prince, and can easily digest such vnkindnesse, for the great loue you beare vnto me: and the rather, for that I did it deceiued (as it pleaseth you to say) by others. All these things you can easily forgiue and forget: so that I will by solemne oath confirme the same conditions of peace that were in our former league betwixt vs agreed vpon. And thereunto you do greatly vrge me, you admonish and counsell me to follow your aduise, as tending to the great profit and securitie of me and my posteritie, least happily whilest I seeke to please the Venetians, I incur your heauie displeasure. Besides this, the more to terrifie me, you reckon vp as it were
B in a catalogue, the people, nations, kings, and princes, by you ouercome and subdued. But what is that which is so strange (I pray you) and which you so much maruell at (most noble Mahomet?) Is it not for that my souldiers did that in the confines of your dominions, whereof they were (of right) sorrie; and had thereof to me complained, that your souldiers had before done the like in their goods and possessions. Wherefore if they also vpon a militarie brauerie (as is your manner of phrase) haue made themselues whole, and done one shrewd turne for another, reuenging iniurie receiued, and not inferring any of new: there is no cause that you should either thinke it strange or blame me. I would my selfe haue restrained my souldiers, although they were greeuously iniured (I will plainely confesse vnto you a troth) I would haue appeased their angrie minds, enflamed with desire of reuenge; if you (a prince of all others most rich and bountifull) would either haue taken order, that full restitution might haue beene made vn-
